A very bland gent with a fast rate of speech got me into it. He had a stock of two-bit pen and pencil sets, in fake gold, but individually boxed. He was doing a fine business selling these to dead people! Of course the dead didn't pay—their mourners did. From the obituary column in the newspapers he would get the names and addresses of recently deceased, paste their names on the inside of the box with dime store lettering, and then show up at the door. The dialogue went as follows:

"How do you do, madame? Is Mr. Brown in?"

"No. Mr. Brown..."

"When will he be home?"

"I'm afraid never. Mr. Brown... died a few days ago."

"Oh, I'm terribly sorry. You see, he ordered this gold-plated pen and pencil set, personally inscribed to him, and we are just making delivery now."

He'd hold the set up, she'd see the name of her husband (or whatever the relationship) on the box, and in her sentimental state would invariably buy it. The price was five dollars. I tried it and it worked... several times. I had food in my belly, money in my pockets, and began telling myself I was a very smart boy. But something was wrong inside of me somewhere—only I did my best not to know what it was. To this day I keep telling myself I would have quit soon anyway, but, as it was, I got help. On my list was a Roland Sheffield, who, according to his obituary, had died at the age of 60. A middle-aged woman came to the door and the spiel went as usual until I got to the part about the recently deceased having ordered the pen and pencil set.

The woman's eyes opened wide. "I'm just a friend of the family," she said, "but I must say Roland Sheffield was a good deal smarter than he let on to his folks. You see, Roland was just six months old when he died."

I stopped running about 20 blocks later, when I was well out of town, and checked the newspaper again. It still claimed that Roland Sheffield was 60. The typesetter must have made a mistake, I decided, but not as big a mistake as I had made. Nothing was ever more plain.

Children in school or living with their families are told what is right and what is wrong. To some extent they also find out for themselves. I found out almost all by myself, by living in error or alongside it, and knowing it for what it was... not guessing. The education I got ground and slapped into me might be difficult to describe in terms of formal learning, but what there is of it is solid. Nobody ever had to paint the horrors of drink to me; I was next door to them for years and wouldn't dream of getting any closer. Nobody ever had to tell me about gambling; I saw it around me as a child in terms of the unforgettable misery it can cause, and the lesson is in me to stay. A big Chicago night club once paid me almost double my salary to star in one of its shows. I wondered why because my act proved not at all suitable for its patrons, and one night one of the waiters told me the reason. He said the club owners felt I wouldn't cost them anything because they were sure I was a gambler and expected me to lose my salary and more on their dice and card tables. Honestly, I felt sorry for them. Nobody has ever seen me bet more than an apple in my life.

You learn to think, and think right through to rock bottom, when you are on your own. You automatically take promises apart for the facts in them, you study over all you see and hear until it makes sense. Sometimes your findings aren't popular ones, the crowd and you don't think alike. Well... that's the price a man pays if he doesn't like to kid himself... and it's worth it.

Eventually, these ways of thinking are the ways in which you come to look at religion. And it is so with me. For instance, the Christ who is always pictured with hands in pious gesture and holy look shining from his face—the Christ in sandals and flowing robe. For me this is too pat a picture for One who attracted tens of thousands of adherents in His time, and hundreds or thousands of millions after His going. His must have been a more positive, a more human personality. I can see Him with His disciples. He calls to them. "Say, fellows..." and they turn to Him as He speaks, not in book talk, in vague verses or proverbs, but in direct words, man to man, and with an animation and enthusiasm that puts a snap in the very atmosphere around them. That was Jesus Christ as I see Him.

Those people who like to be described as God-fearing Christians—I just cannot agree that there can be such people. The very first feeling I ever had of God, the very nature of God, if you like, is that He is One to whom you come in trust. If you trust someone are you not being untrue by fearing him? It is more likely that you love him. So for me the phrase is best, means what you want it to mean, when you say, "A God-loving Christian."

The biblical explorers, men and women who delve into the depths of Bible print and like to split hairs as to the possible meaning of certain passages; they have never impressed me, neither with their learning nor their Christian spirit. The world doesn't suffer for a lack of clear, religious text, nor are the ways of man clogged up by biblical obscurities. If only the most simple of the Bible's injunctions were followed: the Sermon on the Mount, the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, you would no longer require armies, or a police force, or even laws. Truth needs no interpreters—just spreading.

When prayers were first explained to me, when I first heard those in which a whole detailed series of requests is contained, it sounded just as if someone was reading off a Christmas list. It just didn't sound right to me—if you know what I mean. I felt then, as I feel now, that one doesn't ask for material gain or the specific article. I pray. I pray every night that I can be a better person, that I can be of service, and that I can continue to make people laugh. I pray not only to God but to myself because I think God is in me, as He is in all of us, and that in this way it is given to me to help myself. It was thus I prayed last New Year's Eve, when I was recovering from a serious operation, and I added the hope that I become more understanding. This was important to me because I have come a long way from the kid I was—and I want to keep on coming. Sometimes, when they are travelling, strangers will start talking to each other, and if they are companionable and lucky their words will fall together nicely. The nicest I ever heard fell on my ears when spoken by a little Irish priest who took the seat in front of me on a New York to California plane a few years ago. We had talked for some time, and he had learned on a stop-off in Chicago who I was, when I asked him if he liked to fly. "No," he said. "Do you?" "No, I don't," I told him. He nodded. "That's because you and I work with people," he said. He looked out of the window and pointed below. "Neither one of us should have a fear of flying. Working with people I think we are a little closer to Him down there than we are up here." Yes . . . the nicest words I have ever heard. END

By the time Jeff got his smallpox vaccination and had received his passport, the studio had decided on two more postponements. He was due to leave the following day when on August 28th he received a cable from Malta from Frank McCarthy, producer of the picture. McCarthy knew how anxious Jeff was to stick around home as long as possible and was doing his best to stretch the starting date. The cable read to the effect that Jeff could count on September 5th as the absolute deadline for leaving the West Coast.

Mr. and Mrs. Hunter whooped and hollered and blessed the Irish in general, and the following morning Mr. Hunter noticed a vaguely puzzled expression on Mrs. Hunter's face.

"What is it?" he said. "I think I'm going to cooperate," said Barbara.

On the doctor's advice they waited until noon before going to the Santa Monica Hospital. Barbara's mother was the only other person in the waiting room, and they consoled each other until shortly after five o'clock that afternoon, when a boy was born.

WHEN Jeff first saw the small scrunched bundle of humanity that was held up to him behind the glass of the nursery, he nervously fingered the pocket handkerchief he had removed from a suitcase that morning. "Is it mine?" he mumbled.

Mrs. Rush was more appreciative in her verbal comment. "Oh, Jeff! It's a darling boy!"

"Oh," said the new father, mopping his forehead. "Is it?"

He had five more days to recuperate, and on September 4th put Barbara Rush Hunter and Christopher Merrill Hunter tenderly into the back seat of his car. He drove home as though Sunset Boulevard were paved with whole eggs, and gingerly installed his new family in their respective bedrooms, then backed off in bewilderment and gratitude while Mother Rush took over with an experienced hand.

The next morning he gathered his luggage from the perimeter of the living room, took a last look at his new son and put his arms around his wife. It had been wonderful that he'd been allowed to stay as long as he had, but he was well aware that their parting now was even rougher on Barbara than it was on himself. Mrs. Rush would stay with her, and Jeff knew his mother-in-law would give service that would be the envy even of a mother hen. But just the same, he asked himself, what would happen when Barbara succumbed to the famous new-mother blues, and he wasn't there to console her? What would happen if Chris got the hiccups, or the croup, or maybe he might have that three-month colic they'd read about. He suddenly felt a lump rising in his throat, and he gave Barbara a hug that left her breathless, then broke away and ran down the steps.

He flew to New York and there boarded a plane for England but by the time they had reached Newfoundland the engine was spluttering in a frightening way, and passengers were informed there would be a nine hour delay. Jeff had promised to cable Barbara the minute he landed in London, and thinking that a delay of nine hours would make her frantic, he wired about it from Newfoundland. On receiving it Barbara didn't so much as raise an eyebrow. To her, an airplane is no more dangerous than a subway, and for years she has boarded airlines with the aplomb that St. Peter might have in a similar situation. Boats—they are something else, and already she was worried about Jeff's decision to return home on the liner United States.

As Barbara knew it would, Jeff's plane arrived safely at the London airport. The ship flew in at dusk, and although the proverbial mist was in the air Jeff could see the ancient city beneath him, its lights twinkling as far as the eye could see. He stepped out of the plane with the conscious thought, "I am in England." When the voice of the announcer on the public address system crackled through the air in a Cockney accent, he grinned to himself. This was perfect.

IN order to keep it that way, he tried to dodge the loneliness that enveloped him whenever he thought of his family, 6,000 miles away. He kept busy, and was thankful that in that first month he was allowed a lot of free time. He saw London, upside down and inside out. He went to Madame Tussaud's wax works, to St. Paul's Cathedral, to the Tower of London. He watched the Changing of the Guard at Buckingham Palace, and he reserved a whole day for Westminster Abbey. Jeff had always loved history, and having the living reality of these old stones beneath his feet gave him a tremendous thrill. He recorded all of it for Barbara, who had yearned to see Europe as much as he, with his Rolleiflex camera. Whenever he left the hotel in the morning his shoulders were criss-crossed with the straps of his photographic equipment, and wherever he went he caught only a portion of the guides' remarks because he was so intent on the problems of exposures, filters and speeds.

He had time to leave London and see more of England. He went up to Stratford-on-Avon and steeped himself in the reverence felt by the old town for Shakespeare. He went to Leamington Spa to watch the English at play, and he went down to Hampton Court, the famous old palace of Henry VIII. He watched an English soccer game and was deeply impressed by the skill involved, and then he went to a cricket game and was stumped. Cricket was the only thing in all of England that left him cold—cricket and the London fog, which at the time Jeff was there blanketed the city in the worst attack on record. Otherwise he fell in love with the country, its cities and its scenery, and mostly its people, who were the soul of courtesy to Jeff. He grew to admire them tremendously. "Nobody can do so much, and so cheerfully, with so little," he says.

He met a surprising number of friends while there. In Westminster Abbey he was looking at the tomb of Edward the Confessor when he was suddenly slapped on the back and turned to find two college friends he hadn't seen in years. At Bushey Air Base, where Jeff made a personal appearance, he was introduced to the American personnel officer. "Lieutenant Bell, this is Jeff Hunter." They stared at each other a full minute before the officer said, "What's this Jeff Hunter business? Aren't you Hank McKinnies from Milwaukee?" And Jeff recognized him as another old school friend.

His birthday on November 25th was spent alone, but brightened by Barbara's thoughtfulness. More than a week before, she had given him a birthday party, and on his birthday he received not only a tie from her, a print job with English knights jousting across it, but also a piece of the cake, some of the candles, a chain letter from the guests, and a flock of pictures showing the gang at home. That night he sat alone in his hotel room, and setting the time meter on his camera, took pictures to send back to Barbara. A week later she opened an envelope and saw him eating the cake, reading the letter, looking at the pictures and opening her package. It wasn't the same as being together, but it helped.

THEIR letters to each other were frequent and full. Barbara sent him a daily report of their son's progress. Chris was healthy and happy, he had an appetite like a stevedore, and he was a rarity in that he had already got the idea that nights are for sleeping. She sent him scores of pictures and Jeff spent hours trying to scotch-tape them together in accordion fashion so that when anyone inquired after his son he could whip a foot-long record out of his pocket. The pictures arrived in such volume, however, that he soon gave up the idea and instead strung them bunting fashion across his room.

His letters to her were often written in dialect, of which Jeff was learning a bewildering assortment, even within the confines of England. His letters from Paris were addressed to Mme. Hunter, and those from Rome came to Signora Hunter.

The visit to Paris stretched only over a weekend, but in that time Jeff saw more than the average tourist sees in a week. Frank McCarthy and director Roy Boulting went with him, flying across on a Friday night, and from then on Jeff forgot what sleep meant. They contacted a friend of a friend who worked in Paris with TWA and who was kind enough to supply them not only with a car, but with his services as companion and guide. They started out in Montmartre that night, seeing the Sacre-Coeur and then the famous night spots of that naughty hill. They went all over Paris and ended up at dawn in Pigalle at a cabaret which caters to American performers. The next day Jeff went on a shopping spree and bought Barbara a real French chapeau, for he is one of those rare men who knows how and wants to shop for women, and even the language problem didn't stop him from choosing a hat that is currently the envy of other Hollywood actresses.

He went into Notre Dame and had lunch at a sidewalk café and then walked along the left bank of the Seine, wishing mightily that Barbara could be with him. He looked at the awesome spread of buildings that comprise the Louvre, and decided to wait until he and Barbara together could some day enjoy its treasures. The trip was finished off on Saturday night by a visit to the Folies Bergere, and he went back to London the next day still unable to believe that he had really seen Paris.

There followed six weeks of location work in Malta, and despite the fact it was wintertime in the rest of the world, the Mediterranean was in its perpetual state of summer sunshine. They worked on Gozo Island, a rocky promontory in the sea which afforded the stark and rugged terrain over which Jeff was required to walk, run, and crawl. The cast and crew of the movie lived in those days on the British cruiser Manxman, disguised for the picture as a German ship, and Jeff made fast friends with many of the ship's crew. In his free time he went spear fishing, equipped with spear, snorkel mask and swim fins made in Genoa, and although he caught nothing spectacular, he reported to Barbara that to his way of thinking this was the world's Eden for a swimmer.

THERE was one more spree due him before he left for home, and that was Rome. He spent three days in the Eternal City before going back to England to board his ship, and they are three days Jeff will never forget. His first night there he met a young American on his way to Arabia, and discovering they were both long on curiosity and short on time, they teamed up to take practically every tour offered in Rome. They saw the Coliseum and the Forum and Hadrian's Villa and the Catacombs, and everywhere they went Jeff brought up the rear of the group, taking pictures while his pockets bulged with film and flashbulbs.

The Italian language was no more familiar to him than that of Pakistan, but he managed to get around via the tours without much trouble. His only snarl was the night he phoned the desk clerk at his hotel. For a half hour he studied his Italian pocket dictionary and carefully rehearsed, syllable by syllable, the sentence "Please awaken me at eight-thirty tomorrow morning." Then he picked up the phone and with gritted teeth intoned laboriously, "Piacere, io voglio essere svegliato domani alle otto e mezzo della mattina."

"Sure thing," replied the clerk in English. "You bet."

It was with a mixed feeling of relief and sadness that he boarded the United States at Southampton a week later, and heard "the American tongue" around him once more. The ship was big and unbelievably beautiful, and he was excitedly inspecting it when suddenly the whole ship shuddered. There were excited shouts and people running hysterically down on the dock, for in the process of being backed out of the harbor the ship had been hit by a 50-knot gust that sent her slamming back into the dock. It turned out all right—the stevedores threw coils of rope between the boat and the dock to cushion the shock, and a collision was avoided with the immense lifting cranes, but back in Hollywood Barbara read about it in the newspaper and felt the first real fear for Jeff she had known since his departure.

Four days later, even though Barbara was sure the ship would never make it, the United States docked safely in New York and Jeff spilled out, went through Customs in a fever of impatience, and in less than five hours was winging his way to Milwaukee to meet Barbara.

It was a mad, gay, crazy reunion after four months, and even though Chris had been left behind in Hollywood with his grandmother, Jeff felt it was the happiest moment in his life when he sighted Barbara, wearing that saucy hat, waiting for him at the Milwaukee airport. It was his first visit to his home town in more than three years, and they had a merry Christmas with his parents and then Jeff proudly introduced his wife to all his old friends, who numbered more than 200 on that day they held open house.

THOSE two weeks in his boyhood home were fun, but as the days rolled by he found it difficult to keep his patience for the day when he could again see his son. When they finally landed in Los Angeles and whizzed through traffic to their Westwood apartment, Jeff took the steps two at a time. He flung open the door, with Barbara right behind him, and there was Christopher Merrill, big as life, in the process of having his triangular pants changed. Jeff looked at him in astonishment. "But—but—" he said. "Is he mine?"

Mrs. Rush laughed. "You said that the first time you saw him."

"But he's so big!"

Barbara slipped her hand into Jeff's. "Honey, he's four months old! Of course he's grown. I sent you the pictures."

"I know—but somehow—in pictures—well, for heaven's sake!"

Nowadays Jeff stays home and makes up for lost time with his son. In the closets and in the corners of the apartment are stacked piles of pictures, and all kinds of literature from Europe. There is even a full set of Linguaphone records in French, bought by Jeff his first day back in London after the Paris trip. Barbara has mentioned politely that it might be a good idea if Jeff would look at his pictures, read his literature, study his French, and then put everything away in one place.

"Let's wait until we buy a house," he says. "Maybe next year. I'll go through it all then. Right now I'd rather sit and look at you."

man on the move

(Continued from page 39) This was one place where John could talk, so he sat at the wise man's feet and told him of the tragedy that had taken place. The old codger listened without interruption. He always waited for advice to be asked, you know, but he then had an answer ready.

"Son," he said, "there's only one thing to do in a case like this. Keep moving. Get your mind on other things. Play a lot, and laugh a lot, and work. You stand around mooning and you'll suffer. Like I said, keep moving. That's the thing to do."

Well, times change. A boy becomes a man. But wisdom does not change. That advice was given over 30 years ago. It worked then—and it's working now. John Wayne, whose girl has gone away, is a man on the move. A man with a lot of work to do and a lot of things on his mind.

Like most people, it took John Wayne some little time to put sound advice into action. When his wife, Chata, left him, he did his share of "mooning" and "suffering." He didn't stand around Hollywood, but he sat around in the sun of Mexico and brooded on his loss. And he took no part in the gaiety of the winter season at the resort he went to. On the surface, he was just an actor on vacation, with a smile on his face and no cares. But when he was alone with the business associates who came to see him, he was a heartsick man who just wanted to be left alone with his problems. Nothing they could do or say made him want to go back to Hollywood and work.

It appeared once, a few months after John and Chata Wayne were separated, that the melancholy tactic would be successful. Mrs. Wayne knew just how he felt and after a few months apart they went back together and had a second honeymoon in Hawaii. It was well covered by the papers and magazines, so it is not news that the honeymoon didn't take. And a few weeks later they were back where they had been at the first separation.

The advice given John Wayne years ago came back to his mind in a strange way. When the honeymoon flopped, Wayne took an extended tour of South America. He had no particular destination in mind. He just bought a couple of feet of airplane tickets and started for the places listed on the back of the travel bureau envelope. He visited Rio, Buenos Aires, Quito and all of the other famous places below the equator. But it was in Peru that life caught up with him.

Six months previously, John had gone into partnership with an old friend, Robert Fellows, in the making of the picture Big Jim McLain. They made the movie in Honolulu, and they took their time about it. Even though it was business, the project was something of a lark. Then the film went into release, just as John went away—with no future plans. Fellows finally tracked him down and got him on the phone in Lima, Peru.

"You've got to come home," Fellows said. "The picture is making a mint and Warner Brothers want us to make some more."

"I just don't feel ready to get back into grease paint yet," Wayne said.

"You don't have to," said Fellows. "I want you to produce them with me. You don't have to act in them."

"Me produce?" said Wayne. "What can I do?"

"Look, you idiot," said Fellows, "you've been in this business 20 years. You know more about making pictures than I ever will. I need your help. We can keep our company going and turn out half-a-dozen movies a year. The releasing company likes the way we work together."

"No," said Wayne, "not right now. I've got to get something out of my system first."

"Well you're sure going about it in the wrong way," said Fellows. "What you need is to get your mind on other things. Stop mooning and work."

"What did you say?" asked Wayne.

Fellows repeated it for him.

Wayne held the telephone instrument in his hand for a moment, trying to remember where he had heard pretty much the same thing before. It was like being in a situation you felt you had been in before. Then he remembered his wise old friend on the porch. He was laughing when he spoke again.

"Get a desk in that office for me," he said, "and put my name on the door. I'm leaving for Hollywood in the morning."

to put aside his heartaches for the more practical things. As a very young man, new to motion pictures, and without much apparent future except as a cowboy actor who could do his own stunts, he married his school-days sweetheart, Josephine Saenz. During the next ten years they had four children, two boys and two girls. It was a happy marriage for a number of reasons. One, for a long time John and Josephine were in love; two, Wayne is a family man, and loved his kids. But it was unbalanced in other ways. John is a religious man, but, like many people of our time, not too devout. Josephine, on the other hand, was a Roman Catholic and her religion was the most important thing in her life. If John had been of the same faith it might have been possible to reconcile this difference, but the fact that he wasn't, made for friction. He possibly thought Josephine's church work was taking too much of her time.

Eventually an estrangement came into the marriage. It was something neither of the Waynes liked to think about, but it was there. John, who had been a complete homebody, began playing poker and chumming around with the lads a lot. Actually, as Wayne told a friend once, there never was an argument, let alone a fight. Josephine, being a devout woman, hated the very word divorce, but she grew to know that it had to be faced. And then it came. The marriage was dissolved in the California courts.

For months John Wayne couldn't handle the situation. He was a man in a fog, unused to the solo environment he found himself in. Never a ladies' man, he crept into a shell, emerging only to saunter through the pictures he had to make to take care of his obligations. Work? He had none. Making movies wasn't work for him by then. And he had no business interests to occupy himself with.

IT WAS about that time that John Wayne discovered Mexico as a place to hide. It was far enough away from Hollywood so he wasn't bothered with reporters always asking about his romantic situation. Far enough away so that if he went to dinner with a girl it didn't make all the columns as the love of the year. But no matter how you want to tag it, these flights to escape were "mooning" jaunts, no good because they didn't let a man really get his mind off his lost love. There were too many guitars playing and too many star-studded nights.

The first time John Wayne sat across from Chata Bauer at a Mexico City luncheon he knew he was in love. And the story of how he courted and married her, which has been told many times, is concrete evidence that it was. Love is a convenient way to forget love, but it doesn't come along quickly enough usually. At any rate, it saved John Wayne from stagnation this time, gave him a new grasp on life and charged him with the ambition he needed. He brought Chata back to Hollywood and settled down to several years of complete happiness; a happiness that was as complete as the one he had enjoyed in the early years of his first marriage.

But last year that ended, too. Nobody has ever said just what it was that broke John and Chata up, but it has been hinted that she was extravagant, that she demanded too much personal attention, that she listened to her mother above all others, and that she fell out of love with Wayne. John, himself, has never said what it was, if he knows. But he has admitted that Chata fell out of love first, and that it hurt very much. So, as he did once before, he packed a few things into a bag and took off for places where an actor wouldn't always have to be answering questions. A

"mooning" place is what he called it. As we said, it was in Lima, Peru, that the old man on the porch caught up with him. It was in Lima that he held the telephone in his hand for a moment and then began to laugh as he heard from 'way back in his boyhood the old Solomon tell him to keep moving, to work and play and laugh, because that was the way to forget that the nine-year-old girl with the missing front tooth and the freckles had checked out without leaving a forwarding address.

These pages are not generally filled with details of a man's business life. MODERN SCREEN is not Dun and Bradstreet's. But in the case of John Wayne, his business life, his travelling and his new experiences as a producer of motion pictures are linked definitely with his personal and romantic life. He was met at the airport by Bob Fellows and his business manager. They sat in the back of the car, as they were driven into Hollywood, and Wayne grinned like a boy with a new scout knife as he was briefed on the plans for Wayne-Fellows Productions.

"I'll tell you what," said Fellows, "you're probably tired, so you go home and rest." "Who's tired?" laughed Wayne. "Let's go to the office. I'd better get some of these brains you claim I have working for the company right away or you guys will run the business right into the ground."

The three of them sat and chuckled, and nobody was happier about the whole thing than John Wayne.

Since that day John Wayne has been the busiest actor who ever became a business man. He had a commitment at Warner Brothers to make Trouble Along The Way, but, although he is said to have turned in one of the best performances in his career, every moment away from in front of the camera was spent on the telephone with his office or at luncheons where such matters as casting, financing, story-buying were taken care of. Wayne is no silent partner.

WHEN the Warner Brothers picture was finished, Wayne-Fellows already had its second picture, Plunder Of The Sun, shooting in Mexico, and Wayne, after the last shot was in the camera, wiped the make-up off his face and dashed to the airport to get a plane to the location. The next morning he was on the set—and they say he drove the director and the actors crazy by putting his finger into all of their pies. He was so enthusiastic and wanted to take care of so many details himself that his partner had to take him aside.

"Take it easy," said Fellows. "You're making these guys nervous. Why don't you go down to Acapulco for a couple of weeks and rest?"

"Rest?" said Wayne. "Are you crazy, man? I've got too much to do. If a fellow doesn't watch all the details making one of these movies he can lose his shirt."

Fellows threw his hands into the air. "I asked for it," he said. "I wanted to get you steamed up—but I didn't think you'd boil over."

"Stick around, son," said Wayne with a grin. "I'm not even warmed up yet."

When the picture was over, Fellows and the other executives of the company were worn to a frazzle, but happy that they had talked John into taking a short vacation in Acapulco before starting the next movie. They took a house together and planned several days of deep sleep, with interruptions only for eating. This dream was rudely shattered.

The morning after they arrived there was a great clatter of cars driving into the courtyard of the house. Somebody opened an eye in alarm.

"What's that?" he said.

Peering out of the window, the tired movie-maker saw a group of men in city clothing alighting from the vehicles while the house servants carried mountains of luggage upstairs. He awakened his companions and they went down to see what was happening. Wayne sat on the patio, and around a big table sat his lawyer, a couple of fellows from Wayne-Fellows home office, an agent and a well-known director.

"What's going on here?" Fellows managed to stammer.

"No use wasting time," said Wayne, bright as a sparrow at a window pane. "I got these men down here so we can get to work on the next show. You better shower and shave, you look terrible. But hurry, I need you."

At the time of this writing, Wayne-Fellows Productions, actively headed by John Wayne, is the most promising independent producing organization in Hollywood. Two films have been completed and at least half-a-dozen more are ready to go. Such famous directors as Leo McCarey, John Farrow and William Wellman have been taken into the group and will make one film a year for the new company. The pictures will be made in all corners of the world, for this is the policy of the producers. And, because no studio space will be owned, and thereby become a perpetual upkeep problem, they expect they can make the movies cheaper than any of the major firms.

NOT only in business will John Wayne be an active man in the coming years. He'll be on the move about the world because he has taken a new and vital interest in world affairs. Long an avowed Republican, he is solidly behind President Eisenhower—he was at his inauguration—and will take an active part in government affairs, short, of course, of running for office. He will attend the Coronation of Queen Elizabeth in London, and will take advantage of his presence abroad to scout Europe for locations for his company, and to look for stories and talent.

Just a few weeks ago Hollywood had evidence that John Wayne, the man, was coming out of his shell protecting him from women. He attended a party at which Marilyn Monroe was a guest. Wayne has never shown any interest in Hollywood women except for his two wives, but when he saw Marilyn he whistled like any other man. As a matter of fact he whistled several times and if it hadn't been for the fact that he thought she was in love with Joe DiMaggio he'd surely have tried to kidnap her from the party. On the way home that night he relieved himself of what for John Wayne is a magnificent compliment, for he is noted as a fellow of few and very carefully chosen words when it comes to girls.

Leaning back in the seat he closed his eyes and said: "Man! Have you ever seen anything like that Monroe in a red dress? She made me feel like I just got out of high school!" And the laugh that followed was lupine.

Yes, the man's on the move. The lad's in action. He's behind a desk that's cluttered with the things that keep a fellow's mind from brooding on the past. And when he talks his deals on the telephone he puts his feet on the desk and looks like a Wall Street broker. Some day some reporter is going to call his office, though, and ask to speak to him.

"May I tell Mr. Wayne the nature of your business?" his secretary will ask.

"I hear he's got a girl on his mind," the reporter will say. "I want to talk to him about romance."

"Romance?" the secretary will say. "You must have the wrong number. Or the wrong Mr. Wayne!"

GOOD NEWS

THE STORY OF THE DEAN MARTIN SPLIT . . . SHELLEY'S PREMATURE BABY . . . MARILYN MMMM "CRASHES" PARTY

The baby shower was a big surprise for Shelley Winters . . . but she gave the world a bigger one. (For the full story of her premature baby, see page 27.) Susan Cabot's curiosity almost overcome her . . .

. . . before Shelley unwrapped the quilt. Constance Dowling, Pier Angeli, hostess Dawn Addams, and Susan were delighted. Mama Shelley was nearly overcome. The party was a bright spot for the lonely girl.

IT ISN'T the easiest thing in the world to be the wife of a movie actor no matter how famous, good-looking and rich he is. There are no sure-fire recipes for keeping a movie hero a husband.

But, close friends say that blonde Mrs. Dean Martin couldn't have taken a more mistaken course with Dean. One of her closest pals told me:

"With the best intentions in the world, Jeanne set out to see that Dean didn't get a swelled head. Because she was so afraid his great success with Jerry Lewis would spoil him, she bent backward in the wrong direction.

"She made a point of never playing his records and song hits at home. Instead, Jeanne would play Bing Crosby and Perry Como recordings.

"If Dean told a joke, Jeanne had a way of laughing it aside with an implication that his humor could be saved for his routines with Jerry.

"When they appeared in public, she resented having photographers' flashlight bulbs popping in her face. Did you ever notice how few smiling candid camera shots there were of Jeanne with Dean?

"It's all right for a wife to try to keep her famous husband's feet on the ground and his head out of the clouds—but, movie star or not men like to be appreciated at home."

That's very true. And, no doubt it is the correct version of one side of the story. But I've never known of an argument or a separation where there aren't two sides and I'm sure Jeanne has hers.

I know she is a very broken-hearted girl. Since their parting neither she nor Dean have said anything other than their initial statement that they "are sorry."

Jeanne has spent almost every minute at the home of her good friends, the Gordon MacRaes. The night Dean left home, Gordon and Sheila brought Jeanne to their house and stayed up all night trying to comfort her.

SHELLEY WINTERS' baby girl was born prematurely and was in an incubator for two days before the "scoop" leaked out just in time for my radio show.

I talked with Shelley in the hospital and she was still a very groggy girl. "Our little girl weighed just four-pounds ten-ounces," said Shell, "and for 24 hours it was touch and go whether she would live. Oh, Louella, I'm so happy that the doctor now says everything is all right—and she will be all right."

Shelley has been such a miserably lonely girl all during her pregnancy (Vittorio Gassman had to return to Italy to fulfill contracts with the Italian government). I don't believe she could have stood it if anything had happened to her baby.

The first thing she did after the arrival of little Vittoria was to call the "papa" in Rome. She caught him right in the middle of a performance of Hamlet on the stage.

"He is so excited," Shell said huskily, "he will fly here as soon as he possibly can. My poor darling had the flu and he has been so worried about us, the baby and me." Shell proudly reports that Vittoria looks just like her father. "She has the same big blue eyes and dark hair and she's so cute!"

WHEN "His Royal Highness" Prince Mike Romanoff gives a party with his Consort, Gloria, believe me—it's one to remember. Mike spares no expense (and kindly do not remind me that he owns his own café in which to splurge). The Red and White Valentine Ball he and Gloria hosted in the Imperial Room of Romanoff's was the first I've ever known for which the feminine guests did as requested and wore either a white or a red gown. Usually, at least one free soul will show up in purple or green just to show her independence. Not this time. It was such a lovely effect, all the girls in red or white—many such lovely creations. I wore my wonderful Don Loper Inauguration dress. (Continued on next page)

Newlyweds Ginger Rogers and Jacques Bergerac (center) chat with TV actor Charles Farrell at a party at the Rocquet Club. Ginger, 41, and Jacques, 26, were wed on February 7, in Palm Springs. It was his first, her fourth, trip to the altar.

Spring Beauty Hints

by REGIS PAINE
beauty consultant

Arms Program—Most women today make sure their legs are smoothly groomed, hands and elbows creamed to softness. But, often, when they raise their arms, the underarm skin shows irritation from using a too-harsh deodorant. (One out of two women have had this trouble, a nation-wide survey shows.)

To avoid this, use YODORA, the "beauty cream" deodorant. Made with a pure face cream base, YODORA does not irritate normal skin. A four-week test, conducted by a leading skin doctor, showed not one case of underarm skin irritation from using YODORA, even when applied right after shaving. YODORA helps beautify the underarm skin.

Helping Hands—Spring's the time when "smart cookies" like to whip up a tasty hamburger or toss a tangy salad. But who wants the odor of onions and garlic lingering on hands made to be held in the moonlight? Just smooth on a bit of YODORA, and your hands will be soft and sweet-smelling in no time.

Tips for Teens—Don't use too-heavy make-up on sensitive adolescent skin; nor a too-strong deodorant. Use YODORA, accepted by the American Medical Association Committee on Cosmetics. YODORA not only stops perspiration odor effectively, it also softens, smooths and beautifies the skin.

Gloria Stewart spent the day of the party practically in tears because she was sure Jimmy wouldn't be back from Palm Springs where he was recording a show with Bing Crosby in time to take her to the party. And she had such a lovely dress to wear.

(Believe it or not, Jimmy arrived in Palm Springs at 3:30 in the afternoon, taped the show with Bing, and was back in Hollywood to pick up his lovely Gloria at 8:05 on the nose!)

Lauren Bacall wore the shortest dress I've ever seen—even in the flapper days. But far from being hey-hey she was another almost in tears when she told me about her old man's (Humphrey Bogart) automobile accident in Europe.

"He bit his tongue so badly he had to have three stitches taken in it and he's never been so lonesome for me and the children," said Baby Bacall too upset to care about a little non sequiter in her conversation.

Lauren was sooo upset I had to take a second look at her. Usually, she is cool, calm, detached and never overly sentimental about her "old man."

While I was dancing with William Haines he said, "You know, there are only two women stars in this town who keep up the perfect illusion of glamor and excitement throughout the years."

"And who are they?" I asked.

He pointed to Joan Crawford, who was with her director, David Miller. Joan with flowers in her hair and a big red heart on her dress did, indeed, look every inch the fascinating movie Queen.

"Gloria Swanson is the other," said Bill. "Joan and Gloria are individualists; too many other stars look like carbon copies of each other."

Rocky Cooper seemed to be lonely wandering around. If she had an escort I didn't see him. Peter Lawford, who is often with her, hasn't been going out since his father's death.

I wonder if Bill Haines spotted Mari Blanchard escorted by her devoted Greg Bautzer? Mari seems to me to have plenty of oomph and individuality for a new personality.

WHAT'S all this about Marilyn Monroe "crashing" the birthday party Jane Wyman gave for Freddie Karger at Chasens and, "everybody being SOOOOO embarrassed because Freddie used to date Marilyn before he married Jane!" Oh, now—Please!

In the first place, a guest at Jane's party in the new private room at Chasen's ran into Marilyn (dining in the café proper) and insisted that the Monroe join the party for a cocktail. Marilyn didn't even know whose party it was until she dropped in for a hot five minutes.

As for Janie and Freddie being embarrassed—that's a lot of mush. That Wyman girl whom I love so much is far too good a scout for such nonsense. She asked Marilyn to remain for dinner—but the gal had a couple of escorts waiting for her in the café.

Poor Marilyn. No matter what she does she usually gets a blast from some quarter.

GETTING back to Jane's party—it was one of the few real surprises ever pulled in our town. She kept her plans for a birthday celebration so secret from Freddie that she had the invitations sent out in the names of her good friends, Bobbie and Bill Perlberg.

When Janie walked in with Freddie, 85 guests were already assembled and his band broke into the strains of "Happy Birthday To You." Freddie almost fell over in surprise and delight.

Jack Benny's birthday was the next day, so Janie had a cake for him, too.

Joan Crawford danced miles around the floor with Jennings Lang. Ditto Diana Lynn and director Freddie de Cordova.

In Hollywood it's hardly safe to say any two people are romancing. By the time you get the paper out of the typewriter it's pretty apt to be yesterday's news. However, I have seen Diana with de Cordova at two or three different parties, dancing and looking into each other's eyes as though they meant it.

Diana was very hard hit by the break up of her marriage to John Lindsay. I'm glad she seems to be finding the good-looking and charming director such good company.

NOTABLE Quotables:

Terry Moore: "It's my press agent who makes me sound silly in print!"

Marilyn Monroe: "I'm not worried about how I'll look in 3D or 4D or any old-D they think up."

Jane Powell: "It was a mistake to gray my hair. Nature takes care of that soon enough."

Bing Crosby: "Do I watch television? Like a snake charmer watches a cobra!"

Jerry Lewis: "I'm on Dean's side, naturally. But there's no law against hoping that the two sides will soon be one side again."

THE Donald O'Connor separation has been expected for a long time. But never let it be said that Donald and Gwenn didn't try to hold on to their marriage of nine years.

They made no secret of the fact that both were consulting psychiatrists. Time after time they quietly separated with Donald taking an apartment in Hollywood while Gwenn remained in their home with their six-year-old daughter.

The temporary "absent" treatment seemed to work. They always made up and Donald always moved back home—until the final break.

Their troubles are said to be centered in their teen-age marriage. Don was 18 and Gwenn just 17 when they were married in 1944. The day after the wedding, he went into the Army.

One bit of gossip, definitely not true, is that Gwenn was dying for a career of her own and Don wanted her to stay home with the baby. He did all he could to promote Gwenn's professional life even to having her appear several times on his TV and radio shows. Even their child has appeared twice on his shows.

I'm sorry to say that I doubt if the O'Connors will patch up their differences this time.

Still together, even in the face of splitting-up rumors, Tony and Jonet seem to be shoping up as, one of Hollywood's happiest couples.

However, give them E for "effort" during these many years of problems, separations, and kiss-and-make-up reconciliations.

BABY Talk: Esther Williams and Ben Gage are expecting their third child. They have two little sons, so naturally, they're hoping for a girl this time.

As usual, Esther was a long time admitting she was on the stork's list again. I called her in Florida, where she's making a picture, and she didn't call back (as expected). This, however, did not keep me from breaking the story. I've dealt with Esther before on these matters.

Her excuse was she "wasn't sure. Maybe it was the difference in climate in Florida. Or the water scenes she had been making," and so on and on.

It's all right for a gal to keep a secret as long as it's a secret. But when her studio gets around to confirming the news—it makes you wonder why Esther doesn't break the happy tidings herself.

DON'T—I repeat, don't try this style unless you have a derriere like Corinne Calvet's, but her glamorous peddle-pushers are the talk of the town.

They are short, tight pants fitted half way down the legs and Corinne's gaudiest pair are of black velvet with red polka dots!

TOO often our movie producers pay too much attention to the East Coast and the West Coast and more or less slough off the reactions of fans in the middle of the country. This is why I am particularly interested in the results of a poll conducted in seven states in the Rocky Mountain district.

150,000 people voted these results:

THE HOLLYWOOD SET

By MARY MARATHON

Buffalo Bill Cody and Wild Bill Hickok! Anybody who doesn't stir to the mention of these daring Americans who left us such a wealth of true adventure stories . . . just doesn't know how to LIVE! Two of the most colorful characters in our history, Buffalo Bill's and Wild Bill's fight through rugged wilderness and over scorched desert to open a mail route to California, makes every minute of "Pony Express" a breathless experience! It's a picture that will give you that exciting feeling of being part of a glorious venture! That's the way I felt. I wasn't just watching it . . . I was WITH it!

The story is based on incidents that occurred after the founder of the Pony Express commissioned Cody (Charlton Heston) and Hickok (Forrest Tucker) to blaze the trail westward to California. There's stirring heart interest, as well as action. Denny (Jan Sterling), a charming, reckless tomboy, adores Cody and dreams of being his bride. She has some pretty stiff competition in the beautiful person of Evelyn Hastings (Rhonda Fleming), a volatile redhead!

* * *

Evelyn and her brother are on the side of the rebellious Californians who, incited by crafty foreign agents, feel their state will fare better isolated from the Union.

There's a thrilling climax involving Denny. Your heart will ache for her but I'm not going to reveal all now. Just make sure to hop to it . . . when the "Pony Express" rides your way!

If you hear someone say "It made my hair stand on end," you can bet that he—or she—is talking about "The War of the Worlds." E-e-e-k! Remember your favorite thriller? That was a cosy fireside story by comparison. When I viewed "The War of the Worlds," my scalp felt as though an Indian warrior from the pioneer days was practising his favorite hobby—with me as the scalpee! And what made me shiver? In a nice, warm projection room?

* * *

"The War of the Worlds" opens on a high note of terror. Out of a sudden, flashing brilliance in the sky, numberless huge, fiery objects come crashing to earth, spraying screaming heat rays that destroy everything in sight!

* * *

What are they? You can't talk me into telling you! This is the kind of picture that has so many surprising turns that I want them to be surprising to YOU. Just go see "The War of the Worlds" and be scared yourself! And you'll never have a more fascinating time being frightened. I WILL tell you that the invaders are finally destroyed—And HOW . . . will AMAZE you!

There's another thriller coming along that I'll get my typewriter into for the next issue of this column. It's "Jamaica Run," starring Ray Milland, Arlene Dahl and Wendell Corey. I KNOW you'll want to hear more about this one. It's a picture with murder . . . suspense . . . and an underwater action scene the like of which YOU'VE NEVER SEEN!

MONTGOMERY CLIFT has set up bachelor diggin's at the Roosevelt Hotel and every day Monty walks the half-block over to Hollywood High School and goes through track workouts with the team and the instructor, a good pal of his.

The athletes are so used to Monty they pay no attention. Even more surprising, the co-eds either don't recognize him (which seems unlikely) or else high school girls in Hollywood are so immune to stars, there's not a good gasp left in 'em.

Clift is becoming very interested in the school activities. He attends lectures on subjects that interest him—usually at night.

So far the most excited group about Monty is the drama class. He has attended several rehearsals of the Spring play, The Road To Rome and given many helpful hints to the young thespians.

He is a strange boy, this Monty. He's far happier training and coaching with the high school kids than he would ever be as a social lion attending Hollywood cocktail parties.

THE Letter Box: My apologies to the State College of Washington, in Pullman, Washington, where the Crosby twins, Philip and Dennis, are students of animal husbandry. I mistakenly placed the boys at the University of Washington. Maynard Hicks, director of State's news bureau, calls the error to my attention, "because we are very proud of the twins here." All Hollywood is very proud of them, too.

Charlton Heston has been mentioned more than any other actor in this month's fan mail—and it's all complimentary, Charlton. Take a bow.

Bengt Overgaard, Studentgatan 28, Lund, Sweden, writes: "Lew Ayres is still tremendously popular in Sweden—why is there no news of him?" For one thing, Lew shuns publicity.

"Lola," of Kansas City, wants to know, "How does 41-year-old Ginger Rogers think she will be happily married to 26-year-old Jacques What's-His-Name?" His name is Jacques Bergerac. As for Ginger, she looks no more than 26 herself, Lola. Happy marriages are built on understanding and companionship, anyway. Not ages.

I'm omitting addresses of servicemen who would like to correspond with film fans this month to print the news and views of other correspondents. But I haven't forgotten the boys—and next month I'll print some new names and addresses.

That's all for now. See you next month.

DIVORCE AHEAD?

Quotes from Greta stoutly deny a split between Greg and her. But many believe they're heading for a Peck of trouble all the same.

BY MARSHA SAUNDERS

■ Last May when Gregory and Greta Peck, married ten years, stepped aboard the Queen Elizabeth with their three small sons and secretary, it was the understanding of their friends and business associates that none of them would return to the United States for at least a year and a half.

Today, of the entire entourage that sailed for Cherbourg on that May 19th, only Eldred Gregory Peck remains in Europe.

His wife and the three boys, Jonathan 8, Steve 6, and Carey Paul 3, are all back in Hollywood living in the Peck ranch house overlooking Mandeville Canyon, while Dame Rumor, led by Walter Winchell and a small army of other columnists, suggests to the world the erroneous possibility that the Pecks have separated because Greg might be unduly interested in the welfare of a fascinating Schiaparelli model in Paris named Julienne. He isn't, not in Julienne, anyway. All the same Hollywood insists that something in the man-and-wife relationship between Greg and Greta must have gone awry in Europe, or why, after eight months abroad, should Mrs. Peck have suddenly bundled up her flock, moved out of the villa she and Greg had rented near St. Germaine, take the boys out of the American School in Paris, and sail back to the good old U.S.A.?

Greta Peck says, "Greg and I are not separated, there will be no divorce, we may even fly over to see him this summer, and frankly, all those rumors make me sick.

"The children and I came back to California, because it's just too difficult trying to raise them abroad under Greg's schedule. He's in Italy for a few months, France for a few months, England for a few months. He likes to have his family with him, and we just can't keep (Continued on page 62)

"Who says we'll divorce? We won't. We're not even separated," says Greta Peck. But she and Gregory are certainly not together. She and the boys returned to California in January. Greg is scheduled for at least three more films abroad.

"I never dreamed
mean so much to me!"

Why put up with unnecessary and downright uncomfortable inconveniences at "that time of the month?" To many women the difference that the Tampax method of sanitary protection can make is a revelation. There are no bulky external pads to create chafing, irritation and odor. There are no belts or pins to "show."

These advantages alone would account for much of the popularity of Tampax. But internally-worn Tampax gives you other and even more dramatic benefits. You can't even feel the Tampax, once it's in place. It's easily disposable, even when visiting. Tampax can be worn in shower or tub. And your hands need never touch the Tampax, thanks to the dainty, throwaway applicator.

Invented by a doctor, Tampax is made of pure white, compressed surgical cotton. A whole month's supply can be carried right in your purse. Tampax is sold at drug and notion counters in 3 absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. The economy size gives an average 4-months' supply. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

Peter Pan, the boy who never grew up, teaches the Darling children, Wendy, John and Michael, to fly. Then they all fly away to Never Land, for great adventures.

Falling into the hands of wicked pirates, Peter battles with their leader, evil Captain Hook. Meantime, the Lost Boys are captured by Indians, who later free them.

PETER PAN

■ One of the most famous of all children's fantasies, written by J. M. Barrie, is brought to delicate, joyful life in this full-length animated cartoon by Walt Disney. Peter Pan is the boy who refuses to grow up, who lives in Never Land where mermaids drift on lily pads and pirates stalk the scary seas. One evening, just after bedtime, a girl named Wendy and her two brothers are visited by Peter (in his bright green costume with a feather in his cap he looks like an adventurous little Robin Hood) and Tinker Bell, the fairy as big as your thumb who flits about in a swirl of falling gold dust. All of them fly back over the hills and across the moon to a child world and a series of breath-taking adventures. There's the ugly villain Captain Hook and his band of rowdy henchmen; there's the Crocodile who ticks (he's swallowed a clock) and hungrily follows Hook's ship around with his jaws wide open. There are the Lost Boys, the Indian Village, the wonderful ditties like—"You Can Fly—You Can Fly," and "What Makes The Red Man Red." As usual, Walt Disney's creations are expertly drawn and beautifully alive in dazzling color. They move with such dreamlike grace and charming vitality you wish they'd come alive—but perhaps that would spoil this delightful excursion into make-believe.—RKO. (Jackpot of the month on page 20)

Solome, returned from Rome to Jerusalem, performs the Dance of the Seven Veils before lecherous King Herod. Her mother is Herod's wife, a woman of evil, who plots the death of John the Baptist. Solome believes she is saving the holy man's life. Herod misunderstands her wish, murders John.

Centurion Clodius, who is secretly Christian, and Solome have been baptised by John. He tells them that Jesus is the true Messiah.

After John's murder, revolted by her mother, Salome and Clodius flee. They find The Master and join the Christians for the Sermon on the Mount.

SALOME

■ Rita Hayworth drives Charles Laughton mad with lust when she dances under seven Technicolored veils. That's the highspot of Salome. You know the story. Salome (Rita), banished from Rome, comes home to the kingdom of her corrupt mother (Judith Anderson) and step-father (Laughton). There she falls in love with a Roman officer (Stewart Granger) who is a secret convert to the teachings of John the Baptist (Alan Bodel). The Queen wants to have John killed—he defiles her name, threatens her power, she says. The King won't touch John who he fears is the Messiah. The struggle between the King and Queen involves the use of Salome as a pawn, and the movie reaches its climax during her dance when the head of John is carried into the banquet hall on a plate. But that's only a skeleton of the script. Columbia probably emptied its purse to put meat on those bones. It's a lavish spectacle. The costumes alone are worth the price of admission. Don't fool with INFECTIOUS DANDRUFF

Start with Listerine Antiseptic... Quick!

A LITTLE normal shedding is natural, but when flakes and scales persist on coat collar, look out! They may mean infectious dandruff. Dandruff is the most frequent scaly disease of the scalp. When due to germs, Listerine Antiseptic is especially fitted to aid you because it gets after the germs in a jiffy.

Don't fool around with preparations devoid of germ-killing power which merely remove loose dandruff. Start now with Listerine Antiseptic and massage regularly twice a day . . . the medicinal treatment that has helped so many. Listerine Antiseptic treats the infection as an infection should be treated . . . with quick germ-killing action.

You simply douse it on the scalp, full strength, and follow with vigorous fingertip massage.

Kills "Bottle Bacillus"

Listerine Antiseptic gives your scalp an antiseptic bath—and kills millions of germs associated with infectious dandruff, including the "Bottle Bacillus" germ (P. ovale). This is the stubborn invader that many dermatologists say is a causative agent of infectious dandruff.

Keep the treatment up regularly: see how quickly the flakes and scales begin to disappear . . . how itching is alleviated . . . how healthy your scalp feels.

Remember, in clinical tests twice-a-day use of Listerine Antiseptic brought marked improvement in the symptoms of dandruff within a month to 76% of dandruff sufferers.

When You Wash Hair

To guard against infection, get in the habit of using Listerine Antiseptic whenever you wash your hair. Listerine Antiseptic is the fine, time-tested medicine that has served Americans so well for more than sixty years. Lambert Pharmacal Company Division of The Lambert Company, St. Louis, Missouri.

LILI

Lili is a beaut. There aren't many musicals that can dip into fantasy and not drown in it. There aren't many musicals that you can sit through for over an hour without getting tired of the music or the dancing. Lili is original and lovely and enchanting. Leslie Caron plays Lili, a waif who wanders into a small French town looking for employment with an old friend of her father's. But this friend, like her father, has died, and she is completely alone. Suddenly, she spots Jean-Pierre Aumont buying fruit at a vendor's stand, soon she's madly in love. Aumont is a magician with a carnival and a Don Juan with women, but Lili's too naive to sense it. She picks up her valise and follows him like a puppy. He tries to get her a job as a waitress (she can't dance or sing and looks like a plump little country girl). Lili's too love-struck and awkward to even carry a tray. Pretty soon she's jealous, too—of Zsa Zsa Gabor, Aumont's assistant. With no place to turn Lili tries to commit suicide right on the carnival grounds. The voice of a puppet alone on his small stage stops her. Mel Ferrer is the puppeteer behind the curtain—an angry bitter man who was once a great dancer but hurt his leg in the war. Ferrer loves Lili but can't show it. His puppets talk for him, instead, and soon Lili is part of their act (like Kukla, Fran and Ollie). It takes a while before Lili realizes that it's not Aumont but the puppets and not the puppets but Ferrer whom she really loves. She discovers this in her daydreams where some clever and wistful ballets take place. You'll fall for Ferrer, too. And for Lili. And the puppets. All in color. CAST: Leslie Caron, Mel Ferrer, Jean-Pierre Aumont, Zsa Zsa Gabor, Kurt Kasznar—MGM

JEOPARDY

This picture, as the saying goes, will scare you right out of your wits. It's torture, and it's so exciting you can't close your eyes even though you're dying to. Simple plot. A married couple (Barbara Stanwyck, Barry Sullivan) and their son (Lee Aaker) hop into their car and drive down into the loneliest part of Baja, California, for a vacation. The little boy gets his foot caught on a rotting jetty that extends into the sea and in saving him Barry is trapped by falling timber. If Barbara doesn't get help before the tide comes in, goodbye Barry. Unfortunately, the one man she finds who can be of any use is an escaped convict a murderer (Ralph Meeker). He thinks Barbara's kind of cute—and what does she want to go and save that old husband of hers for? He plans to use her car to escape from the Mexican police who are hunting him down. Meanwhile the tide is rising, Barbara's getting desperate and Barry's putting on a brave act for his son. There's one heartbreaking scene where the little boy makes coffee for Barry by pouring the contents of an entire can into the pot. You don't know what's going to happen until the end, and I'm not going to tell you. Just take a deep breath and buy your ticket. CAST: Barbara Stanwyck, Barry Sullivan, Lee Aaker, Ralph Meeker—MGM

BATTLE CIRCUS

"They haven't invented a medal yet for these people," says a soldier in Battle Circus as he watches a long line of medics edging their way down a hill in Korea with the wounded in their arms. Well, at least they've made a movie about them—the nurses, aides and doctors of the Mobile Army Surgical Hospital (MASH, for short). These are the people who put up their temporary city of tents right behind the front lines, send out helicopters to bring back the litters and save lives almost as fast as they're snuffed out on the battlefield. But not quite as fast. Not fast enough to keep Humphrey Bogart, who plays a surgeon, from losing faith in everything. However, a fresh-eyed young nurse (June Allyson) is assigned to his unit. She's like a spring flower blooming in the wasteland, a symbol of the world Bogart had forgotten. More than a tribute to MASH, Battle Circus is a tender love story glowing with humor and charm. Bogart, the cynic and Allyson, the innocent find new depths in themselves and even beauty in the shadows of the Korean nightmare.

CAST: June Allyson, Humphrey Bogart, Keenan Wynn, Robert Keith, Danny Chang—MGM

I CONFESS

I Confess is the stirring drama of a priest who cannot betray his vow even when his own life is at stake. The priest (Monty Clift) is accused of murder. Actually, the murder is committed by an employee in the rectory (O. E. Hasse). Hasse confesses to Clift who is bound to silence. Because two little girls saw a priest at the scene of the crime, and because Clift is the only priest in Quebec without a convincing alibi he is suspected. Relentlessly, Inspector Larrue (Karl Malden) digs up the story of Clift's past which involves Anne Baxter, now married to a member of Parliament. It is a story of love and blackmail and it pours more guilt on Clift's head. Finally, he is brought to trial. Directed by Alfred Hitchcock, I Confess is slick, well-paced and exciting. But it is more than that. It tells us that there still are men who are incorruptible, men of free nobility who can die for an ideal, even though the actions of others seem to reduce idealism to a fool's game. This is an important message,

I LOVE MELVIN

Donald O'Connor doesn't need anything but a bare stage and a couple of props—that's how talented he is. I Love Melvin doesn't give him much more. The movie's as light as spun sugar. Debbie Reynolds wants to be a great musical star. So far her biggest role is playing the football in a dance number—and whoever thought that up was really desperate. In her dreams, though, she is comically seductive as the kind of woman men die for. Donald (he's Melvin) works for Look magazine. That is, he knows he works for them; they don't even know he's alive. Anyway, he promises Debbie he'll put her picture on the cover, and that's where the trouble begins. Plot aside, the movie's fun. Donald sings, dances, mimics, falls all over the place and keeps you laughing. Debbie is cute and gay, a trial to her harried father (Allyn Joslyn). One of the best performances is given by Jim Backus. He is cast as a Look photographer with an acid sense of humor.

THE HITCH-HIKER

Here is another suspense story but it doesn't really grip you. Naturally, you feel sorry for any innocent party who's at the wrong end of a gun, but if there's not much else to make you sympathize with him you just wait a little uneasily for the gun to go off. Edmond O'Brien and Frank Lovejoy are on a fishing trip. They head their car south for San Felipe and pick up a hitch-hiker. Little do they know that this particular hitch-hiker (William Talman) has been killing people all week. Just a little crazy, is what. When Lovejoy turns around to offer a cigarette to the hiker he finds a gun staring him in the eyes. And that's about it for the rest of the movie. They travel from one end of a Mexican desert to the other with this maniac threatening to pull the trigger any minute. O'Brien cracks up along the way, but Lovejoy, who has a wife and kids, keeps better control of himself. Oh, yes, to make things even more eerie, Talman has something wrong with his right eye. It doesn't close, so at night they can't tell if he's awake or asleep. After a while the boys don't much care what happens to them. Maybe you will.

The story of Shelley's Baby

Why did the public have to wait three days to hear of Shelley's baby?
How did she conquer death and despair alone . . . with her man half a world away?

BY ALICE HOFFMAN

Tempestuous Shelley and Italian actor Gassmann married last spring.

■ The baby was not due until April of this year, but in her heart Shelley Winters hoped the child might come late, for then Vittorio would be back from Italy.

As she pictured the scene in her mind, he would drive her to the Cedars of Lebanon Hospital when her time came. Dr. Emil Krahulik, the eminent obstetrician, would be waiting. She would look at her husband, and Vittorio would give her one last kiss before they wheeled her into the delivery room.

For hours he would nervously pace the corridors, hoping for a boy, waiting for some word. Presently, they would come out and tell him that Shelley had given birth to a child. They would call him in to identify the infant as his, to count all the toes and fingers, to give his okay that everything was in order. Then when they wheeled her out to her room, Vittorio would hold her hand. They would gently lift her onto her bed. Vittorio would be permitted to remain at her side for only ten minutes. Soon the sedative would take effect, and she would (Continued on page 82)

Is Bing Thinking of Love?

By LOUELLA PARSONS

Mano's six-year-old daughter Monie is vacationing with her mother in Palm Springs. She's too young to tag along on evening dates . . .

HOT GOSSIP SAYS BING'S IN LOVE WITH MONA FREEMAN. BING SAYS NOTHING. HERE'S ONE GUESS AT THE TRUTH.

■ Let's get this point straight in the beginning: the only girl Bing Crosby has dated since he became the world's most eligible widower is Mona Freeman. Not Mary Murphy. Not Terry Moore.

As of this writing he has been seen exclusively with pretty, blonde Mona.

This is why I say that the citizens of Palm Springs, that desert resort where the glories of Mother Nature and Mama Hollywood can be appreciated for $50 per day and up—have recently been treated to the beginning of what well may be the Headline Love Story of the Year.

The eye-catching spectacle and daily appearance in the streets of Bing Crosby's car—Bing, sitting up front with the chauffeur; and Mona (his already widely publicized "new interest") sitting in back with 14-year-old Lindsay Crosby—all but the chauffeur equipped with golf clubs!

This startling caravan is always headed for a day of sunshine, fresh air, golf (and romance?) in the bright sun flooding the fairways of the Thunderbird Golf Club.

Now, Palm Springs is not a stranger to the astounding goings-on in the Hollywood Love Department.

Ginger Rogers was playing tennis at the Racquet Club just an hour before she slipped out of shorts and into a cocktail dress to marry Jacques Bergerac.

It was in (Continued on page 80)

wasted, bitter years Olivia deHavilland spent in bondage. Now, with her disastrous marriage behind her, she can tell the story she tried so desperately to hide.

BY WILLIAM BARBOUR

Her divorce made a new person out of Olivia. Radiantly happy, she attends parties, sees old friends (like Joan Crawford, above) as she used to.

THE WASTED YEARS

Roberto Rossellini and John Huston were with Olivia when she won the N. Y. Film Critic's award for The Snake Pit. Ironically, this triumph came at the height of her marital problems.

■ Now that Olivia deHavilland is divorced and the wasted years are over, the truth of those years of suffering and fear in which she lived with Marcus Aurelius Goodrich may be told.

It is not a pretty story.

Other than for momentary flights into pleasure and passion, it is not even a romantic one, but implicit in it is a lesson which every young woman should learn.

The lesson is this: To marry a man without really knowing or understanding his personality is to court almost inevitable marital disaster.

Six years ago Olivia deHavilland was married to the novelist, Marcus Goodrich. Months later she learned, according to intimates, that she was Goodrich's fifth wife. Olivia is reported to have told a friend, "I didn't find out how many times Marcus had been married until I read it in the newspapers. I knew practically nothing about his previous marital history."

Coming from Olivia deHavilland, such a confession is surprising, for here at 36, is one of the most intelligent, perceptive, and brilliant actresses in Hollywood history.

Here is a young woman who has won two Academy Awards and never given a bad screen performance in her life. Here is a young woman of shrewd judgment who has chosen her own scripts, The Snakepit, To Each His Own, The Heiress, My Cousin Rachel and upped her salary to $175,000 per picture.

Now, how does such a knowledgeable, perspicacious, independent, and wealthy young actress get married to a man of whom she knows so little? A man who, it is alleged, sought no employment, let his wife become the family bread- (Continued on page 54)

Not until after she'd married him did Olivia learn she was Goodrich's fifth wife!

Olivia's new design for living includes lots of parties, new beaux, and plenty of fun. Charles Brackett, an old friend, squired the ex-Mrs. Goodrich to Ciro's, where she indulged in all three.

Hollywood's highest honor: sidewalk immortalization in front of Grauman's Chinese Theater. Olivia, assisted by Charles P. Skouras, had her hand and foot-prints imbedded there, recently. Livvy's the proud owner of two Oscars.

LEARNING TO LIVE TOGETHER IS FUN . . . BUT YOU'VE REALLY GOT TO WORK AT IT. TONY CURTIS AND JANET

Because their work is such a vital part of their lives, they try to share it as often as possible. Here Tony visits Janet on outdoor location for The Naked Spur.

Doing things together is their motto. But—they don't go places and do things blindly just because each thinks the other wants to!

Parties are fun—but the Curtises, as well as other young Hollywood couples, had to learn to take some rough kidding at first.

The truth about MR. AND MRS. CURTIS

are a Hollywood rarity:

the pressures and worries that wreck so many marriages.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

■ Pretty soon now, on June third to be exact, Tony Curtis will take Janet Leigh in his arms on the second anniversary of their marriage and together they can exclaim, in some wonderment, "Well, what do you know—we made it!"

That two years of wedded bliss should be considered such an incredible achievement may seem a little silly; yet, statistically speaking, Janet and Tony are rare birds on Hollywood's domestic scene. They know it, too. In their almost 24 months together they have hung on tight to each other as they watched a long parade of movie marriages smash up: the John Waynes, the Gary Coopers, Lana Turner and Bob Topping, Rita Hayworth and Aly Khan, the Dan Daileys, Olivia deHavilland and Marcus Goodrich, Barbara Stanwyck and Bob Taylor, Anne Baxter and John Hodiak, the Clark Gables, and now the separation of their close friends, the Dean Martins.

No wonder the ladies and gentlemen of the press look upon any Hollywood marriage with jaundiced eyes. No wonder, too, that Tony Curtis speaks with some venom and utter seriousness from his own point of view:

"If people would only understand that motion picture figures have the same right to fall in love as anyone else, that they have the same feelings and the same emotional honesty as plumbers, bank clerks, executives or insurance salesmen. If they'd only understand that. We're not phonies. We bleed and hurt and love like anyone else. But take Janet and me, the things they said and wrote about us for a while, you'd think we dreamed up the whole thing for a couple of bucks at the box office.

Tony still steams himself up violently when he thinks (Continued on page 57)

LEIGH, WHO HAVE BEEN MARRIED FOR ALMOST TWO YEARS, HAVE A SUREFIRE FORMULA FOR HAPPINESS

Janet will never become that pitiable creature, the golf widow! She and Tony, getting ready for a round here, are both fans.

"Taking your work home with you can be murder," says Tony, who relaxes after a day before the camera with paints, model boots.

Their miniature poodle, named Houdina, is loved by both of them, but can't possibly make up for the major thing missing in their lives: their own child.

THERE'S MORE TO MARILYN THAN THOSE ASTRONOMICAL MEASUREMENTS. WIN HER TRUST AND AF-

LOVE AND LEARN

by Steve Cronin

■ Nobody, but nobody from Hollywood makes such a stir in the world as this girl Monroe. If people aren't whistling, they're talking about her. And most of that talk is questions. What's she really like? What's with her and Joe? Is she going to get married?

It's far from easy to answer. Although Marilyn is one of the most highly publicized personalities in Hollywood, she keeps her private life more secret than anyone in that dizzy town. Although every red-blooded male over the age of six would love to date her—very few get a chance. Joe DiMaggio wouldn't like it. Neither would Marilyn. There's been a lot of discussion about how and where Marilyn has lived in the past. But she's not giving out the whereabouts of her newest apartment.

Miss M. knows a demure black dress, and an apt bit of poetry, charm a guy like Joe DiMaggio. Marilyn's set out to please her home-lovin' man.

FECTION AND YOU'LL FIND THE REAL GIRL.

As a matter of fact, Miss Monroe's living quarters have been the object of much newspaper copy, and over-the-highball gossip ever since Joe DiMaggio came to sunny California. The moving-van chasers have started a lot of rumors based solely on where Marilyn's suitcase is parked at the moment. Here's the true situation.

Marilyn took a lease on a house in the outpost section overlooking Hollywood Boulevard last September. When Joe came out, she was delighted to have a spot for him to sink into an arm-chair, a stove of her own to heat up a bubbling pot of spaghetti. He's a real home-loving guy, and she loves him for it. It was such a perfect spot that he wanted to share his comfort and his girl with relatives and friends. He invited them all over. They (Continued on page 67)

Rumors flew about Barbara Stanwyck and Bob after they were seen dining. Gossips forgot to mention Clifton Webb was along, too!

■ Debbie Reynolds was being very unDebbie-like! Instead of effervescing with her bubbling vim and unquenchable vivacity, she was sitting in Bob Wagner's MG, indulging in what is, for her, the rare luxury of introspection.

She and R. J.—that's what everyone calls young Wagner—had attended the preview of Stars And Stripes Forever, and now after the long ride home, they were parked in front of Debbie's unpretentious house in Burbank.

They had talked of life and love, the picture business and the pursuit of happiness, and now Debbie had reached the all-important point of declaration.

"R. J.," she said. "I don't know about you, but I'm not ready for marriage. I don't think we should give it a thought."

"If that's the way you want it."

"I think it's the best way. Don't you?"

R. J. thought for a moment of his impending tour of duty in the Marines—he's in the Reserve and should be called up any day—then of his relatively young age—he's only 23. He thought of the senselessness in marrying a young girl, going overseas, leaving her behind to worry and fret and cry her heart out. He thought of the bright (Continued on page 65)

Did Debbie Reynolds refuse to date Bob if he continued seeing Barbara? It's too soon to tell how this lop-sided triangle will come out.

What happens when Hollywood gossip forces a young man to choose between a sparkling ingenue and a sophisticated older woman?
That's Bob Wagner's problem now.

BETWEEN TWO WOMEN

■ Most everybody in Hollywood knows that the Green Room of Warner Brothers studio in Burbank, California is the classier of the lot's two public commissaries, and second in caste dignity only to the private dining room of Jack L. (Himself) Warner, who according to legend has not eaten in the Green Room since the day a character actor, no longer connected with motion pictures in any form, slapped him on the back and told him to run out and get him a beer. But the Green Room is not a good place to conduct an interview for one very sound reason: it suffers from trick acoustics.

Thus, while it was perfectly possible one day recently to hear the lunch conversation of Howard Keel and Jane Powell, emigrants from Metro sitting two tables away, it was extremely difficult to get a word Virginia Mayo was saying, not to mention Michael O'Shea, who of course is Miss Mayo's husband, not to mention a lady publicist, who was along to make sure that every syllable was spelled right. And all were at the same table with the person who was trying to hear them.

The problem was roughly this:

Mr. O'Shea had been a pretty hot shot around Hollywood when he married Miss Mayo, who had been as cool a shot as anyone can expect to be when employed mainly to stand behind Danny Kaye while he makes faces. But then, as Miss Mayo went up, Mr. O'Shea went, to put it rather brutally, down, and how had the O'Sheas coped with a situation that would seem to have contained the seeds of strain? The question obviously was a delicate one and would not (Continued on page 74)

"But 25 are off already!"

"Just Michael and me, and now baby makes three. That's all I need to make my hilltop house heaven!" says Liz Taylor. Since she's become a mother, Liz does nothing but eat, sleep and hover adoringly around little Michael who does nothing but eat and sleep . . . and maybe glimmer a toothlessly angelic smile at his enchanted parents. In this picture sequence, Liz describes her new role as a mother.

"Our next baby? Soon, I hope!"

Marriage has changed Liz Taylor a lot. For one thing, she's begun to wear shoes at social functions and even at home. Mike Wilding finally put her in them, then took off his own. He opened the door of their eagle's nest home in Beverly, and looked for all the world like a road show Gary Merrill. He was dressed in unpressed gray slacks, a sports shirt, a tweed coat, and was completely barefoot.

He was unaware that his shoes were missing, and this sent me into gales of laughter. For years I've been telling Liz if she didn't quit paddling around barefoot, she'd end up wearing canal boats or size 12's. But would she listen? No. Bare feet seemed to symbolize freedom of childhood to Liz, who never really wanted to grow up. In the White House once, she surreptitiously kicked off her shoes, and they landed smack under Bess Truman's chair.

Now Mike may wear the pants in that family, but he doesn't wear the shoes. "Come in," he said twiddling his toes contentedly. "Liz tried to get out of the bath to greet you, but she didn't quite make it." (This was at 3:00 P.M.) That wasn't surprising. Every time I've called her since the baby came, Liz had to be rousted out of a bath to answer the phone.

I took a few moments to scan the view. "You seem like an interloper," I said to Mike. "Charles Mendl and I used to come here every Saturday morning to look at the scenery and walk down the hill." And what scenery! For miles beneath us Los Angeles sprawled outward to the sea. Marvelous cloud formations drifted overhead. To the north were rows upon rows of rugged mountains, and nestling in their folds rose gardens and orange groves. There was no house there then; only a hilltop covered with wild growth and a view. Charles, who had traveled the world over, used to say it was the most beautiful sight in the universe. Now it belongs to Mike and the most beautiful (Continued on page 92)

THIS IS THE TRUE STORY OF JAN STERLING'S FIGHT FOR BEAUTY AND GLAMOR. HER DIET AND EXERCISE

ROUTINES WEREN'T SO EASY, AND THEY WEREN'T FUN . . . BUT THEY WERE WORTH IT!

WHEN I HATED MY MIRROR

by Jan Sterling

■ In Rio de Janeiro there is a restaurant called Soveteria Americano which used to specialize in American delicacies for the young. Among the most scrumptious was one listed as Sundae Nova York: vanilla ice cream covered with hot fudge sauce, smothered with whipped cream and heaped over again with malted milk powder. It was served with hot buttered toast thickly topped with grated, tasty yellow cheese. Time will never wash out the agony of an afternoon in which I sat in this restaurant watching my 11-year-old sister eating such a concoction before my envious eyes. What I had in front of me was just a glass of water. I was only 14 but I had begun my fight . . .

Everyone called Mimi adorable. With her curly hair, her slimness and delicate curves she was lovely. Me? They would cast a quick glance, smile kindly and assure me, "Why, Jane, you look fine." The devil I did! I already weighed 145 pounds. I could see 155 coming up, 165, 175 . . . and it was horrifying because in my heart had been a vision from earliest childhood that I could not give up. I yearned to be an actress, a queen of women, a supple, graceful creature who drew admiring looks from everyone. With this in my heart I could only detest the flesh I was picking up, and I couldn't understand why (Continued on next page) this wasn't apparent to everyone, including my own folks.

It had all started when I was 11. I already had begun to develop in a way that would have been gratifying had it been confined only to certain places. (As a matter of fact, at 13 I attended an Annapolis hop in a low-backed gown and must have passed for at least 17 or 18 because no one at all seemed to notice my juvenility.) But I didn't stay pat. I began to bloom elsewhere too, where it wasn't wanted and where it could only be called thickening or fattening. The morning of that day in Rio de Janeiro when Mimi was gobbling up her Nova York I had gone to the mirror knowing it was time to believe, not the assurances of my family and friends that I had nothing to worry about, but exactly what the glass told me. I looked and what I saw was cruel. I hated my mirror for its heartlessness . . . but I bowed before its truth. That day I started a way of eating that was, of course, a way of living from which I have never departed. At 15 and 16 and 17 and 18 I was not 155 or 165 pounds or more, I was only 122 pounds. And my dream came true . . . or rather I had made it come true under the constant guidance of (Continued on next page)

HERE IS JAN STERLING'S OWN PERSONAL SEVEN-POINT GLAMOR AND BEAUTY PLAN.

DIET:

No rigorous diet but foods high in protein, low in calories: lean meat, fowl, fish, gelatin, eggs, raw and cooked fruits and vegetables with very little butter or sugar. Skimmed milk, black coffee, plain tea. Consult a doctor for your personal requirements.

SLEEP:

Get plenty at night, and relax frequently during the day. "Just go limp," Jan advises. "Let your arms dangle, roll your head around like a ball on a string. Get the tension out of your neck and shoulders. And breathe deep . . . way down. When you know you're going to be out late at night, squeeze in a nap during the afternoon or lie down for a few minutes before dressing for the evening."

GROOMING:

Jan thinks good grooming pays bigger and quicker dividends than almost anything a girl can do. She gets in one good grooming chore each day, a manicure, pedicure, etc. She shampoos her hair frequently and dries it by hand. Sometimes she gives her hair a rest by going without a permanent for a couple of months, wearing it straight, and brushing vigorously. For big parties she sets her hair with eau de cologne diluted with water.

POISE:

Good carriage, and knowing how to enter a room gracefully, rate high on Jan's glamor chart. "Stand tall, but relaxed," she advises. "Pull your shoulders down as if they were a coat hanger. Feel that your hands are a part of your arms, not just attached at the wrist. If you don't know what to do with your hands, carry something. A purse, for instance, or a handkerchief."

WORST DEFECT:

Jan believes in minimizing bad points. There are lots of little tricks you can devise to suit your own defects, such as covering sharp elbows with long sleeves, or hiding large ears with a becoming hairdo. Jan felt her worst feature was her nose, and, after consultation with her physician plastic surgery remedied that.

VOICE:

As an actress, Jan has been concentrating on enunciation and expression for years. "But every time I went to church or sang in a group," she says, "I noticed that my voice was almost the only one off rhythm or out of key." To remedy that she started taking voice lessons. As a consequence Jan has added three voice exercises to her beauty schedule that she thinks belongs in any glamor routine. First, strike any note on a piano and see how nearly you can approximate exact tone and pitch. Second, to improve quality of voice strike a note again and sing A-E-I-O-U all on same note, same breath. Lastly, to improve voice projection, try placing sound in front of mouth. Don't be breathy. When pronouncing a word finish all syllables. Finish each vowel sound with lips.

PERSONALIZED WARDROBE:

This is one of the things Jan goes in for in a big way. She likes to accessorize her clothes with scarves, belts, costume jewelry, but not all at the same time, of course. And she's addicted to separates, and skirts of all kinds with sweaters and blouses.

WHEN I HATED MY MIRROR continued

That 122 pounds was fine for an actress on the stage but it wasn't good enough for an actress on the screen. So I called on will-power and medical help again. Today I weigh only 108 pounds—and there have been other changes. As it happens I am the fourth wife of my husband, Paul Douglas. But the way he puts it now, after some of those changes, "You're both my fourth and fifth wife!" That's nice "changing!"

When I was about six my parents divorced and my mother remarried. My step-father, Henry James White, was an oil man with interests in both Europe and South America, and we seemed to beat a constant path between these two continents and the United States. Most of my education came from tutors and in my whole life I have had only one year of formal schooling. That suited me because no matter what subject I studied I always translated it in terms of the stage. History to me was full of characters with costumes and good or bad lines to say rather than people of political or cultural significance. English was something you talked—not wrote or analyzed. Geography concerned places where there were different forms of entertainment; opera in Italy, intimate theaters in France, outdoor concerts and folk dramas in Austria and Germany, weird all-day shows in China.

All my life I had always wanted to play at being someone else . . . but I didn't know my first big role would be the real-life one of simply not being me. I think the customs of my family cemented this desire. My mother, like many mothers, used to dress Mimi and me alike. I think this is a practice which pleases the parents, is complimentary to the younger girl, but darn unfair to the older one. I still remember the sack-like dresses we wore—the kind that hang straight down, when Mimi was seven and I was ten. The minute I'd get alone I'd find something, even if it was only a piece of string, and pull it around my waist, trying for a shape. And then . . . the bloomers! I tried so many experiments trying to unbloomerize them that generally I'd wear out the elastics and time and again these would break and I'd be all bloomers down to my ankles.

I gave my first performance for other than children at the age of nine. The audience was composed of the elevator operators in the apartment building we lived in on Park Avenue in New York at the time, and the stage was the lobby. When the operators agreed to watch my "show" I ran out (Continued on page 83)

"Early to bed tonight," Jan laughingly warns her husband, Paul Douglas, as she points to an early call on RKO's Split Second for the next day. Paul usually picks Jan up after work, and they leisurely make their way home, window shopping as they go.

"You ask me why I gave my heart to Christ.
 "I cannot reply.
 "My heart was drawn at length to seek His faith.
 "He called me and I came,
 "He heard my prayers.
 "I cannot tell you how or when or where—
 "Or why I have told you now . . ."

■ The small, almost frail young woman in the brown suit, brown gloves and hat carried her modest suitcase toward the big TWA plane warming up at the Los Angeles International Airport. She was alone.

June Haver had risen at five, told her family goodbye at her sister Evelyn's apartment and begged them not to see her off, for everything had long since been said that could be. Then she had driven by St. John's Hospital, in Santa Monica to attend six o'clock mass, have breakfast, bid the sisters there farewell and receive their blessing. Now the flight was ready and she climbed aboard. In a minute she was aloft and rising toward the Heavens on a benevolent wind, headed East for Kansas to begin a new life, and to leave an old one behind.

June's clear blue eyes looked eagerly ahead, not back. Back lay Hollywood where she had spent the past ten of her 26 years, and where those same blue eyes had seen her girlhood dreams come true, as she danced, sang, laughed and brightened up the screen to make herself wealthy and famous, loved by everyone who knew her personally and by millions who did not. Back of her lay a star's career in full flower, a salary of $3,500 a week, and all the luxuries, privileges and rewards of success—pretty clothes, jewelry, money, parties, comfort, popularity. Now she owned nothing of the world's goods except the necessities of her journey. Behind June, too, were even more intimately precious things—her mother and her sisters, Dorothy and Evelyn, her nephew and nieces, Kathleen, Trudy June and Brian, whom she deeply loved and to whom she was extremely close.

June looked ahead impatiently with eyes that were wide open to what she was doing and where she was going. She was going, as all the world knows by now, to St. Mary's Academy of the Sisters of Charity in Leavenworth to prepare for a nun's life in that cloistered religious order. Ahead lay a large, brick convent anchored to the flat plains of Kansas, where she would melt into anonymity, wear a plain uniform, eat plain food, share a plain dormitory room, rise at five o'clock, study, pray and work 16 hours a day, in pursuit of her stated ambition:

If that language sounds too strong to you, it is nothing compared to Olivia deHavilland's testimony in court. Listen to her as she tells the judge what life with her ex-husband was like from August 26th, 1946, when she married him in Weston, Connecticut, to May 8th, 1952, when she finally left him:

"We were driving in a car—my husband was at the wheel—along Sunset Boulevard, in the area of Bel-Air, and having some sort of normal conversation. Mr. Goodrich took exception to something that I had said, something that was so trivial I cannot remember it, and began to pound my left arm with his closed fist, and this continued for several minutes, and when we arrived at our home which was in Bel-Air, I got out of the car and he had said that he would kill me. . .

"I got out of the car and ran down the driveway and down to the road that runs along the outside of the property where we were living, and I believe I sat down on a rock in some shrubbery and I didn't know where to go or what to do.

"After a while my husband found me there, he came to hunt for me, and I told him I was afraid to get in the car because he had said he would kill me."

As a result of the arm-pounding, Olivia told the Court, "I received a very large bruise which was dark blue and purple. The bruise . . . on my left arm between the shoulder and elbow, was about the size of a baseball."

In order to conceal that injury from her Hollywood friends, Olivia said, "I just used colored scarves. It was warm weather and I was wearing short-sleeve dresses, and I used scarves which I tied around the arm to conceal the bruise. It was very humiliating."

From 1946 to 1951 Olivia deHavilland maintained the fiction that her marriage to Marcus Goodrich was one of those divine couplings ordained in heaven, an incomparably happy union she never wished dissolved. When a baby boy, Benjamin, was born to her in 1951, she told reporters that she was the happiest woman in the world, that now her marriage was truly complete, truly ecstatic.

I and others who had seen her in company with Goodrich knew that she was whistling in the dark, trying to keep up her courage, hoping against hope that her husband might change. A consummate actress, Livvy felt at the time that she was actually fooling all her friends. She wasn't; we knew the score. We knew she was miserable, cowed, completely dominated by Marcus, living in almost perpetual fear of the man.

It took six long years, but Olivia finally told the truth about herself, her baby, and her husband; and she told it in court.

"During the first five-and-a-half weeks of the baby's life," she testified, "I took care of him all by myself—I wanted to take care of him all by myself and I did. During that period of time, well, the baby was four weeks old and I was caring for him in the bedroom of the house and my husband became upset for something—I cannot recall what it was—it was unimportant—and he became extremely violent and abusive in his manner and he struck me . . . I had to turn my body so that the baby would not be injured because I was holding Benjamin in my arms at the time."

One more extract from the Court record and you'll have some idea of what Olivia deHavilland put up with rather than admit marital failure.

The following extract deals with Christmas, 1951, when the actress was on the road, touring in a stage play, and stopping over at the Hotel Utah in Salt Lake City.

Q: Do you recall the occasion that a person came to the door of the hotel suite and asked for your autograph?

A: I do remember that.

Q: Will you briefly tell the Court just what happened and what he (your husband) said on that occasion?

A: Yes. Someone came to the door and asked for my signature and my husband was rather angered by this request

Annette Warren, who did the singing for Ava Gardner in Show Boat, now seldom sings those songs in nightclubs. "I'm a little tired of them," Annette says, "besides one night a heckler advised me not to sing 'My Bill'—that I couldn't compare to Ava Gardner!"

*Sidney Skolsky in

and became rather excited and quite impatient and unkind.

Q: Was it a repetition of similar moods that you have described?

A: Yes, it was.

Q: How did that affect you?

A: I was disturbed for two reasons: I did not like to see such a small incident upset my husband, and I wanted to avoid a repetition of this kind of thing in the future because these rages disturbed me very greatly.

Q: What did he say particularly on that occasion that affected you? What was the threat that he made?

A: I suggested to my husband that next time if anybody came requesting my signature that Nellie, the wardrobe mistress, who is also my dresser—I suggested that he let her handle the situation as she was accustomed to doing so. She had always handled situations of that kind through all the years she had been in the theatre which were at least 20.

Q: In her presence what did he say?

A: He turned to me and said, "I will beat you for that," and started to cross the room.

Q: How did that affect you?

A: I was deeply upset, not only by the threat, but also by the fact he had said that in front of a third person. I felt the fact he had forgotten himself in front of a third person was a very dangerous thing and the next time I was alone and he became angry, I thought I might not survive.

WHY should a woman, particularly a talented actress who supports her family, put up with such treatment for six years?

This is the question all her friends have asked Livvy.

Why didn't she pull out as soon as she learned what sort of husband Marcus Goodrich really was? Why wait around for the punishment?

Her answer is characteristically simple, "I couldn't bear the idea of divorce. I didn't believe in it. It was my only marriage and I wanted it to last. Before I decided on divorce, I consulted my minister and asked his advice. It was only when I realized that my son was in danger, both physically and psychologically, that I had to face the fact that the marriage simply could not continue.

"I was faced with two alternatives—neither one was desirable. One was divorce and the other was a home in which my son might be done great physical and psychological damage, I decided after I talked to my minister, the only thing to do was to get a divorce."

Olivia got her divorce last year. It was uncontested, and she waived alimony, attorney's fees and court costs. She paid for everything and was awarded custody of her child with the right of reasonable visitation going to Goodrich if he desires to exercise it.

Since August of 1952 and her divorce, Olivia deHavilland has become a new woman. No longer is she the frightened, bewildered, dominated young wife who each time looked at her husband with trepidation before she answered a reporter's questions.

Today she is an attractive, vivacious, bubbling, spirited woman full of warmth, energy and drive, and she is beginning once again to go out with men.

John Huston and Olivia met for the first time in years when he arrived in Hollywood during Christmas Week last year to show his Moulin Rouge for Academy Award contention. It was a romantic and sentimental reunion, for when Olivia was a young actress on the Warner lot during the late 1930's, the first man she genuinely fell in love with was the lanky, quixotic Huston. They went together for years, and there was much talk of an impending marriage, but these two were almost similar in temperament and viewpoint, and the love affair eventually faded.

What memories were aroused early this year when Olivia and Huston ran into each other at several of Hollywood's New Year parties, I don't know. Huston has re-married for the third time and is no longer free, but I do know that when they met at the Vincente Minnelli party, Olivia looked more ripe, more beautiful, more radiant than she ever has before.

OLIVIA deHavilland first saw her husband at a dinner party five years before she married him. The dinner was held at the home of Arthur Hornblow, the MGM producer, and Goodrich, who speaks beautifully, was waxing eloquent on the various virtues and faults of women in America. All that Olivia remembers of the affair, and this rather hazily, was that Goodrich said he thought he'd go to Scandinavia, marry a healthy young girl and have a dozen children, whereupon Olivia said, "Why go to Scandinavia?"

She wasn't impressed by Goodrich, merely regarded him as a pleasant fellow who'd obviously been around.

At that time, which was 1940, Livvy was actually thinking more of her career than of her love-life. She was exceedingly ambitious, and that's putting it mildly. She'd finished the role of Melanie in Gone With The Wind in which picture she had established herself as a sensitive, perceptive actress.

By 1946, however, after 11 hectic years of career obsession, and a tearful farewell to John Huston, Olivia had seen through the illusion of Hollywood, and she was more than ready for a personable and presentable man. She had worked in many films, and tiring of them temporarily, agreed to go to Westport, Connecticut, to do a play.

In the Spring of 1946, Olivia boarded the train for New York on a mission with one of her best Hollywood friends, Phyllis Seaton. En route to the East, both girls began to plunge into various subjects, the most fascinating of which turned out to be something called, "Men."

Phyllis brought up the name of Marcus

Goodrich as an eligible man-about-town and Olivia said she had met him five years ago.

"That's a coincidence," Mrs. Seaton said, "Marcus is an old family friend and he'll probably phone us in New York."

THAT'S exactly what happened. A day after Phyllis and Livvy checked into their hotel suite, Marcus Goodrich was on the phone. That night he took both girls to dinner. Two nights later, he asked for the same privilege. Again it was granted. On Friday night he phoned for a third date, and on this occasion Phyllis Seaton, very happily married, took the hint.

"I've got a nasty headache," she told Livvy. "You'll just have to dine with Marcus alone."

He and Olivia talked until three the next morning, and Goodrich, glib and mellifluous, was absolutely fascinating. At least, Livvy thought so.

A day later she had him drive her from Westport to East Hampton on Long Island. During this trip Marcus asked for all her biographical details, and as Livvy recalls, "We became so entranced by the subject that we got ourselves lost five times."

By the end of the trip, Marcus was ready with a little advice for the talented actress. He had heard his date out and he was convinced, so he said, that she should remain single for another two years and then get married—not to a writer or an artist, but to a successful businessman. Olivia said this made good sense and she would in all probability follow Marcus Aurelius' advice.

Less than a week later, Goodrich was back at Olivia's hotel. Over luncheon he said, "Will you marry me?"

Olivia's eyes sparkled. "But you're not a successful businessman," she cracked. Then she said yes.

They talked until the early hours of the morning, Marcus explaining to his bride-to-be that "you are the type of woman who has enormous respect for duly constituted authority. One of the needs of your nature, like that of every real woman, is to be able to rely upon your mate." Olivia fell for that routine hook, line, and sinker.

When Goodrich discussed the wedding ceremony with her, he reportedly said, "I'd like very much if in the ceremony you would promise to obey."

Olivia knew that contemporary marriage ceremonies carry the promise to "love, honor, and cherish," that the word "obey" is considered out-moded in the light of woman's modern accomplishments, and she should have gathered, from his insistence upon this point, some idea of Goodrich's dogmatism, but she hardly gave it a second thought.

ONCE back in Hollywood, he began to manage his wife's career which, up to this point, had been brilliantly directed. In the process he antagonized agents, reporters, executives, dozens of persons who had known, loved and long respected Olivia.

Some of these friends began to refer to Goodrich as "Svengali," so completely did he come to dominate this actress who had once been too strong to be dominated by anything except her own unbridled ambition.

As Olivia deHavilland's husband, Marcus Goodrich was no success in Hollywood. People began making cracks about the fact that Olivia was the family breadwinner, that outside of writing one novel, "Delilah," Goodrich didn't appear to be very productive. Gradually, some of the more sensitive souls in Hollywood began to drop the couple socially.

Many of us knew Olivia was unhappy, but few of us realized that life with Goodrich had deteriorated into the miserable shambles she later described in court. Few of us imagined that Marcus would ever dare use physical force on so fragile and high-strung a woman. We knew the writer was opinionated, strong-willed; and frustrated, but we figured that once his wife became pregnant, he would alter his ways and become a kind and considerate husband; apparently, this didn't happen.

"I was confined to bed for seven months during the time I was expecting my son," Livvy has explained, "and I wasn't allowed to get up because of the danger of losing the baby. It was our custom to dine in the bedroom—my husband would have his dinner at a card table and I would have my tray in bed. One evening my husband was served beefsteak pie . . . and he was very upset because it was not steak and kidney pie and he threw the pie across the room and left the house."

After the baby came and Marcus still refused to mend his ways, Olivia went to see her minister and together they decided that divorce was the only solution.

Last June, Olivia returned to Hollywood with her little Benjie and gave out the announcement that she was going to divorce Marcus Goodrich and play the lead in My Cousin Rachel.

Hollywood was happy for her on both counts.

When deHavilland works she throws herself into a role with such complete concentration that at the end of the day she's exhausted and has no time for the social amenities. It was that way with Livvy during the making of Rachel. She was rarely seen around town.

Once the picture was finished, however, we saw a new Livvy emerge, a girl of warmth, vibrancy, and tenderness. To begin with, Olivia reconciled with her father, from whom she had long been estranged. Various reasons have been attributed to this estrangement, but the truth involves the story of the deHavilland family background heretofore untold.

OLIVIA's father, Walter deHavilland, left England in 1893, after graduating from Cambridge, to head a law office in Tokyo. In 1914 he returned to Britain where he met a young lady named Lillian Ruse who was studying drama in Sir Beerbohm Tree's Dramatic Academy. Young deHavilland, an impetuous bon vivant, proposed marriage and asked the girl to return to Tokyo with him.

Lillian Ruse said she wasn't sure. "Tell you what we'll do," Walter deHavilland suggested. "We'll toss a coin. Heads you go to Tokyo as my wife. Tails you stay here single." The coin was flipped. It came down tails, but Lillian Ruse changed her mind. She decided to marry the young man anyway. Two years later, a daughter was born to the couple in Tokyo on July 1st, 1916. This first-born daughter was christened Olivia. A year later another daughter was born. This one was christened Joan de Beauvoir deHavilland.

Unfortunately, life in Japan didn't agree with the babies, so Mrs. deHavilland, not too pleased with her marriage in any case, packed their things and sailed with them to California. On arriving, she made a home for her girls in the small town of Saratoga.

In 1925, Mrs. deHavilland decided to divorce her husband and returned to Tokyo for that purpose, leaving her daughters with a nurse. When she returned to the States a few months later, she discovered happily enough that Joan and Livvy had made a fast friend of a department store-owner, a French Canadian, named George Fontaine. Mrs. deHavilland also became his friend and subsequently his wife which is how Joan de Beauvoir deHavilland came to take the name, Joan Fontaine.

Not long after Mrs. deHavilland became Mrs. George Fontaine, her ex-husband decided to marry his Japanese housekeeper. Joan saw nothing scandalous in this. In fact when she was 15 she went to Tokyo to live with him and his Japanese wife for two years. Olivia, however, viewed the entire affair with jaundiced eye and declined to see her father.

When at 69 Mr. deHavilland arrived in California with his Oriental wife, World War II had begun, and his wife was ordered out of the West Coast war zone by War Department authorities. The couple went first to Denver, Colorado, where they eked out a bare living and later to British Columbia in Canada where they now reside.

Olivia hadn't seen her father for years when, after finishing Rachel, she decided there was no point in perpetuating this paternal estrangement. She called Walter deHavilland long distance and told him that he must come to California and see his new grandchild, Benjamin. She paid all the travel expenses, but her Japanese step-mother did not accompany her husband. She remained in Canada.

When the old man arrived at Union Station in Los Angeles, Olivia and her little boy were on hand to meet him. Tears of joy punctuated the reunion, and one got the feeling that one of Walter deHavilland's fondest dreams was coming true.

OLIVIA has also reconciled with sister Joan. Before they were married the two actresses shared a cottage in Coldwater Canyon, and there was no talk of jealousy and feud concerning them. After Joan became Mrs. Brian Aherne, however, the girls separated, and there was much gossip to the effect that Aherne had been Livvy's beau to begin with and that Joan had stolen him away. It was all stuff and nonsense. The two actresses simply began to grow apart, to lead different lives.

Olivia's only husband, Marcus Goodrich, had no liking for Bill Dozier, Joan's second husband, so that no attempt at reconciliation was made during his six-year regime. If anything, salt was thrown upon the open wound.

Once Joan divorced Dozier, however, and married Collier Young a few months ago, she ran into Livvy at the Beverly Hills Hotel and invited her sister and her nephew to visit her family. Livvy said they'd be glad to come, and that was that.

From here on in, Olivia deHavilland is determined to be kind, friendly, and at ease with everyone. She has no room in her heart for bitterness, rancor, or feud of any sort. She had quite enough of that in six years of marriage—years which she insists were not wasted, "because really I learned a good deal from them."

The most important thing Livvy learned, and it cost her a fortune in money and heartache, was something every girl should be told by her mother: Marry in haste and the chances are very good you'll live to regret it.

Farley's design for living

The revenue officer grinned. "Those French art dealers," he said, "will give an American movie star any kind of bill of sale he wants."

"For Pete's sake," Farley groaned. "Call the Whitney Museum of Art. Call the Metropolitan. They'll back me up about these gelotones."

"Maybe they will," the Customs man persisted, "but how'll we know these paintings are what you say they are? You better leave 'em with us."

"Ohmyfoot," Farley muttered in desperation. "Call somebody and let me get out of here."

WHILE one of the officials went to see his chief, Farley leaned against a rail and stewed in his own exasperation. His eyes swept the shed for some sympathetic face. No one gave him as much as a half-smile. For a fast second he was tempted to grab up his paintings and make a run for it or just leave them behind and forget all about them, but then suddenly, he took the canvases and turned them on their backs, and there on the rear, in small clear letters were the words, "Rotogravure, deuxième reproduction."

Farley called one of the Customs men back. "See," he said triumphantly, pointing to the stamp, "this proves it. It says this is a reproduction and a second printing."

The Customs man nodded. "Okay," he agreed. "Now, about these other purchases. You got receipts for everything?"

"Not everything," Farley conceded. "Only for the more expensive stuff. The 12 hemp mats I found in a market in Seville. They only cost about a buck. The casseroles come from the same place and cost 30 cents each. That grain bucket I bought at a roadside stand in France. Don't even remember where. It's worth a buck and a half tops."

The official began to look skeptical again. "And the bird cage?"

"From the Paris flower market," Farley answered with painful honesty. "Less than a buck."

"No jewelry? No gifts?"

Farley shook his head.

"What you gonna do with all this junk?" the Customs man asked.

"It's for my house," Farley said.

The Customs men looked at each other in mutual acknowledgement of an irrefutable truth. "Actors sure are nuts," one said to the other. "Imagine this guy flying all that stuff over from Europe. I'll bet his house looks like a booby hatch."

Farley's house looks like anything but. A small, compact, two-bedroom job, it nestles against the side of a canyon and is possibly the most tastefully furnished bachelor's haven in the entire movie colony.

Farley has learned how to decorate a house the hard way. He's rented eight different ones in the past six years and very early in the game made practically all of the mistakes.

"As soon as I rented a house," he admits, "I used to re-paper and re-paint the place, sometimes even add a patio. Then when my lease was up, I was out. Couldn't take anything with me. Now I've learned how to do over a place with accessories."

Farley doesn't mind repainting a living room, but he knows the walls can be made exceedingly attractive by adding a few good paintings, a couple of carefully chosen art objects, and a shelf or two of books. Right now he's on an art kick and is gradually beginning to acquire a fine collection of paintings.

They range from a sketch by Diego Rivera to a half-dozen water colors painted by an MGM technician named Irv Block. "I buy most of my things on trips," Farley explains, "because that's when I have more time to roam around art galleries. In my contract with Mr. Goldwyn there's a clause that gives me 18 weeks off specifically for the purpose of travel."

FARLEY'S taken good advantage of that clause. Since 1950 he has been to Mexico, Honolulu, Greece, Israel, France, Germany, Austria, Spain, Switzerland, and Italy. And from all these trips he's amassed a collection of beautiful glass, pottery, baskets, mats, and dozens of other household articles all of which you'll find in his house.

"My folks secretly think I'm crazy to drag all this stuff home," he admits, "but I really enjoy my foreign furnishings. I think it does a lot for a house."

The truth is that it does so much for a house that Farley's bungalow has now become the favorite hangout for the more literate and appreciative of the Hollywood younger set. Farley throws two dinner parties each week—he has a wonderful cook and housekeeper named Arzy Peebles—and at these gatherings six to ten of his favorite friends are usually invited. Shelley Winters is still one of these.

Although he's become quite a party-giver of late, "Farfel," as Shelley calls him, prefers to spend most of his home-time in either of two spots, his den or his sun-soaked lanai.

In his den he reads scripts, studies his lines, answers his fan mail, plays hundreds of classical and contemporary recordings. When friends accuse him of living the life of a maharajah, he has a ready answer. "I think," he says, "that it's a sign of maturity that I'd rather spend money on a house and furnishings than in night clubs the way I used to do. It's much more fun taking a girl up here on a date than going to some night spot. Might as well enjoy the things I have."

Although he doesn't mind spending money on furnishings he can take with him, Farley draws the line on buying furniture for any house he rents. He uses a lot of ingenuity to acquire what he wants without being extravagant.

In the living room, for example, a conventional coffee table came with the house. After a few weeks, however, Farley discovered that there weren't enough low tables to take care of his buffet-supper guests. Rather than buy one large coffee table that might fit this particular living room but no other, he had a carpenter knock together four plain tables, 18 inches square and two feet high. He sprayed them with four different colors of enamel and arranged them in the form of one L-shaped table in front of the living room couch. When he builds a house of his own, which he'll probably do when he finds a bride, he can take these little tables with him and scatter them in separate rooms throughout the house.

Similarly, when Farley needed a larger flat top desk in his den, he bought a strip of plywood and set it on top of an existing knee-hole desk. When he wanted an extra lamp table in the lanai he put one together consisting of twelve concrete bricks and a slab of plywood.

Farley is economical with a buck and has learned from experience how to cut corners when it comes to decorating a house. He's found, for example, that you can hide offensive light brackets by covering them with stylish but inexpensive baskets. He also hides an ugly wall heater with a chunk of driftwood he picked up on the Mojave desert, and when someone burns a hole in any of his upholstery, the tell-tale signs are covered with an Indian blanket.

One girl who has dated Farley on and off, says, "It's a little frightening how much he knows about good living and good taste. I mean, the girl who marries him will have her work cut out. Unless she's very well-bred and very well-traveled and very well-cultured, I'm inclined to believe that she'll develop a most acute inferiority complex very early in their marriage. Unless, of course, she's content to let Farley take everything over."

Of late, Farley has been seeing a good deal of an English actress, Dawn Addams, who was at MGM until a few months ago.

Of late, too, he's been bitten by the bug to build his own house. He's even picked out his architect and the location. After living in a variety of neighborhoods, ranging from Malibu to San Fernando, he's decided that he'd like to build in the Hollywood Hills overlooking the Sunset Strip.

For an architect he's chosen a friend and a promising disciple of Frank Lloyd Wright, a young man named Aaron Green. Architect Green lives in San Francisco and supervises the work Wright does in that area. He himself, however, has designed a number of modest homes in and around Los Angeles, and whenever he comes to town, he stays in Farley's extra bedroom. If Farley isn't working on that particular day, he tags along with Aaron on the various construction jobs.

"That's the way to learn about pure design," Granger says. "Go along with an expert who's learned it from the greatest architect in the business. Aaron has taught me an awful lot what to want and what to look for in a house. What I want is a compact little modern house, something built out of materials in their natural state—wood, stone, glass, and so forth."

THE experience of renting different types of houses has taught Farley what he needs: one large living area with built-in sections for entertainment and dining. He also wants a well-equipped kitchen and a swimming pool. The only thing that's holding him back from rushing into construction tomorrow is money. "I just don't have enough dough," he admits, "and I don't want to get started on a house and then stop halfway. I've seen a number of my friends over-extend their bank accounts. Then they move into partially completed houses. I'd hate that. I'd rather not start than end up with a house that has no landscaping or just makeshift furnishings. For me it's got to be all or nothing."

Farley's friends—and these include besides Shelley and Vittorio Gassmann, the Sidney Sheldons, Rocky Cooper, Dawn Addams, Leonard Bernstein, Ted Loeff, and a few others—are inclined to believe that Granger is waiting not so much for money to build as for the right female incentive.

"All he needs," says Shelley, "is a wife. When he finds one he'll stop talking about a house and start building a home." END

the truth about mr. and mrs. curtis

(Continued from page 33) about it. "When we were engaged, and she was wearing my ring and all, some New York columnist wrote that Tony Curtis better get himself a new press agent, because Janet Leigh had fallen in love with someone else and was going to marry him. Man, that was rugged!"

Man, it certainly was!

When the synthetic news that his girl was about to throw him over reached Tony, he came mighty close to a nervous collapse. He was in Denver, Colorado, on the first big personal appearance of his career. So great was his appeal for the opposite sex that after one stage show, he had to hide backstage for an hour before he could safely be smuggled back to his quarters at the Brown Palace Hotel. Girls of all ages were trying to rip off unanchored bits of clothing and he had been kissed once too often that day by passionate, predatory females.

Back in the comparative safety of his hotel suite, he tried to reach Janet by long distance telephone. She had been attempting to reach him all that day, with no success, because the operators were obeying orders; Mr. Curtis didn't want to speak to any eager young ladies. They'd have to leave their names and he'd call back.

Of course, there was some comfort in the dozen messages under his door, asking him to call Miss Leigh in Pittsburgh, but when he couldn't get through his normal reaction was the sneaking suspicion that perhaps, after all, there might have been some truth in the story that Janet had met up with a fascinating baseball player and, so to speak, flipped her lid. It was three o'clock in the morning before the connection was made. Then, at a cost of some 68 dollars, they straightened it out. Tony understood that Janet had met the ball player only once at a benefit show, after which they'd had dinner together with other people; that the ball player, being engaged to another girl, was just as upset over the columnist's "wild item" as they were. Janet, in turn, satisfied herself that Tony really believed that she loved him, and only him. And that morning, before they went to sleep in cities thousands of miles apart, they agreed to advance the date of their marriage by several months.

All this made the MODERN SCREEN correspondent a happy man. He was able to let his editor in on the news six weeks in advance, because he was with Tony at the time. Net result: several other magazines appeared on the newsstands with stories about Janet's "new" romance, and her ditching of the actor for the ball player, at almost the precise time she became Mrs. Tony Curtis.

TODAY, Janet remembers this experience, along with a few others, from an equally mature though feminine viewpoint: "I have a reputation for never forgetting anything, and those hectic days left a deep impression. The things that were printed sometimes! It was all publicity—Tony loved somebody else. I loved somebody else. Every few days we'd read how we'd split up—sometimes even by the same writer who'd said we'd never gone together in the first place. I don't care what anyone says; that's not funny when you have to live through it, and it's not an ideal beginning for marriage.

"But we survived all that. We did get married, and even when some people wouldn't leave us alone, we learned not to get nervous about rumor any more. We learned to live our lives and let other people say what they liked, hoping as we still do that maybe they'll eventually give up and go away."

Unfortunately, Janet knows that this will never happen. During their two years together, they have observed an even dozen famous marriages crack up. They know that reporters, although they are a frequent irritant, are not really to blame. The truth is, as Tony puts it, "Movie stars have the same right to fall in love as anyone else." They also have the same right to fall out of love, and like human beings everywhere, they will deny, up to the last minute, even to themselves, that a romance or a marriage is really over. That's why the whole marriage picture in Hollywood has become a strange game in which reporters must use every clue and device known to journalism in order to pass on to their readers the facts and trends in each matrimonial situation.

Sometimes (but not too often) they can be dead wrong. For instance, not many evenings ago, a guest at a Hollywood party, seeing Tony going through the hilarious fun of the magic acts he learned for his part in Houdini, asked where Janet was.

"Oh," he was told, "she was tired, so she went home."

A few days later a columnist hinted that Janet was fed up with Tony's preoccupation with magic, toy trains, and such-like. Net result: They were having serious trouble. This half-truth could have started a fight between Tony and Janet.

NO SUCH thing happened, and this is why: "Of course we have fights," Janet admits, "but for one simple reason. It's the things we worry about in each other. That sounds a little Pollyanna-ish, but that's how it is. I'm a busy person. So is Tony. The difference is that I'm not a very good sit-still. For instance, Tony is one of those people who can sleep 15 hours if he has 15 hours to sleep in. If I get eight, I'm lucky. Six is my average. When I get up, I have to get busy.

"That gets Tony mad. Starts a health lecture. He's so good at it he could take his solemn warnings out on tour. Then, he makes me mad when he forgets to get a haircut, or starts out somewhere, dressed more or less formally, in blue jeans and T shirt. Tony's not sloppy, but he's not what you call clothes conscious, either. (The truth is he started out to be, but so many people razed his selection of clothes that he decided to skip the whole thing.) Once or twice I've caught him ready to go to a party looking like a man who's just been wrestling with a mountain lion.

"Don't misinterpret this, now. Objectively speaking, I don't think that's good for people in our business. Everyone's got a certain thing to sell, I don't care what they do. Part of ours in the movie business is appearance—perhaps a kind of personality by which you become known. Sometimes even talent, if you happen to have it. But appearance, certainly. Naturally, it works the other way sometimes. You want a switch? Here's one. Sometimes Tony catches me looking a trifle goonish. So it's back to the mirror for Mrs. Curtis until Mr. Curtis approves.

"Mostly, from what I have learned so far, I think it's a good idea for one person to leave another's personality and habit patterns alone, and not to intrude on his individuality. But with Tony I do reserve one right—not to be penalized for speaking my mind if I think it should be spoken. I don't say he has to act upon my ideas; I do insist on the right to express them.

He feels the same, and that mutual attitude has saved us a lot of serious trouble."

Few Hollywood people have the courage or even the sense to express themselves in such an honest evaluation of themselves and their marriage. It must be increasingly apparent that Janet Leigh not only knows her way around the English language, but doesn't use it to lie to herself.

"Of course," she continues, "there are a lot of little things. I worry about Tony's not eating enough. On the other hand, he's afraid I'll go up like a land mine some day, after one too many desserts. I fix him four eggs for breakfast and stand over him until he's eaten them. He groans, complaining that food is just an ordeal, a chore to get over. Then, Tony likes a room hot; I like it cool. He goes around the place turning up the heat. I follow him, turning it down. He won't ride with me in a car. He's got to drive."

Right here, Janet is speaking of the type of little problems which, when all strung together, can begin the breakup of a marriage. Usually, when Hollywood marriages break up, the publicity releases make the whole thing sound like some horrid freak of fate played upon two perfect people, instead of the truth. The truth? Well, it gets back to such things as a husband not liking to have four eggs crammed down his throat each morning by an ever-loving spouse. Then a whole series of minor irritations which are climaxed by a full-blown physical and spiritual parting of the ways.

That this doesn't happen with them, or hasn't yet, is best explained by Janet.

"In two years our marriage has mellowed. It's sort of shaken down. We're in a groove now. A groove, I said—not a rut—and we're better people for it, I think. Happiness is always happiness, but it may be more assured happiness because of time. I'd wish that to everybody. Our feeling for each other has deepened, and if the deepening robs the intensity a little, then that's a healthy form of theft. You can't hold a melting-eyed closeup indefinitely, and you aren't expected to."

AT THIS point, having gallantly given the wife the first words, Tony's attitude is pertinent, if at times contradictory.

"This marriage is wonderful, no matter what you may read," he says. "It gets better and better. Janet and I aren't exactly of high school age any more. We're growing up and learning something new about each other every day. You grow up. You've got to. Everything in your life comes of age sometime. You discover that your work belongs to your marriage. Your marriage belongs to your work and your social life, and so on. In the long run, you can't disunite anything without tearing yourselves apart. Take this acting. I figure that with each picture I learn something. I get a little better. If one isn't so good, I learn from it. I gain in confidence and I take that confidence home to the marriage. It must be the same in every business; in every household.

"But that doesn't mean that you can take your work home with you. Brother, that's murder. Many a happy home has been wrecked by that. Look, I come home, I got hobbies. I got this model boat I'm building. I got a tape recorder Jerry Lewis bought me, 900 bucks' worth. I got a camera I'm learning to work, got an electric train, even. To explain, when I go home of an evening, I may go to work on my boat. I work with parts that are a 16th of an inch or a 32nd of an inch—all small and delicate—putting in pieces you can hardly see. And while I'm doing it I'm thinking about that work and nothing else. I'm just another guy with a hobby. I'm not telling my wife, actor-like, about how the director just doesn't have the 'savvy.' I'm not fighting with her. I'm just fooling around, relaxing with a gadget that cost $1.90. Maybe some other people are spending $30 an hour going to a psychiatrist to find out why their wives get on their nerves, or vice versa. That's not for us."

BOTH Janet and Tony feel that the "Gee Whiz Kids" part of their marriage is over. Thinking back on it, they may wonder, sometimes, whether the public ever thought they were a real couple, or a pair of fiction characters put together from a chocolate éclair recipe.

"We were and are real, all right," Tony continues. "Almost everything written about us has been true, outside of the 'pan' gossip, and if we're not quite so romantic to read about now, we're at least more plausible. I think we got that way by going over the hurdles. Some of the people here in Hollywood, they got a cute custom. Cute like a hit in the head. When we were first married, we discovered these goons. I don't want to make it too nasty, but at parties and other places they make a deliberate effort to cut you apart.

"Maybe it's nothing worse than a sophisticated form of needling or a practical joke. But it's a fact that somebody will make a pass at the husband, and somebody else will make a pass at the wife. Then they like to sit back and laugh when the trouble starts. We went through it, but we discovered that when nothing happens they'll leave you alone. I've had it—up to here, and when you're in love it's not pleasant. Now that we're an old couple, I guess we're immune, and I must say I don't miss this sort of indoor sport."

Here, Tony Curtis has put an expert finger on the trouble with many Hollywood marriages. Frequently, it's not a matter of what happens at home as what happens away from home that leads a movie couple down the road of disenchantment to divorce.

Janet has an excellent slant on this observation. "We're relaxing now—I mean both in a social way and with each other. That must be the growing up stage. In the first year everything the other wanted was just 'duddy.' If I wanted to go to the movies, so did Tony. If Tony wanted to stay home, Janet was all for it. Never a disagreement; a state of affairs which, if it had gone on and on that way, might have brought on an interesting psychological condition.

"Then, just the other night we were scheduled to go to some party or other. All of a sudden I turned to Tony and said, 'You know, I don't want to go.' And do you know what he did? He laughed. He threw back his head and laughed in the most relieved sort of way. Just this side of mild hysteria, he said, 'Janet, that's the first time I've heard you declare an honest impulse since our courtin' days.' He didn't want to go either. It turned out we were both going to go because we thought the other wanted to. It was a great discovery to make about each other, and it's making life a lot easier."

ON THIS note, the bittersweet recollections of Mr. and Mrs. Tony Curtis cease, but further cursory research discloses that the Curtis marriage, however sane and intelligent it may now be, was not without flamboyance in its earlier stages. It took place, as much of the civilized world still remembers, on June 4, 1951, at the Pickwick Arms Hotel in Greenwich, Conn., and amounted in effect to an elopement right from under the eyes of the stockholders and studio brass, an executive group opposed to the whole foolish business.

Tony's best friend Jerry Lewis had to relay to the pair the displeasure of their various employers over the whole proposition. Lewis was in favor of love himself, but had agreed to state the executive attitude formally, the executive attitude being that marital status would detract from the boxoffice impact of both partners. To their everlasting credit, the two embraced the general state of mind of General McCauliffe at Bastogne and went ahead with their plans.

As it turned out, there wasn't so much of a flap after all. No known suicides followed the revelation that Mr. Curtis was no longer a nominee, and Mrs. Curtis' following held up equally well.

Miss Leigh, according to the soundest available sources, is a protégée of Norma Shearer, who came across her at Sun Valley and rushed the news to Hollywood. Mr. Curtis, whose great-grandfather was a seven-foot-eight strong man in a Budapest circus, is the protégé of every woman in America under the age of 23. He himself will be 28 the day before his second wedding anniversary, on June 3.

So ends another interim report on the Curtis family, as they step up from the role of America's sweethearts to the more recognizable grade of a devoted married couple, a little older and a little wiser, if still not quite ready to renounce sugar, spice and similar ingredients. END

everything happens to me

The picture got rolling and spare time for sightseeing was short, but I did have to make appearances at a number of affairs—as a visitor is expected to do. That's when the trouble started. A splendid Mexican gentleman who works on a film paper down there handled our publicity and he asked me if I would make an appearance on the Mexican national radio network and just say hello. Because hello was just about all I could say in Spanish I agreed. I showed up at the station and was ushered before a microphone. I turned around for a minute to take a peek into the control booth and when I looked back a large blonde in a black dress was at my side.

Now I like to look at a large blonde in a black dress as well as the next man, so naturally I grinned like a small boy who had just found his lost live frog. The girl took me by the hand and led me to the microphone and the audience applauded uproariously. Some of it was for me, but a lot of it was for her, and properly so. She spoke into the mike and because I heard her mention my name I bowed politely and muttered: "Si, gracias, amigo, buenas dias. . . ." and a couple of other words I had learned for the occasion. I was received like a noted linguist.

After the program was over, photographers came by and took a lot of pictures, in some of which the blonde woman was standing by my side. Everything was just fine—until the next morning. Someone showed me the papers and it seemed to me that the editors had cut all the other people in the pictures out, leaving just me and the blonde in the shots. I was disturbed for a moment, but then I thought, "Oh, well what's the difference. It's all for the good of the picture. Maybe my wife will understand."

I didn't see this blonde lady for several days. The next time was at the race track. Diana Lynn and I were making some shots out there and we were standing around waiting for the director to say, "Action!" when a little man ran up in front of me with a camera and flashed off a bulb in my face. At the same moment I felt a clutching hand on my arm and I looked around and there she was, looking at me with eyes filled with tenderness. I was beginning to get sore. I called over the publicity man and asked what was going on. He took me and the blonde aside and explained things.

THIS lady, it seems, was one of the big movie stars of Mexico. She was a European, but she spoke Spanish fluently, had made many Mexican pictures and had become very popular. "That is all very well," I told the publicity man, "but I don't like the expression she gets on her face whenever there is a camera around. I am a married man with a family. If this lady (whose name I will not mention out of a sense of chivalry) has this tremendous urge to have her picture taken with me, let's see that she doesn't look that way and let's have a few people around so it won't look like I'm raising old Ned with some siren while I'm away from home. How about that?"

The publicity man was receptive and the blonde appeared not the least bit upset, so with some admonition, like, "Let's watch ourselves around here in the future," I went back to my work.

Life was uneventful for a superb 24 hours. This time it happened at a television station. Dolores Del Rio was making her debut as a TV producer and when I was asked I was delighted to make an appearance at the station. I walked in and guess who popped up, grabbed hold of my arm and swung into a beautiful flow of Spanish. She might have been telling the people around that I was a former axe murderer for all I knew, so all I could do was stand there and grin and mutter: "Si, amigo, gracias, buenos dias. . . ." Apparently, though, she said something nice, because everyone applauded like mad and the photographers ran up and began snapping pictures. I got out of there as fast as I could. And you should have seen the papers the next morning. The pictures were played up big, and my name and the name of the lady were sprinkled all through the copy. I went right out and bought a Spanish-American dictionary.

They got me again at the bull fights. You can horse around in a lot of places in Mexico, but not in the bull ring. The seats are reserved and numbered and a group from the picture company took a block together. I was no sooner seated than I heard a lot of applause, so I looked down into the ring to see what was happening. I was looking in the wrong place, because out of the corner of my eye I saw this blonde skidding along toward me, followed by her cameramen. I looked for a way out, but there wasn't any—and I knew about creating a ruckus, so I just smiled while she sat, and I wished the sun would go down, so I could get under the bench. But they had flash bulbs—and the only consolation I had was that some of the photographers got some great shots of the top of my head.

The next day at the studio I insisted that the American press agent, employed by the studio, take a hand and see if he couldn't stop this situation from getting any more romantic. He was very appreciative of my problem and promised to think of something.

One of the biggest events of the year in Mexico City is the annual film festival. A lot of American stars come to Mexico and the players of each country put on a big show for the press and public. Naturally, I had to go, no matter how much I craved solitude at the moment. But as soon as I stepped into the auditorium, I grabbed an official and I said if I was obliged to do any talking with anyone it was all going to have to be in English. He tried to point out to me that very few Mexicans would understand me, but by that time I was only concerned with me understanding what was going on. While I was talking to him he kept backing me up and the next thing I knew I was on the stage looking at about 5,000 people.

THERE was nothing to do, of course, except bow and walk over to the center of the stage where, so help me Harry, Blondie stood alone as big as ever. Except that by this time she was beginning to look like Bela Lugosi to me. I was trapped, but determined. "Look here, madam," I scowled at her quietly, "I've got to know what you're saying this time, so I can answer intelligently." She grabbed me by the arm and squeezed and whispered to me. "I am going to tell them how much you love Mexico. Mexican films and the Mexican people," she said. "And all you have to say is 'Mucho, mucho,' and they'll understand."

"Well, watch it," I said. "And stick to the subject."

She waited for quiet and rattled off a long string of Spanish, then she looked coyly at me.

"Mucho, mucho," I said.

You'd have thought I'd just given them Texas the way those people cheered. Things are getting a little better I thought. Once again this spellbinder got going with the language then gave me a little hug.

"Mucho, mucho," I said, not quite so eagerly.

This time you'd have thought I'd abolished taxes. The folks just went plain nuts—and Blondie reached up and gave me a little squeeze. I stopped saying, "Mucho," right then. And I'm not ashamed to admit that I discovered I have a streak of cowardice. I slid over to one side and made a fast exit.

That night, with the lights out and the moon shining in the open window I lay in bed and swore an oath that never, never as long as I lived would I stand beside that woman again, or stay in the same room with her. And I never did. But it didn't help a bit. I didn't have to read Spanish the next morning to know what was in the papers. "Our beautiful Mexican actress confesses she might be in love with Glenn Ford!" they said, or words to that effect. "And," cried another headline, "Glenn Ford, when asked by our beautiful Mexican film star if he could love her, shouted 'Mucho, mucho.' What a beautiful pair they are. What a couple of romantic lovers!"

"What a crock of sauerkraut!" I was howling at the press agent ten minutes later. "What are they doing to me? Can't somebody tell them I am a happily married man? How can this happen? Do something!"

A man came in and said that my "Friend" was on the telephone. "You tell her," I said, "that I wouldn't talk to her if she was afire and I knew where the only fire hose in Mexico was."

"We seem to have a serious situation here," said the press agent.

"What do you think I've been trying to tell you?" I said. "If this keeps up I'll be living in a hotel when I get home. Do something about it."

"It appears," he said thoughtfully, "that this actress has just about the hottest-shot press agent in the western hemisphere. And she's using you to get space."

"Okay," I said. "Hire her press agent away. Have him arrested. Get her space with somebody else. Find her a nice local fellow with no family. Get Bogart down here and have the lot of them rubbed out. But move fast, I feel a hot breath on my neck."

The hot breath was all over me the next edition. Apparently upset because I wouldn't accept her phone calls, the lady had given an interview to the papers—which they ran under the usual headlines—stating that she was not so sure now she was in love with me. Good! I thought. But down further I saw my name again and had it translated. "Why?" the newspaper asked, "does not Glenn Ford speak his feelings for our beloved film star? Is he not a man? Is he going to allow our lady to pine because of his ungallant manners. He is surely no gentleman if this is so."

By this time I was surely no gentleman for sure. I was happy to tell anybody who would listen to me just exactly what my feelings for the lady were. But it never got in the papers. The next day all of the Mexico City papers were at me. They almost made me hate myself. "Is this American movie star to be allowed to publicly insult by his silence the flower of our country? Is he to be permitted to break the heart of the loveliest lady in our land. No! Stern action must be taken to halt this. Such a man is not fit to be in our city." And in another paper: "Miss _____, in an exclusive interview with this reporter, stated that she could not understand what had happened between her and Glenn Ford, but she was coming to the end of her patience. She is not at all sure now that she would forgive him if he came crawling to her on his knees. What a shameful situation," it continued. "Who is this man who was welcomed here as a guest and who has made a fool of our sweet lady? Who, in truth, has ever heard of him?"

"Everybody has now heard of me," I roared at the press agent a little later. "Would to God nobody in this corner of the world had, though. When are you going to do something?"

"It seems," he said quietly, "that the young lady has a lot of cousins who are very influential with the press."

"That is the silliest thing anybody ever said," I yelled. "This girl apparently owns the press."

The press agent was trying to stuff a newspaper up the back of his coat while we talked.

"What are you doing there?" I asked. "Nothing," he said. "It's just an old newspaper I'm saving."

"That's a funny place to save a newspaper," I said. "Let me see it."

"Later," he said. "You're a little upset right now."

"I've been upset ever since I got here," I bellowed. "Let me have that paper."

He handed it over. I saw a cartoon, depicting the lovely flower of Latin-American films. I got out my little dictionary, but I really didn't need it. "Who needs a Ford," the caption read, "I have a Cadillac."

"That does it," I said. "Get me writers, lawyers, police. This is the last straw. We're going to give a statement to the press and they're going to print it if I have to go to the President and the American Ambassador."

Finally, at long last, I got a word in the papers. It was difficult to know what to say, because I was a stranger in a foreign country, and I had made many friends, and had developed a good deal of respect for the Mexican people. But I remembered that the lady was not a Mexican, but a European, and I was so fed up with being misunderstood that what I said had to be to the point. Because I was innocent of any complicity in this "romance" I felt I did not have to be polite beyond ordinary dignity, so here is what appeared in the papers the next day:

"When questioned concerning statements made by Miss _____, Mr. Ford stated he had not read in full translation the articles in question. 'However,' Mr. Ford said, 'I have received such magnificent and wonderful hospitality from my co-workers and friends in Mexico, I feel that if Miss _____'s statements are helping her career as an aspiring actress, then I am glad to be of assistance. When she does achieve the full success she is seeking, she will probably adopt more dignified methods of achieving publicity.'"

If that sounds rough, it is exactly what I intended it to be. I wanted an end to the matter, and no future speculations as to my relationship with the lady. And I wanted the people of Mexico to know that I was aware the whole thing was a publicity stunt at my expense. That night I rested comfortably for the first time in weeks. Everything was fine, wrapped up and over with.

LAD, it was only the beginning. All the cousins went to work on me at once. The papers did, too. Someone told me the lady's boy friend was looking for me with a knife. A friend in the government wanted to deputize me, so I could carry a gun. Now, the company press agent decided to get into the act. He invited the lady to meet him at a restaurant and talk the whole thing over. They met—and those who were present say it was quite an occasion.

It seems the lady denied that most of the articles had appeared. The press agent said they had so. All of the papers for the past few weeks were ordered from the news offices and when they were brought the only place they could be spread out was on the bar. While the lady and the press agent began heatedly flipping through the pages and making and denying charges, the bartender began setting up drinks along the line, and in a couple of hours neither the lady nor my defender were feeling any pain.

A couple of days later I got on a plane and came home. When I looked at my house, and saw my wife and son standing in the doorway waiting for me, I wanted to get down on my knees and kiss my own driveway. Ellie had a twinkle in her eye and after I'd kissed her she started to say something. I held up a hand.

"There will be no baiting of Father," I said. "Father has had it. I have had a bad dream. I am now going up to bed and have a good one." And I did. And it was all in English.

"When we first arrived in Europe, we caught the Rome express to Italy. We had a villa ready for us outside of Rome in Albano. We hired an English tutor, Mr. Ticknor, for the boys, and he was wonderful. Greg was acting with Audrey Hepburn in Roman Comedy, and of course, all of us picked up a little Italian.

"When we moved up to France, we spoke a little French, and while learning new languages for Greg and me was very good, it only confused little Carey. He's just a little more than three, and after a while his language became such a mixture of different tongues that the only ones who could ever understand him were Greg and myself.

"EUROPE is a very wonderful continent and all of that, but a winter in France can be pretty wet, and when I thought of what we had waiting for us back in California, the sunshine and the house we'd had re-furnished—well, I just decided that it would be best for everyone if I came back with the boys.

"Greg has a restless nature, and I felt it would be good for him, too, if he didn't have to worry about us. As soon as we were gone he went on a publicity trip for Snows Of Kilimanjaro. He was in Stockholm, Copenhagen, Oslo, and Helsinki. I have dozens of relatives in Finland, and they gave him a tremendous welcome. He called us up on the phone and told us all about it. And another thing, he leaves soon for India. He's making a picture for Arthur Rank. I think it's called The Purple Plains.

"It sounds very romantic, but how would it be dragging three small boys to India for a couple of months, enrolling them in school, getting everything set up and then just when you've got your household organized, start packing and return to France?

"That's what I was faced with. Greg wanted us to remain with him. No matter what anyone tells you, he is a very strong family man—after all when he was making Captain Horatio Hornblower a few years ago, didn't he insist upon bringing the whole family over to London, even Carey and the nurse? But really, it wouldn't have been fair to the boys. That's why we're back in California.

"About Greg and that model Julianne—that's no big secret. I've met the girl. She's a very lovely person. I believe Gladys and Eduard de Segonzac—he's the Paramount publicity man in Paris and his wife is a designer—were the people who first introduced her to us.

"So Greg has taken her out to dinner once or twice, and she has shown him around Paris—that's no great crime. I have never expected Greg to live the life of a hermit.

"When he's away he's entitled to a little companionship. There is nothing wrong in that, nothing in going out with two or three couples or having a dinner partner.

"What is wrong and really unpleasant are those wild stories which spring up from these things. But honestly I'm used to them. The first time—it wasn't long after we were married—two years or so. I was pregnant with Jonathan, and I think Greg had gone to New York for some exploitation or something, and the stories began to come back. He was dining with so and so, or such a girl. I was very young, I believed everything I read, and really, it made me sick. I believed all that divorce talk until I found out it was something the newspapers had just made up.

"It is really a funny world. Greg can be doing David And Bathsheba or any other picture in Hollywood, and he'll be having lunch with an actress, and no one will think anything of it, but let him sit down at a café in Paris and take lunch with a girl, and right away, it's a big romance, and we are getting a divorce.

"I'll tell you again and then we won't talk about it any more. Greg and I are not separated. There will be no divorce. We are on the best of terms, and if you don't believe it, you can talk to him at the Hotel Lancaster in Paris."

At the Hotel Lancaster on the Rue Berri, a hotel which Katherine Hepburn and Spencer Tracy introduced to the Hollywood colony about six years ago, Greg Peck blew his top when he was asked if he contemplated dropping Greta in favor of some younger woman.

"How in heaven's name do these things start?" he exploded. "I'm not separated. I'm not getting a divorce, and I'm very happily married. Right now I'm between pictures, but I'm scheduled to leave for India around April 1st. Then I'm going to do one called Assignment In Stockholm and probably another comedy that Willie Wyler has in mind. After that I'll probably go home.

"Greta and I had a great time and I wanted her to stay, wanted her to stay very much, but she's a wonderful mother—she's always thinking of the boys—and she figured they would be better off in California."

Gregory and Greta Peck are both honorable people, and under the circumstances their protestations are understandable and of course, completely believable. But where there is so much smoke there is usually a little fire, and in this particular case it has been said of tall, dark, gangling Gregory that he is suffering from a disease common to many husbands and known as The Roving Eye.

In Europe the story persists that Greg's roving eye has settled on a beautiful, 21-year-old half-French, half-Russian journalist named Veronica Pasanie.

According to this story which has been hushed about every European capital, Greg was introduced to Veronica last Summer in a café outside Rome by Papashou, the French chanteuse and night club entertainer.

At the time Veronica, according to friends, was representing a French evening newspaper, the Paris Presse. These same friends say that it was love at first sight for the young girl, that she became infatuated with Peck, stayed on in Rome to be near him, and later followed him to Paris after he had finished Roman Comedy.

Allegedly, Mrs. Peck knew nothing about this infatuation. She took little side trips with Greg to Saint Moritz where they indulged in winter sports. Last September she came to Paris, registered at the Elysée Park Hotel, made arrangements to register her sons at the American School in Paris.

Newspaper reporters in Paris say that two weeks before she returned to the U. S., Greta Peck found out about Veronica. Supposedly she and Greg had one of those heart-to-heart talks which culminated in a verbal battle royal.

Greta Peck insists this is nonsense, but the gossip in Europe is that Greg continues to see an awful lot of Veronica who was 21 on February 10th.

In some quarters there is talk that the onetime journaliste for the Paris Presse may even follow Peck to Stockholm, Morocco, and India.

It is possible, of course, that the friendship between Veronica and Greg is nothing more than a platonic relationship, that Greg is flattered by the hero-worship of a young, intelligent, and avidly admiring female, that she has somehow touched his vanity.

Certainly they are never seen together at night clubs, cafés, and restaurants, but still they have seen a good deal of each other in quiet, out-of-the-way places.

Not that anything too serious will develop out of this affinity. A year or so ago, a notorious blonde who worked for a short while at several studios and was later involved in one of the most highly-publicized marriages in Hollywood history, gave Peck a bad time of it.

She made a strong play for the boy from La Jolla, but Peck refused to succumb to her not inconsiderable charms, and this was an admirable demonstration of self-control on his part, and good luck, too—for a few months later, this predatory temptress hooked a well-known actor who divorced her when he somehow managed to come upon a rather sensational photograph.

In all probability Peck's friendship with the Pasanie girl will dissolve as harmlessly, for Greg is one actor who will never have his children suffer the agony of a broken home.

He is the product of such a home himself—his parents were divorced before he was ten—and he was passed around to various relatives, and he knows that such an existence makes for an unhappy, insecure childhood.

As a matter of fact, it has been suggested many times that a contributory reason behind Greg's falling in love with Greta Konen, the girl he married, was her secure family life.

Greta came to the U. S. with her large Finnish family when she was 12. The family eventually settled in Jersey City, and after Greta left New York University, she got a job as hairdresser for Katherine Cornell.

In 1939 Miss Cornell's husband, Producer Guthrie McClintic, signed Gregory Peck, an ex-Radio City guide, for a last-act bit in The Doctor's Dilemma, a play his famous wife was taking out on the road; and it was during the course of this tour that Greg first met the tiny, attractive, wide-faced Greta. When the tour was over, she took him to meet her family in Jersey City, and from that point on, it was love all the way.

They were married in 1942, and the marriage brought Peck great luck. McClintic gave him a part on Broadway in Emlyn Williams' play, The Morning Star, and while the play flopped, Greg got good notices and was seen by Hollywood producer Casey Robinson.

Brought out to Hollywood by agent Leland Hayward, he was shy, uncertain, not too sure of his acting ability, but this was during World War II when Hollywood was practically manless and since he was draft-proof—he had hurt his spine while rowing on the crew at the University of California—Peck was sought by every studio in town.

For a very little money he was soon split up between David O. Selznick, MGM, and 20th Century-Fox. Hayward turned him over to an assistant, an affable Australian named Roy Myer, and each Friday, Myer would pick up Peck's weekly check of $1500.

Fortunately for Greg he was never cast in a series of B pictures, the fate most apprentice actors must endure. All of his pictures were top budget jobs. Keys Of The Kingdom cost $3,000,000. The Yearling, The Macomber Affair, Spellbound, Duel In The Sun, Gentlemen's Agreement; all of these were budgeted at $1,500,000 and over, and all were major productions; so that Peck was never type-cast and was always given a big buildup.

In all fairness to him, it must be said that success never went to his head. At 36, he is still one of the most unassuming of all Hollywood stars. Before he left for Europe, he liked nothing better than to spend his spare time at home with Greta and the three boys or to take family trips. Other than for the aforementioned blonde, gossip never touched him.

He dislikes night-clubbing and the high-pressure social life, but likes to spend money now that he gets upward of $100,000 a picture. His wife is on the thrifty side.

Taxes being what they are, he doesn't get to keep too much of what he earns, which is one reason why he decided last spring to make films outside of the U. S. (Citizens who work outside of the U. S. for 18 months don't have to pay any Federal income tax).

When the Pecks arrived in Rome last May, the first thing they did was to leave their boys at the hotel and take a moonlight ride to the Colosseum and the other famous Italian ruins. This is a pretty romantic way to spend a first night in Italy, and it shows that after ten years of marriage, Gregory and Greta can still light the spark.

HAVING been in show business herself, Greta Peck realizes that actors, particularly handsome leading men, are constantly beset by temptation in the form of designing females.

She knows that many women have figuratively thrown themselves at her husband's feet, but she is a sensible woman with calm Scandinavian blood in her veins—"I don't get alarmed very quickly"—and she has boundless faith in her husband's moral character.

When asked about Greg and the various "divorce" and "separation" stories emanating from Europe, Mrs. Peck holds her head high and says in words that come from the heart, "Greg is a good man. He would never do anything to hurt his family."

Whether that statement is fact or merely wishful thinking the next six months will tell.

"You mean just hold Saturday nights for you?" Debbie's voice camouflaged her disappointment.

"Only if you want to," R.J. said. "If you're too tired, or you want to date someone else—I mean, you do whatever you want to."

Debbie reverted to type. "You bet I will. And you do whatever you want to, R.J." And with that, she slipped out of the car and whisked into the house.

THE following day columnists announced that Debbie Reynolds had struck the name of Robert J. Wagner, Jr., the brightest young actor on the 20th Century-Fox lot, from her list of eligible beaux.

Some of the rumor-spreaders said Debbie had tired of waiting for R.J. to make his move. She had been going more or less steadily with Bob for two years, and while all the newspapers had described them as engaged, the boy who, figuratively speaking, had been born with a silver spoon in his mouth, had never even come up with a ring or a declaration of his intentions.

They suggested that perhaps Debbie in her carefully careless feminine way, had tried to force the play and, in trying, had struck out. R.J. had not even been maneuvered into a statement of his affections. He wanted freedom to play the field, to date Melinda Markey, Babs Darrow, Susan Zanuck, and he was willing to accord Debbie the same leeway with the opposite sex. No entanglements of the heart for this rapidly-rising star.

When Debbie was asked if she'd quarreled with her handsome heart throb on these grounds, all she would say was, "Don't be silly. R.J.'s got to find himself. I know about boys all right."

Other columnists insisted that Debbie and R.J. had called it quits for a very simple reason. Wagner had become infatuated with Barbara Stanwyck, whose son he was playing in Titanic.

In fact, Bob and Barbara were raked over the coals by the press, R.J. being depicted as a sensuous Lothario who dated the 45-year-old Barbara on one night and reverted to the 20-year-old Debbie on another, while Stanwyck, it was implied, had begun in the summer of her life to cultivate the art of robbing the cradle.

The truth of the Stanwyck-Wagner-Reynolds triangle is simple. The truth usually is. Here are two women and one young man whose friendships have been publicized as love affairs, so that under the present set of circumstances, it is considered prudent for Bob to go out with Debbie, but not too prudent to be seen in public alone with Stanwyck.

BARBARA Stanwyck or "Missy" as she's called on every lot in town, is one of the sweetest, kindest, most helpful actresses in the movie colony.

As you probably know, she never wanted to give up her second husband, Robert Taylor. She loved him very much and probably still does. It was he who wanted the divorce, and because Barbara is the type of understanding and compassionate woman she is, she consented without quarrels, fights, or long, involved legal hassles.

With Taylor gone, Barbara was lonely and unhappy, and for such a state of depression she knows only one anodyne: work, work, and more work. She took practically every picture offered to her, and during the course of these films met several young actors: Jean Pierre Aumont, Ralph Meeker, and of course, Bob Wagner.

"With every one of these," she good-naturedly recalls, "it was the same thing. As soon as some reporter saw us talking together, right away it was a big romance. Take this thing with R.J. One evening Clifton Webb, R.J., and myself, all three of us, went to dinner at Romanoff's. No one mentioned that Clifton was along. Oh no! That would've spoiled a good item. The columnists merely wrote that Wagner and Stanwyck had been seen dining together. They made a real cozy thing out of it."

"I've been out here a long time. I know the ways and wiles of publicity, and I don't care what they say about me. But it certainly is unfair to R.J. He's a fine boy and an ambitious actor. It was great fun working with him, and we might've become good friends. But under the circumstances it's impossible. You become self-conscious and embarrassed about a little thing like dinner in a restaurant. You know it will be blown up to ridiculous lengths so you stop going out."

"Last year several newspapers in Paris insisted that I was phoning Jean Pierre overseas every single night. It wasn't true, but they were determined to have us involved in a romance so they conjured one up via transatlantic telephone."

"With Ralph Meeker it was the same story. We went out a few times. Of course, it couldn't be friendship. It had to be a big thing. Well, it wasn't."

BOB Wagner feels miserable about the Stanwyck affair. "They've spoiled," he says of the newspapers, "what could have been one of the finest friendships in my whole life. There was never anything between us that wasn't strictly professional. I hung around her dressing room while we were making Titanic because she was gracious enough to give me a few tips about some lines, a few suggestions how to play a certain scene. What's wrong with that?"

"To me Barbara Stanwyck has always been one of the really great actresses in this town. She knows more about the business than I'll ever know. I'm really indebted to her for her advice. She was wonderful to me in the scenes we played together. She could have stolen every single one of them, but she gave me all the breaks."

"How anyone could think there was a romance or anything like that between us—well, it's beyond me. I admit that I liked to be with her. What man wouldn't like to be with Barbara Stanwyck? I feel it's an honor to have played in a picture with her. But this stuff about my breaking up with Debbie because I once had dinner with Clifton Webb and Barbara, or because Miss Stanwyck and I once had a drink together, that's not on the level. I've always thought the world of Debbie Reynolds, but we were never engaged, and I don't know who started the story that we were. Debbie's a wonderful girl, and we never called it quits. I still see her on the same basis I've always seen her. Debbie has no intention of getting married for years. That goes for me, too. How in the world can I think of marriage with the Service hanging over my head?"

"Honestly, all you have to do in this town is go out a couple of times and you can get yourself so mixed up you don't know whether you're coming or going."

What got R.J. "involved" with Barbara Stanwyck insofar as the Press is concerned, was a tip that these two used to meet nightly at a little restaurant in Beverly Hills called the Hob Nob.

Actually Stanwyck and Wagner were seen in that particular eating place only once. They'd had a hard day on the set and R.J. had offered to drive Barbara home, and en route, he'd suggested that they stop off for a drink.

Barbara had agreed, so they parked the car, walked into the Hob Nob, had a fast one, and then pulled out. Someone tipped off the columnists, and that's what started the gossip.

Whether Bob and Barbara will ever get together again socially no one at this point knows. Certainly they will have a third or fourth party along if they go out in public, because both are extremely sensitive to public opinion. Before she left for Mexico where she's starring opposite Gary Cooper in Blowing Wild, Barbara said, "I think R.J. is a very nice young man, and I'd like to work with him again. As for seeing him, well, you know what can happen. One cup of coffee together and the rumors start all over again. It's just too embarrassing."

LIKE other actresses of her age and position, "Missy" finds herself in a tough spot. It is almost impossible in Hollywood to find an eligible, unmarried man in the 45-to-50 age bracket. Stanwyck, on occasion, therefore goes out with younger men. As soon as she does, the reporters make an item of the date and the friendship goes up like a cloud of smoke.

Debbie Reynolds, of course, has no such trouble. At 20, she has more men than she can handle, but the one she dotes on is her six-foot, sandy-haired "R.J." the prototype of the all-American boy.

Although Debbie and Wagner both insist that absolutely nothing has occurred to change the status of their friendship, there are tell-tale signs that this isn't particularly true. The temperature of their relationship has reduced itself from hot to luke warm. The freshness of it, the primary spontaneity has dwindled, and they are now more obsessed with their careers than with each other. Both kids are determined to get to the top and stay there, and they're not going to let a little thing like affection interfere with their long-term plans.

They still care for each other a great deal, but they're probably more in love with success than with each other. No longer are they an inseparable duo. When it comes to previews and awards dinners, Debbie goes with Tab Hunter, Hugh O'Brian, John Anderson, Bob Travers, any of a dozen boyfriends.

It was Debbie, however, who arranged with R.J.'s mother for a surprise party on his 23rd birthday, and the two kids still talk to each other on the phone three or four times a week. But the promise and potential of their courtship has dwindled considerably since their careers have shifted into high, and Wagner has been mentioned in connection with Barbara Stanwyck.

Debbie first met Bob Wagner almost three years ago through the auspices of Camille Williams, a girlfriend who had a job in the chorus line at Fox. Debbie was just breaking in at Metro—she had been bounced by Warners after working her way up from $60 to $100 a week—and when she dropped by 20th one afternoon, Camille introduced the young Mr. Wagner.

Wagner took it from there. This boy who seems so shy and naive is in reality a very smooth operator but in a cultured, well-bred, impeccable way. He began taking Debbie out every Saturday night, usually to a show or the bowling alley in Glendale, and the next thing anyone knew, these kids were posing regularly for the fan magazine photographers, doing all sorts of layouts; and everyone was sure they were engaged or had entered some mutual understanding.

The crass truth is that they both knew they were good for each other, not only personally but publicity-wise, and while love was undoubtedly involved in their relationship, it was relegated to a subsidiary role. For other than the motion picture business and their mutual affection, they have little in common. Their backgrounds, for example, are completely different.

WAGNER is a rich man's son. His father is a steel company executive who's always earned a five-figure income. As a boy R.J. was sent to private school and educated with all the well-to-do trimmings. His folks own homes in Bel-Air and La Jolla. He's mingled with the country club set all his life. He knows what it is to buy and wreck a couple of sports cars, and he first broke into the movie game because his father happens to be a friend of Wild Bill Wellman, the ace director, and his father asked Wellman to get the boy a job.

Debbie on the other hand, comes from middle class stock. She was born in El Paso, Texas, on April 1st, 1932, and christened Mary Frances Reynolds. Her father was a carpenter for the Southern Pacific Railroad, and when Debbie was eight, the old man was transferred to Los Angeles where he rented a house for the family down near the tracks. The environment was so miserable, however, that the Reynolds entourage took a place out at Burbank, home of the Warner Bros. studio, and it was in this community that Debbie was raised.

Unlike Bob Wagner who has rented a bachelor apartment next door to Dan Dailey, Debbie still lives at home, chews gum violently, is vociferously enthusiastic about everything she does. Although she has made trips to New York, Washington, Korea, Japan, and Mexico, she has yet to adopt the jaded attitude of the worldly sophisticate.

A few years ago when she was asked how she felt about boys, she said, "They're fine if they don't take you for granted. What I don't like is one of those sharpies—you know, you give him a date and right away he says, 'How about driving up and catching a little breeze at Mulholland.' (Mulholland is a highway in the Hollywood hills frequently used as a lovers lane.) When they say that to me, I say, 'That's all, brother. Let me out of this buggy.' I just don't like to be taken for granted."

IN that last sentence may well lie the clue to Debbie's new relationship with Bob Wagner.

"Debbie insists she isn't teed off at R.J.," one of her friends explains, "but I think she is, in her own nice, sweet way, of course. For years she's been saving Saturday nights for him. Instead of asking for more than Saturday nights, he began to ask for less, and the papers began running all those items about him and Stanwyck. I think that hurt Debbie's vanity. She didn't want to be one of many, just a sometimes girlfriend. She wanted to be the girlfriend. I think she was hoping for R.J. to make things more definite. When he didn't, I don't think her heart was broken, anything like that. She merely saw no point in being known as his girl without being it. Lots of times that happens to a girl. She gets coupled with one particular fellow, and all the other guys are afraid to ask for a date. Debbie didn't want that to happen to her, and that's why she sort of decided to let R.J. go his way and she'd go hers. Not that they still aren't friends. They are, but from here on in, R.J. can't take Debbie for granted, either for Saturday-night dates or other dates. He's got to call just like any other fellow."

Debbie's mother says, "I want you to know that we all think the world of R.J. He is one of the kindest, most well-bred young gentlemen Debbie has ever known here, and she's gone out with quite a few."

"Insofar as I know he and Debbie are both still pals, maybe not as close as they used to be, but let's face it, time occasionally dulls the attraction. I don't think they were ever sweethearts—just good friends. Debbie has always said that she would never think of getting married until she was 23 or 24, and while secretly she may have looked upon R.J. as a potential husband, she certainly never said anything about it out loud. None of us believe any of that ridiculous stuff about R.J. and Barbara Stanwyck. Miss Stanwyck is a lovely person, whom R. J. much admires."

A dissenting opinion is offered by an actor on the Fox lot who's known Wagner since he played a small part eight pictures ago in The Halls Of Montezuma.

"My own personal opinion," this actor states, "is that young Wagner is in love with two women at the same time, Missy and Debbie, only he won't admit it; not even to himself. I think he's nuts about Debbie because she's young, bright, pretty, talented; she's got lots on the ball and probably the best sense of humor of any young actress on the town. She speaks his language."

"With Stanwyck it's different. He's probably infatuated with Missy, but that doesn't make it any less real. And I don't blame him one bit. Stanwyck is probably the nicest dame in this town. You'll never hear her cutting another actress to ribbons. She's a mature professional who has humility and understanding, and of course, great beauty and achievement. All those qualities are very attractive to an intelligent and ambitious kid like R.J."

"While they were making Titanic he hung around her dressing room pretty nearly all the time. He listened avidly to everything she had to say. He has great respect for her, and somewhere along the line he probably added love to respect. There's nothing particularly unusual about the setup. Students fall in love with teachers every day in the week. They call such affairs puppy love."

"Stanwyck is too smart to let this kid go off his rocker, and R.J. himself is a very well-balanced youngster, but I don't believe we've heard or seen the last of this relationship. I'm sure that R.J. numbers Missy among his very good friends and that when she returns from Mexico, he'll be around calling."

"As for Debbie Reynolds, she and R.J. still continue to see each other but not on any semi-exclusive basis. Debbie is smart enough to realize that every young guy must sow his own share of wild oats. When and if R.J. is ever finished sowing, she'll probably hook him if she wants him. That little doll is one of the smartest, most sensible chicks this crazy town has ever known."

(Continued from page 35) came, and loved it, too. So much so that the gatherings became a nightly affair. Marilyn is, without any argument, the hostess with the mostest, but she was working on Gentlemen Prefer Blondes at the time, and long social sessions with Joe's close friends and relatives, whom she loves as much as he does, just didn't mix with six o'clock calls. So, like the generous, sensible girl she is, she moved out of the house to the Beverly Hills Hotel, and turned the place over to Joe. Of course she continued to be the central attraction at every party, but when she felt a yawn coming on, she trotted down the street to bed without breaking up the party.

The arrangement worked perfectly. It probably would still be going on if Joe had not decided to visit his family in San Francisco for a while. He saw no point in maintaining the house, so he gave it up. In the meantime Marilyn had found that she liked being free of the responsibilities of house-holding, and instead of moving in again, rented a large apartment after finishing Gentlemen Prefer Blondes.

Those were the simple facts that worked into the first big story of the end of the blonde and the ball-player. The house was empty; Joe was in San Francisco; Marilyn had even moved from the hotel.

Many people would believe that all this change of scene was a waste of time, and that they just ought to pool their lives and residences and be done with it. But Marilyn and Joe are strictly not in the marry-in-haste set. They believe in being slow but sure about such lifetime things as matrimony.

SOME of their biggest headaches so far have arisen from the ashes of Joe's former marriage. Some time ago Joe's ex-wife, Dorothy Arnold, took him into court asking him to increase the sum allotted to the support of their child. The judge denied Mrs. DiMaggio's request in no uncertain terms. He even lauded Joe as a fine sportsman and a good father in open court. But such an experience before a judge's bench, even with the most favorable outcome, is chilling to a bridal atmosphere.

Although both Marilyn and Joe considered the denial of the appeal, and the high praise a step closer to marriage, neither wanted to risk such a step under the cloud of court action.

Another major problem concerns Joe's beloved son, Joe, Jr. The boy and his father are extremely close, although the youngster is in complete custody of his mother. Such is the custom of the California divorce law. Joe is deeply attached to his son, and has made every effort to be with him when the boy isn't at Black Fox Military Academy, where he is a boarding student. The law has granted Joe "reasonable visitations," as it does all fathers. Unhappily these precious moments have often proved embarrassing to Joe DiMaggio and his son. And to Marilyn Monroe, too.

For instance, last year Joe's former wife publicly objected to Joe Junior going swimming at the Bel-Air hotel with his father and Marilyn. As a result, when Joe had his boy with him on weekend visits this spring, they spent the entire time alone, without Marilyn present. Gossip-mongers, seeing the ex-Yankee treating his son to supper at the beach, and keeping it strictly stag, buzzed around town spreading a rash of rumors that Joe and Marilyn had split.

It is only the Hollywood cynics who take such surface rumors to heart, who believe that they verify the predictions that they are drifting apart. Those close to them believe that such rumors have strengthened their determination to marry; that they are closer together than ever.

Marilyn herself has been heard to state, "We are in love and we will probably be married soon."

At this writing Joe has not slipped a ring on her finger, but all Hollywood expects him to become the most envied man in the world before too much time goes by. If he does, and if he has his way, Marilyn would quit pictures and live in San Francisco.

Who could blame this home-loving guy, who has retired from the spotlight himself, and wishes to live quietly despite being baseball's greatest living figure. There's a difference between stepping out of the center of the stage voluntarily, and being pushed away from it. From the moment Joe DiMaggio takes his vows, as all Hollywood knows, he will become known as Marilyn Monroe's husband.

Marrying Marilyn Monroe, though, is only the beginning of the battle. There is living with her, being consort to the most exciting movie star of our time. This will not be easy at all. In the first place the demands on Marilyn Monroe's time are many and terribly important. For the next five years or so she will be making one picture after another, almost as rapidly as they can be turned out. She will have to be on call at all hours, inconvenient hours like for dinner and Sundays for publicity, making still photos and giving interviews to help sell the pictures. It won't be her husband who will tell her what to wear and who to be nice to, either. The studio people will do that.

Living with Marilyn Monroe will be like living in a goldfish bowl for sure. There can be no part of her life that will be completely private, and free of the demands made by the film salesmen. As a single girl she has had her apartment photographed a good many times, but, as a married woman, and homemaker, the requests for "home" stories and layouts will increase tremendously. And in the "home" stories there will be a need for Joe—and he won't care for that. One Hollywood man, married to a big star, once groaned upon entering his house for dinner and spotting a photographer in the living room: "I'm so tired of having my picture taken every night!" It can be a trial.

AND how will the fans take to Marilyn Monroe's husband? It is generally conceded that most of Marilyn's fans care for the physical side of her, and will continue to do so if she is married or not. They must, then, bear a little resentment toward the man she lives with—and will just tag him as a guy who is very lucky and who should keep his place. Joe DiMaggio will find this attitude a bit trying, too. He is not only a celebrity in his own right, but a rugged he-man. As a matter of fact, it is a pretty well-known secret around Hollywood that Joe is all for having Marilyn quit entirely. He has little sympathy with the movie-makers who need her in their business.

The problems confronting Marilyn Monroe's husband will fall atop Joe DiMaggio shortly after he returns from his honeymoon. Joe is not the apartment-dwelling type. He is a big man, with the outdoors in his blood, and he'll need room to move around in. A house is the only thing, and if there is any acreage (which there must be) there will have to be a swimming pool. Swimming (Continued on page 73)

Here famed fashion photographer John Engstead, via a speedy Resort Airlines photographic tour, covers the fashion front in leading world playgrounds taking a preview peek at winter resort fashion trends now beginning to dominate the American fashion scene.

Hollywood approves summertime fashions

■ News in fashion was certainly the pace of MODERN SCREEN's May fashion board meeting. Many, many Hollywood personalities attended the gala affair. Glamorous and beautiful stars Virginia Mayo, Leslie Caron, Jan Sterling, Mona Freeman, June Haver and dress designer Elois Jenssen accepted invitations to sit on the board of judges. James Mason, Rod Cameron, Charlton Heston and Michael O'Shea gallantly joined the ladies.

A buffet luncheon was served to the stars before the fashion show (see the favorite dresses and shoes on this and the following pages—the stores where you can buy them are listed on page 72). The guests and members of the board chatted gaily through luncheon of the old and new doings in Hollywood. The ladies came to the party looking as if they just stepped out of a fashion show themselves. Shortly after luncheon the show went on. The board members seated (Continued on page 71)

And there will be the expense. A star, once asked if it was expensive to keep his pool filled with water, said: "It isn't the water that's costly, it's the gin." If a guest is sitting around the edge of your pool on a hot day, he'll generally ask for a tall, cool one, if you don't suggest it first. Many stars spend as much as five hundred dollars a month for grog and potato chips to keep the loungers happy. Joe DiMaggio is a thrifty man, who, although he has done mighty well in sports, has never been used to the scale of living Hollywood is accustomed to. He is going to resent both the guests and the expense after he marries Marilyn Monroe and has to begin living like a movie star's husband.

Then there is going to be the matter of control. If, say, Joe would like to take a drive down to Coronado some week-end and Marilyn wants to go but says she can't because the studio told her to stand by, Joe is more than likely to blow his cork and tell his wife to tell the studio to drop dead. Who, he will ask himself, is the boss around here anyway?

Well, the studio is the boss. That is for sure. Joe won't like that.

It must be admitted that this is not the case with all movie stars. Many top-flight actresses can live a pretty normal life—normal for Hollywood, that is—because they are only required to show up for work at specified hours, do their bit and go on home until tomorrow. But that is not so with Marilyn Monroe. Marilyn is an exciting star, one as hot as frying butter, and in order for the studio she works for to take full advantage of her phenomenal popularity there must be a constant flow of publicity. Making movies is only part of Marilyn's work—no more than 50 percent at this time.

On a day off spent at home, if Joe DiMaggio isn't driven crazy by the cars driving by to see Marilyn's home or by the fans standing in front of the driveway for a look at their idol, he will be by the telephone calls. It will make him long for the quiet of a summer day in left field in the Yankee Stadium.

Joe DiMaggio may not be a completely anti-social man but he is quite eccentric about keeping out of the public eye. In all the time he has been courting Marilyn in Hollywood, he has not once attended a party with her, nor has he appeared at a night club or a famous restaurant. If there are more than three people in a gathering Marilyn is slated to attend, she goes alone—and Joe sits home and stews until she can break away. It is an odd sight, indeed, to see Marilyn enter a room full of celebrities with their famous escorts, all alone. And it gives rise to much speculation as to whether or not she even has a boyfriend. However, proof that she definitely has is evidenced by the fact that she always leaves alone.

Joe DiMaggio, it seems, is determined not to make any new friends in Hollywood. His cronies now are not even the sports writers who were his shadows for so many years, but his relatives, his cousins and pals he went to school with in San Francisco. And none of them seem to give a hoot for the Hollywood crowd. Marilyn may not be too crazy about them, but she spends most of her time in their company, in deference to Joe.

Another rough spot in the marriage of Joe DiMaggio and Marilyn Monroe is going to be the personal appearances she is going to have to make. Marilyn's first real experience in the movies was as a traveling saleslady. The picture was Love Happy in which she appeared on the screen for a total of 60 seconds. But the producers wisely decided that she was just what the film needed to sell to exhibitors, so she was taken on a cross-country tour for about two months, calling on the theater owners and news folks throughout the country. The result was that many theaters billed the movie as starring Marilyn Monroe, huge pictures were exhibited in front of the show houses showing Marilyn in a characteristic pose, and the marquees blared: "Love Happy, starring Marilyn Monroe."

20th Century-Fox is wise to the fact that Marilyn out in the field is a good bet to increase the take on a movie, so she will, married or not, be required to travel a large part of the time she is not before the cameras. This DiMaggio will not like, for he is the kind of man who thinks that his wife should be in the kitchen preparing something for a man's appetite. Marilyn, on the other hand, feels she owes it to the studio to get out and do all she can to increase the grosses—and as long as she is a movie star she is likely to do so. It is not likely that Joe will be happy with this arrangement.

One of the most unpalatable chores the husband of a movie star has to put up with is acting as his wife's escort at gala events such as premieres, publicity parties, etc. At these events he must dress in either a tuxedo or tails and walk up a long fan-lined path in the glare of bright lights. Now if the scene was a ball park the spectators would fall out of the stands cheering DiMaggio. But in Hollywood it's the movie star they came to see and the most oft-quoted expression even Joe DiMaggio is bound to hear is, "Who's he?" Movie fans are generally of one loyalty and don't give a hang about celebrities in other lines of work. As a matter of fact, Jack Dempsey, who has attended many of these affairs, has seldom ever had his name listed among those present—and has never, to our knowledge, been asked to speak into the broadcast mikes at these events.

It is our guess that Joe will one night halt half way up the walk and go home alone. That is, of course, if they ever get him to go to one in the first place.

A BITTER pill for a movie star's husband to swallow is the "interference" of outsiders in his wife's (and his) affairs. In the movie business this is necessary. There are highly trained facets of a movie star's life that only specialists can handle. Take for instance the signing of contracts and approval of pictures. There is a good deal more to this than just the naming of a figure and an acceptance. Most movie contracts, for stars anyway, are made up of 40 or 50 typewritten pages. There are that many details. It requires endless hours of conferences and the consultation of many experts in law and finances before such a contract can be settled. A husband can only sit on the sidelines and listen during these times. And after the master contract is drawn there are discussions before each picture, to make sure the principles of the contract are lived up to. Joe will have to remain on the sidelines during these negotiations, because legally it is his wife who must agree to the deals, not he.

However, Joe may be able to help Marilyn along this line indirectly. At present, Joe's lawyer handles Marilyn Monroe's business affairs. He may be a pretty busy man in the near future, as a matter of fact. Few would believe it, but Marilyn is discontented with the current arrangement at her studio, and has told friends that she is beginning to think maybe she'd better quit. Her feelings were understandably hurt, because even though she is about the biggest box-office draw in Hollywood, her salary of $750 per week was less than that cashed by many unknowns. It is estimated, for instance, that Monroe received about $10,000 for work in Gentlemen Prefer Blondes while the same studio paid Jane Russell $200,000 for the same picture.

ASSUMING Marilyn is properly pacified, then there are the interviewers, the gossip columnists and the photographers. They are vital in a movie star's life. Joe will sit by and listen to Marilyn explain that she likes to sleep raw so that, as she put it once, "I can feel blonde all over." And he'll boil maybe. And everytime she goes anywhere without him the phones will begin ringing the next morning asking if there has been a quarrel. Marilyn is now conditioned to gossip columnists and can handle these things. But can Joe? He has a simmering Italian temper, and it might be difficult for him.

And the photographers. This breed has never been particularly interested in husbands. They might ask Joe if he'd mind stepping aside so they can get a shot of Marilyn with some male actor she has been working with. Or they'll ask him to straighten his tie and stand beside "Miss Monroe." Man, the third or fourth time that happens will be a time to remember.

No matter how happy her friends will be to see Marilyn Monroe marry the man she is quite obviously in love with, the fans and the studio will not accept the union with great joy. The fans actually prefer Marilyn single and, in dreams at least, available if a miracle should happen. The studio knows this and realizes that marriage might cut down on her box-office potential. There will be, then, some resentment—and it will more than likely be seen.

The fans will not accept Joe wholeheartedly and, because he is a sensitive man, he will not like that. The studio will be wary of his "influence" on his wife, and if she becomes obstreperous, may make Joe the heavy, even if he is innocent. This could lead to bad feelings.

The main problem in the marriage of Marilyn Monroe and Joe DiMaggio, however, will be the separations. And there will have to be separations. Marilyn's work will naturally be in Hollywood, and Joe's, for many months a year, will be in New York. Although he is retired from playing baseball, Joe has quite a career ahead of him as a sports announcer. Those who have seen him on TV, broadcasting after the ball games—and this writer is one of them—will tell you that Joe is a natural in this line. He is without a doubt the best of the players turned commentator. He receives $1,250 per week for his services, so Joe will have to spend the ball season away from his wife, unless, which seems unlikely, she can arrange her schedule to be with him.

Every time they live apart they will be the victims of the wagging tongues that will link one or the other of them with some one else. They could, we suppose, make sure they never stand too close to anyone of the opposite sex in public, but that will be very, very hard. And, apart from each other, they will either have to live in shells or suffer the discomforts heaped on them by the speculators who make a living keeping ahead of the news of Hollywood. Even without this hazard there is a strain when a married couple lives apart.

A SHORT time ago Marilyn Monroe was eating a lonely dinner at the Beverly Hills Hotel, in the main dining room. As she sat eating Joe DiMaggio walked into the lobby of the hotel and went to the elevator—and apparently upstairs to wait for his girl. A waiter saw him pass and commented to a fellow employee on the fact that Joe didn't come into the dining room to join her.

"I guess," he said, "they don't like to be seen together in public. That's a funny arrangement. I understood they were going to get married."

"It ain't so funny," said his friend. "If those two get married it will be like Frank Merriwell marrying Nellie Bly. It just don't seem right."

And it "don't," as the man said. But maybe love is stronger than precedent. Maybe, in all the hours Marilyn and Joe have spent together they have figured out a formula. We, for one, hope they have—and that it works. END

someone has to stay home

By and by, while O'Shea peered moodily over a fruit salad deal that looked like a funeral wreath and Miss Mayo clutched a light coat across her working clothes—a black lace slip, for the picture The Marines Had A Word For It, the interviewer went about his task in real subtle fashion.

"You're re-making A Star Is Born out here, aren't you?" he said. "Judy Garland?"

"What?" said Miss Mayo.

"A Star Is Born! You know, that picture they made back in—" A Star Is Born won the Academy Award in 1936. It concerned a male star who married an unknown, lived to see his stardom melt and sputter out as hers became a spectacular reality, and resolved his problem in the end by walking out into the Pacific Ocean, into the sunset, with no notion he could reach Hawaii or even Catalina.

O'Shea heard the question. "Oh, sure," he said. "That wouldn't be for me though. I can't swim. Brother, the guy in that picture was really a ham. Not Freddie March but the part he played."

"Norman Main."

"What?" said O'Shea.

"Let's get out of here," said Miss Mayo. "Let's talk in my dressing room. Goodness."

MISS Mayo's Pontiac convertible was parked right outside where anyone could admire it, or trip over it, or let the air out of the tires. O'Shea said he'd get his car and meet us over there. His was a Jaguar sedan, very lush. The dressing room was one of those set jobs, a mobile with enough room for four people and an ash-tray. En route, the approach was spelled out to Miss Mayo. "We thought now that Mike's up there again, you wouldn't mind talking about it."

"Well—he's not," said Miss Mayo. "But—oh, I don't know."

"I know," said O'Shea in the dressing room, "I know what you want." He turned to his wife. "They want a story, let's give 'em a story. It's all right."

"If you'd rather—" began the interviewer.

"No, no, it's all right. You think I worry about What They Say. If I worried about What They Say, I'd be six feet under right now. That goes for anyone who stays around Hollywood long enough. After a while, you get so you tune yourself out like a hearing aid or you give up. It's one or the other. Anyway, what can they say? This one here—" (Miss Mayo) "—and I don't worry, so why should anyone else? It's not that I can't get work. I can get work. I could go to New York. I could've had Guys And Dolls. Or others, the titles don't matter. I just finished reading a play that was offered to me. I don't like it. I won't do it. It's another of those kid-the-government things. I happen to think now's a good time not to kid the government. But I can get work. Only look at it this way: somebody's got to stay home. I've thought about an article like this and that's what I'd call it. 'Somebody's Got To Stay Home.'"

"Europe," said Miss Mayo.

"That's right, Europe," said O'Shea. "Virginia had to go to Europe to make a picture. If I'd been working in New York, do you think I could have gone with her? And do you think I want my wife—?"

"A girl can't just go to Europe by herself," said Miss Mayo. "Mike gives up so many things to be with me."

"Say I'd taken Guys And Dolls," said O'Shea. "A year, two years, three—away from my wife except for when she could get East, and that wouldn't have been often because this one, she works like a gopher. Is a marriage supposed to stand up under that stuff? I wouldn't like to bet you.

"Now I'm a useful human being, I'm part of the team. Virginia goes to the studio, I do what has to be done around the house and grounds. I'm the cheapest handy man in the San Fernando Valley, no salary. Don't think I can't do it either. There's a wiring job got to be done right now, a big one. You think we're hiring a crew for it? Nope, I'm doing it. Like today, I come in here for this talk and I get out of the denims and put on this—this flashy set of threads—" (O'Shea was wearing a grave, single-breasted oxford gray suit) "—and as soon as we're through, I'll drive back and be in the denims and working again. I mend fences, fix leaks, repair roofs, you name it and I can do it. All for the price of none. And do what I can for a happy marriage. Is that bad? Am I that Freddie March character, has to drown himself to prove whatever he was trying to prove? Am I such a gutless chunk of ego I can't face a world because my wife happens to be doing better than I am? Am I supposed to be ashamed? I'm not. I'm proud. I'm proud of this one here and of our marriage and that I can hammer a nail straight and don't mind doing it."

"And I'm proud of him," said Mrs. O'Shea, very much as though she meant it.

"But don't make me sound as if I were through," added O'Shea, "professionally speaking. I'm not through. You know something? I still make more than Virginia makes—when I work, I mean." The figure $2500 a week came up somewhere in the conversation. "A producer will call me about a part. He'll say, 'Look, Mike, I know it's just a bit but the bit needs you. Will you do it as a favor to me?' So the bit needs me, so I need the bit. So I do it."

"Listen. I've been in show business for—well, for plenty. Why should I kid anyone, you or the readers or anyone. You're up, you're down. Maybe six or eight years from now, Virginia'll be through and then I'll step in again. The poor man's Bogart. I had my chance. I want Virginia to have hers while she can get it," says Mr. O'Shea. "He does," said Miss Mayo. "A woman's career isn't as long, you know. Mike wants all this for me. He never interferes, just helps."

"ANYWAY, who's kidding who?" said O'Shea. "I got in this business on a raincheck. Now the field's dry again and I'm out. So what? Those were the war years. I was almost over-age when the draft began and I never did get in. So they were desperate for actors. Faces like mine even. You could walk, you could talk, you could breathe? You were hired. Lock the doors and don't let him out! We were luckier then than we had any right to be. Now the first-string lineup's back and we're where we started out. Ordinary system of compensation. Who's going to cry about it?"

"Now this one works and works and brings home the larger share of the bacon. Maybe some people wonder how I feel about that. I feel this way: it doesn't matter as long as there's bacon. I learned that the hard way. The gossips don't matter, the columns, the whispers, the critics, the notices. What matters is that the sprinklers work and the dogs get fed and the house has a roof and maybe there's some left over. That's what matters. A lot of that bacon's mine, you know. I make two pictures a year for Fox. I didn't marry this one here for her money. She was making—what was it, honey, a fast 80 bucks a week? A fast 80. I was doing pretty well then. If you can't have it both ways, you settle for one."

Somewhere in the dim recesses of the interviewer's mind was the recollection that this was to be a sounding out of Miss Mayo. It didn't seem to matter now. She sat and was decorative and sympathetic and amused by her husband's able rhetoric, and in effect turning stage center over to him without a struggle. This was partly because Miss Mayo is in truth the shy, withdrawn member of the family, O'Shea the fizzing extrovert with a remarkable stock of Irish gaiety and courage. But it was also, according to later information, because it was the way Miss Mayo wanted it and always wants it. Vis-a-vis her husband, Miss Mayo regards herself as strictly second billing.

It is not surprising. O'Shea is as arresting a personality away from the screen as Miss Mayo is on it—mercurial, gesturing, restless, full of the articulate patois of show business. Miss Mayo evidently has subordinated her social facade to his, and with the utmost willingness. It would not be fair to say that she is his straight woman, but it is her tendency to cue him and then sit back.

"But he draws her out amazingly too," a close friend of both has said. "Virginia is shy, there's no getting around it. But when she's with Mike, a kind of glow comes over her. You can almost see it. She talks more easily and sometimes becomes almost as animated as he—and Mike's one of our more animated citizens."

O'SHEA is wearing his hair en brosse these days, or what Hollywood calls a Butch. Under it, his face is almost ageless, although he must have slipped past 40. Now the conversation got around to a topic that must have been painful to both of them, and emphatically so to O'Shea. Not long ago the first Mrs. O'Shea instituted renewed alimony proceedings with the argument that O'Shea could pay her more than he did because of the O'Sheas' joint income; i.e., magnified by Miss Mayo's salary.

O'Shea's voice lost none of its crispness but he looked at the floor for the first time. "My business manager," he said, "knows what he has to (Continued on page 79)

REMARKABLE

FOR 4 PROBLEMS OF "YOUNG SKIN"

So often the oil glands of "young skin" suddenly become overactive. At the same time, the skin turns sluggish. It fails to throw off the daily accumulation of dead skin cells. Day by day, these tiny dead flakes build up into a layer over the pore openings. Then—there's trouble ahead. Enlarged pores and even blackheads are on the way.

Now—the makers of famous Pond's Creams recommend a special treatment for these four major problems: oiliness, sluggishness, enlarged pores and blackheads. It takes only one minute—and it works!

Restyle
your complexion!
Make it clearer, brighter, softer!

Cover your face, except eyes, with a cool, snowy 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Leave the greaseless Mask on one full minute. The Cream's "keratolytic" action loosens stubborn, clinging, dead skin cells. Actually dissolves them off! Frees the tiny openings of your skin glands so they can function normally again. Now—after just 60 seconds—tissue off clean. See how tingling fresh your skin feels! How much smoother, brighter, and clearer it looks!

Don't "stifle" your skin under a heavy make-up! A light greaseless powder base of Pond's Vanishing Cream is sheer flattery!

"A woman can be a grandmother at fifty," says vivacious Jeanne Crain, "but she shouldn't act like one." In this thirteenth article in MODERN SCREEN's star personality series, Jeanne gives her ever-young eternally feminine theory.

Take my word for it

by JEANNE CRAIN, star columnist for May

We go out more than ever, now.

Career vs. domesticity? Nonsense!

I sometimes retreat from my family.

Four children and look at us!

THERE IS A PROBLEM which is supposed to face a girl in show business that I firmly believe isn't a problem; the choice between career and marriage, and the misconception that if she makes marriage the main interest in her life her career will suffer. I wasn't sure I was right about this until I worked in Pinkie. A talk I had with the director of the picture, Elia Kazan, convinced me.

Almost every eligible girl in the studio wanted this part and, of course, I was both proud and happy when I got it. But after the picture had started I became conscious of a guilty feeling that plagued me for several days. I couldn't analyze it but one afternoon while I was talking to Elia Kazan, our director, it all came tumbling out.

"I'm bothered by something," I told him. "I wonder if my marriage, the fact that I am a wife and mother, has made me less keen about my work. Now that I have the role of Pinkie I realize it would not have been a disaster if I hadn't got it. Can I be as good an actress as some of the other girls to whom it meant everything and who would have pitched into the part with every ounce of energy they had?"

HE RAISED BOTH HANDS IN THE AIR in supplication. "Deliver me from the intense, 100%-dedicated-to-her-work actress!" he cried. "For me, the more a girl is a woman, the more she is an actress. It is natural for a woman to have a husband, to care for him and her children. It is not natural, it is odd and oddly cold, for a woman to turn away from this for her work. I want the natural woman . . . that's what the actress is attempting to be, a natural person."

"Do you really mean it?" I asked, feeling this was too good to be true.

"With all my heart and all the experience I have had in back of my heart," he replied. "Unnaturally intense ambition can defeat one's talent; it is a form of over-eagerness and you know what that can do to acting. I have worked with too many not to know."

Well! I think I'll go home now . . . go home to my husband and my children and all the things that take up my life there . . . and enjoy them with a clear conscience.

SOMETIMES I WALK OUT ON MY FAMILY, and everything else, for short periods. I think every person should have a retreat of their own where they can occasionally remold themselves back into their original individualities. My husband has built one for me, a small studio up the hill from our house . . . a real climb. I go there when I want to regain my own identity, not as a mother or wife or actress, but as the individual I am in my own right. Sometimes I paint. Sometimes I read. Sometimes I idle around and just think. I don't do anything that has to be done, I just do things that I get a joy out of doing and that I don't have to explain to anyone but the person inside of me. And these intimate moments with myself, I find, repay me with a feeling I can't get any other way, restoring my distinctiveness, such as it is; those parts of it which have been worn off or changed in my daily contacts with others.

IN MY UNCHARITABLE, BOBBY-SOX DAYS I used to figure that when I eventually got to the decrepit side (or later half) of my 20's I'd probably want only to be a homebody—especially if I was married, most especially if I also had children. Well, something has gone wrong. I'm past 25, I'm married and the mother of four, and, for the first time in my life, you really see me everywhere these days. I go out on the slightest pretext—and I love it. I was never like this before; neither was my husband. And neither of us think that the social bug has hit us at an odd period in our lives—we think his timing perfect.

I was 16 when I first got into pictures and went out seldom. My work, my studies, kept me busy, and, of course, I was under parental restriction as far as late hours were concerned. I didn't mind, as I remember. Luckily I wasn't in love, and even more luckily, I wasn't worried because I wasn't in love so I didn't labor under the feminine compulsion to get out and be seen. When I met the man I married our courtship was confined to about an average of a date a week because a lot of studio work had developed for me. And after marriage, well, there were the babies and the pictures I did in between their births which kept me busy. So again not much chance to gad around. Today Paul and I, so to speak, are making up for lost time. But actually we don't look at it that way; we just feel that we are reflecting a phenomenon of life today; people are living longer and stretching their active days over a longer span. To go on with this kind of thinking I really don't believe it is natural or good for so-called "older people" to withdraw to home and fireside as they often do.

A MOTHER CAN STILL BE A YOUNG PERSON. At 50 she can be a grandmother—but I don't think she should be one in the old-fashioned sense of the word; meaning she shouldn't act like one. At 50 and 55, and even 60, what's wrong with going out into the world, working, doing things you are interested in, rather than just becoming "Granma" whom the children are brought to visit once in a while?

At 50 I can see a woman, who has seen her children grow up, and who has no one dependent on her, go to college or otherwise acquire training that can make her a wonderful asset of society. She has the judgment that a mature outlook can give and she probably will have a concentrated enthusiasm for her work that the younger and still flighty would never be able to match. And, bless her, at last she has time to do something just for herself. More power to her. When I reach the half century mark, just watch my steam!

MY OLDEST BOY, PAUL JR., is six now and can read very well for his age. I am proud of this accomplishment, of course, but I wonder if other mothers have experienced the oddly personal sort of reaction that has come to me as a result . . . the feeling that this boy, who before learned what he knows mainly from me, is now listening to other voices. When I watch him read I can almost hear the buzzing of these voices that come to him from the pages he is looking at, and I wonder what they are saying.

Paul has been reading for nearly two years now. His brother, Michael, who is nearly five, can make out some words now. Timothy, who is two and a half, is quite certain that he is going to be able to read any moment now. Jeanine, just a year, is not interested in this sort of sedentary occupation at all. She won't sit still a minute, as a matter of fact.

IT SEEMS TO ME that children take such a natural joy in learning that the job of educators ought to be basically just making sure that they don't make it unattractive. I know I sound as if I am putting in a plug for the progressive school system for younger children but this is not my intention. My boys show such a hunger for facts that I am sure it would be wrong not to take advantage of this by supplying them with those which make up the three R's.

My young minds, anyway, have a great deal more respect for the definite than the random. Being just the youngest kind of mother yet I am hardly an authority on juvenile education. But, to date my feeling is that the old style methods are not so bad—they seem to have turned out a lot of brilliant people in our time.

A FRIEND FROM THE EAST COAST recently visited me and before she arrived I found myself picturing the color of her outfit; I knew it would be a solid in the heavier shades, a blue, black, brown or perhaps grey. It was a brown. And then I realized I had been aware for some time of the dress differences between the east and west. There is more color to clothes in the west, gayer colors. And much more freedom.

If, as the psychologists claim, the colors you prefer have something to do with your temperament and personality—do all the people in the west just happen to be different than those in the east, or has geography changed them? It's not too important, perhaps. But what would I be wearing if I was a Chicago girl, or a Philadelphia or Boston or New York girl?

WOMEN HAVE TO BOW TO FLOWERS in the matter of perfume. Flowers know always just how much to put on, so to speak; women don't. At least I have never been able to solve the problem. We all would love to be "the fragrant lovely who has just passed by" you read about in stories, but how? You can't go around asking your friends, "Do you notice a wonderful aroma about me?"

The French say American women waste their perfume by using so little that more of it evaporates from the bottle over the course of time than is actually applied. This is just an opinion. But there is no doubt about the flowers: they know just how much to put on, and, one thing more, they always look as beautiful as they smell.

Isn't it odd that nature, that has blessed flowers with this knowledge because they require it to attract bees, hasn't done the same for women who, after all, find it helpful in attracting beaux? Is it at all possible that as time goes on and women keep using perfume, biology will work its wonders and we, too, will be born with this wonderful power already built in?

IN MY HIGH SCHOOL DAYS I was a great one for getting ideas from what I read and acting on them. I can see myself faithfully following elaborate rituals to improve the complexion of a 15-year-old face. Ridiculous, of course. The complexion would never be as good again. Yet I did it. I still do. I still have sessions in which I cover my face with honey, just ordinary honey, and pat away at it until it is tacky and pulls at the skin when you take it off. I also used cornmeal packs then, and oatmeal packs. And I still do.

Every morning and evening I would splash my face, at least a dozen times, with cold water. And I still do and think there is nothing better. If I want to test its merit as a beauty and health aid I do it just before coming onto the set when we are making a Technicolor picture. Invariably the color expert will call for toning down of my cheeks with powder because they are too rosy.

I DEVELOPED MY "RAG DOLL EXERCISES" and it is very much something I still do. I stand firmly . . . then suddenly let the upper part of my body fall; from feet to waist I am still firm, but everything else hangs perfectly limp—head, torso, arms, hands . . . down to the last joint on my little finger. This, when I first read about it as a kid, was called " . . . a perfect way to relax; a wonderful headache remedy." Of course I never had headaches then. Since then I have had plenty and it has chased many of them away.

Speaking of chasing—you'll have to excuse me. Timothy's on the loose again, and Mama's baby-sitting.

Jeanne Crain

(Continued from page 75) do: pay her exactly half of whatever I make. That's gross, not net. Off the top. She's a nice person. She really is. But this thing—well, I'll tell you this anyway. If she'd won, I know of a lot of stars would have been heading for the hills the next day. It was that kind of a case.

"You see, my first marriage, broke up 16 years ago, and I hadn't got a divorce till I met Virginia because why did I want a divorce? I wasn't going to marry again, not me I'd had it. As I say, she was a nice person and still is, but it just didn't—you know. I was show business, and she wanted me to get over to the rubber works and stand in line. Who's going to blame her? Eating three times a day, that's a habit that's hard to break. But the rubber works and I were incompatible. So. It lasted a couple of years. Then I was in show business again, way down on the level that looks up to burlesque as the end of the rainbow. Any restaurant between here and Philly, I don't care where, any restaurant that has out a sign 'Our Specialty, Spaghetti and Meatballs,' I've sung in that restaurant. Save 'Mother Machree' for the late show, when they're maudlin, and they throw quarters instead of dimes. 'Shanty in Old Shanty Town,' that was me. But there were no alimony problems. Not like this one."

"Oregon doesn't recognize alimony," said Miss Mayo.

"That state is going to get populous," said O'Shea. "Anyway, she started out by trying to get—" He mentioned a famous Hollywood attorney. "So we went to him, too, went to him with all our books, every last figure, and it ended up, he wouldn't take her case. But another lawyer did."

"I had to make a deposition in his office," said Miss Mayo. "The other lawyer, I mean. And the doors were open and reporters and photographers everywhere. It was like a circus. Finally I just had to refuse point-blank to say or do anything until we had privacy."

"Well," said O'Shea. "It's over."

AN inevitable query arose. Did not O'Shea find the days very long on occasion, too long, with the hours crawling by on hands and knees?

"Some days," said O'Shea, "not usually. The fence, the wiring, the TV goes haywire, I work with the horses, the day is through before I am. But some days it's not too good. I walk to the window and I look east and there is New York over there, where I could be working steadily. So I walk to the other side of the room and west is the ocean, and maybe I should be on the beach, but I know I shouldn't. And here I am all alone—hum 'Mother Machree,' will you, honey?—the hell and gone away from anywhere, and for a couple of minutes I feel sorry for myself. Then I think that in New York it's snowing or raining or blowing and the show I'm in runs a fast week. I picture the beach and remember I can't swim. So that's that."

"I mentioned the horses. I like horses and roping and all that rodeo stuff, but I got to taper it off now. You know why? I bounce higher now than I used to and the ground's getting harder. I think it's going to outlast me."

"But let's keep pathos out of this thing. Do me a favor and keep pathos out of it. Maybe you wanted something about the brave little woman's unflagging courage and radiance pulling us through or how her inspiration brought me back to the top; or what a hot rock trouser I am myself. Just forget all that. We're doing fine. Just remember—somebody's got to stay home."

they expected me to cry. 'Shanty in Old Shanty Town' goes with that one. Nuts. The smell of grease-paint makes me want to gag. I'll settle for hay."

O'Shea looked at his wife and remarked that she was beautiful, an understatement.

"And it's not too tough having this one here come home to you," he said.

"It's not too tough going home to that," said Miss Mayo.

"And it's not as though—"

"—we weren't still in business together," said Miss Mayo. "Mike and I collaborate all the time on the problems that arise. He's been in the profession so much longer than I. Not that he ever tries to run my picture affairs. But he gives me advice when I ask for it. And his advice is always good."

"Only six times out of ten," said O'Shea. "I operate on masculine intuition, instinct. You know masculine intuition. Virginia's the thinker of the family."

"I think hard about everything," said Miss Mayo. "I weigh both sides. I think so hard about both sides that half the time I don't come to any conclusion. That's where Mike steps in."

"I don't think at all," said O'Shea. "Strictly snap judgments. So when I'm wrong, I really do a job of it."

"He's never wrong," said Miss Mayo stoutly.

"Sugar," said Mr. O'Shea.

A man came by, rapped on the door, and said something that got Miss Mayo to thinking. She began thinking so hard, you expected to see tendrils of smoke come out of her ears.

"That's what I mean," said O'Shea. "It fools people. The other day one of the top executives said to her something about dying her hair platinum for a picture. Virginia sat there with her head in her hands, saying nothing. The guy got a little nervous. Well, not exactly platinum, he said. Maybe more of a wheatfield blonde? Still Virginia says not a word. Or auburn, the guy says. That's it, of course! In auburn, you'd look great. He's coming unstrung, see? He thinks Virginia's mad. So he runs through a whole spectrum until his voice cracks and he dissolves completely. Nah, nah, he says. We'll just leave it the way it is. Forget I brought it up, will you? So finally Virginia raises her head. 'I think it's a good idea,' she says. Sure, the guy says. Sure it is. Leave it just this way. 'No,' Virginia says, 'I mean the platinum.' She'd been thinking about it, that's all."

So that's how it is with the Michael O'Sheas, one working steady and the other not so frequently. It's fine. And that's how it is with the magazine business, you start with one premise and are diverted to another in deference to the plain truth, and the truth isn't so bad either.

There's a happy Irisher with a strong domestic streak in him who likes to fit planks together and repair wiring systems; and there's a famed and lovely woman who is destined to act in movies, and fortunately that is what the public would prefer she do. They got together and they stayed together. One went down and the other went up and it didn't make any difference. If at some future date, the trends reverse again, as they well might, that won't make much difference either.

At the moment, Miss Mayo's case is the simple one. She is in love, and she is necessarily busy, and she is piling up moo in the practice of her industry and she doesn't have to worry about the home while she's away.

O'Shea, too, is in love and reasonably busy, and has developed a great resourcefulness against the possible encroachments of boredom. He lives his part with grace and the gift of being high-hearted about it. If he doesn't like the doldrums, no one's ever going to know it—unless his wife knows it and won't tell. More likely, though, they're too busy to care. END is bing thinking of love?

It was 'neath the desert stars that Nora Eddington and Dick Haymes began their romance under the limpid lights of the Racquet Club cocktail lounge, neither one quite free of previous marriages.

Elizabeth Taylor confirmed her separation from Nicky Hilton from a telephone booth in the Doll's House.

Errol Flynn knocked a gentleman off a bar stool in a pre-dawn scuffle over a lady's smile.

There have been other incidents equally newsworthy.

No, Palm Springs is not immune to the varied idiosyncrasies of Hollywood love.

But this private close-up of Bing, in what may be the new role of a suitor, has nonplussed the most case-hardened native and literally put the place on its ear!

Heretofore, romance, in the desert has had a habit of blooming—or ending—violently.

The Swimming Pool Set and the Tennis Shorts Crowd are used to anything and everything but the open and above-board. And, the open and above-board are just what they're getting in the talk of the town—Bing and Mona.

Just how much does their regular dating mean? Let's examine the evidence.

First, Bing and Mona are making no effort to hide the fact that they are dating. This is a potent factor in the arguments of two radically different schools of thought.

The Sun Bathers say: "It can't be serious. Otherwise, they wouldn't be seen together so openly just a few months after Dixie's death. Bing's known Mona ever since she was a kid around the Paramount lot. He thinks no more of having a golf and dinner date with her than he would with Phil Harris (or some other desert resident)."

On the other hand the Tennis Racquet-eers are just as sure: "It must be romance for them to be seen so constantly together because Bing is a stickler for propriety. He would not risk what he realizes will be sniffing from the Mrs. Grundys being seen so soon with a girl as popular and sought after as Mona."

And, just when the debate is waxing the most furiously it abruptly subsides, because here come Mona and Bing,—and, of course, all talk ceases to watch.

If it's a Sunday, they'll be having brunch beside the Racquet Club pool. Bing's car has spun him down from his hilltop house and he's picked up Mona at the Bon Air where she's occupying a bungalow with her little daughter, Monie.

They're a handsome couple, no doubt about that. Bing has picked up a terrific tan plus a few pounds from the pallor and thinness he presented the months before and after Dixie's death.

Mona looks as cute as a doll in her white shirt and shorts, tanned to a becoming amber, her blonde hair only softly curled. She wears no make-up except a foremost name in hair beauty

Mr. Crosby around the Paramount lot in over six months," says a puzzled Mary.

As for Terry Moore, Bing happened to sit down at a luncheon table where she was present and that was all her press agent needed to go to town!

To repeat the question, "How serious is all this between Bing and Mona?" here is my not-so-private opinion:

No matter how serious they are now or may become, I don't believe marriage is ahead for them. Bing is a very devout Catholic. Mona is divorced.

But, Bing wouldn't be human if he didn't enjoy the company of a pretty girl, particularly one as charming as Mona, who is even prettier off the screen than on.

Mona doesn't go in for silly chatter and gossip about other people. She isn't flattery. She doesn't air her troubles. She's fun for a man to be with—particularly a man who has gone through a great sorrow.

Mona has a level head, she talks sense, and she enjoys golf, tennis, life in the sun—all the things men enjoy. It is little wonder that even the world's most marriageable man finds her attractive.

HOWEVER, as I write this, Bing has not changed his mind about leaving his Palm Springs paradise on March 15th for many months vacationing in Europe and he's taking Lindsay with him.

The present schedule calls for their return in mid-September just in time for Lindsay's school term. That's a long time for even an embryo Romeo to be away from a lady love.

Lately, there's been some gossip that Mona, too, might be in Europe this summer chaperoned by her mother. "Of course," she says, "I won't be able to go if a picture comes along to keep me in Hollywood. I have my little Monie to take care of and my work is important."

Whether or not Mona is in Europe at the same time Bing is—there is one thing for sure—the spotlight will not be off him for one moment.

The slightest smile he bestows on a flattered belle will be photographed and written about. There's always bound to be excitement about Bing.

It doesn't take much fortune telling talent to predict that Bing's name may be linked with many fair charmers!

But I'm still sticking to my story—the one I wrote about Bing for MODERN SCREEN soon after Dixie's death:

The beauties may come—and go. But, Bing and his boys will go on alone for a long, long time.

the story of shelly's baby

That's how Shelley Winters imagined the event.

What actually happened was entirely different. The birth of her little daughter was six weeks premature. The child's father was 6,000 miles away. For a time it was touch and go as to whether the infant might live or die. Shelley herself was in danger.

The birth of her first child was as wild, chaotic, and unpredictable as Shelley Winters herself.

It started on the night of February 12th, a Thursday. Shelley was at home with her mother, Mrs. Rose Shrift. Shelley's mother has been watching over her ever since Vittorio flew back to Italy last winter to stage Hamlet with his own company.

Toward eleven o'clock, Shelley who had the most miserable pregnancy known to woman, seven and a half months of uninterrupted illness, suddenly began calling, "Mama, mama!"

Mrs. Shrift rushed to her side.

"You'd better call Dr. Krahulik, Mama."

The sac containing the amniotic fluid had broken. Shelley, like any young girl, was frightened and afraid. Her mother packed a bag. The doctor was called, and Shelley, white as a sheet, was raced down to the hospital. She was admitted at five minutes past midnight on Friday, the 13th. Taken to her room in the maternity section of the hospital, she was examined to see if there was any possibility of delaying the birth. In first births there are occasional false alarms which later subside.

This wasn't true in Shelley's case. The examination revealed that she would deliver her child within 36 hours at the latest.

Vittorio was notified in Rome, and although he's been a father once before—he has another daughter, seven-year-old Paula, by a previous marriage—he got so excited that he made little sense on the transatlantic phone. Within the next 12 hours he called twice to find out how Shelley was. "Has the baby come yet?" he shouted. Shelley's mother told him, "No."

It was after midnight, in the early morning of the 14th that Shelley was wheeled into the delivery room. At 2:47 A.M., a tiny, dark-haired female baby was taken from her. The girl weighed four pounds, ten ounces, the premature birth undoubtedly being caused by Shelley's profound anemia.

During the course of her pregnancy, Shelley had suddenly grown anemic, and on several occasions, in addition to vitamins, hormones, and injections of iron, she'd been given blood transfusions. What caused her anemia is difficult to tell. Early in her pregnancy she visited Vittorio when he was in Mexico making Sombrero, and it is suspected that she caught some bacteria south of the border which weakened her whole system.

As soon as the baby was born, little Vittoria was placed into an Armstrong incubator, and the mother told that the child was doing fine.

The truth, however, was that the infant wasn't breathing properly. Something was wrong with baby Gassmann's respiratory system—she couldn't seem to get enough air down her lungs. The little girl who was later named Vittoria Gina Gassmann hovered between life and death.

Shelley's pediatrician was called immediately, and he in turn, brought in Dr. Arthur Parmelee, one of the crack children's specialists in the country, as a consultant. Dr. Parmelee examined the child, ordered special day and night nurses to see that the baby's temperature never went lower than 97 degrees nor higher than 99 degrees.

If Vittoria Gina lived for the next 48 hours her chances of survival were excellent.

When Shelley awoke she asked for her baby and was told it was in the incubator. Her reaction was typical of all mothers who give birth to premature babies. Physically she felt exhausted and yet the maternal instinct in her cried out for some way in which to help her child. There was no way, nothing she could do, and a period of frustration seized her.

"It seemed like a year," she says in retrospect, "before they let me see my baby."

When presently she did, Shelley noticed that her baby's skin seemed pale, almost blue. Shelley began to worry. The nurses told her that of three and a half million babies born in the United States each year, 1 out of 20, approximately five per cent, are premature. They told her not to worry; that her baby weighed almost five pounds; that Winston Churchill, Victor Hugo, and Sir Isaac Newton had all been born ahead of time.

But Shelley is a worrier, and for the first two days there was nothing anyone could say or do to alleviate her fears. She prayed for her baby's survival.

Oddly enough, Shelley who loves publicity, cautioned everyone to say absolutely nothing about the birth of her child. "I was trying to regain my strength," she says now. "I didn't want to be bothered by reporters and press agents asking questions."

As a result of this insistence upon secrecy, it wasn't until three days after the baby was born that the item made the newspapers. By that time Shelley had been assured by the doctors that her infant had passed the crisis and, barring some unforeseen relapse, would live.

In Rome, Vittorio said nothing for public consumption about his new daughter. He did, however, manage to give out with a professional announcement. He and his company, he stated, planned to go to the United States to tour the country in an Italian repertory program. The bill would include his four-hour-long production of Hamlet. He would bring with him such stars as Elena Zareschi and Anna Proclemer.

In Hollywood there has been a good deal of talk about Vittorio's conduct during Shelley's pregnancy. Other actresses have said that Vittorio, regardless of his commitments in Rome, should have stayed at Shelley's side when she needed him most.

"I know," a colleague of Shelley's said, "that the Italian Government backed his Repertory Company. I know that he didn't want to put a lot of people out of work. I know all about the show-must-go-on tradition, and I know how Italian men feel about childbirth. To their way of thinking, giving birth to a baby is no worse than having a bad cold. I realize all that, but let's face facts."

"Vittorio today would be relatively unheard of in the United States. It was Shelley who brought him to Hollywood; Shelley who got him in touch with the right people; Shelley who helped him land that contract at Metro."

"I'm the first to admit that she may not be the sweetest or most well-bred girl in the world. She may not even be the most companionable wife. Maybe they argued like cats and dogs. But she did fly to Mexico to be with him. She did tell him she was pregnant."

"Under the circumstances I think he should have stayed in this country. Not that he could have helped Shelley have the baby, but it would've helped her morale. And when the baby did come, well—I think he should've been around to share the responsibility."

"After all the baby almost died. She had a mucous obstruction in her throat, and the doctors were afraid she was coming down with pneumonia—in which event she would certainly have died—and they had to keep her under oxygen and feed her by dropper. The baby's all right now—I mean the doctors say she's passed the danger zone, and Vittorio is the proud father. Only I'd like to ask one question. Where was he when the going was tough?"

In Rome when this question was put to Vittorio Gassmann he said, "Look, Shelley is a very sensible girl. She knew I had these commitments even before she came with child. If there was anything I could do that would have really helped, I would have tried to stay behind. But Shelley herself told me to go."

"We thought for a while that maybe she could come to Rome with me, but the doctors would not allow it. When Shelley gave birth I spoke to her over the phone. She told me about our darling little daughter."

"I could not fly back to California just for the weekend. I'm opening in a new Italian play here. Late in April I will return to the United States. In the meantime, Shelley knows that I am thinking of her and our baby every minute."

"Believe me when I tell you that it is very hard for me to be patient. I know what Shelley went through. But there are certain times when husbands are helpless. And that is one of the times."

"Any stories that Shelley and I did not get along, they're not true. I love Shelley more than I have ever loved her before, and if I did not have these stage commitments, I swear to you, I would be on the first plane back to California. I have spoken to Shelley several times now, and she tells me that she and our baby are fine. I thank God."

As for Shelley, back home with her first-born, in the duplex apartment she bought last year, she is well on the road to complete recovery from her near-tragic experience.

Child-birth has also wrought several personality changes in her makeup. She seems no longer obsessed by her career. Constant chatter concerning productions and castings no longer occupy her tongue. Having performed the primary function of womanhood—the perpetuation of the life cycle—she seems strangely subdued like a soldier who has gone into battle and for one fast fleeting moment, met his Maker.

No one brushes by Death without some chastisement—not even the tempest-tossed new mother, Shelley Winters. END

when I hated my mirror

(Continued from page 52) to the drug store and bought theatrical make-up for myself. I always wanted to be professional. At ten the family was back in London and I persuaded my mother to get me a permanent. But then I didn't like the color of my hair, which I correctly called "dirty blond" and started experimenting with bleaches. I'd buy these myself, do the rinse myself, and almost always end up with a mess; the color settling in the parts which had been curled.

I know I was a source of constant upset to my elders. My step-father's attitude toward me was one of astonishment as if he couldn't understand what made me so restless, so discontent. Once he had most of the gendarmes in Paris looking for me because despite winter weather I was gone from the house all day. When he learned what I had been up to he was completely perplexed; he couldn't even understand why my mother could understand. It was just that I was a Jean Harlow fan and, having written her a letter and figuring it was time for a reply, had been hanging around the home of a friend where I received my "secret" mail. Harlow, and Constance Bennett (with her divine thinness!) were my idols.

This is what was buzzing inside of me and keeping me a harried young miss. When my family assured me I looked all right I instinctively felt I was being lulled into false security. When I talked about the stage they wouldn't believe I was being motivated just by thoughts of a career. They hinted at boy friends, that I was responding to the call of life rather than the call of drama (as if one didn't, somehow, go with the other!).

much about the future," my step-father said. "There is plenty of time. You've got too much drive in you."

I WANTED to believe him, and to some extent I did, until that day in Rio. From then on pastries, starches, fats of any kind, were practically out of my life for good. When I recoiled from the mirror I sat down and did some realistic thinking. The girls whose shapes I envied—they weren't any different than me under the flesh. I knew enough about anatomy to feel sure that our skeletons were exactly the same. It was just a matter of how much fat and muscle you had covering it—and where. That would be up to me. I liked my eyes, I could cope with my mouth which I thought was too small, and mascara could handle eye-brows that were far too blonde. My choice was clear. Was I to be a contender for the world of my dreams or was I going to give up? The answer came to me instantly—if I couldn't be the best looking girl in the world I didn't want to be anybody! (Actually I knew I'd never be, but I wanted to get close enough so that there could at least be some hopeful and wonderful confusion about it!)

Lord knows it was hard at first. I'd eat a sensible lunch and then still crave for something. After the first four or five days it wasn't so bad. And in time, that same year, came my reward. The first time I stopped taking a size 14 dress for a size 12 I knew it was going to be worth it. I smiled deep into my insides, feeling so elegant, so feathery, that I loved the whole world. For the first time I began to accept myself as a person whom I would be willing to live with for the rest of my life.

I remember my mother saying one night, "Darling . . . you've been losing weight."

"She doesn't eat anything," my little sister said, accusingly.

I didn't reply. I was brimming over with a good feeling and my eyes must have been full of it. My mother, who had been going to argue with me, sensed it and changed her mind. "Well . . ." she said, and shrugged. But there was both respect and admiration in her manner; not just mother for daughter, which any girl can get, but woman for woman, if you know what I mean! My little sister sensed it. Something must have penetrated through to my step-father because he studied us all and then apparently decided not to intrude into the feminine mysteries going on around him. Something was happening in the family all right . . . and that something was me!

THAT old saying, "Him who hath, gets," is not exactly right in my estimation. It should be, "Him who goes out and gets . . . can get again!" I had gained respect in my family. On the strength of it I was able to put over something I would never have been able to . . . starting from scratch. Mother had kept Mimi's and my name in the New York Social Register and had planned this year to start me in finishing school at Farmington, Connecticut. But I thought it was time for me to start being an actress rather than waste time preparing to be a debutante. I had no interest whatsoever in confining what I thought was a great talent on a closed circle of bluebloods; the world was where I wanted to play! I put on a campaign towards that end which involved arguments, minor and major hysterics, and plain defiance. In the end I got a small concession, principally because I had proved I wasn't just a little girl. I could go to New York and have a month's time in which to find a job in the theater. If I failed it was Farmington for me. I'd be "finished" one way or another.

At that time I listed my assets as follows: name, Jane Sterling Adriance; age, 14; stage experience, years of it in my mind if none in actuality; beauty—I felt like one! I neglected to consider something that proved to be most important. In the years we had spent in London I had picked up an English accent (which years later I was to work hard to lose). One afternoon I accompanied a friend to the Shubert offices and one of the famous producer family, Milton Shubert, heard me talk. He was casting a play to be called Bachelor Born, and needed a girl with a veddy, veddy British accent.

"What's your name?" he asked.

"Jane Sterling . . ." I began slowly, sounding off with all the Mayfair I could.

"Excellent name!" he cut in, and offered me the part right then and there. I wrote mother and she was properly shocked. Mimi was delighted. And my own father, William A. Adriance, who was in New York at the time, found consolation only in the fact that Milton Shubert hadn't heard my whole name and thought of me as just "Jane Sterling" without the "Adriance" attached. Later on I cut Jane down to Jan at the suggestion of a theatrical friend.

On the stage there are no close-ups, you are there in person and in color instead of in black and white which can accentuate faults. At 122 pounds with my height of 5 feet, 5 inches, I considered myself perfect. And nothing ever happened to make me change my mind until six years later when I began seeing myself on the screen. One look—and, a little sadly, I said to myself, "Here we go again."

At my height all the beauty authorities said my weight was perfect . . . but the screen disagreed. It said I was fat. It said that my hips were too big, the upper part of my arms, and, I knew, the upper part of my thighs. It said that because my cheek and jaw bones were small there was an impression of fatness in my face in closeups. I admit I felt like rebelling but, as the saying has it, go argue with City Hall! There was nothing to do but shut off even a bigger part of my stomach. I ate nutritious foods; eggs, hamburger, steak, tomatoes. Nothing else. I controlled the distribution of weight with massage and with exercises—but posture exercises only. From childhood on I had had a fear of developing muscles that would go flabby when I quit exercising them. And instead of getting on the scales daily I walked into the wardrobe department of Paramount Pictures one afternoon months later to check results a different way.

I knew that they kept a dummy of my form on which to check costume measurements and that it was constantly altered to conform to any change in my own dimensions. "Have you had to do anything about it?" I asked the wardrobe mistress.

"Yes," she replied. "We've had to take it in two and a half inches practically everywhere."

That's all I wanted to know. I got on the scales and I was 108 pounds. Perfect . . . except it wasn't. When I saw the rushes of my next picture something else hit me. At 108 pounds my face had lost its fatness all right but in such a way that my nose was too prominent . . . and I realized that my nose was of a kind which could not stand concentrated attention. "Not a nose bobbing," I thought to myself. "Not that!" But I knew darn well, that very second, that it was to be exactly that.

The facts were as plain as the nose they had to do with. My nose at the top started flush with my forehead and stayed flush—there was no inward dip, no rétroussé or tilt. Further, the high bridge was not only flat, instead of rounded, but much too wide and flat. You may wonder, in view of an itemized list of defects like this, why my nose had not perturbed me before. The reason is that I had always considered it an individual nose, one which helped to make me me, and when my weight was higher it was not at all a bad nose. But with the more delicate modeling which characterized my whole build after I reduced, every defect about it stood out too sharply. There was no doubt about it . . . it had to go or I'd never be really self-confident before a camera again!

First I talked to my husband, Paul, about it. Then, because the studio had invested heavily in me, I discussed it with them. After this I mentioned the idea to friends. In the end it was up to me . . . nobody opened up my eyes to anything I hadn't already thought of, either beneficially or otherwise. Paul said simply, "I liked you as you are well enough to marry you but if you want to go ahead I like you well enough not to deny you my blessing." The studio officials were wonderful. They were grateful for my thinking of their interest in them but what I planned was a personal matter. They urged me not to consider them in any way. My friends said everything from, "Great!" (which was oddly uncomplimentary) to, "What do you want to do that for?"

I PAID exactly $1,000 for everything connected with the operation. The doctor—and I made sure that he was a good one—hummed and sang while he worked, and I heard him because the anaesthetic was a local one. There was no pain. It felt as somebody were fumbling with my nose but there was no greater discomfort. Once I knew the nurse was handing him some instrument and after a moment she said, "Well! That little gadget didn't work out, did it?" I couldn't help bursting out with a cry. "What little gadget?" I wanted to know.

For about three days my eyes were discolored and that was all. Two weeks later I was entertaining in Korea and when an army commander leaned over to kiss me during a presentation ceremony (they gave me a tank on condition I leave it in Korea and, not needing a tank at the moment, I did) the rim of his helmet hit me right on the bridge of the nose. I nearly passed out from the pain, and felt sure that there was nothing but a squashed blob on my face. But there wasn't a mark and my pretty reborn nose was just as pretty as before.

Paul was pleased, I know he was, but like a man will he just grinned and said, "Well, now I have a new place to slug you."

Well, it may be a new place to slug me but it is a much smaller place than before. You know the mirror I hated? Well, after a nose operation you don't hate your mirror, let me tell you. For months afterwards I couldn't stay away from the mirror. "Is that really you?" you keep asking yourself. You do this because you love the thrill of answering. "Yes! Really! That's you!" And sometimes I add, "And that's the way you should have looked all your life." But I'm satisfied. Satisfied and happy.

Now whenever there happens to be a moment when I feel low I just pull out the mirror, look, and a big smile spreads all over my face. "Well! Well! Well!" I think to myself. "Look at me! Well! Well! Well!"

Another Modern Screen Special!
An intimate report on the private lives of top television personalities

MILTON BERLE'S REAL DOLL: The other day, in Lindy's, a bunch of TV actors were talking about Milton Berle and wondering, "Whom does Berle love the best?" They decided to take a vote. Berle himself won first place, and Vickie, his daughter, second in his affections.

This got a big laugh in Lindy's, but the truth is that Milton is simply crazy about Vickie, now 8. His devotion to her even seems to overshadow his profound feeling for his mother, Sandra, and his terrific self-appreciation of his own talents.

Three years ago, when the Bobble Co. put out an Uncle Milt comic book, it suggested that Vickie be given a half interest in the book. Milton agreed eagerly, exclaiming, "Fine! I've got all the money I want. Let's add this money to Vickie's trust fund."

People say Milton is building a million-dollar trust fund for Vickie. His friends kid about Vickie's being a much sought-after heiress by the time she's 18, and Milton enjoys the talk. One of his younger gagwriters has warned Milton that, "I'm applying now for the job as your future son-in-law."

Milton, who lives alone in a big apartment, has visitation privileges with Vickie. She lives with Milton's ex-wife, Joyce Matthews, attends private school in New York. Milton is still on good terms with Joyce and, most of his friends agree, is still carrying the torch for her. When Joyce's romance with Billy Rose hit the front pages last year, Milton did not attempt to hide his anguish. Ruth Cosgrove has been Milton's girl friend since his last bustup with Joyce, but because of his mixed feelings for Joyce, his friends believe he will postpone marriage indefinitely.

"When he's in a bad mood," one of his writers says, "you can soften him up by just mentioning Vickie. She's the real doll in his life."

JOHNNY'S IN THE MONEY: Johnny (Sob!) Ray continues to make a fortune, but his personal life is more mixed up than ever. His wife left him, after confiding to friends that he was impossible to live with, and Johnny made headlines with the statement that she "was the only girl who had ever made me feel like a man." The fact is that he paid very little attention to his bride, and she withered.

PEGGY LEE'S ALL SET: There was a tense moment when Peggy Lee and Brad Dexter were honeymooning in New York. Brad was offered the male lead opposite Margaret Sullivan in The Deep Blue Sea, and hurried off to consult the play's producer. He returned with the usual box of Sherry chocolates, a kiss and "I love you, darling!" Then he said, as Peggy listened anxiously, "I refused the offer, of course."

That enabled them to return to Hollywood together.

Peggy is at the peak of her career, and her seven-year Warners' contract gives her career security, just as her marriage to Brad gives her emotional security and a stepfather for her nine-year-old daughter Nikki.

I had the strong impression, visiting them in their honeymoon suite in the Sherry-Netherland Hotel, that they are a well matched couple. Peggy is a deep thinker and a student of philosophy and religion, and Brad is a quiet, well-educated actor who originally studied to be a lawyer. "Brad's got a strong sense of justice and speaks out for the truth," says Peggy, proudly. "He would have made a wonderful lawyer." He, in turn, is very proud of her book of poetry, "Softly, With Feeling."

It's significant that they met through a mutual friend, Dr. Ernest Holmes, a minister.

Next to her husband, Peggy's favorite subject of conversation is her daughter. "Nikki campaigned for Ike. She smeared the neighbor's cars with Ike stickers and she went around for weeks, loaded with Ike buttons. When Brad and I left for New York," she made me promise to bring back two photos—one of Ike and one of Jackie Gleason's her favorite TV star."

Peggy Lee Dexter is still a very moody girl. "I have moods," she confessed. "One year, I feel like traveling, and the next, I don't. Right now, I'm in between moods." Then she glanced lovingly at Brad. "But I'd go anywhere with Brad!"

THE LADIES: Marcia Van Dyke, a panelist on her husband, Jack Barry's show, Wisdom Of The Ages, had to answer this question recently: "With whom would you like to be stranded on a desert island?" Remembering she was pregnant, she answered: "No doubt about it—with an obstetrician!" . . . Zsa Zsa Gabor was being interviewed by Paula Stone. Paula suggested: "Give us some advice on how men can treat their wives." "Never good enough!" snapped Zsa Zsa. . . . Those gorgeous gowns Jane Froman wears are by Florence Lustig and cost $1,000. They are rented to Jane, and go back to the shop as floor models after each show. . . . Bess Myerson, former Miss America and now an NBC-TV emcee, is five-feet-ten in her stocking feet and is constantly being asked for advice by other tall girls. She told one girl, "What's really necessary, when with the man who's important, is to make him feel taller. Not that you should be a clinging vine, but a man does like to be looked up to—so that he feels dependable, not expendable."

IMOGENE COCA RETIRING? Imogene Coca, Sid Caesar's partner in Your Show of Shows, is thinking of retiring for a season and having a baby. She is married to Bob Burton, and they have often discussed the possibilities of starting a family before "it is too late." They have been married for many years, and never had money enough to stay put for a while. Imogene has been making fine money for more than four years.

Because she portrays Sid's wife on TV, many fans assume she's really married to him. As a result, Imogene has had to write magazine articles entitled, "No, I'm Not Married To Sid Caesar." Sid is married to a former model, Florence, and they have two children.

NINA FOCH A PAINTER: Nina Foch, who has settled in New York, has taken up painting seriously. "I paint about three canvasses a year and I never sign them," she says. "I don't want anybody to buy them because my name is on them. After a painting is sold, then I sign it." She's proud of the fact she recently sold a painting "for two bills" ($200).

GODFREY THE HEADACHE-MAKER: CBS's biggest money-maker Arthur Godfrey is also its biggest headache-maker. His most recent lulu was speaking up for his pal, Charles E. Wilson, when his nomination as Secretary of Defense was controversial. This violated a network rule against entertainers editorializing on controversial subjects. But millionaire Godfrey didn't care. He just went off on a two-week trip around the world with another pal, General Curtis Le May.

The trouble with Godfrey is his uninhibited tongue. But Godfrey knows it is also the quality that attracts such an army of fans. "People like me that way," he says.

Godfrey, who has money and prestige, would like to have a high job in the Eisenhower government. However, it would have to be a consultant job, as his contract with CBS has years to go.

THE RISE OF JONI JAMES: The five-foot former bra model from Chicago is already making more than $2,000 a week, because of her hit recording of "Why Don't You Believe Me?" Yet, as she recalls, "Last year, I was ready to give up and get married."

She had been singing for four years in "plush hotels and junky dives" and she was discouraged. Today, she is surprising everybody with the calm efficiency with which she's handling her career. She is a buxom brunet, with brown eyes, and an extroverted personality. When mobsters tried to "buy" into her career as managers, she rebuffed them. And when somebody discovered she had never taken vocal lessons in her life and wanted to send her to a teacher, she refused. She's afraid taking lessons might ruin her. Her real name is Joanna Carmelia Babbo, one of a family of six. She insists she has no intentions of marrying . . . right away.

MARGARET O'BRIEN'S KISS: Margaret O'Brien, now a slim 16 and displaying a blossoming figure, has been in New York with her mother. Her mother is with her constantly, and Margaret has not been seen in any public places with boys. There is still a shy quality about Margaret, and she impresses every one as "a little lady" who is unspoiled. Sweetness rather than sexiness is the word for Margaret.

When she was signed for a romantic role on a recent CBS Lux Video Theatre, her role called for her to kiss a boy. Assured by Margaret's mother that this would be Margaret's first public romantic kiss, the Lux publicity department hurriedly prepared to turn the kiss into a big publicity splash. But somebody did some research and discovered that Margaret had been kissed in a Columbia movie. Result: publicity called off.

PERSONALITIES: The Jack Lescoulies, thrilled when expecting their first baby after 10 years of marriage, are sad. Mrs. Lescoulie lost the baby during the ninth month. . . . Steve Allen is dating Jayne Meadows. . . . Maureen Cannon married Alan Smythe, a New Jersey businessman. . . . Veronica Lake, with her three children, has settled in New York for TV work. . . . Vincent Lopez, who's quite a famous astrologer besides being a fine musician, predicts that Eddie Cantor will have a "year of change." "If he undertakes new assignments," says Lopez, "they will be of short duration, although not necessarily unsuccessful." . . . Robert Merrill returned all of the wedding gifts he personally received when he married Roberta Peters. . . . Don De Leo, tired of portraying villains on TV, shaved off his moustache. So what happened? He is still doing villain roles.

NO DUMMY, HE: A newspaperman was interviewing Jimmy Nelson, the young ventriloquist. "Isn't it true," said the newspaperman, "that, after a while, you begin to identify yourself with the wooden dummy?" "Hardly," replied Nelson. "I have three children."

SHERWOOD OF THE MOUNTED: Bobby Sherwood, who's so fey on the Milton Berle show, gets up early for his WJZ, New York, 6:30 A.M. show. So he brought in his beautiful buckskin mare, Lady Buck, from his Hunter, N. Y., farm and keeps her in a stable near the studios. Every morning, after the show, and still wearing blue jeans, he takes Lady Buck for a canter through Central Park. A few of his pals, including Mel Torme, Richard Hayes and Eileen Barton, join him for occasional canters through the park, which they call Sherwood Forest. Sherwood calls his pals the Sherwood Radio TV Rangers.

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

Dean Martin's wife Jeanne accompanied Gordon and Sheila MacRae to the preview of The Desert Song the night the Martin separation was disclosed . . . Marilyn Monroe, who used to date Freddie Karger, showed up unexpectedly at a dinner party tossed by Janie Wyman and her Freddie. . . . Linda Christian has been endorsing everything the advertisers push under her nose, from beer to bed sheets, and Tyrone Power hasn't been too happy about it . . . Loretta Young hit the ceiling when a columnist said she and Tom Lewis were sparring simply because Loretta had moved into her studio dressing room. Then the columnist retracted by printing an item that Loretta was living in the dressing room with her husband, cook and masseuse . . . The neighbors were the first to report that Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis have been quarreling—the arguments were that noisy!

Errol Flynn and spouse, Patrice Wymore, stayed at different hotels while in Rome. And that's not doing what the Romans do in Rome at all, at all . . . Nora Eddington Flynn Haymes took the trouble to phone me with a denial that she and Dick were breaking up several months ago—and this after I saw her dating someone other than Dick at Scandia . . . There were dirges also from the Rhonda Fleming-Lew Morrill household but these too were denied . . . Saddest break of the year: Donald and Gwen O'Connor . . . Blowoff on the Anne Baxter-John Hodiak hassle came when a lady referred to John, in his very presence, as Mr. Baxter . . . Noisiest fights of the season, and the ones to which we'd like to own the iodine concession, are Cara Williams and John Barrymore, Jr.'s . . .

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Guy Madison will make more dough on his one picture at Warners than he made during his entire six years under contract to David O. Selznick. And no one's happier over it than Guy's ever-lovin' Gail Russell . . . A Las Vegas nightclub offered Mario Lanza $20,000 a week to sing there, fat and all . . . Marilyn Monroe moves up from $750 to $1,200 a week at 20th-Fox May 1 . . . Rosalind Russell, who's showing Hollywood how great she is in Broadway's Wonderful Town, partnered in a ladies' wear and leather goods business with her former maid, Hazel Washington.

Susan Hayward bought a 1953 convertible, then put it in a garage and took off for Europe with Jess Barker . . . George Montgomery opened another furniture store, his second, in Beverly Hills . . . Dana Andrews managed to save $20,000 a year for the past 12 years. That's a solid nest egg of $240,000 . . . Olivia de Havilland won't budge from her insistence that she be paid $175,000 per picture. She's one of the few who can still get it, and didn't you think she was wonderful in My Cousin Rachel? . . . Zsa Zsa Gabor has been getting $3,000 a week to go out on tour to make personal appearances with Moulin Rouge.

FUNNIES:

John Derek told an interviewer he calls his wife frequently. Interviewer: "What an odd name!" . . . Tab Hunter says a bee is an insect that gets little bumbles from heaven . . . Spotting Mickey and Elaine Rooney at LaRue, Craig Hill asked how long they've been married. "Seven weeks?" sputtered Craig. "And I'm the fool who said it wouldn't last!" . . . At lunch, Debbie Reynolds asked for cigarettes. "King size or regular?" asked the waiter. "Regular," said Debbie, "I'm an old-fashioned girl" . . . Howard Keel was telling Doris Day he knows an actress who's temperamental only twice a year: each attack lasts six months! . . . Evelyn Keyes writes from Paris: "The most beautiful day in my life will be when I can think in French—the most beautiful night when I can dream in French!" . . . Laraine Day and Leo Durocher were having a playful argument. Said Laraine: "Look, Leo, you'll never divorce me because you don't have the strength to teach another gal baseball!"

I went to the Masquers Club testimonial for Jane Wyman, a fine tribute to a fine actress . . . Toastmaster Art Linkletter said that sitting between Janie and her Freddie at the speakers' table was "like peeking over a transom!" . . . Jack Warner said: "Janie has been under contract to me 17 years, and anybody who's been at Warners' that long deserves a dinner in a stadium!" . . . Janie entertained the guests by singing "Red, Rosy Apple" and "My Honey Man," after which she made a little speech of thanks for the honor bestowed upon her. This is part of her speech: "I always wanted to be an actress, even when I was third girl from the left in the second row of the chorus—but I could never make it up to the first row because Alice Faye was always in my way!"

SEX APPEAL:

Oversleeper June Allyson bought an electric-eye alarm clock that keeps ringing till she gets up and out of the beam . . . Vic Mature got a poodle cut for his role in The Robe, and the gals out at 20th-Fox claim the curls suit Vic better than they do Bob Wagner . . . U-I's new starlet, Mamie Van Doren, once named Zaba Olander, employs the same hairdo, same licking of the lower lip and same open-mouthed posturings as Marilyn Monroe.

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Seen in a Beverly Hills parking lot—Rita Hayworth in levis and a red sweater with daughter Rebecca, looking more like a parking attendant than a movie star . . . Talk of the town—the Bing Crosby-Mona Freeman datings . . . The Rosemary Clooney-Jose Ferrer romance has been easing up and will likely continue to do so as long as her career keeps strengthening, and don't ask me how come I know so much! . . . QUICK QUOTES:

The Duke and Duchess of Windsor tossed a dinner party in New York for Clifton Webb and Susan Zanuck. Susan couldn't locate a maid to lace her into her gown. So Uncle Belvedere took over, remarking betimes, "Why not—I've been dressing my mother for years!" . . . Mel Ferrer writes from Africa: "The riots have calmed down. Now we can be shot at only for bad acting, so don't expect to see me again" . . . Jane Russell, during the shooting of Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, kept nagging at Marilyn Monroe to marry Joe DiMaggio: "Believe me, honey—and I know 'cause I married one—athletes make the best husbands!" . . . Carole Mathews: "Most women aren't sufficiently posterior-conscious. It's the last impression as you leave the room that counts."

Somebody overheard Lana Turner say: "Fernando Lamas is a fine actor but I'm amazed no one bothered to teach him English" . . . A newspaper reporter asked George Raft: "Have you ever worked with Humphrey Bogart?" George replied: "Well, Bogie worked with me in a few pictures" . . . George Sanders told British reporters why his wife, Zsa Zsa Gabor, will go to the top of the acting profession: "There just isn't anybody in Hollywood strong enough to stop her!" . . . They had Betty Hutton under an inhalator when I flew up to San Francisco to catch the Bombshell's stage show at the Curran Theatre. Betty couldn't talk (!!!) but Charlie O'Curran told me she had knocked herself out, up to my arrival, giving the best shows of her—or anybody's!—life. And if you know Betty you can believe it. Anyway, I left the Bay City without seeing her perform—and can only hope that she'll decide to put her show on in Los Angeles at some future date . . . Bob Hope: "It's too bad Bing Crosby couldn't come to this dinner for Cardinal McIntyre. You see, he couldn't find a sitter for the Bank of America!" . . . Bob Taylor comments ominously on Ava Gardner's slim waist: "It could get her arrested—no visible means of support" . . . An extra gandered Zsa Zsa Gabor's cleaved gowns and cracked, "Lincoln to the contrary, all women are not created equal" . . . Steve Cochran told a newsgal he learned all about women when he was six months old!

(Continued from page 44) The wedding was a complete surprise to everyone. Anne hadn't mentioned to anyone that she was considering marriage, or was even in love for that matter. She had dated the usual bachelors about town but no one at her studio gave a second thought to Anne's becoming a bride. She had been a professional actress since the first year of her life, and with only 21 birthdays behind her seemed quite willing to devote herself entirely to her work and to enjoying her new-found success in movies. And then on Friday, May 16th, she telephoned 20th Century-Fox and calmly announced that she was marrying Mr. Price the following day.

Anne is "different" in Hollywood in that she works with calm assurance and complete lack of temperament. In the three years she has been in town she has fulfilled the best hopes of the directors with whom she has worked, yet managed to live her own life, the kind of life, except for the hours in front of the camera, that might be lived by a small town girl at college.

Her wedding stayed in character. It was traditionally beautiful, quiet, and slightly crazy, but bare of crowds and flashbulbs. It took place in the chapel of the Harvard Military School, an institution in North Hollywood which Bam had attended in his youth. The presiding minister was a friend of Bam's, and families of both the bride and groom flew into town from New York and Porterville, California, respectively. It should have gone off smoothly, but then, few weddings do. Anne's father, preparatory to giving away his only daughter, was more nervous than a politician on election eve. "Why," he kept growling, "doesn't the organ start playing?"

He ignored the fact that Bam had not yet arrived, and for her part Anne was wondering, in a simmering sort of fashion, what Bam had been doing driving in the opposite direction as she and her father had approached the church. She calmed her own frazzled nerves by telling her father over and over that they were to use the lock step going down the aisle. She neglected to so inform her matron of honor who, as a result, eventually went trotting briskly toward the altar, leaving the bride and her father leagues behind. Bam finally arrived, having been there once before but having forgotten to pick up his best man. This had now been rectified, and the explanation for his driving away from the church ten minutes before the scheduled ceremony was gratefully accepted by Anne.

Secure in her knowledge that the groom was here and that her father knew all about the lock step, Anne went back to visit the pastor, who was just donning his robes for the ceremony. "He looks just wonderful in them, just beautiful," she confided later to her father as the two of them stood waiting for the strains of Lohengrin. "Blast!" roared her father. "This isn't his wedding! It's your wedding! When is that infernal organ going to start?"

THE tumult and the shouting and the wedding over with, the new Mr. and Mrs. Price left for a brief honeymoon in Yosemite and San Francisco and then returned to their two apartments. Each was quite small, consisting only of a living room, bath and kitchen, and they decided to keep both of them until a larger apartment was available. They lived in Anne's, and Bam used his for his work.

Bam's work must be explained in order to effectively chronicle the first months of the marriage. In his study of motion picture production he must turn out a thesis, which in this subject consists of a complete documentary film, written, produced, directed, photographed, edited, etc. by the student himself. Bam chose the subject of the evils of drug addiction, and when he first met Anne was in the throes of interviewing those unfortunates who had been a slave to the habit. The project went on until shortly before Christmas of 1952, the last few months being devoted to the editing, or cutting, of the film. Luckily, Dream Boat was Anne's last picture until she began her role of the swamp girl Flamingo in Warner Bros.' A Lion In The Streets last December. As a result, she had seven full months in which to devote her time to assisting Bam. She was alternately his script girl, his assistant director, and his Girl Friday, and in helping her husband Anne learned more about what goes into making a movie than she had ever gleaned from her own work in front of the cameras. "I now adore all assistant directors," she announces, "and don't know how they ever keep their sanity."

When the time came last August that a larger apartment was ready for occupancy, they were delighted, although the more Bohemian residents of their neighborhood were saddened by the news that henceforth the Prices would live in one apartment. "What a dee-vine arrangement!" several gay divorcees had clucked. "Two apartments!" Anne merely smiled. To each his own, she figured, and for her there was only one living arrangement for a marriage—two people with one key.

THE new apartment gave them the feeling of great spaciousness. There was a living room, dinette, bedroom and kitchen and what's more, the living room boasted a fireplace. At last, thought Anne, here was a real home. Moving day changed her thoughts somewhat. Bam filled the fireplace with cameras, tripods and batteries, and flashbulbs wandered here and there onto the hearthstone. His desk was put in the dinette and within two days he had strung wires from here to there throughout the room. These were promptly hung with strips of film, and when they put up a folding screen to hide the working room from the living room this, too, was shortly be-ribboned with film.

In the days when Bam was shooting his picture things were fairly neat. His day had begun at seven and he whisked out of the house with his cameras and came back later with nothing to show for his work but neat little spools of film. Last fall it became a different story. The cutting of film is the messiest part of the business, and soon after his morning coffee Bam disappeared behind the film bunting and didn't emerge until dinnertime, when he appeared with bloodshot eyes.

"The only way I knew he was there," says Anne, "was from the noise of the movieola. Or if he wasn't working with that he had the radio turned on full blast."

Once in a while she parted the curtain of film, feeling like Sadie Thompson making an entrance, and ventured in to look over his shoulder. A scene was running through the movieola, a small machine used by film editors. "Uh, uh," Anne would say, shaking her head in a negative fashion. "That should be a closeup right there instead of a long shot."

"You think so?" said Bam. "Then what about the closeup that comes just before that? Before the fadeout?"

"Now, wait a minute, wait a minute," said Mrs. Price, putting her hands over her eyes. "I can see the whole thing clear as day. Now. If you put the closeup before the fadeout and then follow with the—follow with the—honey, I'm losing it. I'm all muddled. Goodbye." And she parted the film curtain once more and left.

Anne didn't often enter her producer's

den. As confused as it was Bam knew where to find every scrap he wanted, and as a result neither Anne nor the woman who comes once a week to clean dared to go near the cluttered desk. One day Anne stepped squarely on a closeup, neatly imprinting the film with the outline of her shoe, and she was so angry with herself that she went into the bedroom and sulked for an hour.

While Bam was thus engrossed Anne had time to attend to her own affairs. Those seven months of freedom gave her an opportunity to learn the difference between a broiler and an oven, and how to make dirt disappear from a house. They also gave her a free mind with which to struggle with the adjustments necessary in a new marriage. Despite her youth Anne has the intelligence to know that it takes work to make a good marriage. Most people, she figures, are dreamers. They think that falling in love is the whole answer and the end of all effort, but Anne knows that's when the work begins.

THE first thing she learned about was Bam's tremendous energy. Anne had thought she was similarly endowed, but after a month of trying to keep up with his schedule she fell by the wayside. He was up at seven to start a 16-hour workday and Anne, who got up and made his breakfast and then worked all day by his side, was exhausted by nine p.m. It dawned on her finally that it would be more sensible to stay within her limits, a practice which in time made her a more cheerful bride.

Her next step was to worry about him. Nobody, she thought, should keep up such a killing pace, but she learned that it is Bam's way, and that if she fretted about it and nagged him to work less, it would only make him unhappy. This premise was so settled in her mind that when she began work in A Lion In The Streets and had to be up at 4 a.m. and at the studio by 5:30, she didn't object when Bam too crawled out of bed and started his own day along with her. She could hear him whistling in the kitchen as he started the breakfast while she took her shower, and she knew that this was what he wanted to do, or he wouldn't be doing it. She has contented herself merely with talking him into taking Sundays off. "You know, dear," she said, "just to relax? Maybe take a drive out in the country or something?"

There was no problem with the toothpaste tube; they use different brands of toothpaste, so the argument never arose about whether it should be squeezed flat or rolled from the bottom. They are both prompt people and never have to wait for each other to dress, and each is so attentive to details that often they both try to pick up the laundry on the same day. But Anne hit a snag regarding neatness. In her bachelor days she had always tended to strew things slightly through the apartment, and now that she was married felt quite miffed when Bam left his sports coat on the bed, his bath towel over the door and yesterday's shirt on the floor. She was even more miffed when she realized that her husband, without having said a word, was deliberately demonstrating to her how messy a home could look when its residents let things fall where they may. By now she hangs up her own things as well as his and the other day when he asked where his jacket was, she smiled through gritted teeth. "I hung it up, dear." Then laughed out loud.

In the beginning, there was a budget, an idea, Anne hastily explains that stemmed exclusively from her husband. She hasn't the slightest affinity for arithmetic and not only told him so but proceeded to prove it. They started off with a special budget book purchased from a stationer, and neatly penciled in at the head of each column the names of their miscellaneous expenses. Anne kept it up to date quite dutifully for two weeks and then discarded the idea as entirely too much trouble. "Putting down how much I spend for soap," she told Bam, "can't possibly increase our income or decrease our expenses. As far as I'm concerned the budget book is a big fat waste of time."

Their bank statement arrives and stays for days on the same table, each waiting and hoping that the other will be a martyr and inspect it for possible errors. Up to this writing Bam has been the inevitable loser, and one day was foolish enough to attempt to explain to his bride how a bank statement should be checked. "You see," he said, "you merely check the canceled checks with a check against each—" he turned around in his chair. Anne had disappeared. "Where are you?" he called. "I'm explaining how simple it is to do this thing!"

Her voice floated merrily from the kitchen. "I'm baking a pie," she said. "This is something I can wrap my mind around."

Anne indeed can master the mysteries of a kitchen and is rapidly becoming a culinary queen. Bam is no slouch himself and on Sundays, the only day they have time to sit leisurely over breakfast, his waffles alternate with Anne's popovers.

THEY both wear white terrycloth fatigue outfits around the apartment, and other residents refer to them as the ghost couple. The neighbors have also had occasion to note that the young Mr. Price may possibly be out of his head. There for a few weeks he was frequently seen in the garden, leaping into the air and flailing his arms for no obvious reason. What Bam actually was doing was collecting food for his wife's new pet, a green creature three feet long which Anne describes as "a friendly snake." She had first become addicted to snakes back in Atlanta on a P.A. tour when one night she was standing in the wings of a theater and felt a light touch on her shoulder. Turning, she saw the head of a good sized serpent nestling on her upper arm. This particular snake was due to go on stage soon with his own act, and when editor Paul Jones of the leading Atlanta newspaper saw that Anne was not only unafraid but quite fascinated, he offered to send her a snake for a pet. Told it was impossible to adopt her newfound friend for her very own, she agreed to accept a substitute. "But be sure," she told Jones, "that he is a friendly one."

The wire arrived a few days after Anne's return to Hollywood. "CURLY ARRIVING EIGHT MONDAY MORNING ON SUPER CHIEF COMPARTMENT SIX." Arrived at the railroad depot on Monday, Anne looked up compartment six and found a pale and shaken newspaper-woman who held out to Anne, at arm's length, an immense glass jar filled with Curly. "Here," she said in a weak voice, "you take him. I haven't been able to eat a thing since I boarded the train."

Curly was taken home and given loving care. The neighborhood was nonplussed by Bam's daily safari for a boxful of insects, and friends of the young couple did not take kindly to being met at the Prices' front door by Bam wearing Curly in his hair or around his neck. All things must come to an end, however, and when Curly died a few weeks later everyone was quite jubilant, except Anne and Bam. They have concluded that it would be easier to raise something more along the human line and are hoping, after they eventually buy the house they are saving for, to start a family of their own.

MEANWHILE their respective parents are delighted with the marriage. Bam's mother and father came down to Hollywood last Thanksgiving, armed with candy and cookies and flowers, plus wood for the fireplace. The latter was stacked out of sight for the bright day when the fireplace would be empty of camera equipment, and then, because the dinette was bursting with film, they all went for Thanksgiving dinner to the home of Bam's friends in Whittier, 17 miles away. It was to this same house that last summer Anne and Bam decided to walk, and did. When the elder Prices heard about the jaunt they looked at each other and beamed. Wherever else would their son have found a girl who liked to walk as much as he does?

When Anne's parents came west for Christmas, a fire was blazing in the fireplace and a dinette set sat where it ought to sit—in the dinette. They had a merry holiday and a fine dinner and when it was mentioned that Thanksgiving day had been spent with their friends in Whittier—the place 17 miles away where they had once walked—Mr. and Mrs. Francis caught each other's eye across the table. Where else could Anne have found a boy who liked to walk as much as she does?

So although Anne and Bam can account for their finances only the first two weeks of their marriage, although he puts her through her paces in the matter of putting things away, although their first year was lived with a movie, and although Anne goes away from home and orders snakes delivered on her return, this one looks as though it's going to last. He brings her flowers "for no special reason," they completely understand each other's work, and they like to walk like nobody else on earth. To top it all, Bam approves of her driving. "And," says Anne proudly, "he told me that after we were married!" END

And I might add, it also belonged to one of the most beautiful babies. Yes, Michael Howard was a property owner before he was born. "The man who built the house gave our expected baby an acre and a half of land."

He pointed out young Michael's section—an up-ended acre that dropped sheerly into a deep canyon. "I hope the boy never falls out of his property," I said. "It looks as though he'll need the legs of a mountain goat or a helicopter to reach it." Mike shrugged. He'd let the lad figure that one out in the future. Mike was too busy living for the day.

"And wouldn't you know," I said, "that you'd cover your yard with diachondra instead of grass." Diachondra is a small plant that requires no mowing—just the thing for the labor-loathing Wildings.

The pool was small, but electrically heated. Mike considers it a great luxury, since swimming pools are rare in his native England. He takes four or five dips a day. Between his swimming and Liz' bathing, they're the cleanest couple in town.

"On a clear day," Mike continued, "we can see Catalina when we sit up in bed. I only hope that Catalina can't see us."

That's hardly likely. The house, a strictly modern affair, has a small yard surrounded by a high fence. It pops into view before a stranger knows he's near it. The mailbox still bears the name of "Ted McClellan," the industrialist who built the place. Mike and Liz haven't yet got around to putting up their shingle.

The yipping of two dogs told me I was at the right place. Those dogs are part of Liz' eternal menagerie. Come husbands, babies, or what-have you, Liz would feel naked without her animals. If the animals weren't sufficient identification, an enormous packing box would give you another clue. It rests beside the driveway and bears the inscription: "Made in England" and "Mr. M. Wilding."

"Well," I said, "you can certainly look down on many famous people." On the winding road up the hill you pass the homes of Danny Kaye, Ronald Colman, Katharine Hepburn, Fred Astaire, Mary Pickford, Charlie Chaplin, Constance Bennett, and King Vidor.

"Isn't that wonderful," said Mike, ushering me through a small hallway into a huge combination living-dining room. The windows reach from floor to ceiling to take advantage of the view. All the furnishings are as modern as the house.

The color accent of the living room is purple—a blue-violet divan with purple pillows; purple glassware gleaming from various spots; before the rock fireplace a purple chair. It was obvious that somebody's favorite color was purple, and I soon learned that somebody was Liz. Her bachelor-girl apartment had been dominated by green and chartreuse (which she loathed) and always looked as though somebody had moved in but never got around to settling down.

But Mrs. Michael Wilding's home already has the air of permanency. The walls are covered with paintings. A huge landscape, a wedding gift from her art-dealer father, hangs above the divan. Next to it is an Augustus Johns portrait. Beside the fireplace is a life-size bronze bust of a girl by the noted sculptor Jacob Epstein. Mike confided that he knew the girl who had posed for the statue.

An accent of humor is added to the dining room section by a caricature Jean Negulesco did of Liz when she was expecting the stork. It shows her in black slacks, a full purple smock, and a tousled head of hair. Mike can always point to it and say, "That, my dear, is how you looked in the first year of our marriage."

Liz' hair was still tousled when she entered the room. A poodle-cut, without waves, produced a shaggy effect. Her flowing white dressing gown concealed her figure; but her face was no longer oval. It was round. Except for lipstick she wore no make-up, and no jewelry except a plain gold wedding ring on her finger, and a tiny gold cross around her neck. Her eyes were sleepy, and she looked as relaxed as the black cat that lay sleeping on a green upholstered bar stool in a corner of the room. But she was still beautiful.

MAKING a mock curtsy, I exclaimed, "Why, Liz, you wore that dressing gown a year ago. Shame on you."

"But I'm much poorer and much older now," she protested. The wind which had been blowing hard all day now began to howl around the house. At the sound Liz' eyes were no longer sleepy. They opened wide. "Welcome to Wuthering Heights," she said. "I'm supposed to go back to work—terrible thought—in three weeks; and I've got to lose some weight, but fast."

"Well, you can't do it by diet alone," I said. "I've got a wonderful masseur, Dr. Fred Nelson, who could take those extra inches off you."

"How much does he charge?" was her first question.

At that, a dead silence fell over the room, and everybody did a double-take. For Liz to ask about the price of anything was like an atheist asking the way to church. Finally Peggy Rutledge (Liz' secretary) turned to me and said, "Are you sure you've come to the right address?"

"We're very poor," Liz continued, "and I have to think of prices. We call this 'Suspension House'."

"In one year, we've had a year and five months of suspensions between us, a record for one family," explained Mike. "I was on suspension four months; and Liz, seven. Then we both had a three-months layoff. Figure it up. We've been suspended so long we feel like bats hanging from the rafters." In Hollywood language "suspension" means being taken off studio salary for failure to do a picture assigned one, or for having a baby.

"But we're all set now," said Liz. "Mike has one picture coming up; and I have two. How much does your masseur charge, seriously?"

"If he charged by the pound . . ." I replied, studying her figure, then stopped with a gasp. I noticed Liz was wearing bedroom slippers. "Well, well," I roared. "Mike finally got shoes on you and took his off."

"He got shoes on me!" exclaimed Liz. "When did this happen? I'm always a fashion plate when you're around, you know."

"Of course," said I. "You and Mike must come to a party I'm giving next week."

"Party," replied Liz in a shocked voice. "I haven't a thing to wear. All my old clothes are too small. And I'll be darned if I'm going to buy anything until I've reduced."

"The party's being given for Dana Tasker, the man who got your pretty puss on the cover of Time. He wants to meet you," I said.

"Maybe he'd buy me a new dress," Liz hinted.

"Maybe he would, but I doubt it," I said. "Perhaps I could promote you a free massage upstairs while the party's going on below."

"You're a real little sport," said Liz with a smile.

"She's a very difficult girl to handle," said Mike. "The reason she put on so much weight is that she drank and ate everything in sight, especially milk, during her pregnancy. The doctor told her to slow down on that milk consumption, that she was gaining too much weight. But she just batted those baby blue eyes at him and said, 'But I like milk.' Naturally the doctor couldn't resist her. He said, 'Well, have milk then. Have it.' She put on 40 pounds."

"Forty pounds!" I yelled.

"But I've already lost 25," she said. Then added kiddingly, "You see I owed it to myself to remain strong and healthy. The baby would have got enough food from me, no matter how much I weighed. All that calcium in the milk was good for him."

As Liz told this grandmother all about what you must go through to have a fat, healthy baby, Mike sat in the purple chair and beamed at her. They seem to appreciate each other's sense of humor. When Liz scored a wisecrack, Mike smiled like the cat that swallowed the canary. But since the topic Baby had been brought up, he asked, "Don't you want to see him, Hedda?"

"Sure," I said. "That's why I'm here."

THE statement brought pandemonium. Mike jumped up and started for the nursery. Liz was immediately on her feet and after him. By the time I got into locomotion, a small poodle, by the name of "G", joined the party, barking and getting under everyone's feet in an effort to get to the nursery first. But the black cat on the bar stool never opened an eye or moved. It would take more than a baby to wake him up.

The baby's room is painted in yellow and pale blue. Toys are all over the place. On a ledge around the room sit all kinds of stuffed animals: Bears, deer, dogs, and cats. Toy soldiers stand at attention on top of a chest of drawers. Also in the room were a tiny blue chair, a bed for the nurse, a large canopied child's bed, a bassinet with yellow organdy ruffles and a pure white blanket with "Michael" embroidered on it in pink, and a small basket which holds the baby when he travels to and from the doctor's office. But tiny Michael Howard was oblivious to all these comforts of home. He was sleeping soundly on his stomach in a small, plain perambulator. A pink blanket hid all but his head, which was covered with dark, black hair, like Liz'. He has a turned up nose and tiny ears that lie flat against his head.

"And he has blue eyes," said Mike, pulling back the blanket so I could see all of his son. "And see how long he is." He was as proud as a mother hen with just one chick over his son and heir.

"Has he shown any special talent?" I asked.

"Certainly," said Mike. "He knows when to stop feeding. Unlike most babies who over-eat then up-chuck, our boy stops, breathes a while, then goes back to his food."

On the walls I spotted a picture of Liz, and asked, "Now who ever did that? It's a horror."

"It's Michael's first attempt at painting. He did it from a photograph when he had to return to London, and I had to stay in Hollywood to finish a picture," said Liz.

"Don't shoot, Hedda, I'd never do another one," Mike added.

"I did the other picture with the snow and two deer when I was 12," said Liz.

"Now for the bedroom," I said.

Liz led the way. I nearly had a stroke when I saw the size of the bed. "It's only seven feet by seven and a half," said Liz. "I wanted one nine by nine."

"She didn't know her bed or sheet sizes," Mike broke in. "This one is great."

"Somewhat like a battle ground," said I.

"Sure," said Liz, "it gives you room to kick around and do all sorts of things without disturbing one another."

The room was definitely pink, with a huge television set facing the bed, and a chaise longue beside it. There was another TV set at the bar. "You must be nertz about television," I suggested.

"A family arrangement," Mike explained.

"Liz loves murder mysteries, and I like boxing. With two sets there's no conflict."

The bedroom was immaculate, and I commented on it. "But don't look in the bathroom," pleaded Liz.

"Tell me, Mike. Is she still careless about hanging up her clothes?" I asked. "She used to leave them wherever they fell."

"I told you not to look in the bathroom," giggled Liz.

"Well," said Mike, "she has fewer clothes to drop now. But thank goodness, she doesn't drop the baby. As a matter of fact, she's a good mother. I'm proud of her."

"I don't see what that has to do with motherhood," pouted Liz. "I know a lot of old people who leave their clothes all over the place. My husband, for instance. But, Hedda, don't you think the bedroom does look neat?"

"Yes," I replied, "but I'll bet my hat you cleaned it up when you learned I was coming up to see you."

"You're quite right," Mike admitted. "Things were dripping all over the place until I suggested it be tidied up before you got here. I had an idea you'd like to see the bedroom."

"You were quite right about that too," said I.

"It's a model of neatness," declared Liz.

When we arrived back in the living room, Peggy brought out the other baby of the family—a tiny black poodle named Mugwumps. The poodle and its mother began cavorting all over the place. Coffee arrived. Liz picked up the silver pot, acting as though it were so heavy she couldn't hold it. "For heaven's sake! Put it down. You'll scald us all," I cried.

"It's so heavy," signed Liz, collapsing on the sofa and stretching herself. "I think I'll take a nap. I just got up before you came. I hadn't been out of bed all day."

"You get up at three in the afternoon?"

"Well, I'd been awake for quite a few hours," she explained. "The doctor told me I must sort of take a nap."

"She must sort of take a nap; so she sleeps all day," I said. "She's really playing her role to the hilt. Mike, I'm afraid you've got yourself a real lazy girl."

"It's all right," he said, tossing a smile at his wife. "I'm sort of lazy too."

Liz just lay there, looking utterly helpless. And I could just see everybody in house breaking their necks to cater to her slightest whim. She was living it up and liking it.

"Now, my girl, tell me how it feels to be a mother," I said, knowing I'd laid myself open with that one.

"I like it," said Liz in imitation of Jerry Lewis. "I hope you didn't expect anything more intelligent in the way of an answer."

Then she sat up and had herself a cup of coffee, resting the cup on a purple pillow in her lap. "No, really," she added, "he's a very good baby—cries only when he's hungry, and gets hungry only on schedule. But he's so tiny and delicate, I do worry when I have to flip him over in the crib."

"Do you bathe him?" I wanted to know.

"No. But Mike helps," she said.

"I was up at the crack of dawn this morning," he said. "The nurse did the bathing though. I stood by watching and looking like a fool." He got up, slipped into the nursery, and came back with a puzzled expression. "He's sleeping with his eyes open," he said. "He's got one eye open and the other shut."

"He's not asleep, love," said Liz. "Michael gets upset so easily," she explained. "Bless his heart. The night the baby was born, the doctor told him the operation would take about 12 minutes and promised to let him know whether he had a boy or girl as soon as the Caesarean was over. But somebody forgot; and Mike had to wait 45 minutes."

"I was climbing the walls by the time I got the news," said Mike.

"When he was finally taken to see the baby, Mike thought it was like an opening night," continued Liz. "A curtain was raised, and he spotted a nurse standing behind the glass with her mask on. The baby had one eye open and the other closed then. Mike cried, 'Oh, my God, he has only one eye.' Then he started making frantic signs and yelling to the nurse, 'What's wrong with the other eye?' She leaned over and gently pried the eye open."

THE poodle yipped at the puppy under Liz' feet. She jumped, exclaiming, "Please. My nerves."

"What did you think of the baby when you first saw him?" I asked.

"I'd had a spinal block, but was awake when he was born," said she. "He was five seconds old when I first saw him. The doctor was holding him by his feet; and the baby was bright purple—my favorite color."

"That children survive at all is wonderful," said Mike. "After one breath, the doctor holds them up by one leg to drain the mucus from the lungs. The baby just dangles there, chokes, and becomes purple."

"What a colorful description for a father to make!" laughed Liz. Then she turned erious. "An hour after Michael was born, he was brought to me; and I saw that he was beautiful. He was all pink and white, with no wrinkles in his skin, and a beautifully shaped head. He opened his eyes when I reached for him. He was beautiful. I couldn't be making all this up."

"Did you get an attack of those 'baby blues' that many mothers have after giving birth to their children?" I asked.

"No," she replied. "I was very happy. But I was nervous, without being afraid, before his birth. I didn't have time to think much of the operation, because I was told it would be necessary only a day before it happened. But it has taken me longer to recuperate than I thought it would. I figured I'd be jumping from room to room in a week. But it's taken me a month already, and time's a-wastin'. You know I'll be 21 the end of this month. Then I'll be a woman!"

"Okay," I said, remembering how sensitive Liz was about her youth. "When are you going to have your next baby?"

"In 18 months or so," she said. "I want my children to be born close together. I guess," she added with a laugh, "I'll have to arrange to have them during my suspensions."

"That's an idea," said Mike. "Check with the accounting department at the studio and find out when you can have your next child."

"Work!" she sighed. "Reducing! No fooling, how much does that masseur charge?"

"Stand up and pull in your stomach," I said. "I want to see how your figure really does look."

She did as I requested, murmuring, "Sylph-like, that's me."

What I saw made me scream, "Elizabeth! How could you?"

"Just call me Temptress Taylor," said she.

"You'd better start getting that off quickly," I advised, and then told her how much per hour my favorite masseur charged.

"What do you think, love?" she asked Mike.

"It sounds interesting," he replied.

"You've got an appointment with your doctor in about 15 minutes," Peggy Rutledge told Liz.

"So I have," said she. "This is Thursday, isn't it?"

We all agreed it was.

DURING the whole proceedings, Mike was content to leave the spotlight on Elizabeth. He just sat there in his purple chair, grinning at her feminine shenanigans. But when Liz retired to dress, he went to the bar and mixed himself a gin and tonic, explaining that the limes he used were "homegrown".

How languid Liz dressed so quickly, I wouldn't know. But before Mike had time to take a sip of his "tonic," she was back, wearing black velvet slacks with bejeweled shoes to match and a huge white sweater with a turtle neck to which was fastened two gold safety pins. She sat down by Mike and reached for his drink. He shrugged and handed it over, muttering, "Just what the doctor ordered. Reducing stuff." (She sipped a third of the contents before handing it back.)

"Well, my dear," said I, "it's just as the girl claims. She has to keep up her strength, you know."

I glanced at the black cat still slumbering on the bar stool, and it occurred to me that the cat sets the pace for the Wildings' household. I had a feeling that in a way they envied him. After all, he didn't have to work; he slept the hours away; and when he wanted food, he got it and never had to worry about what it did to his figure. Yes, sir, a cat can look at a queen, but a movie queen can also envy a cat. END

bride of faith

Thus began not only the biggest news story of the Hollywood year, but one of the greatest stories ever told in all of Hollywood's history. Many people, of shallow understanding in Hollywood and elsewhere, think it a defeatist one—picturing June Haver as a tragic fugitive fleeing from a blighted life. Because in the minds of the unenlightened a nun's life is a sad one—especially when a young, beautiful, vivacious, talented and famous girl assumes it. This could not be further from the truth. In tribute to June—who though gone will be long remembered and loved for what she was and is—the story deserves to be truly told.

It is not a story of sadness . . . but one of ecstasy and joy.

It is not the story of a girl fleeing from life . . . but one of a girl flying to a larger life.

It is not the story of a world lost but of a world everlastingly found.

It is not the story of a great love denied . . . but of the Greatest Love realized.

It is not a story of failure . . . but the story of a girl who was tested and found fit to serve.

If it had been possible to ask June Haver, as she abandoned spotlighted Hollywood for her new, anonymous and consecrated life, why she had made that decision, she could not have told you more than did that poem which she carried in her purse—a poem printed in a brochure of St. Mary's Academy of the Sisters of Charity, which, her heart at last had told her, was the most beautiful, serene, happy and desirable place in all the world for her to be.

So desirable that she was leaving Hollywood three days early, because her eagerness to be there was so great. At that, she felt she was late; June had planned to enter St. Mary's last August, but she could not finish her final picture, The Girl Next Door, that soon.

By now June Haver has already been three months a postulate in the probationary period required of all aspirants to the Sisterhood. In three months more, she will put on the white veil of a novitiate. After two more years of study, training and prayer she will be professed as a Sister of Charity, assume her black veil and take her religious name. She will also take three sacred vows before the Altar of her God:

The vow of poverty. The vow of chastity. The vow of obedience.

Each year after that June will renew her vows. At the end of seven and one half years since the doors of St. Mary's closed behind her last February she will take her final, lifetime vows. Then there will be no more June Haver as the world has known her. Actually there is none now. No one who knows her has any doubt that June will succeed in her quest. June has never failed at anything. "I know what I want to do," she said on leaving, "but what I want must also be what God wants. May His will be done." (Continued on page 96)

Already, His will has been done, in one beginning way. Because it is solely through the gradual extension of His Grace that June Haver finally took the step which she did, a step which stunned, shocked, puzzled and amazed most of Hollywood and most of the world, even though it was plainly approaching. Many could not even believe it, though all the omens were there: June made a pilgrimage to Rome in the Holy Year of 1951 and had an audience with Pope Pius XII; she twice visited St. Mary's in Leavenworth; it was known that she had applied for dispensation to allow her, a divorcée, to assume the holy robes of a nun; she auctioned off her furniture a month before, gave away her clothes, jewelry and personal effects to her sisters and friends; she instructed her agent, Ned Marin, to advise her studio, 20th Century-Fox where she had starred for ten years, that she would not re-sign and would not accept the $14,000 salary due for her last month. All of this pointed to her decision.

Only her mother, sisters, church officials and a few family standbys, such as Joe Campbell, June's faithful escort, and Dr. Al Metus, a family friend, knew for sure precisely what she was planning. And June told the world only what she felt it had a right to know.

Big story or not, Hollywood reporters respected June's wishes and the wishes of her church—that beyond her statement, she be pressed for no more interviews. Her statement, by the way, was written by June herself, without consultation of the local Catholic Chancery. They found it perfect. In that statement June anticipated the news bombshell she was touching off: "To all my friends," she wrote, ". . . I am about to do something that some of you perhaps will find it difficult to understand. . . ."

JUNE was right. Some did not understand. The first conclusions were sad, fastened conveniently to the unhappy episodes in June Haver's young life:

Her short lived, disillusioning marriage to Jimmy Zito, the moody Italian-American trumpet player. . . . Their divorce and the block to future marriage it posed for June in the eyes of her church which does not recognize divorce. . . . Her fruitless appeal to the Sacra Romano Rota, for an annulment of that mistake. . . . Her engagement to Dr. John Duzik, the blond Beverly Hills dentist, and his tragic death on the eve of their supposed wedding plans. . . . And June Haver's own repeated bouts with ill health, accidents and painful operations.

Some even suggested that these illnesses had made it impossible for June to bear children, the mission of every devout Catholic girl in the outside world. Some—as some would in Hollywood—whispered cruelly that June Haver's career was fading.

These latter "explanations" were false. Although the personal tragedies and ordeals that June suffered had been only too true, it was long before those tragedies arrived, long before she married Jimmy Zito, met John Duzik or felt surgical pain, that June Haver—June Stovenour then—experienced strong spiritual stirrings. A deep religious longing was planted in her even as a girl. And the seed that was to blossom and bear holy fruit was nurtured, not in the shade of sadness, but in the sunshine of a bright, expansive, and vitally ambitious a personality as the town of Rock Island, Illinois, where she was born, on June 10, 1926, has ever known.

Back then her yearnings were more vague, but they were yearnings just the same. Her family likes to recall that June was born with a veil over her face. Through the ages, some people have interpreted that nativity phenomenon as a sign of great talent; others give it deep religious significance. In June's case both have always applied. But while she flaunted her talent for entertaining others, her spiritual side was a private, and for a while, even a secret matter with June.

It was a secret, because from girlhood June was irresistibly attracted to the Catholic Church, and that was not the church of her family. The Stovenours and Hansens (her mother's family) were Protestants with ministers in the family. June didn't want to hurt them. But in high school, after classes she would take her younger sister Evelyn's arm, and the two would disappear.

"We would go to another part of town, picking our way across a high railroad trestle to St. Joseph's Church," Evelyn remembers. "For as long as she could, June would sit in a pew and look steadily at the altar with its flickering candles. Maybe she prayed, I don't know. We didn't say much, going or coming. But every time June's face seemed to glow with happiness and peace. It was as if she needed those visits. We kept them up a long time. I never said anything."

JUNE's father, Fred Stovenour, who was divorced from her mother, Marie, when June was only ten, recently ascribed his daughter's attraction to the Catholic Church as due to the shock of that family rift. "When her mother and I were divorced," he said, "it made quite an impression on her and it influenced her in finding a religion where divorce is not permitted."

Psychologists might agree. Yet while June loved her fascinating father, from whom she inherited her own musical ability, she also got along famously with her stepfather, Bert Haver, whom her mother married next. In fact, June adopted his name when she turned professional and has used it ever since. There has never been any symptom of bitterness or lack of understanding in June's makeup and up until she left for St. Mary's she remained devoted to her mother, now married to her third husband, Andrew Ottensmeyer. June's attraction to the ancient, orthodox Church of St. Peter would seem to lie deeper than that perhaps contributing cause.

But if her parents' breakup was a reason it was to carry a bitter irony. Because the sanctity of marriage which June sought when she became a Catholic herself was the first law she broke, the sole sin she was to commit in her adopted religion.

June Haver was 15 when Ted Fio-Rino, the band leader, needed a singer, heard about June Stovenour in Rock Island, wired from Chicago, listened to her sing "Embraceable You" and hired her to join his band on tour at $75 a week. Jimmy Zito was his other discovery, a 17-year-old trumpet wizard who could ramble on his golden horn like the Angel Gabriel himself. He was a Catholic. He had never been away from home either.

All the zig-zag course of that trip, as June sang her way to Hollywood, she and the black-haired, slender, quietly attractive boy paired off. It was the first romance of June Haver's life. In Rock Island she had never had a real sweetheart, gone "steady." Not that there was anything wrong with her. June just was too busy, too ambitious, too eager to spread herself around. Her heart wanted to embrace everyone, not any single one. Still does.

But Jimmy and June were both wide-eyed, excited and thrilled with their unbelievable breaks. They revelled in the spotlights, crowds, big hotels and cafés. They were the youngest two in the troupe. Jimmy was a sweet, unsophisticated boy hen June was as fresh as a budding rose. Mrs. Haver chaperoned them as they saw the sights of new cities—St. Louis, Dallas, Des Moines, Denver—heard Jimmy shyly call her “Mom.” It was a rosy interlude which June Haver never forgot—what girl ever forgets her first romance?

JUNE Haver was at her most impressionable age when she arrived in Hollywood. She saw her first movie studio, making some musical shorts with Fio-Rito's and. The big league of talent and accomplishment all around her was inviting, promising, irresistible. June talked her mother into staying in Hollywood. The Havers moved out, bag and baggage. Jimmy Zito and the band traveled on.

At Beverly Hills High it was the same story for June that it had been in Rock Island. Her beauty, vivacity, magnetism and friendliness captured everyone, including a host of Hollywood talent agents who saw June in a school play. Darryl F. Zanuck, back from Army duty, was impressed and put her right away into Home in Indiana, where as the blonde charmer “Cri-Cri” she shared a hit which started her career right off in high gear, along with another pretty newcomer named Jeanne Rains.

In person June was a fun girl . . . popular, asked everywhere, bubbling with life, twinkling with wit and laughter. June Haver had dates galore. But never was there any scandal of any kind. No one ever was June Haver's enemy.

That was the girl Hollywood knew—a precocious Miss determined to get what she wanted; clever, aggressive, ambitious and irresistible. When she was chosen for the role of Marilyn Miller in the life story which Warners' had held cautiously six years for the right star, all Hollywood gushed, “What more could any girl want?”

June herself didn't know, but she was making an earnest search for it. She had been, quietly, unobtrusively for many years. After she had returned from Kentucky location with Home in Indiana she began instruction in the Catholic faith at the Church of the Good Shepherd in Beverly Hills. Even as the trumpets blared about her earthly success, June took her first consecrated vows, administered by Monsignor Patrick Concannon. She took them with her sisters, Evelyn and Dorothy. Perhaps even then she realized she was searching for love. A love that would reach to the depths of her heart and satisfy her inner yearning which she appeased only when she entered the Church of the Good Shepherd and prayed. June never missed a Sunday mass from the day she was converted. That is where she went with John Duzik on their first date. Literally, they met by an accident.

A bump in a picture scene cracked the ice of June's front teeth, capped for the umpteenth time, and she was directed to the skillful young Beverly Hills dentist. His receptionist has said that June asked, “Is he married?” when the tooth repair was over. So, that was more a sample of June's anxiety than sudden passion. John Duzik was not the kind to inspire sudden passion. And the evidence shows that certainly at the start he was more in love with June than she with him.

John Duzik was 27 when June Haver met him—nine years older than she. He was no Adonis or Romeo, although a nice-looking, stockily built man with wavy blond hair and a reliable, assuring smile. He was a devout Catholic, a good and solid man. He was the last person in the world June, or anyone else, would ever think could innocently bring her heartache—the heartache of self reproach—or a relief that, paradoxically, was to lead her to joy and peace.

There is no doubt that Dr. Duzik fell deeply in love with June. Whether she did with him then is another question. While she was making Oh, You Beautiful Doll he slipped an engagement ring on her finger. June kept it but she didn't wear it. Pretty soon she gave it back.

PERHAPS even then June was groping for a greater spiritual love. Or perhaps she couldn't forget Jimmy Zito, with whom she had kept in touch. Shortly after June and John Duzik reached and passed the climax of their first romance, Jimmy showed up in Hollywood again. He seemed like the same old Jimmy—except for a tiny black moustache—the boy who had first touched her heart. When this time he asked her to marry him, June found herself saying, “Yes.” They were married in Las Vegas on March 9, 1947. Because both were Catholic they were remarried at St. Timothy's 17 days later. June Haver gave her heart impulsively, romantically and—as it turned out—tragically. They lived together three months almost to the day. Nobody knows just why her disillusionment was so great, but she won her divorce, March 25, 1948 on grounds of mental cruelty and Jimmy Zito did not contest it.

Some close friends of June's think that it was her broken marriage which first pointed June toward a nun's life. “June,” says one, “carried away a deep sense of sin from the divorce court. She felt she had flouted the laws of her church. She felt she must make penance. Her one desire became a chance to expiate her transgression.”

This might seem strange reasoning in the face of June's second and serious romance with John Duzik, who stepped back into her life with love and understanding. There is no doubt that he had worshipped her always—and June's family, along with everyone else, believe he was the love of her life, as well. Yet, while they were at last engaged, there was never any definite date to marry, as most people suppose. There could not be with June until she had been absolved by her conscience and her church. She had not received absolution by August 1949 when John entered St. John's hospital for a simple operation for stomach ulcers.

June was then making The Daughter Of Rosie O'Grady. For a while he seemed progressing perfectly, then internal bleed-

IT HAPPENED TO ME

Six years ago when I was living in Chicago I used to go frequently to the Rainbow Gardens Ball Room. When Les Brown played an engagement there, I went with some friends and we were immediately impressed by his vivacious vocalist. Her long blonde hair, sunny smile and numerous freckles seemed to contribute to her particular type of glamor.

As we were leaving the crowded lobby, I dropped my handbag and the girl stepped over instantly to pick it up for me. She smiled so genuinely, I knew I'd always be a fan of hers, even though at the time she was not well known.

Today she is deservedly famous as Doris Day.

ing started, and later uremic poisoning. For eight weeks, while she danced and sang on the set, sometimes until midnight, June went through a private Gethsemane, as her fiancé lingered agonizingly between life and death. Eight weeks. Eighty-four blood transfusions. June slept in the hospital on a cot, prayed in the chapel, kept vigil by his bed every free hour. But to no avail. On the Sunday morning of October 30th, John Duzik died.

One close friend is sure that was when she made her final decision. "June felt that John Duzik's death was her punishment, and a sign from Above," he believes. "She felt responsible. From that minute she put herself in the hands of God and was determined to find a way to walk in His steps."

She found the way at her place of suffering, St. John's Hospital. The Sisters of Charity who staff St. John's helped her . . . not by persuasion but by example of their work and their lives.

June was a patient at St. John's herself four separate times—for ulcers, for an appendectomy, for a ruptured abdominal organ, for a twisted back. These operations and illnesses were devastating to her frail body—she lost pounds she could not afford—but they were nourishing to her soul, and they brought her the opportunities she was seeking to prepare herself for the selfless life of mercy which she longed for.

During the past three years June has spared nothing of herself. She has eaten irregular meals, exhausted her strength, risen at dawn to set out on endless rounds of benefits for needy causes, driven and flown thousands of miles—often alone—to raise money for or bring cheer to orphanages, small churches and parish houses. To visit hospitals and private homes.

To none of this has there been the slightest touch of sadness or gloom. Friends who have worried about June Haver's "loneliness" because she had few dates with men and—by Hollywood standards—little fun, need not have. "I have never been happier in my life," June told me once during this time. Anyone who has really been close to her knows that despite her skimpy sleep and driving urge to give of herself, she has never been gayer, never more beautiful, radiant, or desirable.

During the three days that June spent in seclusion with her family before flying to Kansas, Evelyn, who is closest of all to June, asked her this question. She said:

"June, if you had received your dispensation from the church, if John had lived, do you think you would ever have given your life to God?"

"Yes," June replied. "I think I would. I think it was meant to be."

JUNE'S Holy Pilgrimage and visit to the Holy Land, brought her spiritually much nearer to her own consecration. Coming back she spent a week at the mother convent of the Sisters of Charity in Kansas. There June realized that a nun's life is a positive one, a life of service and accomplishment, for which a girl, such as herself who had lived and loved, known the world and its people, is far more fitted for church work than one who has shrunk from experience. She learned that the Sisters of Charity is a penitent order, opening its doors to girls who have been married, lost their husbands through death or even divorce, experienced sin or sorrow in their lives. It is an American Sisterhood, founded 86 years ago by the daughter of a Methodist minister, converted, as June was, to Catholicism.

In spite of her qualifications, June was given no promise then, and sought none herself. Although she knew what she wanted, she was not certain she was ready, still unsure that it was His will for her to serve. The past two years have been a test and vigil for June, preparing herself for sisterhood and awaiting signs of His will. They have come to her unmistakably. She has experienced miracles of faith. The first appeared the week she returned to Hollywood from her pilgrimage in 1951.

June had departed carrying a sadness deep in her heart. It concerned a special friend of hers, a paraplegic in the Naval Hospital. He was apparently hopelessly paralyzed and wasting away; doctors gave him only weeks to live. On her journey June prayed daily for him, made offerings in his name at the shrines she visited, asked the holy people she met en route to pray, too. Back home, she hurried to the hospital but he was nowhere. She was afraid to ask. The answer seemed plain: He had died in spite of her appeals, just as John Duzik had.

That night her telephone rang. "Hi,

Junie," greeted a strong voice. "It's me! How am I? I'm great! Got out of the hospital. Have my own house. How about a date tonight?" June raced over, her eyes brimming and her heart surging with the meaning of the miracle.

Soon after, on the International Film Festival flying junket June took through South America, a little black native girl came up to June in Trinidad and handed her a miraculous medal. She did not know June's story, what was already in her heart, even that she was a Catholic. Minutes later when their plane took off, the rudder jammed. They all missed death by inches. Further on, at the Rio de Janeiro airport almost the same thing happened. A Brazilian girl again handed June a miraculous medal—and again their plane failed to rise, circled, dumped 2,500 gallons of gas, fought its way back through a blinding fog and miraculously brought them safely down.

THESE are only samples. June has had them all along—children doomed to die who got well when she prayed, private agonies only she knows about eased, great and small miracles of faith that were signs to her of approaching Grace. After June left for her novitiate, her family took over her mail. Only then did they learn about the hundreds of private charity cases she interested herself in.

Last summer June knew she was ready. She had a cleared application for the Sisters of Charity. Her heart was pure and eager. She had a body that was fit—as it must be to enter St. Mary's. Her health was checked, her medical certificate signed, her list of supplies every postulate must take assembled. She had the blessing of her family. She had the summons, the call, and the Grace she knew she must feel. She wanted to enter the class in August.

But even in her eagerness to serve Christ, June Haver could not be selfish. The Girl Next Door had been delayed by the accident in which she injured her back. She stayed to finish it. Her courage in laughing, singing, making screen love and kicking her pretty legs as she always had—with her sacred secret and desire consuming her—is symbolic of what, all her Hollywood life, has been June Haver's pride—to please the public. Now there is something else—God.

"I love Hollywood. I always have," were among the last words June spoke in that very town. "I have found something I love better, that's all."

How will she fare in that new life? No one who knows her has any worries. "Some girls," says a wise friend of June's who has helped guide her both through her studio and religious life, "find the emotional adjustment too much to take. They have cracked up and gone to pieces. They have been found unfit. That will not happen to June. Actually, she has been making the emotional transition slowly over the past year or more. By now it is made. June can stand the work physically; it is not hard. She is intelligent. She is devout and dedicated. She'll come through."

What will June eventually do as a Sister of Charity? The order staffs hospitals, orphanages and schools. "She would like to teach," Evelyn believes. "June loves children. But she will do whatever work is given her and she will do it with every ounce of ability she owns."

No one who has had the privilege of knowing June Haver doubts that for a minute. "I am praying for her intentions," said Cardinal McIntyre of the Los Angeles Archdiocese. All of Hollywood proudly joins in that prayer, a devout and earnest prayer for June Haver's success in the greatest role of her life.

Act Now! MAIL COUPON TODAY

The Oscar for the best performance by an actress was awarded to Shirley Booth for Come Back, Little Sheba. Two-time Oscar winner Fredric March made the presentation in New York City. Awards were made both in Hollywood and New York.

John Wayne, flanked by two former winners (Janet Gaynor, left, and Olivia de Havilland) accepted one Oscar for John Ford, and another for Gory Cooper.

Mrs. Anthony Quinn (right) proudly accepted the trophy for her husband, who won it for his supporting role in Viva Zapata! Greer Gorson presented it.

FOR a hot first-report from the Stork, it looked as though Elizabeth Taylor Wilding would have another baby, her second within a year!

With their infant son, Mike Howard, not yet two months old, Liz had reason to believe she was to become a mother again.

Her doctor confirmed her suspicions on the first diagnosis.

Everything was in an uproar! Her bosses at MGM were flabbergasted because a deal had just been completed to loan Liz to Paramount to replace Vivien Leigh in Elephant Walk.

Her agent and manager were equally up in the air. The only people calm, cool and collected during all the hubbub were the two most vitally interested, Elizabeth and Mike.

Even though Liz has started work in poor Vivien Leigh's role, isn't it quite possible that she is keeping a big secret which will be announced at the completion of the picture?

OSCAR RAMBLINGS: Hollywood's big night goes down in history as the shotgun wedding of television and motion pictures. Strangely enough, it was the once-despised television that came to the rescue of the Academy, and saved the day. Without the television money, it is doubtful if the Academy could go on.

It was the night that sentiment was rampant. Old favorites stole the limelight. New stars took a back seat while yesterday's favorites, with their gorgeous glamor, gave yesterday's movie fans, and today's, a thrill.

Janet Gaynor, the first star to win an Academy Award, looked very little older than she did when she made Seventh Heaven. The applause was deafening when she walked out in a beautiful pink dress that was especially designed for her by her husband, Adrian, who is no longer a couturier because of his health.

To me, the highlights were the ripple of sympathetic laughter when Shirley Booth tripped on her gown and tore it in her eagerness to clasp her Oscar to her heart. That emotion was good to see.

And Gloria Grahame's beau, Cy Howard, author of "My Friend Irma" and "Life With Luigi," holding his head in his hands when all Gloria could manage to get out was a big "Thank you." "Oh, no!" gasped Cy. "She had the wittiest speech prepared in case she won the supporting Oscar!"

The heart that went into the two awards given Cecil B. de Mille, one the coveted Irving Thalberg special prize, and one for the best picture of the year, The Greatest Show On Earth. At long last, the master showman came into his own.

Jane Wyman's flowing white chiffon gown was the most beautiful. . . .

Ginger Rogers' Dior French gown was so tight she wobbled as she walked. Later she changed her dress for the photographs. I've seen Ginger look so much prettier. . . .

Mitzi Gaynor's slinky black dress topped by a black fox stole, the most sophisticated. . . .

Tony Curtis' haircut should have been as short as Janet Leigh's. . . .

Never were the songs presented more disappointingly, although Billy Daniels, Peggy Lee, Johnny Mercer and Celeste Holm sang them. . . .

John Wayne's wit and charm was a highlight as he accepted winning actor award for Gary Cooper and directorial for John Ford. . . .

Obviously, Olivia de Havilland had just had a fresh permanent. . . .

Last, but far from least, a great big hand to Bob Hope! Without his charm, wit and stage presence as M.C., this year's Oscar event might have sagged into general ennui. . . .

I sincerely believe that if the glamor and excitement of our annual awards is to be brought back to its former brilliance, Hollywood should return to the lovely dinner-dance Oscar nights of years ago.

MRS. DEAN MARTIN says I played Cupid in bringing about the reconciliation between her and Dean after I broke the scoop that Jeanne was expecting a baby (their second) in September.

"I didn't think anyone knew my secret," Jeanne told me when I checked the story. "I didn't want this to influence Dean's decision about coming home."

I told her I had talked to Dean first—and Louella Parsons and Jimmy McHugh were among early arrivals of the gala affair, held at the Pantages Theater. For the first time in Oscar's history, the awards were on TV.

Thrilled over her Oscar for the best supporting female player, Gloria Grahame profusely thanks Edmund Gwenn, who presented it. She was in Bad And The Beautiful.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

Another baby for

Martins . . . Lana Turner's latest feud . . .
Rita Hayworth's newest beau . . . Plushiest premiere of the month:

that he didn't know about the baby until I broke the news. He said, "I want to take Jeanne to Europe with me when Jerry and I go to play the Palladium."

Twenty-four hours later, Dean moved back home—clothes, golf clubs, records and Jeanne's photograph (which he took with him when they parted).

This is the second time I've told a "rifting" husband that his wife was expecting—and the news led to a reconciliation. The first was Gregory Peck, at that time AWOL from Greta until I told him the big news. Like Dean, he went home and I couldn't be happier in the role I played both times.

I wish I could say that the Gregory Pecks had stayed reconciled. But I'm told that when Greg comes back to this country, he and Mrs. Peck will make their separation official. They haven't been getting along for many months, and he intends to ask Greta for a divorce.

BY THE time you read this, the John Waynes' financial settlement should be worked out. Chata (Mrs. Wayne) has been very difficult to pin down, although John has offered her what most people think is very liberal alimony.

Just when everybody was looking in Mexico for Chata, she suddenly appeared on the Hollywood scene and is seen in night clubs and around town with the handsome Steve Cochran.

One night when I saw her at Ciro's, the Hollywood night spot, she was done to the teeth in a white ermine cape and seemed to laugh a lot and to be very gay.

There have been rumors from time to time that John has been fascinated by a Peruvian beauty, but every time I've seen him he's been alone.

I KEEP hearing again and again that Rita Hayworth is being very quiet, staying home and working hard. I believe it's true that she's working hard, but as for staying home, there are two schools of thought on that.

Rita seems fascinated with Manuel Rojan, Argentine polo player. Talk is that he was engaged to a Nevada beauty when he met the gorgeous Rita. The Nevada girl was promptly forgotten. Of course where the Hayworth girl is concerned, the picture could change, but up to now Rita has only been seen with Manuel.

I believe Rita is still in love with Aly Khan, but she couldn't take his Continental way of life and his dating of so many other women.

Will Gene Tierney be able to take it if she becomes the next Princess Aly Khan? Well, Gene has more sophistication and more European training. She's been abroad so much and attended school in Switzerland.

I've forgotten how long they've been married, but I've never known a husband to make such ardent love to his wife (of longer than 24 hours) than John Bromfield does to Corinne Calvet.

The other night, in a crowded nightclub, my chair was backed up practically to their table and I couldn't help overhearing their whisperings. As my ears pinkened, I heard John say:

"Stop. Stop. I can't stand it when you look that way."

From Corinne: "What way, dolling?"—as though she didn't know!

"So beeeautiful," sighed her old man, "so dewy and young and fresh and inviting!"

"Oh, dolling," breathed Corinne, "keep talking, keep talking. Say more."

"Just luscious, just beautiful," John whispered between clenched teeth, crushing a rose into the palm of her hand. "The most beautiful woman in this room. The most beautiful woman in the world, that's you!"

Zounds! And Wowie! No wonder they stay married. (Other husbands please note!)

I WAS the only reporter to visit Vivien Leigh during her short and tragic stay in Hollywood before her complete collapse—possibly the end of her career. (Continued on page 8) 7

Vivien, with whom I have always been friendly, sent word that she would like to see me on the fabulously expensive set of Elephant Walk, the most costly set ever constructed on the Paramount lot.

Although it was the very day before her breakdown, Vivien greeted me warmly and said she thought I had lost a great deal of weight. "What did you do with the rest of you?" she laughed.

She said she loved Ceylon (where she and Dana Andrews and the company had been working previous to Hollywood) and wanted to go back there. She also spoke glowingly of her daughter who has a "nice beau."

"I hope she marries him," Vivien said, "and makes me a grandmother."

The suddenness of her illness was a big shock. The next day she was unable to report to work—Sir Laurence Olivier was enroute from Rome to be with her—and after a week of indecision as to whether or not she could finish the picture, it was decided to take her home to England.

I could hardly control the tears as I wrote the story of her leavetaking: "One of the world's great actresses was borne to the plane on a stretcher, unconscious. . . . The tears streaming down the face of her husband . . . in what may be the ending of a brilliant career in the theater."

ASK ME to name one of the wisest wives in Hollywood and I would have to put the name of Dorothy (Mrs. Robert) Mitchum high on the list.

When Bob became temperamental and difficult several weeks ago—Dorothy invited him to move into an apartment until he could get his nerves under better control around her and the children.

"It's all my fault," a penitent Bob told me, "I don't blame Dorothy for not putting up with me. If I had stayed home, it would have meant more quarrels. Instead, she put me out—and now I can hardly wait to get back to her and the children."

"I love my kids. I grew up without love and affection of a father and I never want that to happen to my children. Do you think Dorothy will take me back?"

I didn't tell him—but I knew she would.

Never for a moment did Dorothy Mitchum consider divorcing Bob. She did not consult a lawyer nor did she sob on the shoulders of her girl friends about her troubles.

She just stayed home, minding her business and her children, dignified, calm, cool and collected during the whole squabble.

If only other wives would be as smart there would be fewer broken marriages. Salute, Dorothy!

THE PLUSHIEST premiere of the year, Call Me Madam, brought out all the dolls in their jools and finery and the boys in their most formal attire because everyone wanted to see how the musical comedy Queen of Broadway, Ethel Merman, fared in her movie. They weren't long finding out. Madam Merman knocked them cold.

Jeanne Crain, wearing the largest brilliant earrings ever seen in this town (covering part of the cheek as well as the entire ear) looked gorgeous. But she and Paul Brinkman became slightly annoyed when they were routed out of their seats twice because of ushers' mistakes. (You never expect these small misadventures to happen to movie stars as they happen to you and me.)

Donald O'Connor came stag—and sad. He's still carrying a torch for Gwen and didn't loosen up and smile until later, at the private party given by 20th at Romanoffs. With just everybody congratulating him on his great performance, Don broke into a little jig of happiness.

At both the preem and the party—Janet Leigh surprised with a modest décolletage.

Dorothy Lamour, like Joan Crawford, believes in always appearing in public looking as a screen queen should and she was regally glamorous with her dark hair piled high and a rhinestone ornament clipped in her braids.

Dottie's gown was cream satin, the panels lined in cerise.

TERRY MOORE and her escort, Nicky Hilton Jr., argued clear up the aisle after the picture about whether they should catch Peggy Lee's opening at the Cocoanut Grove (the same night) or drop by a drive-in for a hamburger. Terry was for the Grove—Nicky, the hamburger.

To me, the prettiest "girl" of the evening was Mrs. Joel McCrea (Frances Dee), lovely, slim, still as beautiful as when she was a leading lady although Frances whispered in my ear, "Louella, our oldest son is 18 now—and as tall as his father."

I HOPE this answers all the fans who have written me to the effect that, "June Haver is too young to have given up her career and fame to enter a convent."

A very close friend of hers, whose identity I promised not to reveal, recently received a letter from June.

She says she has never in her life been so happy as she is since entering the novitiate in Kansas. And, she particularly wants all her friends and fans to know that her decision was not prompted by unhappiness in love, but by a sincere spiritual hunger and the desire to serve and help others.

FOR THE first time in her life, Lana Turner is starting a movie (Flame And The Flesh) on the verge of a feud with her leading man. Usually, Lana and her screen lovers start work with either publicity or fairly authentic rumors hinting at a romance.

But Lana was burned when she read that Carlos Thompson, the South American charmer sponsored by Yvonne De Carlo, had informed the MGM publicity department that he wanted no "romance nonsense" linking his name with Lana's.

"Humphhh," said Lana when she read this, "he needn't worry about that! Who does he think he is????!"

I'm sure that Carlos, who has very good manners, did not intend his remark to offend Lana, who is pretty well wrapped up in a romance with Lex Barker these days.

Being a foreigner, he may not have gone about it in the most tactful way because he is not yet completely at home speaking our language.

What Carlos meant to convey is that he did not in any way want to offend Yvonne De Carlo who, whether they admit they are in love or not, is the No. 1 girl in his life. Yvonne has been very good to him and is entirely responsible for his being in Hollywood.

While she is away in Europe, the tall, not-too-dark but very handsome Carlos does not want Yvonne to get the idea he is playing the field.

He did take Piper Laurie to the Academy Award ceremonies, but that was because Piper's studio felt she should be with some handsome, attractive, good looking young man.

JUST MUSIN': Are Rock Hudson and Rocky (Mrs. Gary) Cooper a romance as they seem to be? Or are they more intrigued with the "cute" way their names go together, Rock and Rocky? . . . Vera-Ellen was wistful and a little sad explaining why she and Dean Miller broke up: "We tried and tried to overcome a difference in religion—but our faiths are too important in both our lives. The sad part is—I think we could have been very happy together if it hadn't been for this one big barrier. We were very much in love." . . . Frank Sinatra has the Columbia gang eating out of his hand he's being so charming making From Here To Eternity. Well, I've always said he can charm the birds off the trees when he wants to, and apparently he wants to. . . . As far back as I can remember in his love life, Evelyn Keyes is the first blonde John Wayne has ever dated. Both his wives, Jo and Chata, are Latin types, tall, brunette and slender. . . . The doctors have told Esther Williams she can continue swimming up to two weeks before her (third) baby is born. In Grandma's day, an expectant mother in a bathing suit would have been scandalous. . . . Never was a girl more beside herself, almost out of her mind, than June Allyson during the black hours when it seemed that Dick Powell might not live after two major operations within a week. And, just a few years ago they were hinting that June and Dick were drifting. . . . Isn't Terry Moore giving quite a good acting performance saying she doesn't care that Nicky Hilton and Nora Haymes are dating?

THE LETTER BOX: Help! I can't begin to count the letters, most of them violently pro Marilyn Monroe after Joan Crawford gave her a blistering piece of her mind in print. 98 out of 100 yipped that they'd never known, "one actress to make such a violent attack on another. Why doesn't Crawford pick on someone her own size? Joan's jealous, etc., etc., etc."

Only a handful took the view that, "Joan's advice to Marilyn is good—if she'll take it and stop crying."

Anyway, this tempest between Joan and Marilyn was the biggest topic in this month's mail.

Now, that's all for now. See you next month.

An intimate report on the private lives of top television personalities

by Paul Denis

ROBERT Q. LEWIS' NEXT PROBLEMS: Bob Lewis tells me his "next problem" is getting married. "Life is a series of problems," is the way he puts it, "and my next problem is whether to marry. I am making good money and have all the material things I ever wanted. I almost got married twice. Once, when I was a student I loved a girl, but everybody told us we were too young, and we drifted apart. The second time was when I wasn't doing too well. I was only making about $200 a week [he's serious!] as a New York disk jockey, and the girl's father wanted me to quit radio and go into a business. The girl thought her father was right. And that broke it up!" I asked Bob what his ideal was. "She should know enough about show business to talk about it," he said, "because I'm always talking shop. And she should be well dressed. Not expensively dressed, but she must know how to put herself together. I like people who look well. She doesn't have to be the prettiest girl, either."

Bob, now 32, is living alone in a beautifully furnished three-room penthouse apartment in a midtown hotel. It's an apartment that has everything—except a wife.

MARIA RIVA WANTS A BIG FAMILY: Marlene Dietrich's daughter, Maria Riva, has two sons, Michael, 4, and Peter, 2, and plans a big family. "Our next sons," she told me, "will be named, Paul, Christopher and Stephen in that order. And if I have a sixth son then Bill [her husband] said I could call him William."

"What would happen if you had a daughter?" I asked. "No, no," she laughed, "we just don't think about that! We just know we'll have a family of sons." She says Bill played a "trick" on her when she came out of the ether after their second son was born. "I saw Bill smiling at me and holding up two fingers. I thought he meant twins, and I shrieked with joy. But he meant a second son."

She says, "I wanted to have a baby every second year, but we skipped this year, so that I can build up my television career first."

She adds, "Mommy baby-sits for us often, and takes the children to the park, too." Her husband is tall, Italian-born, and works at NBC.

ARTHUR GODFREY'S ANGER: There've been hard feelings between Arthur Godfrey and one of his sponsors. Their latest run-in came when Godfrey didn't want Robert Q. Lewis to replace him. This had been a long-standing custom; each time Godfrey left the show, Lewis replaced him. But this time, Godfrey stubbornly refused to accept Robert Q. Lewis. Naturally this didn't sit too well with the sponsors, who insisted they, and not Godfrey, had the sole right to pick Arthur's replacements. Finally, Godfrey called in Lewis for a long, private talk. It's reported that Godfrey was annoyed at Lewis' having become "too Broadwayish" in his comedy style. Anyway, the sponsor won and Lewis did replace Godfrey . . . Arthur blew up again when a New York daily erroneously referred to singer Julius LaRosa as "Godfrey's successor." Co-workers say Arthur can't stand any suggestion that there might be somebody who's as good as he is! . . . And around CBS, Godfrey's temper and ego are so well known that he is referred to (behind his back) as The Great Man.

THEY'RE AFEUDIN': NBC executives are hopping mad at Frank Sinatra for walking out of the Martha Raye show, after he had okayed the script and signed the contract. Frank flew to London to see Ava, and left NBC with the problem of writing and putting on a new show on six days' notice! Around NBC now, the name Sinatra is poison . . . And, two weeks after this hectic show, Martha Raye collapsed from exhaustion and had to be hospitalized in Miami Beach . . . Myron Cohen and Milton Berle had a hot argument one night. South American Pilar Pallete, 23, is the daughter of a Peruvian senator. First an airline hostess, then an actress, she met Wayne on location.

Has John Wayne gone again?

 Senoritas. That's a habit hard to break. Hollywood suspects The Duke is in for another dark-eyed duchess.

BY ARTHUR L. CHARLES

■ Marion Mitchell Morrison, who acts in motion pictures under the singularly simple name of John Wayne, is a rugged, gusty-lusty, two-fisted man of action who likes an occasional drink, an occasional practical joke, and a beautiful Latin-American female around the house all the time.

One of the major faults in Wayne's second marriage, this one to Esperanza Bauer, the Mexican actress known as Chata, was that his woman was unpredictable, not only in temperament but in geography, too.

One out of every four Wayne pictures is filmed away from Hollywood on location. When Duke returned from these jaunts, he never knew whether his Chata—the name means pugnose—would be at home in the San Fernando Valley or down in Mexico with her mother.

Things finally got so bad between these two that a divorce was the only solution.

A. He is a personable young man, currently employed as an actor, who was trying various pursuits when Ginger met him in Paris.

Q. I've been told that MGM has never offered to share the profits of a film with any movie star. Is that true?

—E.R., TERRE HAUTE, IND.

A. From Miss Stanwyck's viewpoint, friendship.

Q. Which Hollywood actress owns and wears the most jewelry?

—B. I., MCKEESPORT, PA.

Q. Which actors take permanent waves to keep their hair curly? I'm sure Gregory Peck is one. He sure had the waves in David And Bathsheba.

—P. D., HOLLAND, MICH.

He doesn't want money; he doesn't want laughs. Lanza just wants to sing—his way! And nothing in the way of debts, lawsuits or bad publicity'll stop him.

Who cares about suspensions when a man's first son is born? Damon Anthony arrived Dec. 12.

BY JIM NEWTON

He knows what he wants

■ Rex Cole, one of the few really conscientious business managers in Hollywood, shuffled into Mario Lanza's home in Bel-Air a few nights ago, his face crossed with lines of worry and care.

Ever since Mario broke irrevocably from Sam Weiler, his first personal manager who took from 10% to 20% of the tenor's tremendous earnings in addition to working as the producer on Lanza's radio show, Rex Cole has been trying to bring some order out of Lanza's financial chaos.

On this particular night he had come to discuss Mario's astronomical telephone bills. However, Mario was rehearsing—he practises anywhere from four to ten hours a day—and Rex Cole knew better than to interrupt.

Rex looked around, and he spied Mario's wife, Betty. She caught the worry in his eyes, rose, and tip-toed from the room.

"I'm sorry to disturb you, Betty," Rex began, "but these telephone bills puzzle me, especially the long distance tolls. They run into thousands of dollars."

Betty smiled, and her flashing brown eyes turned soft. "I know," she said. And then with a friendly shoulder pat, "It's all right, Rex. It's for the sick."

Rex Cole shook his head in puzzlement. "I'm sorry, Betty. I don't get it."

"It's very simple," Betty Lanza explained. "Mario sings over the telephone to sick people. If a man writes him, say from Omaha, and tells him that he's going into the hospital for an operation, and he'd love to hear his voice again, Mario can't help himself. He serenades the guy via long distance.

"Not only that. You've seen some of the doctors' bills? Lots of times Mario insists upon flying a specialist to the patient's bedside. Only a few days ago he had a cardiac specialist, a friend of his in (Continued on next page)

Take Nancy. The outdoor type. Always ready for any sport, from cycling to tennis, no matter what time of the month it is. Even goes in swimming on "those days."

How does she do it? With Tampax, the internal kind of monthly sanitary protection. Tampax does away with chafing and irritation; is so comfortable the wearer doesn't even feel it, once it's in place.

Then there's Helene. Overwhelmingly feminine. Sachet for her bureau drawers and satin cases for her lingerie. Helene likes Tampax because it's so dainty. The highly absorbent cotton is easily disposed of, even while visiting. One's hands need never touch the Tampax, thanks to the throw-away applicator.

Ann's a career girl. Efficient and practical. Naturally you'd expect her to use doctor-invented Tampax. Just the assurance that there can be no revealing outlines, that there isn't any possibility of offending odor, lets her feel poised and sure of herself under any circumstances. And Tampax is so convenient to carry. A month's supply fits in the purse.

Get Tampax yourself. Drug and notion counters everywhere carry all 3 absorbencies: Regular, Super, Junior. Tampax Incorporated, Palmer, Mass.

Rex Cole has been a business manager in Hollywood for 27 years—he's handled practically every big name you can think of; he's accustomed to the unique and the unusual—but this time he was really flabbergasted.

"I know about that Raphaela Fasana girl from New Jersey," he said, "but do you mean to tell me that Mario does this sort of thing regularly?"

Betty nodded. "The more you're around him," she said proudly, "the more you'll see that his heart is as big as his voice."

"All I can say," Cole muttered, "is that the public really doesn't know Mario Lanza."

What Cole meant was that a tremendous hiatus exists between the Lanza that really is and the Lanza people read about.

HERE is a man who was not only unemployed, but deprived from making a living from August 1952 to April 1953. He was not only suspended by his studio but prevented from appearing on the Coca-Cola radio show thus causing the cancellation of the program. In addition he was sued for more than $5,000,000 and simultaneously informed by the crack accounting firm of Haskins & Sells that despite having paid the Government $485,000 in taxes, he was still behind in his payments. Moreover, he was informed that his financial records, whose upkeep he had entrusted to others, were so incredibly confused that it would take months of detailed auditing to determine just how deeply in the red he really was.

With this sort of financial ruin hanging over his head, with the realization that he had sung his heart out for ten years and money-wise had nothing to show for it, Lanza still insisted upon answering each and every fan letter, still insisted upon using the long distance phone to encourage those who were ill or hurt, and to sing for anyone he might help with his voice.

No matter what the cost, he refused to break faith with a public that had given him its confidence.

Lanza, who is much more profound and philosophical than most people think—he is an omnivorous reader of catholic taste—once tried to explain how he felt about his talent and the public.

"The voice I have," he pointed out, "it's difficult for me to express myself about it exactly. I feel it belongs to the public, that it was given to me to entertain people, to make life a little brighter for them.

"That's why I never abuse it. People who tell you I do—they just don't know. When I was a kid in New York I quit the Celanese Hour because I knew the voice needed further training.

"I don't want to sound pretentious, but the voice is kind of like a sacred trust to me. If I don't use it wisely then I feel I'm cheating the public, and that's one thing I'll never do. They can sue me for fifty million dollars, a hundred million. I'll declare bankruptcy before I compromise the voice."

This is the man who six months ago was pilloried and described as "an ungrateful ham, a real madman." The barrage of insult has thinned down, but as a result of it, many people are still convinced that Lanza is an unstable character of little-boy moods, a sybarite who indulges himself in Farouk-like pleasures, or a bellowing bull who sweeps everything before him.

Actually he is a kind, hyper-sensitive, super-generous artist with a great love of people and an abiding sense of humility.

He may stalk his living room, shouting at one of the help, "I'm a tiger, Johnny. Don't mess around with the tiger!" But these exclamations are manifestations of his sense of humor.

Johnny Mobley, the cook who works for the Lanzas, says, "You can judge a man by the way he treats his help. I can tell you Mr. Lanza treats us all fine. Everytime I bake some cookies, he says, 'The best, Johnny. The best.' I never serve him but what he's extremely grateful. And he treats everyone the same, makes no difference, white or colored, big star or newspaper boy. He loves people, and he loves to sing for 'em. I'm tellin' you. He's as nice a man as I've ever worked for. Fact of the matter is he's so nice you think maybe he comes from my home state of Arkansas."

Pages could be filled with similar glowing quotations; but they would all point up the same two facts: Mario Lanza is kind, and Mario Lanza is so trusting that he's frequently taken to the cleaners by the very ones he's been kindest to.

Here's an example. A few years ago, Mario was approached by a man who'd just been fired from MGM. The fellow was on in years, he'd seen a lot, and Mario without any fuss, put him on the payroll as a general assistant. A few months later, this same individual turned up at the studio and offered his services as a spy in the Lanza household.

Mario was told about this but he refused to believe it. Month after month he carried the guy on the payroll. Finally when it was no longer financially possible, he let the man go. You should have heard the vituperation, the slander, the insults.

This case can be multiplied half a dozen times, and the wonder of it all is that Lanza still retains his basic faith in the essential goodness of people.

However he has learned one lesson. Now before he hires new personnel, he is doing a bit of preliminary investigating. He's kissed off his former press agent, his old business manager, his old lawyer and surrounded himself with men of proven competence.

IT is no secret that Lanza refused to continue with The Student Prince last August because he could not see eye to eye with the studio on the way the production was being handled.

Mario felt that his fans as well as himself were entitled to the best not only in music but in musically experienced directorial personnel.

He just did not want to go through all the agony he had experienced in Because You're Mine, a picture he did not want to make.

People told him that he was being difficult, that he should "stop making it a Federal case," that he should "walk through" The Student Prince and not take it too seriously.

"What do you care about the director or even the assistant director?" he was asked. "Why eat your heart out about the script? The songs are great and that's all that counts."

Not in Lanza's book. He felt somehow that in Because You're Mine he had let his fans down, especially since Because was the film which followed The Great Caruso; and he was determined to make The Student Prince as great as it could be. Lanza knows more about his type of music, his type of singing, more about opera than probably any other man at MGM. When his suggestions were dismissed, when his requests were dismissed, when he felt he had been treated like a wayward little boy who chronically had to be chastized, he declined to continue with the picture.

That is the story, pure and simple.

He didn't go crazy. He didn't suffer a nervous breakdown. He didn't leave his wife. He didn't go to a sanitarium. He didn't do any of the ridiculous things ascribed to him.

He thought over his course of action, and on the day his first son and third child was born, December 12th, 1952, he decided that he was right. There would be no compromise. The picture would be done extremely well, or he wouldn't do it at all.

While the columnists reported that he was racing "all over Hollywood like a chicken with his head cut off," Mario spent the first three months of this year down at Palm Springs.

"It was wonderful for Damon," he recalls—that's what the Lanzas christened their son. "We had him sleeping outdoors every day, and I honestly feel the fresh air and the warm desert sun really built him up. You know, he's not one year old but still we have to dress him in one-year-old clothes. He's really a bruiser. That boy of mine when he grows up—well, you'll see. He's going to be a big one. A man of integrity too."

WHILE they were down at the Springs, Betty and Mario tried eating out one night. Lanza was mobbed by hundreds of fans, many of whom kept clamoring, "What happened, Mario? Why are you and the studio fighting?"

After that, Mario remained on the Francis Ryan estate which he had rented for $1,500 a month. At midnight when the village was asleep he and Betty would ride around town.

For a while Betty used to say, "You know, Mario, maybe you should make a statement. Maybe you should explain your side. They're saying so many awful things about you." But Mario would shake his head and say, "No, Betty. Recrimination is a boomerang. Name-calling is childish. Let them call me anything they want to. I'm going to remain quiet. Eventually we'll get everything worked out. Then there'll be no hard feelings."

Lanza who is supposed to have no public relations sense but has more than any other singer with the possible exception of Bing Crosby, proved that he was right.

Early in March he drove up to MGM and had a small conference with Eddie Mannix, the genial general manager. Mannix was surprised. "I've never seen you look so well," he spouted joyfully. "You look like a 16-year-old kid."

Mario said nothing about the fact that for weeks he'd been in crack physical and vocal shape, nothing about the fact that he had brought his own musical conductor, Constantine Colonicos, down to the desert, that together they had rehearsed 175 arias in 12 weeks. He said nothing about the fact that he had memorized The Student Prince script word by word and knew it letter perfect.

Mannix was so pleased at seeing Mario in such wonderful shape that he called to his secretary. "Get everyone in here," he said. "I want them to see Lanza."

Dore Schary came into the office and all the rest of the big boys. Everyone shook hands and it was agreed to let bygones be bygones. The Student Prince would start with a clean slate. There would be one or two more conferences between the legal beagles, and Mario would go back on salary as of April 1st.

Everyone agreed that under the circumstances The Student Prince would have to be made with infinite care, and that whatever errors were committed in the past would not be re-made.

If, at this reading, Lanza is not working on The Student Prince, and there is a very good chance that he might not, the reason will be that Mario wants any musically experienced director, while the studio insists on one director and one director alone whose great forte is not music. Mario's representatives have advised him against accepting a certain director, and Mario will follow their advice even if it results in a long legal hassle and subsequent bankruptcy. His actions are always motivated by "what is best for the voice, and what is best for the public."

When Lanza returned to Palm Springs a day after that reconciliation conference, he was riding on cloud 69.

"Where's Damon?" he shouted, as soon as he rushed into the house. "Where's my son? He's got to hear the good news, too." Miss Brown, the nurse, brought little dark-haired Damon into the family conclave. Mario explained to his wife and three children—he was very guarded about this—that his chances of singing for the public again were very good. If the studio would just give an inch, he would give a mile. All he wanted to do was sing.

THAT's all Mario Lanza has ever wanted to do. He loves to entertain, and he was born to sing, and if he can't use his voice for the public, a terrible frustration seizes him and he plunges into despair.

There are many actors and actresses in Hollywood who genuinely hate to act—no names, please—and they perform for only one reason, money. They take the money and buy television stations, motion picture theaters, oil wells, and magnesium mines. Their hearts are not in their work; they're in the loot their talent brings.

With Lanza it's different. He's not interested in money. If he had been, the state of his finances would not be in their current, sorry condition. His primary interest is in singing, in bringing good music to the world, in popularizing the classical and semi-classical. And fortunately for him, he has a wife who agrees with his viewpoint. She wants security for her children—what mother doesn't?—but under no circumstances will she permit Mario to jeopardize his voice or his career for "an easy buck."

Friends tell the Lanzas they're crazy. "Look at Ezio Pinza," one agent told Mario. "He's getting 10, 15 grand a week. Maybe you won't believe this, but I can get you $30,000 a week to sing at Las Vegas."

"I know," Mario said. "They've already called and made an offer, an even higher offer. I told them no. I just don't think the public would like it, not the people in Vegas, but music-lovers everywhere."

The booking agent was incredulous. "You got rocks in your head," he said flatly. "Nothin' but rocks."

MARIO Lanza is one man who knows what he wants; and it just doesn't happen to be money.

He wants the public's friendship and respect and following; and he knows he has earned that only through the proper use of his voice.

To mis-use that voice for the grasping of "the easy buck" either in gambling casino's or Grade B pot-boilers—well, as he says, "I'd sooner go bankrupt."

That's the attitude that makes Mario Lanza more than a rare talent—it makes him a rare human being.

Decked in diamonds, rather than dignity, Ethel Merman discusses affairs of stote . . . and the heart, with her guy.

CALL ME MADAM

■ If you missed seeing Call Me Madam on Broadway this Technicolor version will more than make up for it. Ethel Merman's personality bounces off the screen with all the vivacity that made her famous. Donald O'Connor and Vera-Ellen are ideal dancing partners and George Sanders sings in a mellow lyric bass. Add to this the comic touch of Walter Slezack and you have everything you could want in a musical comedy. Ethel Merman plays the Washington party-giver who becomes ambassador to the mythical kingdom of Lichtenburg. No ambassador was ever so decked out in diamonds and so loaded with wise-cracks. Lichtenburg's ministers of finance expect her to be an easy mark. They're fishing for a huge American loan to facilitate the marriage of their princess (Vera-Ellen) to Prince Hugo of Mittedorf (Helmut Dantine). But Madam's no is pretty firm until she meets General Cosmo (George Sanders). By this time Miss Merman's press attaché (Donald O'Connor) has met the princess and would like to marry her himself. In the midst of all the diplomacy Madam Ambassador chats cosily with Harry Truman via long-distance, undergoes an hilarious presentation at court, attends the annual Lichtenburg fair and falls in love with Sanders. The color is riotous, the settings and costumes are magnificently lavish, the words are often witty and the songs you keep hearing were written by Irving Berlin. 20th Century-Fox. So much depends on whether your charm keeps on working. Freddy's didn't. Freddy was going great at half-past-eight, but by ten his girl was giving him the definite brush-off. And who could blame her? No girl wants to put up with a case of halitosis (bad breath).

LISTERINE STOPS BAD BREATH 4 times better than chlorophyll

WHY TAKE CHANCES with lesser methods when Listerine Antiseptic instantly stops bad breath, and keeps it stopped usually for hours on end?

No chlorophyll kills odor bacteria like this... instantly

You see, Listerine Antiseptic kills millions of germs, including germs that cause the most common type of bad breath... the kind that begins when germs start the fermentation of proteins which are always present in the mouth. And, research shows that your breath stays sweeter longer depending upon the degree to which you reduce germs in the mouth. Brushing your teeth doesn't give you Listerine's antiseptic protection. Chlorophyll or chewing gums don't kill germs. Listerine does.

Clinically proved four times better than tooth paste

That is why independent research reported Listerine Antiseptic averaged at least four times more effective in reducing breath odors than three leading chlorophyll products and two leading tooth pastes.

So, no matter what else you do, use Listerine Antiseptic when you want to be extra-careful that your breath does not offend. Rinse the mouth with it night and morning, and before any date where you want to be at your best. Lambert Pharmacal Company Division of The Lambert Company, St. Louis 6, Missouri.

THE GIRL WHO HAD EVERYTHING

The title of this movie naturally refers to Liz Taylor who plays a proud young beauty, willful as the thoroughbreds they raise in Lexington, Kentucky, her home. Elizabeth's mother has long since died. Her father, successful lawyer William Powell, holds his liquor rather sloppily, and her boyfriend, Gig Young, is too well bred to be exciting. That's the set-up when Powell becomes counsel for rackets boss Fernando Lamas, who's ordered before a congressional committee. Lamas buys a mansion in Lexington to which he proceeds to lure Liz. Powell is shocked but he's a modern father and doesn't swing into action until it's too late. Liz decides to marry Lamas and help him evolve into a social butterfly. Marry my daughter, Powell finally says, and I'll tell the government about one or two corpses you've left lying around. Lamas retaliates with three or four rights to the jaw, then he turns to Liz and says, "You wanted a barbarian. Well, you got one, baby." True enough. This movie has an ending which you will have to see to learn.

SPLIT SECOND

Here's a suspense film that really grips you. It's tense, it's intelligent and it manages to make generally stereotyped figures seem interesting. The scene is the Nevada desert where the Army plans to explode an atom bomb. The area, containing a ghost town, is cleared days before the blast, and everything's ready to rip. A couple of escaped killers (Stephen McNally and wounded Paul Kelly) unwittingly head for the danger area. En route they hi-jack Alexis Smith (she's on her way to Reno), her boyfriend Robert Paige, a newspaper reporter Keith Andes (he's looking for the killers) and Jan Sterling, a stranded nightclub singer he picked up at a diner. Once in the ghost town the suspense mounts. The bomb's scheduled to go off at six in the morning and it's getting late. While they wait they reveal themselves and one of the party manages to be murdered by McNally. In the morning the bomb goes off even earlier than originally planned. Some of the people escape, some don't. The ones that survive are treated to a pretty grim view of that mushroom cloud.

JULIUS CAESAR

William Shakespeare's Julius Caesar is brought to impressive life in this beautifully staged, well acted production. When Caesar (Louis Calhern) returns triumphant to Rome the people want to make him emperor. Jealous Cassius (John Gielgud) spreads the fear to Caesar's loyal followers that too much power will corrupt him. The noble Brutus (James Mason) is swayed by Cassius and consents to Caesar's murder. (The murder scene is brutal but superbly dramatic.) In his stirring funeral oration Mark Antony (Marlon Brando) incites the populace against Brutus and all the other "honorable men" who did away with Caesar. More than a year later the small armies of Brutus and Cassius are defeated by Antony. James Mason is outstanding as a tragic hero motivated always by his conception of justice and truth. John Gielgud handles a less sympathetic role dynamically. And

MAN ON A TIGHTROPE

Man On A Tightrope is a strange, powerful tale about people struggling to free themselves from the decay around them. These people belong to the Circus Cernik which was owned by Karel Cernik (Fredric March) until the Czechoslovakian government took it over. March is planning an incredible feat. He is going to lead the entire circus caravan across the well-guarded border into the American zone. He has to work fast since he knows there is a spy in the troupe. Aside from this, March has other problems. His second wife (Gloria Grahame) has become slovenly, indifferent, and flirts continuously with the lion tamer. His daughter (Terry Moore) has fallen in love with a handyman (Cameron Mitchell) whose origins and political leanings are unknown. Filmed in Western Germany, directed by Elia Kazan, the movie is always gray, always eerie, as if it were all a nightmare. As, indeed, it is.

DESERT LEGION

Why doesn't Alan Ladd make more pictures like This Gun For Hire and less pictures like Desert Legion? In this one Captain Ladd is leading a patrol on the Algerian desert; he's ambushed by the notorious raider Omar Ben Khalif, otherwise known as Richard Conte. Ladd's patrol is wiped out and he wakes up in a fancy tent inhabited by gorgeous Arlene Dahl. Naturally he thinks he's dreaming. He hastens back to camp but the face of Arlene haunts him and with Private Plevko (Akim Tamiroff) he make his way back across the desert. Hidden in that arid waste he finds a kind of Shangri-La called Medara, city of peace. Only it's not so peaceful. Richard Conte, known here as Crito, wants Arlene Dahl and Medara all to himself. Well, I'm happy to report he doesn't get either, although he manages to create a large bit of havoc. What puzzles me is how so many bloodthirsty cut-throats ever settled in that city of peace in the first place.

TROUBLE ALONG THE WAY

Charles Coburn, rector of St. Anthony's College in New York City, is informed by the higher-ups that unless he can raise $170,000 in six months, the college will be closed. It comes to Coburn that what he needs is a football team. He hires John Wayne, an ex-coach who has been kicked out of all the big college leagues. Wayne's flighty wife, Marie Windsor, left him with a daughter to raise (that's Sherry Jackson and a more precocious 11-year-old you'll look far to find). Now, said wife is trying to get Sherry away from Wayne and so she sets a Domestic Relations Court officer on his trail. The officer turns out to be Donna Reed. It's a complicated story, all right, but aimed directly at the heart.

After a while things got so intricate that Giesler resigned from the case, and Chata hired another lawyer to obtain what she considers an equitable financial settlement.

The legal haggling in this divorce mess—and potentially it's a nasty case with a good deal of soiled linen that had best remain unaired—will go on for many, many months, at least until October 19th, at which time a trial is scheduled in the California Superior Court.

When a man has been married twice, he becomes a creature of habit, especially where feminine companionship is concerned, so when Chata flew the coop and winged from Hollywood to Mexico, everyone around town knew that sooner or later, Duke would find a new heart throb.

Some of his friends said the supposition was ridiculous. "Look," one of them told me last August, "Duke has had enough of dames and marriage for a while. His heart is broken. He really loved that Chata. Now, he's gone out of the country for a while. He's down in Peru, just taking it easy, scouting around for locations."

In a way that was true, but while Duke was scouting for locations, he traveled into the Peruvian jungle to watch the first full-length motion picture ever shot in that South American country.

THE film was being produced by Edward Movius; it was entitled Sabotage In The Jungle, and it starred a buxom, gorgeous, fiery, insinuatingly beautiful Limaña (a native of Lima, Peru) named Pilar Pallete.

Pilar is 23 years old. She has the kind of figure men look at twice. They don't believe it the first time. She is the third of four sisters. Her father, who died three years ago, used to be a Senator in the Peruvian legislature. She is well-bred, well-educated, and well-traveled.

As a girl she was sent to a very swanky school, the Villa Maria, but her father, a worldly man, wanted her brought up so that she would know how to look after herself in a world of domineering men. He enrolled her in the Lima High School, and it was here that she learned how to speak English, a virtue which helped her when she met Duke and his friends, although Wayne does manage a pretty good sort of pidgin Spanish.

The first time I saw her she was a hostess for Panagra, the Pan American Airline subsidiary in South America, and she was even then a real beauty, on her way to full development, captivating most of the male passengers.

When Duke Wayne first saw Pilar in the jungle last August and got himself introduced to her, a sort of electric current of mutual attraction sprang up between them.

For some inexplicable reason, probably because opposites always attract, Duke has consistently chosen Latin-American beauties for his attentions. They arouse him.

His first wife, Josephine Saenz, is of Dominican ancestry. His second wife is Mexican. And now Pilar Pallete, the utterly delightful and charming actress, comes from Peru.

Duke Wayne is a pretty sharp hombre, and in his soft, unobtrusive way, he began making inquiries. Had Pilar done much acting? Was she really a professional?

They told Duke that two years before she'd done some work for Sol Lesser in a film called The Lost Emeralds Of Illatica. She'd also studied and worked a good deal in the Lima Theater Workshop.

Duke then asked the all-important question. "Is she married?"

The answer came as no surprise. In Lima all beautiful young women are married.

"Yes," the informant said. "She's married to Dick Wedy, the fellow in charge of publicity for Panagra." Then the reprieve. "Only they're not doing so hot. Broken up like you and Mrs. Wayne, or about to."

Duke Wayne is an introspective man who rarely discusses his emotions. He feels things deeply, but the more profound they are, the less he talks about them.

Ask him, for example, how he feels about Pilar, and you get something like, "She's an extremely talented actress." Nothing more.

Ask him how he felt when he learned that his black-haired, heart-faced new discovery was on the verge of a break with her husband, and he'll shake his head and walk away from you. It's none of his business and none of yours.

He never trifles or talks lightly about women who mean something to him.

IN the case of Pilar Pallete, he said nothing when he returned to Hollywood. But Pilar knew that if ever she came north she had a friend who would use all his influence to help her. And Duke Wayne has plenty of influence in Hollywood. So much in fact that when he checked in at Warner Brothers after his Peruvian junket and they asked him to play the lead in The Iron Mistress, he read the script and promptly said no, and Warners said okay but will you please do something else, anything else.

Duke read the script of Trouble Along The Way, a story based roughly on Slip Madigan, the football coach at St. Mary's College in California, and agreed to do the picture.

Later, he wasn't too happy about his decision. But no one knew at the time whether it was because he was disappointed in the film, he had a subconscious, unrequited yen for Pilar, or he was irritated because detectives were on his trail trying to unearth a little embarrassing data that might be exposed in a divorce court. Duke was also upset because he had received a good offer to rent his ranch house, only Chata wouldn't hear of it. Added to that was the fact that while he was worth a fortune, it wasn't too easy for him to liquidate his assets into cash.

Anyway, Duke Wayne was not the easiest man in the world to get along with during the filming of Trouble Along The Way.

Once Trouble was finished, however, Duke took off for Mexico where his own production company, Wayne-Fellows, Inc., was shooting Plunder In The Sun.

Now it so happens that when Duke pulled out of Hollywood, Pilar Pallete pulled in, ostensibly to do a Spanish soundtrack for Sabotage In The Jungle. Since she is still legally married to an American, Pilar has no visa difficulties when it comes to entering the country.

When Duke learned that the exotic, well-built Pilar was in movieland, he thought of a story named Pagoda which his company owns, and the more he thought of that yarn, the more he felt certain that Pilar should play the lead in the production opposite him.

It was just a question of a few days before Pilar and Duke were in front of the cameras in Mexico. This was Pilar's screen test, and needless to say, Duke went all-out in helping her. Johnny Farrow, a director, was supposedly giving the test, but Wayne knows a good deal more about picture-making than most directors, and he took over.

He posed Pilar in the best angles, saw to it that she got the best shots, made her feel very much at ease, and the result, of course, was a foregone conclusion.

Wayne-Fellows, Inc., signed Pilar Pallete to a seven-year contract, permitting her the privilege of making one outside picture per year for Movius Productions, the Peruvian Company that had given her her first screen opportunity. All of Pilar's other films, however, will be released through Warner Brothers.

Just how successful Pilar will be, how quickly the public will take to her, no man can predict at this point. It is safe to say, however, that if she co-stars with Duke in his films, her popularity will be assured, because Wayne's name on a marquee means top box-office.

The screen test completed in Mexico, Pilar eventually came back to the movie colony, moved into the house of a friend in North Hollywood, and now definitely estranged from her husband, began seeing a good deal of Duke who had taken a house on Valley Vista Road, not too far away.

They went driving together, toured the glitter spots, showed up at formal film functions such as the annual dinner of the Screen Writers Guild, and it was just a matter of days before Hollywood began to realize that Duke Wayne was happy again, genuinely happy.

At the Screen Writers Guild dinner, for example, he roared at Georgie Jessel's jokes, cracked his own, greeted everyone with a big hand, proudly introduced Pilar to all the big shots, and carried on like the Duke Wayne of yesterday. Smiling, exuberant, good-natured.

"Of course," one of his friends cracked, "he didn't know that Chata had flown in from Mexico that very night. But even so, I don't think that would've made any difference. There's absolutely no chance of a reconciliation. Duke wants a divorce as soon as he can get one. Then, I think he'll marry this Peruvian doll. That is, if she has her own divorce by then.

"Don't ask me why he goes for these Latin-American babes, either. He's Anglo-Saxon down to his very toes; you'd think he'd fall for some doll from Iowa. He just doesn't. Soon as a girl has blonde hair, his interest fades.

"He has a big yen for these black-eyed senioritas. With two of them he's struck out, at least marriage-wise. With Pilar, maybe he'll ring the bell. Anyway, he seems happier than he's been in a long, long time."

In Hollywood that's what counts. END

LANA'S OFF ON A MARRY-GO-ROUND AGAIN—BUT HOLLYWOOD'S BETTING SHE'LL ONLY WIND UP DIZZY!

Loving Lex Barker is fun for Lana, but will her usual bad luck louse up this romance, too?

■ As of this writing, to the ever-growing list of lovers who have succumbed to the irresistible charms of Lana Turner you may now add the name of Alexander Crichtlow Barker of Rye, New York.

Known to his friends as "Lex" and recognized by the movie-going public as "Tarzan," the handsome, six-foot-four giant is currently the number-one man in Lana's constantly changing love life.

Ever since the beauty with the convertible top—Lana has dyed her naturally brunette hair 16 different shades in the past 15 years—gave Fernando Lamas his walking papers, she and Lex have been virtually inseparable, in Los Angeles, in Palm Springs, in New York, and now in Europe.

Lana has claimed that "I'm unhappy unless I have someone to love." And in her case the necessary adjunct of love has always been propinquity, so that during the past six months she and Lex have spent practically all of their spare time together, and a good deal of their working time, too.

During the making of Latin Lovers, for example, in which Lana plays the richest girl in the world and Ricardo Montalban acts a wealthy young Brazilian horsebreeder, Lex was an almost daily visitor on the set.

Not only that, but he also brought his two children along, Lynne, nine, and Alex, five. Lana would bring her young Cheryl to the studio, and a folksy little group consisting of Lex and the three kids would stand on the sidelines and watch with childish awe while director Mervyn LeRoy sent Lana and Montalban through their paces.

I was on the set one day and LeRoy was particularly anxious to have things go well. He had dined (Continued on page 105)

ANNA—title song by Silvana Mangano* (MGM); Paul Weston* (Columbia); Richard Hayman (Mercury); Three Suns (Victor); Ray Bloch (Coral). I Loved You by Silvana Mangano* (MGM).

BLUE GARDENIA—title song by Nat Cole (Capitol).

HOUDINI—The Golden Years by Tony Martin* (Victor); Paul Weston (Columbia); Russ Morgan (Decca).

POPULAR AND JAZZ

ARTHUR GODFREY—*TV Calendar Show (Columbia).

If you happened to catch the Godfrey & Friends show on CBS-TV last Jan. 28 and were impressed by the ingenious month-by-month story unfolded musically that night, this 12-inch LP record is a must for you, for here's the entire program transferred to records.

Joan Edwards, formerly a big-time singer herself, and Lyn Duddy, reformed press agent, teamed to write the music and lyrics for these twelve tunes, one for each month, and they're well tailored to the requirements of the entire Godfrey family. Julius La Rosa, you'll be glad to note, is represented with Everything That's Yours Is Mine, done as a duet with Janette Davis, and Summer's Symphony, which he does solo. The Mariners, Marion Marlowe and Frank Parker, Haleloke, the Chordettes, Lu Ann Simms and the Archie Bleyer gang are all there too. This is the first really comprehensive representation of Godfrey and Co. on records.

DUKE ELLINGTON—*Ellington Uptown (Columbia).

Most exciting item in this 12-inch LP is Duke's Harlem suite, A Tone Parallel To Harlem. Louis Bellison is also featured in a drum specialty, Skin Deep.

DIZZY GILLESPIE, JIMMY McPARTLAND—*Hot vs. Cool (MGM).

A novel album recorded at Birdland, New York's leading jazz club. The two bands, which we helped to assemble, both play the same four tunes, in contrasting Dixieland and bop styles. Buddy De Franco's terrific clarinet work on Indiana is the best of the "cool" numbers; Vic Dickenson's trombone on Battle Of Blues is "hot" highlight. Also heard: the first Dixie disc of How High The Moon and the first bop version of Muskrat Ramble.

HOLLYWOOD AND YOUTH

■ A month before she gave birth to her chubby baby son, Elizabeth Taylor, the most beautiful young actress in Hollywood, ambled into the office of the Los Angeles County Clerk.

"I believe," Liz said politely, "that you've got something for me."

Harold J. Ostly, the tall, pleasant, bespectacled County Clerk, grinned. He opened the top drawer to his desk, took out $47,100 in Government bonds, and handed them to Liz.

"You could've picked these up two years ago," he said.

Mike Wilding, dressed in open collar shirt and wearing the navy blue yachting cap he uses to cover his receding hairline, shook his good-looking head in puzzled disbelief.

Liz turned and blew him a little feather of a smile as if to say, "I am a naughty girl, aren't I?" Then she spoke to the County Clerk. "I've just been too busy," Liz explained, "to come down and get this stuff."

"This stuff" represented 15% of Elizabeth Rosamond Taylor Hilton Wilding's film earnings which a California Superior Court judge had ordered invested in bonds during her minority.

Under California law, Liz was entitled to manage her own financial affairs at the age of 18 if she were then married. She could have obtained her securities in May, 1950, after her marriage to Nicky Hilton, the semi-spoiled young son of a wealthy, capering hotel magnate—but no, she'd been too busy.

After Liz posed for pictures holding up her $47,100 in bonds, a $75-per-week photographer sidled up to a reporter. "This," the lensman said somewhat bitterly, "is what Hollywood's sense of values does to a beautiful babe. Too busy to pick up 47 grand. How do you like that?"

While Liz was giving out with her worldly, sophisticated, money-isn't everything attitude, another young married, a girl born in Portland, Oregon, who had changed her name from Suzanne Burce to Jane Powell, (Continued on page 88)

The Success Story of 1953! One song began it, one movie clinched it—and young Miss Clooney, Gulping down coke between bites of a hot dog, a willowy blonde waited in the wings of a theater for her cue to go on stage. The show people around her were horrified. For years—for centuries—singers have been taught never to sing on a full stomach.

"Rosie," they pleaded. "Don't!"

"It's all right," she said, and the words worked their muffled way through a piece of roll.

"But suppose you burp in the middle of your song!"

Rosemary Clooney shrugged. "S'all right," she said. "I'll just re-phrase it."

This is an anecdote that any movie star would prefer to put in their bottom drawer, and a procedure that most singers would shun like the plague. Rosemary Clooney, however, is not one to wrap hot towels about her precious throat and insist on a handy cup of hot tea, nor is she likely to hedge when asked a question, whether it be about her age (25), her appetite (prodigious). She treats life and people the same way she sings—tenderly, honestly, without affectation, yet with plenty of what is known politely as intestinal fortitude and impolitely as guts.

The all-around result is that wherever Clooney goes she is immediately referred to as 'our Rosie'. There is a warmth to her personality that seeps out and enfolds everyone she meets, and willing victims include an assortment of elderly ladies, schnauser dogs, small boys, millions of big boys, what's even more remarkable, women of all ages.

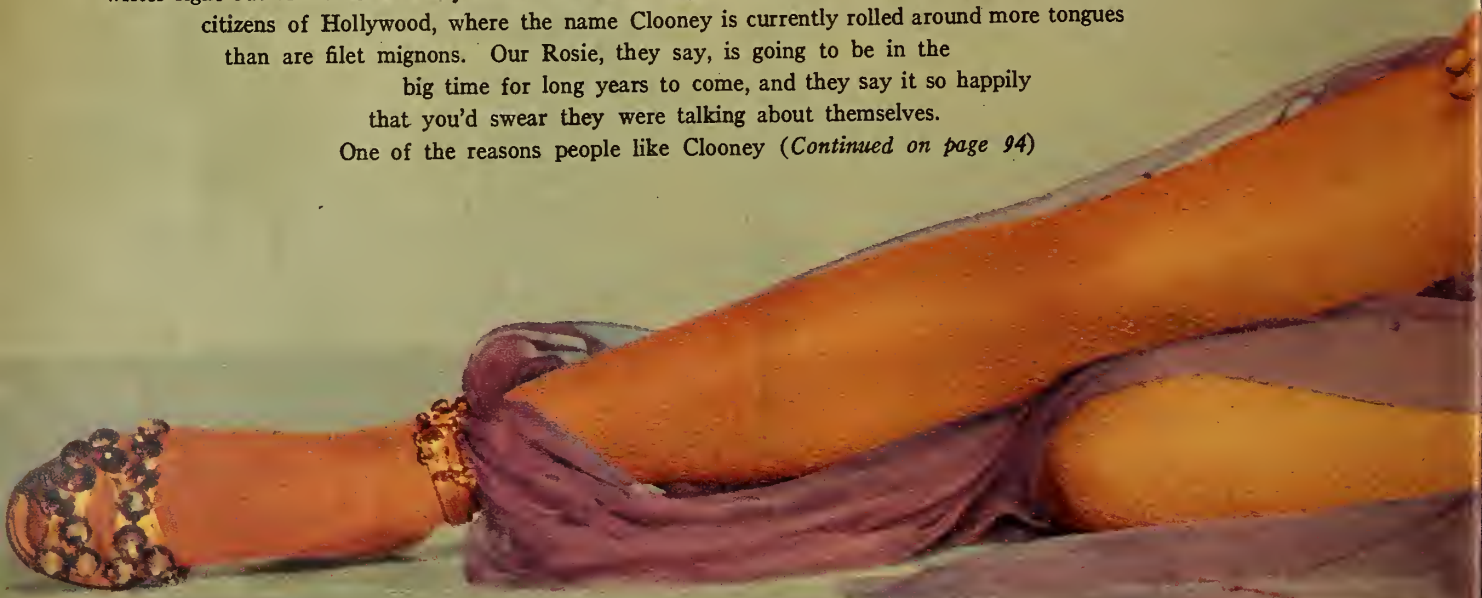

Rosie does not do this intentionally. She was born with the personality of the Pied Piper, an indefinable something that could (and did) charm a Time Magazine writer right out of his derisive adjectives. The latest large group to fall under her spell are the citizens of Hollywood, where the name Clooney is currently rolled around more tongues than are filet mignons. Our Rosie, they say, is going to be in the big time for long years to come, and they say it so happily that you'd swear they were talking about themselves.

Brando has Hollywood gasping again! After less than three years in films, at the height of his popularity, the peak of his career, the "Do-what-I-want-to-do" lad is setting another precedent: He's retiring!

Marlon's current film, Julius Caesar, is his fifth; he has earned $400,000, enough for a lifetime.

■ Marlon Brando has had it!

After only five motion pictures, The Men, Streetcar Named Desire, Viva Zapata, Julius Caesar, and The Wild One, the 29-year-old acting genius from Omaha is kissing Hollywood goodbye.

"I came out to Hollywood for two reasons," the brooding, hawk-nosed eccentric recently explained, "loot and film experience. I've got 'em both, and there's no point in hanging around. Maybe I'll do Pal Joey, but right now I'm not sure.

"Only thing I'm sure of is that I'm getting out. I'm going to travel, maybe do some pictures in Europe. I want to go to the Far East, Siam, India, the South Sea Islands.

"Maybe later this year I'll blow back to New York. Maybe do a show for Cheryl Crawford. Maybe just keep going, just keep strumming that guitar.

"I've got nothing against Hollywood. It's been very good for me working here. It's broadened me socially. I've learned a lot about the business. But it is a business, and when you've made enough loot, the thing to do is pull out.

"I like to travel, and I'd just as soon spend some of my dough while I'm young and can enjoy it. I'm not finished with motion pictures. I'll make more of 'em, only maybe not in Hollywood. They make some pretty good stuff in Europe (Continued on page 84) too far, too fast?

Bob Wagner hit the jackpot overnight, and strange things happened. Was it stardom . . . or stardust?

■ There's a standard gag about Bob Wagner that is going the rounds of the 20th Century-Fox lot: "I sure feel sorry for that Wagner kid. He's had to overcome an awful lot of obstacles in life. Do you know that when he was born he almost choked on that silver spoon in his mouth?"

The satirical reference, of course, is to the fact that young Wagner comes from a well-to-do family.

His father is a successful steel magnate who has seen to it that his two children have always had the best of everything—fine clothes, nurses, private schools, cars, country club memberships, the whole works.

Now this relatively high standard of living is the expected order in Grosse Pointe, Michigan, the Wagner home bailiwick, and no one gives it a second thought. But in Hollywood, for a movie star to be born into a wealthy family is an almost inexcusable error in tactics, an almost insurmountable obstacle in the obtainment of good public relations.

It is a tribute to Bob Wagner's warm and friendly personality that despite his background, he's managed to win the acclaim and interest of the movie-goers everywhere.

Sex is not enough

by Jim Henaghan

Elaine Stewart, touted as MGM's answer to Marilyn Monroe, had a sizzling three-minute bit in a recent film. Whether or not she can act is still a moot point.

Fans go wild when Monroe appears . . . in person. But at the box office, they're more restrained. Studio execs learned it takes more than sex to sell a film.

Sex can do a lot for an ailing career. Terry Moore was getting noplacé fast until her press agent gave her a sexy buildup. Now, she's hotter than hot.

Laurette Luez' career has been built exclusively on sex. With such a start, nobody will be surprised if the "Flower of Delight Girl" withered on the vine.

Zsa Zsa Gabor, whose family makes a career of being female, may have mis-judged her talents. She draws as many laughs as whistles, could be a comedienne.

Already loaded with talent, Mitzi Gaynor is one of those rare individuals who just radiates sex appeal. She's even more attractive off than on the screen.

Monroe leads the parade . . . and every girl with a curve to her name is on the bandwagon. But they may learn the hard way that they've got to have talent, too.

■ The fat, white fingers of silver light, beaming from the cones of great searchlights, played tic-tac-toe in the night sky above Hollywood. Wilshire Boulevard, in front of the Ritz Theater, was a happy bedlam. Traffic was backed up for a mile, and in the glare of sputtering arcs sleek Cadillacs pulled to the curb and discharged elegantly appointed stars and movie-makers who made their way into the building through an avenue of ropes that held back thousands of breathless fans.

One by one the big names of the movies made the walk past the spectators and each got applause and cheers. (Continued on page 97)

don't blame Farley

BY PAMELA MORGAN

Shelley's married now, but she and Farley still get a kick out of kidding around. Their "romance" was only a joke to them, but it taught Farley to be careful with new friends like Dawn Addams (far right).

■ The studio publicity man was visibly upset. "Look," he said, "the photographers all shot pictures of Farley Granger and Shelley Winters at Donald O'Connor's party. We're asking everyone to kill the pictures. They just can't be published."

"Why not?" the MODERN SCREEN editor retorted. "What's to be so upset about?"

"Well, you know how it is. They used to go together. With Vittorio Gassman in Italy and all, it's liable to cause gossip; maybe even stories. You know the kind—'Is Shelley's Marriage Failing?' 'Will Farley and Shelley Get Together Again?' These pictures could cause everybody a lot of trouble."

Oh yes?

Give the publicity man credit for being alert on his job, certainly. But as for starting a rumor that the paths of Shelley Winters and Farley Granger may cross again romantically, well, that's the best laugh of the year. Any journalist with an ounce of mixed common sense and honesty will tell you that the "Shell-Farl" romance was one of the neatest little hoaxes ever perpetrated on the public.

No offense, though. It was harmless enough and thoroughly enjoyed by everyone until Shelley lost her sense of humor when a reporter asked her who she thought she was kidding.

"I don't need Farley for publicity," Shelley shouted, way back in August, 1951. "If we weren't on the level, we might have gone on with it for a couple of months. But two years! I'm crazy about Farley and I don't care who knows it. If I wanted to go with someone just for publicity, I'd go with Francis, the mule . . . just because we didn't get married in June doesn't mean we're not in love . . . we'll get married when we can, and not when a lot of busybodies think we should."

The reporter, well-disciplined to the ways of Hollywood in which an actress may one day declare deathless devotion and on the next file suit for divorce, took all this with a straight face. He knew, however, that the bombastic pro-and-con announcements were just a prelude to their well-chaperoned romp through Europe which was expertly tied up with publicity for their latest picture efforts.

model mother ■ by JACK WADE

On the late side of one morning, a few weeks ago, Elizabeth Taylor Wilding stretched out her five feet, four inches and 123 pounds on her oversize bed, clad mainly in a mass of turkish toweling from which her home-cut, black poodled curls protruded at one end and her pink toes wiggled protestingly from the other. Between those extremities a masseuse kneaded her tissues like a pastry cook attacks dough. Having vanquished 20 of the 40 superfluous pounds acquired bearing her baby, Mike, Liz was on the homestretch of a reducing campaign with 15 more to lose before she'd be fit for the cameras in her next MGM picture, Rhapsody.

At this interesting juncture, a slightly pixy-ish male face with quizzical eyebrows and a little boy's grin—belonging to her husband, Michael Wilding—poked inside the door, coughed discreetly, said, "Oh, excuse me!" and started to pull back out again. But muffled laughter smote its ears and the face popped through the opening again, like a turtle's.

"What's so funny, Mrs. Birdnose?" Mike inquired.

"Everything," chuckled his loving wife.

"Correct," Michael approved, "but philosophy aside, what's especially droll this morning?"

"I was just thinking," explained Elizabeth, "that here I am, married, now a mother, and already having weight pounded off me like a dowager—but as of today I'm just eligible to vote for the first time!"

"You can now also be sued, run for office, and be hanged for murder, if that's any comfort," advised her mate. "Happy birthday!" And when she was presentable, he gave her a big kiss and a small gold buckle ring to celebrate the majority attained by the girl he had married.

The date of that intimate scene (Continued on page 86)

Morriage to Mike started working miracles with irresponsible Liz, and motherhood completed the cure. Today, Liz is the competent one, Mike the scotterbroin. But both shine at coring for Little Mike.

The O'Connor home rang with love and laughter . . . until Don's career gave him less and less time for his family. Now, asks all Hollywood, will the O'Connors ever be reunited?

Little girls love a nightly romp with Dad; but will Donna ever be sure of hers?

Don's collection of foreign cars is a hobby his wife and daughter shared.

Bitter Triumph

BY WILLIAM BARBOUR

■ "When is daddy coming home?" Sooner or later six-year-old Donna O'Connor had to ask that question, for in addition to looking like her famous father, she is the apple of his eye, and they love each other very much. Donna's mother, Gwen O'Connor, was prepared with a reply that she knew would be temporarily satisfactory.

But the ladies never got too excited over Dan's antics . . . they were pretty used to them!

Trooper Don used to give his best performance for the critical eyes of Gwen, Danna.

When one O'Connor collapsed another was always ready and willing to take over.

In happier days, Don and Gwen enjoyed parties together. First thing, Dan always whipped out his wallet to show his snapshots of Donna. Here, Don's ready to give Mel Torme a look . . . but finds he left his wallet home!

Immediately after the O'Connors separated, rumors spread that Gwen was dating Dean Martin. Pictures like this helped keep the reports alive, but Gwen, in tears, phoned Dean to say she had nothing to do with it.

won with hard work and brilliant talent . . . but three young lives are paying for it with heartbreak.

Daddy had so much work to do at the studio that he was staying in his dressing room for a few days.

All children of show business parents can understand their moms and dads being away for periods of time, but both Gwen and Don knew that sooner or later they would have to tell their daughter the real truth. Children somehow have a way of knowing the secrets their parents try hardest to cover up, and Donna O'Connor is brighter than most.

Still, the heartbreak of separation was kept from their only child as long as possible. Gwen and Don had been through battles before. They always patched them up.

But this time Gwen was determined to force the issue. For the first time, she sought out an attorney and Don was served papers. He may have known what was coming, but the actual blow so stunned him that for the first time in his life he begged off from work on his newest co-starring picture, (Continued on page 102) are the keynotes of today's generation.

■ Tourists who visit Hollywood are constantly amazed by the large number of signs on fabulous Wilshire Boulevard that advertise auctions.

"TONITE—AUCTION OF LAVISH FURNISHINGS FROM THE MANSION OF MISS JOAN CRAWFORD . . . NEXT TUESDAY AUCTION OF FABULOUS POSSESSIONS FROM THE MANSION OF MISS BARBARA STANWYCK . . . FROM HEDY LAMARR'S MANSION, COMPLETE FURNISHINGS TO BE SOLD AT AUCTION."

One visitor from the East, after observing all these auction advertisements, turned to a friend of hers, a long-time resident of the movie colony, and said, "Surely, there must be one Hollywood star who doesn't live in a mansion?"

The truth is that there are dozens of actors and actresses who live simply, reasonably, and normally; and with few exceptions, practically all of these are under the age of 30.

The day has long since passed when an actor, on being signed to a contract, raced to a phone, (Continued on next page)

The living room (top, above) of her two-bedroom apartment is comfortably contemporary—with practical leather chairs and shag rug. Quaint old prints spark up the dark walls. Her bedroom (above) goes definitely old-fashioned, however. It houses her collection of antiques, including four-poster bed and old-fashioned marble-topped washstand.

RORY CALHOUN and his wife, Lita Boron, hit the Hollywood jackpot with their home! Rory bought this eight-room Colonial house in Beverly Hills, then learned a swimming pool came with it, free!

JOAN EVANS, a bride of one year, believes this three-room furnished apartment is perfect for a novice housekeeper. It leaves her plenty of time to concentrate on her cooking. Joan planned the soft monochrome green decor.

rang up an important real estate dealer, and shouted, "I've just signed a contract at Metro. Get me a house befitting my position. You know, gardens, swimming pool, the whole works."

The reason these days have passed is that starting salaries in the motion picture industry aren't very large. Janet Leigh began at $43.80 a week, Debbie Reynolds at less than $100, the same holds true for Marilyn Monroe, Tony Curtis, Bob Wagner, Debra Paget, Lana Turner, Betty Grable, and so on down the line.

It takes anywhere from five to ten years before a star begins earning a four-figure weekly salary; so that for the most part they spend their early working days living in small but well-furnished apartments or in small but modest rented houses.

When they hit the big time and have proven themselves great box-office attractions, their salaries boom, and they begin to live accordingly.

■ You should watch Debra Paget's eyes sometimes when anyone suggests that she is still a mama's girl. They can slant down to the thinnest, unfriendliest tilted slits you ever saw. She might say a few cold words in denial, or, even more likely, do it with an even colder silence. She particularly resents such insinuations from boys. One such fellow talked along this line when trying for a date the other day. Not an effusive girl anyway, Debra gave him a look that told him exactly what to do but he refused to drop. He managed to stay on his feet, and alive, while she marched away. He wouldn't have gotten the date anyway, very likely, but if he had been more diplomatic there might have been an invitation to join the gang at her home some evening.

It is difficult to picture Debra as a meek and obedient daughter when you study her full-blown beauty, catch the flaunting fling her curvacious figure can achieve when she walks down the street in a bright ballerina skirt, (Continued on page 111)

Unspoiled by fame, or fortune (her salary is $500 a week) Debra lives in this small rented house. She receives no allowance; Mom handles all pocket money.

Whether it's work or play, Debbie's mother, Mrs. Frank Griffin, is right there by her side. They attend premieres and parties together, and, on set, Mrs. Griffin is just an inch or two out of camera range.

Is Mrs. Griffin living her own life over again, in Debbie's career? Once a successful vaudeville and stage star herself, she seems to glory in the attention and excitement surrounding her beautiful daughter.

Babysitting with 2-year-old Meg is Debbie's favorite chore. She spends her free time with her sisters, brother and, of course, mother.

Nobody's a pampered movie star in Debra's house! She has to take her turn with the dishes just like younger sister Lezlie who also wants to be a star.

Handsome brother Frank and Debra are close pals. They frequently appear in little theater plays together. Frank's an actor, too.

Big-name movie stars, and next-door neighbors gather at Debbie's house often. As long as they like to laugh, and love to eat, they're welcome!

Debbie doesn't have much time to devote to just plain relaxing. Busy with her girl scout troop, French horn practicing, and her career, she has few minutes for her poodle "Tursey."

Burned once, Debbie's determined to guard her heart more carefully next time. She has many dates, won't go steady. Tom Morton gets the same attention as her other beaux.

*"If you see my darling with somebody new,
Keep it a secret whatever you do,"*

■ The misty, California spring night had given way to grey, early morning fog when a young girl, a small and pert young beauty, stepped out from the Los Angeles Airport waiting room onto the passenger loading apron. She wore a light, tailored suit, a gay, knitted cloche on her head and fingered an icebox-fresh corsage pinned at her throat.

With her came a middle-aged couple. The three stood for a few minutes in a fond, close grouping and then with a last, quick embrace for each of them the girl turned and ran for her plane. Motors roared. The DC-4 taxied slowly away. Debbie Reynolds was leaving Hollywood for an extended tour . . . leaving with a saddened heart.

There should have been another there, a tall, darkly handsome boy, but he wasn't . . . unless you count the memory of him which filled her mind. Once they had been close, once she would have had a right to expect him there, once his hand would have been the last to touch hers before she left. But that had been once. Now it was not like that. Now you hear of him being with others . . .

*"Why should you tell me and break my

Then foolish pride would just drive us

Debbie Reynolds and Bob Wagner were never engaged. He never gave her a ring. They never announced that they were going steady. They were young and like the young made a lot of their independence. Too many talented young people put off love for a rainy day. Not Bob and Barbara, who know the way to face the future is together.

■ Barbara Ruick and Bob Horton are one of the brightest young couples on the Hollywood horizon. She is the daughter of radio actress Lurene Tuttle and radio actor Melville Ruick, and her two-year-old contract with MGM has put her in such pictures as Above and Beyond, I Love Melvin and The Affairs of Dobie Gillis. Barbara herself has put even more into her movies than was expected in the wildest dreams of studio executives, and as a result she is slated for the big time on that lot. A star dressing room is also waiting for Bob, whose portrayals in The Arena and The Bright Road mark him as an unquestionably fine actor.

Come August, all this talent is going to be lumped into one family, when Barbara and Bob exchange their vows in front of what they both agree will be a "small altar."

There has been plenty of time to discuss the wedding, the kind of house they want, and whether or not they'll install a garbage disposal unit, keep parakeets and have children. Long engagements versus short engagements make a frequent subject for debate, and Barbara admits she would have been willing to marry Bob 24 hours after Cupid let go with his arrow. Twenty-four hours, she figures, would have been more than sufficient (Continued on next page)

Barbara Ruick paid a visit to fiancé Bob Horton when he was on location in Arizona for MGM's The Arena. First thing Bob did was give his girl a trot around camp.

Livestock penned in a corral, to be used as "extras" in the film, make a local point of interest for Bob to show Barbara. She became so excited over the cattle she almost fell into the corral with them.

Time out for lunch. Food on location isn't as fancy as the Brown Derby's, but there's plenty of it. Barbara never liked cooking until Bob became a steady customer for dinner. Now she thinks it's fun.

Anybody looking? The engaged pair duck behind Bob's big-brimmed hat for a kiss. They've been planning to marry for almost a year, but must wait until August; Bob's divorce becomes final then.

to gather up her wedding dress, the license and the dime for her shoe. But because Bob's interlocutory divorce decree will not be final until August, Barbara has been forced to endure an engagement period of almost a year.

"And you know, I've decided it's a good idea," she says. "It gives us time to iron out the kinks."

None of the so-called kinks are very serious, as their temperaments seem admirably suited to each other. They agree on many things, including the fact that the least likely way to spend an evening is a siege at a plush nightclub. If you really wanted to find them after working hours, the best bet would be any little restaurant where there is a torrid piano player. Barbara would be the brown-eyed blonde who is so engrossed in the music, and Bob would be the handsome man with red hair, the one wearing the patient, puzzled expression. The pianist comes to a highly stylized phrase, and Barbara half rises from the chair in her excitement.

"Now what did he do?" says Bob.

"Didn't you hear that?" she says. "About two bars back. Those were the licks I've been telling you about."

Bob shifts in his chair. "Now, go over that once more for me—lightly. You mean when he hits the keys in sort of an off-beat way—"

"That's it—that's it! Now, listen and see if you can tell me when he does it again. I'll make you a jazz fan yet!"

If you wanted to find them during the day, look around any sports stadium. Baseball, football, basketball, it doesn't matter—if it's a good game, they'll be there. Barbara is the one who is either staring intently at the field or plying Bob with questions about technical points of the game, which he answers as fast as she asks them.

Since last fall, when love bloomed between them, they have had a liberal education concerning each other. Bob wants desperately to be a hipster so that he can share her enthusiasm for jazz, and Barbara has discovered that he has an excellent singing voice which she thinks with a year's training could be slightly sensational. Bob has found out that his future bride can whip up an excellent dinner, and Barbara was pleased to find that while she never enjoyed cooking for herself, it developed into a pleasure when she was doing it for Bob. She likes Chinese food, which he loathes, and he likes Mexican food which sends Barbara's digestive system into a snit, so they compromise at Italian restaurants. They have discussed at length the affect of their combined careers on their coming marriage and feel they understand the other's work so well that they will be able to iron out any possible wrinkles.

The attraction that has grown between them has been a gradual thing. They first met more than a year ago in the office of MGM dramatic coach Lillian Burns, and it was a matter of "How do you do, Mr. Horton?" and "Quite well, thank you, (Continued on page 100)

* at the sneak preview — they all said Burton!

■ A neighborhood movie house was the scene of a 20th Century-Fox preview some months ago. It was what is known in the trade as a "first sneak," which means the first opportunity the studio executives have to examine the picture with an unbiased audience. The movie was My Cousin Rachel, and during the screening the house was very quiet. As a matter of fact, you could tell it was obviously a little too quiet to suit the taste of the nervous producers.

When the picture was over the audience filed into the lobby and dutifully walked to the temporary desks provided for the purpose and began filling in the comment cards. There was still little conversation, and none of the usual gayety audiences express at such a screening. When the last of them was gone the producers (Continued on page 109)

KEEFE BRASSELLE

* a press agent's brain-storm came true

■ Keefe Brasselle was pretty blue the day he dropped by the office of his old friend, the publicist, Glenn Rose. He wasn't getting parts; he feared his option would be dropped. As he recited his miseries, Glenn suddenly pointed a finger at Keefe. "You are going to be Eddie Cantor." Keefe told him he'd lost his mind. "I don't look like Cantor; too many other actors are after the part." But Glenn's eyes were glazed with an idea that wouldn't let go. Keefe went home. Glenn grabbed a phone to tell Sidney Skolsky to stop worrying about a lead for The Cantor Story. Meantime the idea began to bother Brasselle. He had some pictures of himself made up to look like Eddie. Glenn hunted up a girl named Barbara Donahue, who worked for an optical company. Contact lenses were needed to change his blue eyes to dark Cantor color. He called Keefe and announced, "Boy, I got your eyes—for nothing." Then they button-holed producer Skolsky in the back room at Schwab's drug store. Miraculously, Brasselle had the part of his life. This is the true story of how one man's idea secured the future of a star. The talented boy from Elyria, Ohio, who clerked in a Hollywood shoe store, and sold automobiles to support his family—Keefe Brasselle—has clicked for good!

* talent scouts watch television

■ It just seems that every time Anna Maria Alberghetti opens her pretty mouth to sing, she gets moved. It happened on her home Island of Rhodes, before she was 12. She had concert engagements in Italy, and won passports for herself and her war-exhausted family when she sang her lucky song, "Cara Nome" for the military governor. A high C in Italy won her contracts in America at Carnegie Hall. One trill in that famous auditorium and music-devotee and celebrated MC, Ed Sullivan had her on his TV program. The camera had just focused on her golden throat when she was spotted by Adolph Zukor. She was whisked from New York to Hollywood to sing in a picture with another tune-hummer, Mr. H. L. Crosby. To complete this fairy tale that came true, Anna Maria got a contract at Paramount. In The Stars Are Singing, Miss Alberghetti proved she could act as well as sing. She'll be teamed with Rosemary Clooney again in her next, Red Garters. She never sings a note before 12:00 noon. Her father, a fine musician and her teacher, says because she is so young, not yet 16, it would harm her voice to sing before her body is fully awake. Once having heard her, nobody, not even the neighbors, can wait till she's old enough to sing all the time, from morning to night.

success like a present under the Christmas tree — one morning there it was. Just like that . .

JOANNE GILBERT

* all it took was a pair of scissors

■ Joanne Gilbert is as flabbergasted as anyone else over her amazing leap from obscurity to movie fame without having appeared in a single picture. This newcomer, who's set to star with Donald O'Connor in The Big Song And Dance says, "I've had nothing but luck!" Part of that luck is the fact that although her parents are separated, her mother sensibly allowed her to see a lot of her dad, Ray Gilbert, Academy Award winning song writer. One day, tired of her 5-year career of modeling, Joanne told him, "I've got an idea. Would you write me some special material?" "Sure," he replied. He wrote. She sang. He listened. His eyes popped wide open. Then Joe Pasternak of MGM suggested she put on a charity performance at the Mocambo. Owner Charley Morrison was enthusiastic until she showed up in a man's white blouse and long black trousers. All was saved, however, when someone in a fit of genius produced a pair of scissors, snipped away the pants legs and behold! There were legs that would make Marlene Dietrich think twice. The results were startling. The sultry, emotion-filled voice, the big hazel eyes knocked Hollywood for a loop and Paramount for a contract. One critic said, "That voice—those eyes—the legs that never stop. WOW!" And Hollywood thinks fans will agree.

* who's the tow-head in the tenth row?

■ Tab Hunter is a lad who never bled to be an actor. As a matter of fact, he was plucked off the bleachers at an ice-show, and thrown into the arms of Linda Darnell. He was a spectator at an ice show the night Henry Willson, a top talent scout, spotted him all a'gog at the figure eights. Willson has picked people like Linda Darnell, Rory Calhoun, and Lana Turner before they knew the front end of a camera from the back, and helped them develop into stars. He wanted the same thing for Tab. And Tab didn't mind a bit. His first role was in Island of Desire, with Miss Darnell. Now he's slated for Steel Lady. Tab is the boy-next-door type, an ex-San Franciscan who doesn't believe that his profile is heaven's gift to movies. He works hard to keep in trim, riding and jumping horses; studies acting and singing diligently. He lives with his mother, but call him "Mama's Boy" and you'll collect a good sock on the nose. At 22, he's a bachelor and an ex-Marine. He ran away from home at 15 to join the Leathernecks. Now that he's home again the situation is still well in hand—including the social life of Hollywood. This boy gets around with the best—Susan Zanuck and Debbie Reynolds, for instance—and Hollywood predicts that Tab Hunter will stay around for a long, long time.

Tomorrow's spotlight will shine on these new faces—17 youngsters hand-picked and ready for the big break.

ELAINE STEWART and Marilyn Monroe have something in common: Marilyn was married to a policeman, Elaine is the daughter of one. Something else, too—of all the girls in Hollywood, Elaine is Marilyn's closest sex-appeal competitor. She's in Young Bess.

RICHARD ALLAN majored in music at college till World War II came along. Drafted, he ended up in an overseas laundry unit. His first film break came when he doubled for Monty Clift's swimming scenes in Place In The Sun. His latest (same old water!) is Niagara.

PHYLLIS KIRK has been given a fast shuffle by Hollywood . . . but it looks like the time has come for a "new deal" for her, now. Under contract for a while, first to MGM then to Warner Bros., at last Paramount gave her a break in their Iron Mistress.

PALMER LEE's been called everything under the sun by casting agents: too short, too tall, too handsome, too ugly. But, like the patient Norwegian-American that he is, he stuck it out till U. I. took a second look and signed him up. His next: The Cimarron Kid.

KATY JURADO used to be such a tomboy she beat up all the boys in the neighborhood. She still floors 'em, but with her flashing dark eyes, now, instead of her fists. A native of Mexico, where she was a top star, she made a name for herself here in High Noon.

TOM MORTON's one chorus boy who made good. (Van Johnson's another.) Tom had the audacity to hire a press agent while still in the chorus. Paramount teamed him with another unknown (Rosemary Clooney) in The Stars Are Singing; has big plans for him.

LORI NELSON had to give up Hollywood at the age of eight. Rheumatic fever cost her a job in King's Row. But she lived in the movie neighborhood, and pretty soon the gal down the street was on the screen in the Ma and Pa Kettle series. At 20, Lori's on her way.

KEITH ANDES' best breaks have come with a germ. He met his beautiful nurse wife while sick-a-bed. Alfred Drake's illness in Kiss Me Kate gave Keith a chance to sing the lead 22 times. RKO scouts heard him, cast him in Clash By Night and Split Second.

SUSAN CABOT was born in Boston and raised in the Bronx. She's as American as a hot dog—but, oddly enough, until she was teamed recently with Audie Murphy in Roughshod, she played nothing but native girls and Indian princesses in her movie roles.

TOUCH CONNORS has been shooting for a screen career right along, but he's studying law on the side . . . just in case! He is registered under his real name, Joy O'Hanian, at Southwestern University. But, if his role in Sudden Fear means anything, he'll forget law.

BETTA ST. JOHN licked a serious speech impediment and went on to become a child actress at the age of eight. At 16, she danced herself into the chorus of Carousel on Broadway; next, she landed a job in South Pacific. You'll be seeing her in 20th's The Robe.

BYRON PALMER's performance in Tonight We Sing netted him such glowing notices that Darryl Zanuck signed him to a contract when studios were dropping, not hiring, actors. If "By," as his friends call him, ever tires of movies, he'll try newspaper work.

ROBERTA HAYNES' father used to be an electrical engineer . . . so maybe that accounts for the sparks that start flying when she's on screen! Her first bit role, in High Noon, wound up on the cutting room floor, but she made out better in Return To Paradise.

CRAIG HILL's big ambition is to buy a boat that will carry him away on a cruise to South America someday. If his screen career keeps zooming the way it's doing, he'll have the money for the trip in short order . . . but no time! He'll be too busy making movies.

POLLY BERGEN is about as different as you can get. She dances with a Southern accent; attended 45 different high schools; once got fired as a singer because she was "too sexy." She's still something special as a wife to Jerome Courtland—and a star in The Stooge.

HUGH O'BRIAN was the youngest drill sergeant in the history of the Marine Corps. Except for some amateur magic, his aptitude for acting seemed almost non-existent. But Hugh looks good, talks sense, and comes across the screen big in The Man From The Alamo.

AUDREY DALTON hails from Dublin, where she was schooled at the Convent of the Sacred Heart. She has more poise than the average 18-year-old, sparkling blue-green Irish eyes, and a smouldering temper she's never used. She's in Paramount's Pleasure Island.

Dale Robertson who has played opposite the 23-year-old star and knows him well, says, "Wagner's a regular guy, very likeable and down-to-earth, no airs or anythin', that's why everyone goes for him. A swell kid."

Debbie Reynolds' mother, who saw a good deal of the tall, brown-eyed Wagner when he was going more or less steadily with her daughter, generates the same sort of enthusiasm when she discusses Bob. "He's a wonderful boy," she explains, "well-bred and well-mannered, the kind of boy a mother knows she can trust her daughter with. He is every inch a gentleman and a wonderful reflection of good, substantial upbringing. He's always welcome in our house."

These quotations are typical of the high regard in which Wagner is held in Hollywood.

Throughout the country he rates similarly—that is, if his fan mail is any indication—and it always is.

When Titanic is released, and Wagner finishes Twelve-Mile Reef with Terry Moore down at Tarpon Springs, Florida, it is highly probable that his fan mail will double. All of which leads us to the vital point of discussion—is this friendly, good-looking young actor with the moneyed background and the winning smile becoming too famous too fast?

LIKE on every question in Hollywood there are two schools of thought on this one. Those who believe that Wagner should be held in check and those who think the boy is doing just fine and should be given his head.

Students enrolled in the first school claim that young Bob is feeling his oats, that fame has gone to his head.

A girlfriend of Debbie Reynolds says, "Debbie still thinks R.J.'s a dreamboat, but I'm not that gone on the boy. As soon as he got a little successful what happened? He bought himself one of those fancy racing cars, a low slung MG. He started seeing less and less of Debbie, more and more of Susan Zanuck and girls like that, you know the boss' daughter."

"He cracked up his car, bought a new one, moved out of his folks' home in Bel-Air. He started making the rounds with Dan Dailey, even got an apartment next to Dailey's. One of those bachelor setups where you can be alone and play records and show etchings."

"I like R.J. Don't get me wrong. He's a swell fellow, but I honestly feel he's reacting to success the way any other young man would."

"He doesn't want to get married, and he makes no bones about the fact. He's playing the field, and he's giving his career everything he's got—and that's plenty."

"I'm sure he's got enough background to keep both feet on the ground, and I certainly hope he's not going to move into Dan Dailey's league."

"Dailey's an operator, you know. He came to Hollywood out of burlesque, and he's strictly show business, and fellows like that—well, they're tough on girls. Look at what happened to Liz Dailey and Beetsy Wynn, and then there was Dan's first wife back in New York."

"I don't want to sound like one of those females who dips her tongue in sulphuric acid each morning, but I don't feel that the combine of Dailey and Wagner is such a hot combination."

"Dailey himself needs an older well-adjusted man to guide him, maybe a psychiatrist, and R.J.—I know he thinks the world of Dailey. They go up to Arrowhead and Water-ski and all that—but let's face it, Dailey isn't the same basic type that Wagner is—in age, background or upbringing."

"I don't know if I'm making myself clear, but just want to go on record as saying that to me Bob Wagner is no young god. He's got all the foibles and weaknesses of other young men. I guess that's why we girls love him."

"I think fame has hit him in the head, and while he's trying awful hard not to let it run away with him, still, it's showing."

"Another thing. I'm no expert in the movie business; but I think it's best to go slow with a guy like Bob. Just because the public likes him, don't push him into too many pictures. Dale Robertson, he's another pal of Bob's—well, I think he's been put in one movie after another. I think he should be paced. I guess the studio's got to take advantage of an actor when he's hot, but the public is very fickle and tires very quickly."

"I hire R.J. won't make ten pictures in two years which is just about Robertson's record."

That particular opinion of Bob Wagner is biased and unobjective. The girl who

The British censor of public entertainment has for some time been issuing what are known as "X" certificates, denoting that a specified film may be viewed only by persons over 16 years of age. Last week, an exhibitor found a way to capitalize these limiting restrictions. He advertised a double-feature of French films as "The X-iest show in town."

gave it very much resents the fact that Debbie Reynolds and young Wagner aren't as close as Debbie would like.

Women gang up, even in Hollywood, and it comes as no surprise that a female press agent at MGM, Debbie's home studio, recently exclaimed to a writer. "Oh! That Bob Wagner! How could he break that little girl's heart! I'm telling you when he threw Debbie over, he broke her heart, broke it right in pieces. And what for? Just so that he could buzz around from one girl to the next. I thought he had more sense than that. I really did. He didn't know when he was well off. Well, I guess, he'll just have to grow up."

The simple truth is that Bob Wagner has already grown up. He has a pretty good idea of what he wants in life and how to get it.

WAGNER knows just where he's going. He's always wanted to be a movie star and now that he is, he hopes to work hard, maintain his popularity, level off eventually into an actor like Clark Gable or Spencer Tracy.

"I don't think I've gone any place in the industry yet," he says. "I've just had some lucky breaks. The studio took me three years ago and signed me, $150 a week. By April I'll be making $350, and I'll have been in nine, ten pictures."

"I'm glad I've caught on with the public, but there again, luck's had a lot to do with it. The movie magazines have been real socko to me. They've given me one break after another, and I sure am indebted to them; columnists have been great, too."

"Maybe I'm wrong but it seems to me that I'm the same guy I was ten months ago. I can't control how much or how little the public likes me. I just try to go along with the tide."

"I figure if I work hard, and mind my own business, if I continue to get good pictures then I've got a fair chance of amounting to something in this game. If I goof up, then it's my own fault."

"As for getting my own apartment, heck I'm not a kid anymore. I'm 23. I'm earning my own living, and it's only right that I should be self-supporting and not living off my folks. That's why I have my own place. Also it's very convenient. Only a few blocks from the studio. Nothing to write home about, just one of those bachelor jobs."

"When am I going to be drafted? There again I've been lucky. I was in the Marine Reserves but I transferred out. Now I'm with the 311th Logistics outfit, part of the National Guard setup. When they get called up, I go along. Nothing I can do about it."

"As to the effect my little success has had on me, I can honestly say I'm very grateful for my luck and for all the help the people at the studio have given me. I'm working harder than I've ever worked before and loving every minute of it, but on $250 a week—and you know movie contracts call for employment in only 20 out of every 26 weeks—after I get through paying my agent, taxes, insurance, rent, food, car upkeep, and the rest of it, I give you my word, there's not enough left to be any kind of a playboy."

WHERE Wagner is concerned the truth really is that he lived more of the Hollywood routine before he got into the business than he does now.

During those years he dated girls like Virginia Reed, Sue Moir, Melinda Markey, Gloria Lloyd, Michele Farmer, the daughters of wealthy industrialists, or famous movie stars. And he took them dancing and playing tennis at the Racquet Club in Palm Springs or any of the swanky hotels around town.

He was sent to one private school after another, Urban Military, Fairburn, Black Foxe Military, Harvard Military, Cal Prep—in all of which he was an infinitely better athlete than scholar. He also attended a few public schools, Emerson Junior High and Santa Monica High where he was elected President of the senior class.

He also went through the hot rod stage, buying a souped-up Channelled roadster with a high-powered motor. "Later," he recalls, "I bought a Chrysler from my dad—it was a '46, and I traded that for a '50 Ford convertible." It was in this particular car that Wagner and Susan Zanuck, daughter of Darryl Zanuck, chief of 20th Century-Fox, were riding when it was crashed by another car on the Pacific Coast Highway two Easter Sundays ago. Luckily, neither of the kids was seriously hurt.

Bob's next motor outfit was an old Cadillac convertible which he turned in for an MG, then wrecked the light little British car.

You can see from this that our boy has had it, that he's really been around, that $250 a week hasn't changed him from a shy, underprivileged, callow youth into a jaded, rah-rah playboy.

BILL Wellman, the director who gave Bob his first chance in a picture, says, "This kid's got too much character to be spoiled by money. Money usually spoils those youngsters who've never had any. This kid has had enough all his life."

The prevailing opinion in Hollywood is that young Bob Wagner has enough common sense to take anything in stride—work, women, fame, and money—no matter what their rate of speed.

In the words of Clifton Webb who acted with him in Stars And Stripes Forever, "This young man has both feet on the ground. In such circumstances he can't ever get into any serious trouble." END

"Mother may I go out to swim?
Oh, yes my darling daughter.
Hang your clothes on a hick'ry limb
But don't you go near the water."

With a lush pool steps away, not a swimsuit model plunged into the cool, clear water but—rather, suits concealed, they paraded swathed in mink coats and smothered with rhinestone jewelry before MODERN SCREEN's delighted Hollywood Fashion Board and guests. At the M.S. Summer fashion luncheon held on the estate of James and Pamela Mason, the models surprised all as they slipped the mink coats off to reveal the season's outstanding swimsuits. From the vast collection of swimsuits modeled, the stars on the board (see photo page 79) voted their favorite styles.

The orchestra played sweet, mellow music during the gala luncheon and fashion show. Hit dance tunes and request numbers by the stars were played later.

Esther Williams emceed the swimsuit show from the sidelines. While the models paraded before members of the Board, Esther pointed out the beauty and swimability of each suit. (Continued on page 76)

Swimsuits a-glitter with jewels and tulle drew ooh's and ah's from the glamor-conscious Board. Esther convinced the bedazzled MODERN SCREEN Hollywood Fashion Board Members that these glamorous suits were just as successful in deep water as on the sea-shore. All the pretty bathing costumes—all-over embroidered, sophisticated stripes and plaids, ornately jeweled or cunningly printed—were deftly designed for active sports as well as for their rightful place in the sun.

In between the time the models passed before the Board and returned to the dressing room, waiters carried large trays of gift packages beautifully wrapped. They served each Board Member a surprise package. Wrappings were quickly disposed of and boxes and boxes were opened revealing the surprise gifts of Dana 20 Carets perfume and cologne. Cole of California swimsuits, Ledo rhinestone jewelry, Holeproof hosiery, Tartan Suntan Lotion, Luxite lingerie, Rose Marie Reid dolls with gift certificates, Volupté compacts, Seven Test nylon stockings and Risqué casual shoes. All gathered around June Haver to watch her unwrap her gifts—to wish her happiness in the new role she chose. This was June's last Hollywood party before entering the convent.

(Continued from page 63) other's folks and approved of each other's folks and were in turn approved by them. All of this, you might say, building in their lives . . . and then, nothing.

Maybe it hurts more than it should because Debbie, before she met Bob, was a laughing bubble of a girl; too happy about being just young to be bothered about being young and wanted. Debbie was the kind of miss who wouldn't give you a plastic penny for all the lovey-dovey in the world. She preferred to talk bop through her gum and park herself in any position she liked and the heck with ladylike decorum or much-minded escorts. She used to insist that as far as boys were concerned, "I can go along with a good-night kiss but, frankly, it doesn't do a thing for me."

She used to have a way of saying she wouldn't think of marrying, then, after a pause, adding, "Not until I'm at least 24, at least." Life was too full of movement to hold still for mooning. There was dancing—that really "stoned" her. There was swimming—she "flipped her lid" about swimming. There was volley ball and playing her French horn and leading her girl scouts and camping and making pictures and, for that matter, just the big kick she got out of talking and eating and sleeping. "Anything's fun if you give it a chance," she would say, meaning it didn't have to be boys.

The Debbie of those days? Well, there was the time her brother, Bill, prevailed on her to go out with a buddy of his. Bill had been after her to do this for a year because this friend was "real gone" on her.

"Well . . ." said Debbie, skeptically, and finally went. That night she didn't come home until near midnight. She stamped into the house angrily, walked over to Bill's room and banged the door open.

"Ah-h-h! What a shmoo!" she cried. "What a shmoo your pal is! So I've been sitting in his car for an hour. So he's been breathing in my ear and kissing the back of my neck. I hope you're satisfied!"

But then she met and began dating Bob. They mostly did the things Debbie liked to do. They went bowling on those Saturday night dates. They went dancing . . . but rarely to those intimate, night spots; Debbie liked well lit halls. Generally they had a ball and Debbie began to change her tune—as if her old ideas were beginning to clash with new dreams. She let it be known that she might marry at 23; and only last year, while she and Bob were still dating, she announced that maybe 22 would be a nice age for wifehood. But that was the last remark on the subject. Quietly, very quietly, it began to be evident, not too long ago, that she and Bob weren't seeing each other any more. Almost everyone who knew them felt badly and hoped otherwise. But it was true.

The ending, it is pretty well established, was Bob's idea. Debbie, it is quite clear, didn't make a fuss about it. And it is Bob who has seemed able, more easily, to pick up with a new life . . . and with new girls. (For the full story of Bob Wagner's "new life" read Too Far, Too Fast? on page 46) And wherever he goes with them, dancing at the Mocambo with this one, cutting up at a Beverly Hills party with that one—so often on the Saturday nights that used to be Debbie's Saturday nights—there is always someone who has to make sure it reaches Debbie's ears. As if she wants to know. As if she doesn't repeatedly plead that she would much rather not know. " . . . If you see my darling in some rendezvous, Painting the town with a girl he once knew . . ."

Those who know Bob refuse to believe that he isn't still crazy about Debbie. They say that when Rory Calhoun and his Lita Baron gave a birthday party for him last February and he learned, on arrival, that Debbie had volunteered to be a co-hostess, he was deeply touched. It was a surprise party. Bob came alone. When he entered Debbie was there with a trumpet and blowing him a fanfare salute. Lita was unrolling the red carpet. Bob and Debbie quickly paired off and talked for a long time. But after the party was over . . . nothing had changed. Bob went back to his new ways. They spoke again only a few times, and these times over the telephone. When Bob went out it was again with someone else.

HOLLYWOOD always has to explain things to itself in down to earth terms, and in Bob's case there are any number of stories to account for his defection, some of them perhaps more vivid than accurate. More simply it could be said that at 23 Bob is beginning to find the social level of his dates with Debbie (a level which she set), too immature for him . . . or thus it seems to him. He feels he is growing up past the dancing at the Palladium, the jitterbugging (which she taught him), the weenie roasts at the beach, the picnic jaunts to the mountains, and the whole round of bobbysox cavorting. Spending more and more time with such comparatively blasé companions as Dan Dailey Jr., and Dale Robertson, even to the point of getting a new apartment near them, his tastes are said to be changing.

Dan and Dale, and others of his older friends, are supposed to have kidded him for "playing with little girls," and Bob is reported to have suffered the mortification of the young male whose maturity is questioned by his seniors. He was caught between two outlooks on life; with Debbie he could not be a man of the world, with his more sophisticated pals it was uncomfortable, let alone unsuitable, to be anything else.

That Bob felt such a thing may be inferred from some of his more recent activities. How else could you explain such an extreme departure from normal routine for a 23-year-old boy as to go night clubbing with a 45-year-old woman . . . grey-haired Barbara Stanwyck? If this illustrates his inner compulsion to escape the brand of juvenility, breaking with Debbie seemed necessary for Bob.

that this is a challenge that all youths face sooner or later. In Bob's case it has been intensified, not only by his position as a star, and a darn good looking one, but by another personal involvement. He may be called any time now to go soldiering for Uncle Sam. The prospect of having to go to war has sharpened the appetite for life of many a boy before him. Manhood is like that.

Even more than a year ago Bob was giving evidence of wanting to spread himself as an eligible bachelor around Hollywood. Debra Paget began to be conscious of his attention during the shooting of Stars And Stripes Forever. Bob sought for her favor with a line that was half kidding and half serious. She resented it on two counts: he knew she never dated, and also, as far as Debra was concerned, Bob was Debbie's boy friend and she valued Debbie's regard. Eventually Debra got so angry at Bob's persistence, particularly at columnist's reports about them that she attributed to Bob, that she wouldn't talk to him for a week.

Debbie is 21 now. She was 21 last April Fool's Day she will tell you with a smile that, maybe has a little bitterness to it. She never talks about Bob as a rule unless someone else brings up his name.

" . . . Pay no attention and just let it be, But keep it a secret from me."

Once, when someone asked why they aren't seeing each other any more, tears were reported to have come into her eyes and she replied, "Well, I guess he doesn't like me any more."

WHAT worries her friends more than this is the kind of talk that makes them think Debbie might fall for someone on the rebound, words like this which she spoke not long ago: "I know my family and my friends would be happy if I fell in love—and they would trust my judgment. But until I can announce my engagement and get married within a few months I'm not even going to go steady."

Debbie is not unaware of Bob's thinking, his motivations. She understands him because she has an older brother, after all, and is not unacquainted with the thinking of the young male when he becomes of age. And as her mother has told her, she is still young: "There is always time for love when you are 21." Bob may want a change now but her best bet is to stay herself—by no means the old thoughtless and frivolous Debbie, but the kind of girl she is intrinsically, in contrast to the kind of girls he may be discovering in his new quests. For one thing she can't help being herself, for another thing her instinct tells her this is the right thing to do.

But in the meantime Debbie is out to forget Bob. There may come another day but it is silly to count the minutes, the hours.

That was why she thought it wise to leave Hollywood for a series of radio and personal appearances. As a matter of fact, she planned two jaunts. After a three week trip through the east she was to be back in Hollywood—but only for two days. A South American tour with Pier Angeli and Carleton Carpenter was to follow. And after that, Debbie might not be adverse to more travel—if needed. But in the back of her mind as she took off from Los Angeles was perhaps a strong hope; deeply hidden, but nevertheless there.

By the time she returns to Hollywood (and she will have been back some time when this is being read) Bob may have done with his "traveling" too. And maybe he'll be "back" . . . back where he belongs.

"I just don't dig this Hollywood routine any longer. When I first came out here, I was very shy, didn't know what gave. Bunch of people started asking me wacky questions. I didn't tumble to 'em. I just mumbled or kept quiet. Right away, they pegged me a screwball. Made up the most preposterous stories about me. A bunch of scuffling hucksters, nothing else.

"All that stuff about my clothes, blue jeans and T-shirts. Must be a million guys in this country wearing blue jeans. They're nice and comfortable. I've got suits, ties, shirts, things like that. I'm not out of this world. Just because I keep a raccoon. What's wrong about keeping a pet? What's wrong about playing with a raccoon? I just happen to dig animals."

In three years of film work, young Brando has managed to save approximately $200,000, a sum prudently invested for him by his father in a holding company aptly named Marsdo, Inc. (Marlon's dough).

This company has interests in several Indiana oil wells plus owning outright 800 head of class A cattle in central Nebraska. It is estimated that Brando's dividends will now bring him an annual income of $10,000 which is more than enough "loot" for the most unHollywood-like actor in existence. Thus, if he never works again—and for him this is an impossibility since acting is really the great passion of his life—Marlon will still have enough of the green stuff to get by comfortably.

Brando has been able to amass this financial nest egg by being honest, sensible, thrifty, frank, earthy—and you may not believe this—but completely unaffected. This boy believes in the essentials—nothing else.

Brando's opinion of the "glamor life" is unprintable, and he saw through the glitter of Hollywood at once. He recognized immediately what a perfect environment this was for a fool to be quickly separated from his money.

First thing he did was to move in on his aunt, Mrs. Betty Lindemeyer, who owns a two-bedroom bungalow in a small community called Eagle Rock. He slept on her sofa.

Now, oddly enough, many Hollywood actors wear blue jeans and T-shirts and dress most informally—Dale Robertson, Bob Wagner, Dan Dailey, John Derek, many others—but the Press typed Brando "a wack" very early in the game and never let up on him; and as evidence of what they termed a strange behavior pattern, they pointed to his scanty wardrobe, also his incommunicability.

None of the reporters who first interviewed Brando entertained the possibility that he might be afraid. After all he was so broad-shouldered and masculine. He seemed to generate so much animal sex. But the truth is that he was plenty afraid. "One columnist started to talk to me," he recalls. "She was very nice but she chattered so much I couldn't follow her, so I just didn't say anything."

Then, there was the time Brando was playing in Streetcar Named Desire. A friend brought another Hollywood columnist, backstage to meet him. At the time Marlon was busy taking his make-up off. Catching only a quick glance of the news-woman, he turned to his friend and said, "Your mother, Jesse?"

The reporter is far too young to be the mother of a 30-year-old son, but on this particular night she looked worn, and Brando hadn't gotten too close to her. As a result of his offhand remark, Brando is not one of these ladies' favorites in print.

Actually, Brando is so honest he's amazing. He says many of the things most people wish they had the courage to say. A few years ago, for example a newshen began to interrogate the young actor about his sex life. Brando was so genuinely shocked, this seemed like such a flagrant invasion of his privacy, he could call to tongue only one answer. "None of your damn business," he rightfully said. Whereupon the writer next day described him as "a strange, withdrawn mental recluse."

A studio chauffeur once called for him in a limousine, offering to drive him from the railway station to his residence. Brando looked at him quizzically. "Been sitting a long time," he said. "Rather walk." He detests any ostentatious display of wealth.

What many people don't seem to realize—it doesn't fit into the build-up and they refuse to accept it—is that Brando is blessed with a highly imaginative and romantic sense of humor although basically it is more adolescent than adult.

When he was making Viva Zapata he told one of the crew, "You know when I was in the Belgian Congo I used to eat gazelle eyes everyday. The natives mash them up into a paste. Very good."

Brando has never been in the Belgian Congo but he was secretly tickled when members of the crew fell for the story. Later he admitted, "I just made that up."

IN New York, very early in his acting career, when he played the role of Nels in I Remember Mama, he was asked for some biographical notes to be printed in the program. Brando thought for a while, then announced that he'd been born in Calcutta, that his father was an itinerant geologist, that he'd been educated in India.

Later, when he acted in other plays, he changed his birthdate, altered his birthplace to Bangkok, spun a romantic story of how he had lost a passport in France and had been compelled to earn a living disguised as a Turkish beggar.

"Reason I did it," he explains, "is that those programs are always so dull. Wanted to jazz 'em up a bit."

Dozens of stage actors have long confided that they, too, hoped one day to fabricate romantic autobiographies; but to date, Brando is the only one with sufficient courage to be seduced by his impulses.

Reporters cannot understand other facets of the Brando behavior. Why, for example, does he steer clear of the Hollywood beauties? Dozens of glamor girls have tried their best to date him. They've worked through intermediaries and friends of Marlon, but the boy won't give them a tumble. He is more interested in the mind than in the body.

He goes with the actress, Movita, more than he goes with any one movie star, but that's because he doesn't consider her the typical product of the Hollywood beauty belt-line. He likes simple, forthright girls and is more interested in their manner and attitude than in their fame or beauty. Also, he cannot abide publicity-seekers, male or female.

"He always used to go with a cross-eyed girl or an ugly-duckling in school," his mother recalls. "He's a boy of great sympathy and rare compassion." And this is no maternal exaggeration, either. Brando is inherently kind.

Actresses who have worked with him say that he gives every scene his best, never essaying to steal a scene with a clever little distraction or to block someone else out of the camera. He is completely devoid of deceit or narcissistic thinking.

TERESA Wright, who played opposite him in The Men, says, "Marlon is one of the finest, most thoughtful actors in the business. I love to play opposite him."

Elia Kazan, who's directed Brando both in New York and Hollywood, describes him as, "the greatest young actor in a century."

Mary Murphy, his leading lady in The Wild One, claims, "He's the tops. He'll do anything to help you. In this whole picture I have yet to hear anyone say a single bad word about Marlon. He's cooperative in everything."

The girls who speak in derogation of Marlon are usually those he's spurned. Before she got married to Vittorio Gassman, Shelley Winters was sweet on Marlon. For a long time he refused to look at Shelley because he felt she was putting on. A few weeks later when they met at Motion Picture Center and Shelley came down to earth, Marlon took to her very nicely.

A few months ago, Brando was at a party where one young actress—she's popularly referred to as Hollywood's newest sex queen—tried to attract his attention by showing more and more of her neckline. Brando has a powerful sense of concentration, the result of studying Yogi, and he refused to flatter the doll with even a sideward glance. Later, the offended sex queen described him as, "the most insufferable prig I've ever met." To this very day, Marlon doesn't even know she was at the party.

When he likes a young woman, however, he makes no secret of the fact. During the making of Viva Zapata which was shot on location in Del Rio, Texas, he got on famously with Jean Peters. To show exactly how fond he was of this beauty, he climbed a treetop and serenaded her at three A.M.

Brando is a free soul who has always believed in obeying his impulses. He was expelled from school because he felt he simply had to wire the classroom doors with explosives. Next morning his teachers were duly shocked. His classmates, however, thought so much of their quixotic colleague that they signed a petition demanding his immediate reinstatement.

By this time, however, Marlon was fed up with school and took a job north of Chicago digging irrigation ditches. A few weeks later he moved on to New York where his sister Frances was studying art in Greenwich Village. He decided to become an actor and enrolled at the New School for Social Research where his dramatics instructress was Stella Adler.

After a year at the New School and a season of summer stock on Long Island Brando was signed for I Remember Mama. Four plays later he was cast as the lead in Streetcar and after that, Hollywood beckoned and he came.

Brando was paid $45,000 and ten per cent of the profits for his work in The Men. In Streetcar he got $65,000. Viva Zapata! was good for $75,000. Julius Caesar and The Wild One brought him $100,000 each.

In five pictures, Marlon has grossed close to $400,000, approximately half of which he's given to the government in taxes.

When Marlon is working, all of his salary is sent to his father in Chicago. His father, in turn, sends him $100 each week. Added to this, Brando gets $50 a week from MCA, the talent agency that represents him.

"On 150 bucks a week," the actor says, "I get along very well. I have everything I want in the way of food, shelter, and entertainment. When I want to travel that's when I dig into the big loot. In Hollywood I try to rent a place, a house or something, that gives me a little privacy. In New York I have an apartment on 57th Street near Sixth Avenue. Nothing very big."

Actually, Marlon comes from a fairly well-to-do family. As a child in Omaha, Evanston, and Libertyville, these last two cities in Illinois, he always lived in large homes—there were never less than two in service—and he was sent to Shattuck, an expensive military academy.

With this sort of background it's a tribute to his sense of values that he understands the worth of a buck in this world. He believes more in the luxury of the mind than in luxurious material possessions of which he has practically none.

A FRIEND who's known him for many years says, "They can call Bud a wack, a screwball, a bum, anything they want to, but do you know any youngster in Hollywood who's handled himself better? In three years this kid has been starred in five of the best films. He's won all sorts of critical accolades. They gave him an Academy Award nomination for Zapata, and I predict he'll get another one for Julius Caesar."

"In three years he's earned enough dough to take care of himself for the rest of his life. He's never been mixed up in the slightest scandal. He's never been arrested for drunken driving or slugging a cop or any of the mistakes young guys are more or less expected to make."

"His head hasn't swelled one-eighth of an inch. If anything, success has made him more kind, more thoughtful, more considerate. He's been a good son to his parents, a good brother to his sisters and a good friend to his friends. The only people who dislike him are reporters he refuses to see on the grounds that they're 'scuffling hucksters'."

"I'm not saying he's perfect. He's got a lot of blind spots. Like he's death on movie magazines, hates them, but not without reason. A lot of them have made him look like a silly jerk, and the truth is that he's not."

"In a town of sophistry and sophisticates and snow-job artists, he's managed to hold his own by being honest, frank and outspoken. By being Brando, nobody else."

"If you know any other kid who's got a better record than Bud, who's made a better showing than him, I wish you'd speak up."

"This guy doesn't miss a trick. He's got all the right instincts. He's leaving Hollywood exactly at the right time. He's 29, and he's on top. That's the time to pull out—when you're on top."

hollywood's youngest mother

(Continued from page 53) was last February 27th, at which time Elizabeth Taylor turned 21 years old and became at long last officially, legally and irrevocably an adult. Later in the afternoon she slipped into her latest Amelia Grey dress and snapped on her pearls. Michael Wilding poured a round of very special champagne cocktails for his wife, himself, and Liz' brother, Howard and wife, Mara, who strolled in from the pool house where they've been staying ever since Private Taylor came back from Korea last Christmas Eve. After special toasts were drunk, they all set out for a special evening—Mrs. Wilding's first one out since her baby arrived and her first appearance in public.

They went to Romanoff's in Beverly Hills and as they entered, the tables buzzed. They buzzed again as the quartet strolled out, after Liz had gorged herself on a lean lamb chop, a spoonful of unbuttered peas, melba toast, tea and a reckless slice of high caloric birthday cake.

THE prevailing myth about Elizabeth Taylor is that she's the helpless, flighty, spoiled, beautiful-but-dumb child bride of a sophisticated, worldly wise British actor who knows all the answers.

People are funny that way. Often they prefer outworn fiction to current fact. But the up-to-date truth about Elizabeth Taylor Wilding's present existence is twice as interesting as her lingering legend—and that truth is that at an age when most girls are still toying with fraternity pins and chanting rah-rah songs, Elizabeth is already a purposeful and mature young woman running her own house, caring for her baby, making herself and the man she married ecstatically happy, and continuing her adult screen career. In the face of doubts, relentless publicity and head waggings ever since she flew to England to marry Michael Wilding, all Elizabeth has done is to record the most personally successful, fruitful and meaningful year of her entire life. As such she rates a 21 gun salute from MODERN SCREEN—not only as Hollywood's youngest mother, but its most triumphant young mother. Because Elizabeth's victory has been won against odds and under harrassing fire, with the weapons of courage, confidence, good sense, and the native wisdom and sure instincts of her sex. And with the help of a husband who as a close friend puts it, "is the first man Liz ever knew who treated her like the woman she was instead of the kid she was not."

"Liz has always wanted a home and children," says another girlhood friend. "She always mothered everything that came her way, whether it was birds, mice, kittens or puppy dogs. She was a little woman in a lot of ways before she ever had a date. Nobody ever called her domestic or mother's helper, because she was raised with servants, she's still untidy in a lot of ways and has no idea whatever of time. But emotionally she was prepared for motherhood the minute that was possible."

"As for Nicky Hilton and his complaint that he wanted to have kids but Elizabeth didn't, that's probably right. But the reason Elizabeth didn't was because she didn't want to have Nicky's children. She knew only too soon that her marriage couldn't last. She discovered her mistake on her honeymoon. Nobody in the world could have guessed that Nicky wasn't the nicest, steadiest, most sincere boy in the world before Elizabeth married him. Then almost the minute he shook the rice off his collar, he changed into a wild Indian whom Liz didn't recognize. But you notice what happened when she met a real man and married him, don't you?"

"It was hard for us who'd watched Elizabeth grow up the petted darling of the lot," says Helen Rose, her close friend and studio dress designer, "to believe that she was having her first baby. She acted as if she'd already had six."

But there was one thing Liz was particular about at that point—a home for her baby. Until Mike joined her in Hollywood she stayed with her secretary, Peggy Rutledge, in a furnished Beverly Hills apartment and Mike replaced Peggy when he arrived. The minute he did, the house hunt began. "I'm not going to bring my baby back to any furnished flat," Elizabeth stated. "I'm going to bring him home." But the search went on until a spare two months before the big event. They didn't find the right place until last November.

The reason was that in this project Elizabeth exhibited a surprising new trait. She set a strict price limit, very modest by Hollywood standards, from which she refused to budge, and she amazed brokers and Mike as well with her shrewd sizeups of properties which as any young couple knows, are deceptive to figure, unless you've had tons of experience or are an expert. For example, at the same time that they spotted their mountaintop eyrie, Elizabeth and Mike discovered another place for sale right on the beach at Santa Monica, a beautiful house with the right rooms and a front yard running down to the waves. Both the Wildings are beach bugs, especially Mike who looks on Southern California as the next best thing to his favorite spot, the French Riviera. Actually, both preferred the ocean front site, and besides the price was appreciably less. But Elizabeth thought beyond the seaside lure and shook her head.

"No, sir," she decided, "we can't afford it," which statement didn't make sense to the broker. "I know," explained Elizabeth. "We had a summer beach house once. You have to paint every year. Everything rusts. Your clothes fall apart. The linen mildews. The sand ruins your carpets. Too expensive."

She was just as sure-footedly practical about the prospective arrival of her son. Much to the confusion of her dithering mate. "Before, during and after her baby none of us worked up a wrinkle over Liz," smiles Barbara Thompson. "But we've had a few anxious moments about Mike."

That's always the way it is with first fathers. Michael Wilding was no exception. On the other hand, having babies is what little girls are made for and very obviously Elizabeth is not styled inadequately there, although she had the bad luck of a Caesarian delivery. Before that news broke however—three weeks before little Mike was due—his prospective dad had things meticulously figured out for the hospital dash. He'd already made a dozen speed trial runs up and down the twisting road, but there are some turns with sheer drops on the steep descent for which Liz's Cadillac had to slow down. He wasn't quite satisfied. One day Mike burst in with an inspired look on his face.

"I've got it," he cried, "the Jaguar. It's tiny, it really holds the road, and I can whiz you down with that in no time!"

"Have you figured out how you're going to squeeze me in the Jaguar?" inquired Liz.

THAT'S how impractical husbands can get in the emotional stress of approaching fatherhood, and that's the way it was with Mike Wilding—nervous as a witch while Liz stayed relaxed as a tabby cat. When the doctor summoned her for X-rays at last and announced that the baby was turning, that a dangerous breech-birth might develop, that a Caesarean seemed wise, Mike almost had to be carried out of the place, while Liz stayed as cool as a cucumber and the only complaint she made was, "I wanted five children and now my limit's three!" As if to comfort her, her poodle, GiGi, had the same trouble and had to have a Caesarean first.

Caesarean sections, of course, are no joke; in every respect they're a major operation. But while Mike rented a special room next to Elizabeth's for himself at the hospital saying, "I don't want him in the nursery. You know, they do mix up babies at hospitals now and then," (once in maybe 500,000 times!), Liz travelled for her encouchement as if she were going out to a party. Besides her own family and Mike, their good friends Michael and Maggie Rennie, and Barbara and Marshall Thompson gathered festively in her hospital room to wish the stork a happy landing. At that time, Elizabeth was scheduled for her delivery the next morning at eight. But at ten o'clock the doctor came in, shooed out the guests and rather apologetically asked if Mrs. Wilding would mind having her baby an hour from then. "Some emergency cases are coming in tonight. Tomorrow the operating room will be busy," he explained.

"Sure," said Liz, without batting an eye. So at 11 o'clock Michael Howard arrived, got obstrically spanked and let out his first protesting squawk.

He's emitted plenty of those since then, you can bet, and 99 per cent of them his different ways they both rely on her completely and need her. This has given Liz a confidence she used to lack and wiped out her long-standing inferiority complex better than a squad of psychiatrists could. Elizabeth has always been wanting the chance to prove she's more than a beautiful face and now she has it.

"I know this may be a hard opinion to sell," says one of their best pals, Marshall Thompson, "but between the two, Elizabeth actually seems more grown up to me than Mike—a funny thing to say maybe about a chap who was raised in the biggest city in the world, has lived all over Europe, and looks as sophisticated as Leslie Howard used to on screen. But Mike's so disarming, ingenuous and naive in his manner that sometimes, even I have almost a paternal feeling toward the guy."

The key to Michael Wilding's Ponce de Leon personality perhaps lies in what Stewart Granger said about his pal: Mike's an artist, not only in temperament but in fact. He was a professional artist before he ever turned actor, as he states blithely, "to make an easy living." He admits he doesn't like acting, he loves painting. Artists are notoriously young in heart and ageless in outlook.

Mike paints beautifully (he's done a knockout oil of Liz) when he isn't drinking in the view from the terrace through a spy glass which Liz' Uncle Howard gave him, a view that takes in half of Southern California including Catalina Island on a clear day. Or dipping every hour on the hour in their new pool. In her first chance to catch up on leisure hobbies in years Liz has cleaned up her brushes, too, and started some canvases. This mutual art kick, oddly enough, is what brewed the lone spat between the Wildings since they made a team. One day, when Mike left the unfinished portrait of Elizabeth lying around, Liz, lonesome and bored, grabbed a brush and finished it. Coming home that night Mike really hit the low roof of their home. "Don't ever do that again!" he raved, and Liz hasn't. Artists are funny that way—loving husbands or not. Your most devoted pup will bite you if you grab his bone.

OF course, their idyll is over by now and both Elizabeth Taylor and Michael Wilding are back in circulation and in movie make-up, Liz happily, Mike comparatively so. She's making Rhapsody at MGM, he's there in The Scarlet Coat. Whether that first Hollywood starring job will make Michael Wilding the standout success in America that he was in England, no one yet can say. Nor at this point can anyone accurately predict what two active careers in one household will do to a marriage which hasn't run into that hurdle before. But the smart Hollywood money is betting on continued bliss.

Elizabeth, of course, is really just getting started on that adult career and the only thing which seems likely to slow her down is what did last time—another baby. This, she says, is exactly what she intends to have soon, maybe next year, if the Good Lord wills it, so little Mike won't grow up a lonely, only child. And anyone who knows Liz is pretty sure she's not just popping her pretty lips on the subject, career or not.

Meanwhile, Mister and Mrs. Wilding are sitting pretty in a pretty little nest over which the Hollywood magpies don't fly much any more—or the mocking birds, either.

Maybe in time the scatterguns will stop rattling birdshot on the window panes of the girl who has everything—for the love of Mike. In only a year she's proved pretty satisfactorily that if she had any pin feathers left, they're gone by now and her wings are spread to match her mate's.

Marilyn Monroe is always late for appointments. The Monroe was like this before she became a star. One day Marilyn arrived late on a set and the assistant director reprimanded her, ending with: "You know, you can be replaced." Marilyn replied: "You can be replaced, too, but they wouldn't have to re-shoot you."

mother has heard. She had him right in the bed with her the morning after he was born, even though groggy with sedatives for the pain. "She really shouldn't have her baby yet, you know," the maternity nurse told Sara Taylor when she peeped in. "I've seen lots of mothers in my time, but I've never seen one so in love with her son as this one. I just couldn't deny her."

But while Liz is indeed foolish about Little Mike or "Boy," as his dad still calls him (from the lettering beads 'Boy Wilding' on his identification bracelet) she's not foolish with his kid. Not half so much as his Old Man is, and has been ever since he carefully steered the Cadillac with the bassinette inside back up the hill and home. Until recently he hadn't missed the awesome sight of a feeding. Recently when Liz and Mike started to get back in circulation, they were asked to an early dinner at the Thompsons one night and showed up at a quarter to six. But no sooner had they stepped inside the front door than Mike shot a look at his wrist watch, gasped, "I forgot—say, I've just got time!" and whirled again out the door to leap in his gray sports car. Politely, he yelled back, "Sorry, but he's getting his first solid food tonight at six. Can't miss that, you know. Be right back," and roared off. Liz watched him go with a smile—but she stayed where she was.

"Having both Mikes, Junior and Senior, is the most constructive and developing experience of Elizabeth's life," her best friend, Barbara Thompson, believes. "In Jane knows something about apartment houses. Her parents, before they were separated, used to manage one, and Janie has a good idea about overhead, expenses, the cost of linen, and taxes. As a girl she had to be careful with money. There was never any to throw around.

She and her husband looked at this apartment house in North Hollywood.

"Let's buy it," Jane said after a while. "It's good income property."

Geary Steffen, son of Willie Ritchie, the lightweight boxing champion of the world, 1912-1914, nodded. "I think you're right," he agreed. "We'll sign the papers."

Now, these two incidents, involving two young actresses of equal fame and popularity, point up the difficulty in dogmatically charging Hollywood with any definite, irrefutable effect upon the lives of young actors and actresses. For while it will pervert the sense of values in one player, Hollywood will strengthen it in another; so that it becomes specious to level a finger at the movie Mecca and accuse it with sweeping, denunciatory, all-inclusive charges.

If may well be, after all the circumstances are considered, that Hollywood is no worse for young players than New York, Chicago, London, or Peoria. In one sense it is certainly better, for it consistently provides young men and women with an unparalleled opportunity to acquire money and success, two factors which in turn, provide them with the opportunity of revealing their true characters.

If a young actress has enough strength of character to resist the temptations and pitfalls which are an integral part of show business, she will lead a good and substantial life.

If she doesn't, she will find herself tumbling from one marriage to another, from one love affair to another infatuation, from neurosis to neurosis, and finally into a state of perpetual wretchedness.

Over the years, however, it has become de rigueur, it has become fashionable to blame Hollywood for all the crimes, indiscretions, misdemeanors, and excesses of its constituents rather than blame the individuals themselves.

A few months ago, for example, New York City was rocked by a booming vice scandal. A prominent young café society playboy was accused of inducing several attractive girls to become prostitutes. The playboy was tried and found guilty. No one blamed New York City for this crime.

In Hollywood, however, when John Agar was arrested once again for drunken driving, people said, "Poor guy! Look at what Hollywood has done to him."

When Judy Garland, after falling in and out of love a dozen times, nicked her throat with a broken glass in a childish attempt at suicide, Hollywood was again charged with "lousing up that poor kid's life."

ACTUALLY, Hollywood is a loud, changing, tradition-less, exhibitionistic community which beckons to its bosom, no questions asked, any personality or talent who can help fill the coffers at the box-office.

In trying to determine what Hollywood does to youth, certain basic questions must be answered.

Would today's young stars have developed the same behavior and character patterns had they not come to Hollywood?

Is the motion picture industry responsible for perverting their sense of values, aging their minds, jading their lives, and incontrovertibly corrupting their morals?

Is it true that for years now Hollywood has taken impressionable and malleable young players and moulded them into narcissistic neurotics who have little regard for the sanctity of marriage and the stability of the family?

Is it true that Hollywood consistently spoils young actors and actresses?

To answer these questions intelligently—and by their sociological nature none of them may be answered with finality—it is best first to divide the players into two groups: those young stars whose formative youths were lived in Hollywood and those stars whose adolescence was spent elsewhere.

Shirley Temple, Margaret O'Brien, Liz Taylor, Lana Turner, Betty Grable, Judy Garland, Jackie Coogan, Jane Powell, Debbie Reynolds, Mickey Rooney, Deanna Durbin, Mitzi Gaynor, Peggy Ann Garner, and possibly one or two others belong in the first group. These are Hollywood-bred products.

The vast majority of contemporary

Hear about the tourists in Hollywood who asked for a tour of the cemeteries? They wanted to visit the stars they've been seeing in old movies on TV.

young stars, however, were not raised in Hollywood. Doris Day, Dale Robertson, Bob Wagner, Rock Hudson, Scott Brady, Van Johnson, June Allyson, Ava Gardner, Jeanne Crain, Anne Baxter, Leslie Caron, Esther Williams—even though one or two of these attended school in Los Angeles—they were reared away from the motion picture business and did not go to school on the studio lots.

Is there any appreciable difference between these two groups? Is one happier or better adjusted than the other? Is the divorce rate higher in either of these two categories?

You will discover that with half a dozen exceptions, practically every well-known Hollywood actress has been divorced at least once.

Lana Turner, Betty Grable, Liz Taylor, Shirley Temple, Judy Garland, Mona Freeman, Marilyn Monroe, Esther Williams, Shelley Winters, Terry Moore, Rita Hayworth—the list is endless.

Many of these young stars were divorced long before they came to Hollywood, but Hollywood is still blamed for the relatively high divorce rate these players have established; and yet as we know, Janet Leigh, Dale Robertson, Dan Dailey, Doris Day, Esther Williams, and Shelley Winters were all one-time marital losers before their movie careers really began to get underway.

What Hollywood has done—and it is in the nature of the business to do it—is to mature its child stars too quickly and to spoil them rotten in the process. This is unavoidable.

When Liz Taylor was a child at MGM, she was being fawned upon by adults who catered to her slightest whim.

When she attended classes at the studio school her classmates were other precocious children. In her workaday world she had little contact with the normality other girls of her age were living every day. Wherever Liz went she was surrounded by adults. Scarcely in her teens she was playing love scenes with Robert Taylor.

Whether constant contact with adults, particularly adult males, hastens the maturation process in young girls this writer doesn't know, but it is a statement of fact that practically all Hollywood child stars bloom physically at a relatively early age.

When Lana Turner was 15, she looked so physically provocative that Mervyn LeRoy cast her in highly seductive "older" parts.

As for Liz Taylor, she always had more girlfriends than girlfriends. Vic Damone, Stanley Donen, Arthur Loew, Jr., Bill Pawley, Glenn Davis, Montgomery Clift, Tom Breen, Jerome Courthand—these are just a few who come quickly to mind. She has always been the Queen Bee from whom the men have wanted some honey. She has always been a classic example of beauty, glamor, and sex appeal, Hollywood's three outstanding marketable commodities.

Had Liz Taylor never come to Hollywood, had her mother, a frustrated actress in her own right, never put the child in movies, the chances are that Liz would have developed more normally, in a slower tempo.

She might have gone on to college, furthered her education, broadened her ken. She probably would have had just as many boys in her life, for after all, she's irresistibly beautiful, but the adoration would have begun at a much later age.

Gary Cooper once said, "It's darn hard kissing a beautiful woman 20 or 30 times and not feeling anything, even though it is play-acting." And Coop was a grown man when he said that. Take a 15-year-old girl and let her play tempestuous love scenes with handsome, well-developed leading men and you're going to stimulate her whole glandular setup and change her whole outlook on life. To her, love and sex and men and marriage will soon become the beginning and the end of all existence.

THE simple truth is that you cannot introduce a young girl into the motion picture business and expect her to lead a normal life. (The same holds for young men.)

It was tried with Shirley Temple who fortunately had intelligent, well-balanced parents; but even they failed. They put Shirley in an exclusive finishing school after she had made a million as a child star. But it was the same old story. Shirley was physically and mentally precocious. She was anxious to become a part of the adult world that had for years revolved around her.

Obsessed by the great goddess, Love, spoiled and long-accustomed to adults and their ways, she fell quickly in love with a schoolmate's brother, John Agar.

Her parents tried to delay the wedding. They knew Shirley was too young for wifehood. But Shirley had earned a fortune. Studio employees had pampered and petted her for a dozen years. Hollywood had made her financially independent of her parents.

She wanted to marry Agar, and come hallelujah or high water, that's exactly what she was going to do. Neither Shirley nor Agar knew what marriage was all about. Neither of them had been prepared for the compromise, the give-and-take, the mutual consideration involved in a partnership. The divorce was inevitable.

The same thing happened to Lana Turner, Betty Grable, and Loretta Young. They entered the motion picture game at an early age. They all were very beautiful. Men old enough to be their fathers—agents, casting directors, cameramen—flattered their egos, made passes, whispered sweet nothings. At an early age the sex instinct was aroused.

A year or two of this, and a girl is sure that she's become an authority on men, that she can discriminate between the real thing and the phony.

Loretta Young's mother advised Gretchen—that's Loretta's real name—not to marry Grant Withers. Only Loretta felt at the time that she knew much more than mother. Later, she had the marriage annulled.

Lillian Grable was dead set against Betty's marrying Jackie Coogan and her later escapades with fighting George Raft. But Betty was the breadwinner, and she was determined to lead her own love life, and she loused it up considerably until she found real happiness with Harry James.

Mildred Turner had many a spat with daughter Lana about love and men—in fact, she moved out of their apartment—but impetuous Lana went right ahead marrying Artie Shaw and Steven Crane. "I asked for it," she said later. And she got it, too.

Ava Gardner when she first arrived in Hollywood, was warned from many sources about Mickey Rooney. She wouldn't listen. As a result she wound up with $25,000 and a broken heart. Also a master's degree in disillusion.

ONE of Hollywood's shortcomings is that it throws young actresses into contact more or less exclusively with show-business characters. Unfortunately, actors and entertainers make the world's worst husbands. They are interested too much in themselves.

When Ava was going with Frank Sinatra, she was asked if her intentions were honorable. "Do you think I'm nuts?" she cried. "Marry Sinatra? Why should I do a thing like that? I've learned my lesson. I've been married to two guys in show business." A few months later the doll from North Carolina became Mrs. Frank Sinatra and has been fighting with the Thin Man ever since. It is popular to say that Hollywood ruined Ava Gardner. The truth is that Ava has always been her own worst enemy.

A director who has been in Hollywood 25 years and therefore prefers to remain nameless, says, "It's been my experience that parents and especially mothers, do more to ruin young players than Hollywood ever does. These movie mothers are career-crazy.

"Who puts a young girl into the movies in the first place? Usually it's the mother. Why? There are two reasons. One is money. The other is that the mother wants to enjoy stardom vicariously. Usually she's loused up her own life and now wants another chance through her daughter.

"Talk to Betty Grable. She'll tell you that she never wanted to become an actress. It was her mother who planned it for her. Betty has a sister who lives in the valley, happily married and all of that. Doesn't have as much money as Betty but never had her sad experiences, either.

"Take Peggy Ann Garner. Her mother wanted Peggy to become a movie star so badly that she passed bad checks, did everything in the book, finally wound up in the clink.

"With Judy Garland, it was the same bit. Her mother wanted the girl to get ahead, to become a big movie star. All of these cases follow a pattern. Mother takes daughter and puts her in movies. Daughter is besieged by men who like her looks, like her figure, like her youth. The mother becomes alarmed. She tells the young girl to stay away from men. They're heels. They've got bad intentions. By now that daughter is supporting the mother, so she tells the old lady to go whistle. Next thing you know mother and daughter are fighting, and the daughter runs off and gets married.

"Right away Hollywood's to blame. That's a lot of bunk. We're not here to build character for young actors and actresses. That's a parental job and an educational job. We're here to build and develop and exploit talent. Our primary purpose is very simple—to make money.

"You get a young actress who's been reared well, who comes from a good family—not a broken home—who's had a little religious training—girls like that never go wrong. Jane Russell, Jeanne Crain, Leslie Caron, Susan Hayward, Debbie Reynolds, Esther Williams. These kids have character.

"I've been around this town a long time, and I've yet to see one young girl of character corrupted by this environment. The bad girls have been corrupted long before they got here.

"I remember how Esther Williams was once propositioned by a big executive who promised to make her a great star. 'If I've got what it takes,' Esther said, 'I'll be a success. If I haven't, you're not going to help me.'

"In the final analysis, it's the public that makes the star. A girl who is willing to relax her moral scruples may encourage some unscrupulous producer into giving her a picture. But if the public doesn't go for the girl, she's out and there's nothing the producer can do about it. He can't afford to lose the stockholders' money in order to satisfy his own love-life.

"HOLLYWOOD, despite its many detractors, is a very wonderful place. Nowhere else in the world do youngsters get the opportunity we give them out here. What we're looking for is talent and personality. We're not interested in background or family connections. The salaries we pay are higher than in any other line of business. Those few stars who've ruined themselves out here would've ruined themselves anywhere. Never forget that!

"Every man carries the seed of his own destruction. If he plants it in fertile soil—and I concede that Hollywood is fertile soil—it will burgeon. If through proper parental training he is taught to lead a clean, decent, upstanding life, you can place him in a den of thieves, and he will emerge an honest man."

It is a mistake, of course, to try to pass judgment on Hollywood youth by employing the yardstick applied to residents of the average community, for Hollywood is an atypical district peopled by ambitious, self-centered, emotional, exhibitionistic youngsters who crave and hunger for the immediate recognition of their talents.

Under the circumstances, it is remarkable that in the past ten years only two or three of these youngsters have irreparably muddled their lives. Judy Garland, Deanna Durbin, Shirley Temple, Mickey Rooney, Lana Turner, Betty Grable—all these headline-makers are currently living in wealth and happiness, which goes to prove that Hollywood isn't such a bad place after all, not even for les enfants terribles. END

Myron accused Milton of slighting him when Miltie was in Miami and went to all the local night clubs except the one featuring Myron... NBC officials are sore at Paulette Goddard, for walking out of a TV show and claiming she had the flu. Then she confided to columnist Earl Wilson that she wasn't sick at all. She just didn't like the script given her. Joan Blondell, who substituted, had no trouble at all with the same script!

RENDERING UNTO CAESAR: For the past few years, Sid Caesar has been quietly collecting his $10,000 a week for his work on "Show of Shows" and commuting to a modest middle-class apartment on the outskirts of New York City. But with his recent raise (to $14,000) he and Florence have decided they can afford to move—to an eight room suite on Park Avenue. It's a cooperative apartment building, and Sid explains that the $13,000 purchase price could easily be reclaimed if he wanted to sell.

He's given up collecting guns since killing his first deer in the Catskills and turned to golf and collecting modern paintings. The whole family has the art bug—Sid browses through the 57th St. galleries whenever he has an off afternoon and Florence and five-year-old Shelley—short for Michelle—are taking a mother-daughter course in water-colors at the Museum of Modern Art.

The new apartment has an unlisted phone, and the address is carefully protected. Sid gets off from daily rehearsals in time for a typical businessman's homecoming at 6:30 every evening, practices putting in the living room (as does Shelley with her midget clubs) and even Robert (now one, and a hefty 34 pounds) swings a mallet.

Two years of psycho-analysis has made Sid a little more secure and calm, but he still isn't able to really relax and enjoy vacations. A few summers ago he and Florence planned an easy-going eight week tour through Europe. They sailed on the SS Liberté, spent three days in Paris and took a plane back home. "We missed the kids," Sid explains. "There was no one to talk to." During the winter Sid and his brother Dave tried it again at a mountain lodge in the Catskills. Sid lasted a week. "I went crazy! Too much quiet," he says. "I went home, lay in bed for four days sleeping and got up only for consommé and steak. Greatest vacation I ever had!"

Imogene Coca and her husband, Bob Burton, are close friends of the Caesars; the foursome went to Florida together last March for the most recent attempt at a Caesar rest cure.

DENNIS JAMES' NARROW ESCAPE: I went up to New Rochelle to see Dennis James' "dream house." It's a 10-room $150,000 granite house on Echo Bay, and Dennis bought it for his bride, the former Margaret E. Crawford of Newcastle, Pa. He tells me how, one day, as he was working in the garage, the overhead door collapsed on his head and sent him reeling across the garage and into the kitchen entrance. He was found later in a pool of blood, and rushed to a hospital, where 16 stitches were required on his head. Dennis has since installed an electronically-controlled garage door that lifts when he presses a button in the car, as it approaches the garage.

JIMMY BOYD SEES THE STATUE: Jimmy Boyd, whose recording of "I Saw Mommy Kissing Santa Claus" brought him a fortune, went to New York for TV work. And there he realized his life's ambition: to see the Statue of Liberty. When he got to the Battery, to take the boat to the Statue, he wanted to swim it. He insisted he could have swum it easily! But he was persuaded to go the normal way.

Jimmy tells me he is already accustomed to being interviewed about his life. "But when I'm with kids my age, I want to play. And when they want to talk about my records, then I know they're not real pals."

THE MEN: Tom Ewell, a big hit in The Seven-Year Itch, is selling his farm house in New Hope, Pa., and renting a New York apartment. Busy with his new TV show, he relaxes by playing poker, and confesses, "I always lose. Sometimes when a poker game is going and I don't have much time, I just push my money under the door and leave. Save time that way." . . . Roger Price, recently divorced from actress Anita Martell, has rented an apartment in New York and is finishing his second book, a satire about an ape that's mistaken for a human . . . Paul Winchell is the latest TV personality to come down with a stomach ailment that's the result of tension. Ed Sullivan, Red Skelton, and Eddie Cantor have had similar troubles. There's no doubt that TV is a killing medium . . . The hot rod craze is sweeping TV. Robert Montgomery, Herb Shriner, Dave Garroway, Ernie Kovacs and Herb Sheldon have gone in for foreign speed and odd-shaped cars. Not only that, but Shriner has become a promoter of motor car shows. . . . Jackie Gleason organized an orchestra and went into La Vie En Rose, for a much-publicized two weeks, as a favor to an old pal, Monte Proser. Jackie, who can't read music, drew union scale of $225 a week. It was fun the first week, with all the other comedians coming around for laughs. But, during the second week, the kicks were gone and Jackie got bored with the whole affair. So he just walked out.

THE WOMEN: Marguerite Piazza, whose second husband died suddenly Christmas week, seems to have recovered her good spirits. She's brought back her sons, Gregory, 4, and Graves, 1, from New Orleans, where they were staying with Marguerite's mother. And she has gone on a jewelry binge. She has switched to rather severe dresses so she can wear the maximum number of heavy bracelets, huge rings, jewel-studded leather belts, charm chokers, and cameo brooches . . . Gale Storm was hospitalized with flu the same day that Hollywood was flooded with heavy rains. Local papers carried a story headed, "New Storm On Way," with a picture underneath of Gale in hospital. Friends who read the papers hurriedly came to the wrong conclusion and started sending her congratulations on her new "baby." . . . Joan Davis has been sending 16 mm films of her TV show to her parents near St. Paul because their TV reception is poor. So many neighbors dropped in to see the films, however, that now Papa Davis runs the films in the local school auditorium, for all to see . . . Because so many fans believe Marie Wilson is, in real life, what she portrays in My Friend Irma—a stenographer—CBS has had to hire two stenographers to decipher fan letters written in shorthand. Marie, of course, knows nothing about steno. . . . Lucille Ball, busy with the new baby, relaxes by playing the Hammond organ that Desi gave her when their son was born. So far, she has mastered only, "Home On The Range."

(Continued from page 42) is that Clooney likes people. She isn't truly happy unless she is surrounded by at least three other human beings, and when she first arrived on the Paramount lot she asked rather shyly if she could have the corner dressing room. This particular 10' by 30' space is assiduously avoided by other actresses, as it is situated at the junction of two studio streets that must be passed by everyone who enters the lot. This is precisely why Rosie wanted it and nowadays if it contains Clooney it also contains a round dozen other people. They pass by in countless numbers and every one of them yells, "Hey, Rosie!" And Clooney always bellows, "Come on in!"

When she walks down a studio street the windows go up as though a Manhattan parade were approaching. Seamstresses, cutters, carpenters, messenger girls—all of them have to call a greeting, and Rosie grins wide and roars, "Hi, Dad!" to the men and, "Hi, Mother!" to the women. The expressions are typical of Clooney who is amusing when she talks. Her conversation is sprinkled with such ticklers as, "I was out of my skull", referring to a headache, and, speaking of a dramatic role she had done on a radio show, "I was pretty awful. You may consider that I am no longer the Mary Pickford of song."

ROSIE likes to kid herself, and it is the firm opinion of those who know her that she will be the absolute last to lose her head over the success that is pouring in upon her so fast. Two years ago she was practically an unknown, recording songs for Columbia that consistently missed being hits. Then came the famous "Come On-A My House" and the Clooney craze began. Despite the raucous jiggle of "Come On-A My House" it was suddenly discovered by her new fans that Rosemary could spin a ballad with such heart that listeners were mesmerized into utter adoration. Disc jockeys began talking about her in their sleep, theater managers clamored for her presence on their stages, and the kids who were lucky enough to be given her records for children included her in their prayers. More than a year ago the manager of a large record shop said, "There's an awful lot of popular junk we have to stock all the time. People buy it—I don't know why—but even though I've studied music seriously for years, after listening to this stuff all day long I'm happy to slip in a Clooney record. That girl is a real artist, and remember when I say that I'm pretty jaded where singers are concerned. For my money, she's the only one worthy to record a song. And she can sing anything." Then Rosie hit Hollywood, via Paramount Studios, and when her first picture The Stars Are Singing was previewed, audiences knew a star had been born.

There has been an overpowering storm of adulation, yet Rosie remains untouched by it. She has not even bothered to keep a set of her own records for herself. She takes the success, particularly the Hollywood part of it, with a great deal of sense, for she knows that a movie career is a lot more consistent than that of a recording artist who is only as good as his or her last release.

She also accepts Hollywood much in the spirit of a wide-eyed kid, and with two pictures behind her and two planned for the future (Red Garters and White Christmas, the latter with Crosby), still goggles at other celebrities. The first time full movie make-up was applied to her face she was as delighted as a kitten with a ball of string, refusing to wash her face until the last minute before she climbed into bed that night. "I only wished I could have had eight recording dates that day." The first time she met Bing Crosby, who is the idol of other singers as well as run-of-the-mill citizens, she stood speechless and unable to move. Bing made a stab at conversation. "I understand we're going to do a show together soon." Rosie nodded dumbly and Bing tried again. "What's the date of that show, anyway?"

By now Rosie's eyes were glazed over. "Oh, sometime in the 20's," she said.

Later she explained to him that she was not a complete idiot, that she had only been stunned, for later Rosie was to learn that nothing embarrasses Bing quite so much as people who refuse to relax in his presence. It was after she had learned to talk with him easily that Bing dealt Rosie her favorite compliment. "I think you're the best singer in the business," he said.

It has remained her favorite because it can't be topped, for according to Rosie's lights, singing a song well is the best thing that can happen to her. She does it constantly in a busy schedule of perpetual personal appearances, guest spots on radio and television shows, recording the tunesmiths' products, and making movies. She is busier than the old woman who lived in a shoe, yet always takes time to talk to people.

Last February she left for New York after finishing Here Come The Girls with Bob Hope, then returned to Hollywood for a week of engagements which included a premiere in her honor, four radio programs, assorted TV shows, interviews, posing for art and taping two radio shows with Bing. There was plenty to think about on the plane winging its way toward Hollywood, but as we've already stated, Rosie likes people. She sat down next to a young girl and immediately started a conversation. "What's your name?" Rosie wanted to know.

"Rosemary," said the girl.

"Honest?" said Clooney. "So's mine!"

The girl smiled and said, "I know." It came out that she was flying to California to be married to a trumpet player in Hildegard's band. It was her first plane ride and her first trip to the west coast.

Clooney bounced happily in her seat. "Tell you what—why don't you and your Jerry have lunch with me the day I'll be spending at Paramount? I think it's Tuesday."

That was to be the couple's wedding day, but they weren't going to miss Clooney. They took their blood tests at 11 o'clock in the morning and were told to come back for their marriage license after a two-hour period. So they hot-footed it to Paramount where they had lunch with Rosemary, and then slipped into the retinue of people who follow her around the lot. At four that afternoon they were still in the gallery and watching Clooney pose for a barrage of cameras. In a free moment she galloped over to where they sat, seemingly more enchanted with her than with each other. "Hey, today's almost lost! When are you kids going to get married?"

The other Rosemary beamed. "I've waited three years—what's one more day? We'll get married tomorrow."

The compliment might well have sailed unnoticed over the head of another movie star, but not Rosie. She put her arms around the reluctant bride and said, "That's the nicest thing anybody ever said to me." And Clooney meant it, every word.

If Rosie is warmhearted toward strangers she is naturally more so with her own family. The telephone wires hum between Rosie's current location and the dress shop

WE SAW IT HAPPEN

Two days after Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh were married, we were looking out of the window of a dress shop close to the famous "Club 21" in New York. A young couple passing down the street stopped to kiss.

We realized it was Mr. and Mrs. Tony Curtis and when they finished kissing they looked up and saw us watching them. Tony whispered something in Janet's ear, they both smiled, and waved at us before walking on.

managed by her mother in Wilmington Delaware, her younger sister Betty who records for the Coral label, and her still younger (19) brother Nicky who is a disc jockey on a Wilmington radio station. Recently Nicky went to New York to spend a week-end with his now famous sister, and in the process of conversation showed her a clipping about himself. It stated that Nicholas Clooney, disc jockey, aspired to writing the whole book, music and lyrics of a musical comedy. Rosie whooped at her kid brother. "The lies you tell!"

"I'm serious," he said. "Here," and he took from his pocket the music and lyrics of a song he had written, among others, for his planned show. At this point Rosie can pick her own songs for recording, and she considered that she would drop an atom bomb into Nicky's lap.

"This is nice," she said. "You know—I just might record it."

And Nicky threw a hydrogen bomb back at her. "Uh-uh," he said. "It would break up the score."

The Clooney family is Irish, pure green on both sides, and there ensued an argument that any Englishman would have steered clear of. The Clooney kids never argued about anything except music, and when that happened they made up in quality for what they lacked in quantity. Each one of the three was blessed with a good voice, a fact which is slightly mysterious as none of their forebears could trill anything more complicated than "My Country 'Tis of Thee." Pop Clooney did all right according to Rosemary, but, "Mom is a stylist—she sings out of tune." Back in Maysville, Kentucky, when the kids were little, they'd latch on to a new tune and learn to sing it and from then on it was considered solely his or her property. If either of the other two sprouts dared to sing it, he or she was promptly clobbered by the proprietor.

At any rate, Rosie won this particular tangle, and her latest record release is "It Happened To Happen To Me"—composer, Nicholas Clooney.

MUSIC—popular music—just comes naturally to Rosie. She is frank to admit that she knows little about classical music. "I've just never been exposed to it," she says in understatement. From the beginning her life was filled with ballads and blues, and there wasn't a symphonic recording in the house. From the time she began to sing in public there has been no time to do anything except sing some more. Mitch Miller, top tune picker at Columbia, has given her a fine library of classical recordings, and when Rosie has had a half hour in between engagements or planes she has spent the period listening to Brahms or Sibelius. "You know," she says, wide-eyed with the pleasure of discovery, "it's beautiful. I hope I have time to learn more about it."

Rosie's honesty is no small part of her charm. "People are always asking me whether I prefer golf or tennis. I can't do any of those ladylike things. I can't even swim—not a stroke. But ask me about baseball or football. I was a whiz at those. Back home I played shortstop on the local nine." She flatly declares she's tired of seeing The Stars Are Singing (seven times for various business functions), and says she hated school. "I dodged math all the way through high school and finally had to put up with it in my senior year." She speaks candidly about her attempts to charm the 3,600 disc jockeys in America. "I phone and write about 150 of them, I guess. The poor guys get 64 new releases in a week, and you can't expect them to play yours unless there's a personal touch somewhere."

Her appetite has already been chronicled by dozens of writers who are happy at last to find a girl who's willing to admit that she loves food and lots of it . . . and who states she has to be careful about weight. Most movie stars exist on half-hearted salads and black coffee, and would sooner lose an eyelash than confess they gain weight at the drop of an hors d'oeuvre. Not Rosie. She pats her imaginary paunch woefully and says, "I've got a singer's diaphragm, and if I'm not careful, that's where the spaghetti goes." She has a penchant for Italian food, created in the days when she sang with Tony Pastor's orchestra. Most of the boys in the band were of Italian parentage, and whenever they hit a home town the resident musician would invite Rosie over for Mom's lasagna or fettucinni. Rosie hasn't been able to resist Italian dishes since, and tells gleefully of the time she was foiled.

"You know how, when photographers take pictures of you with food, they just half cook it so that it looks fresh? Once during my ignorant days they put a bowl of lasagna in front of me and I couldn't wait until the picture was finished so that I could dig in. Well, I dug in. And, Mother, they had to pry my mouth open."

ROSEMARY even acknowledges the fact that she smiles at a lot of people at times when she couldn't feel less like smiling. "When you're on the way up they make excuses for you, but when you've arrived you're expected to be Miss Enchantment of 1953. It's hard sometimes—very hard."

She was amazed at the shrewdness of her grandmother on this score when she talked with her recently back in Maysville. Grandmother Guilfoyle has never been closer to show business than the local movie house, yet she put her finger on the burden that is hardest to bear.

"You're working too hard, Rosie," she said.

"Poof," said Clooney. "I like it this way. You know that."

"Rosie . . . how many people have you been nice to today when you were too tired to be nice?"

Perhaps she gathered the idea from the reception given Rosie by Maysville when The Stars Are Singing was premiered there. The town's normal population of 6,600 was swelled to 20,000, and the streets (one of them named Rosemary Clooney Street) were festooned with flags and banners. There was a parade, and there were speeches and it was one of the biggest days in Maysville's history. Rosie was the heroine and wherever she went there was a crush of people, all of them shouting hello and trying to grab her hand. For Rosie it was the thrill of her life, and her smiles that day came from a grateful heart.

Maysville was the only home she has ever known. Since childhood it has been a series of one night stands, graduating to weekly engagements, and by now she is harder to pin down than an ounce of mercury. "Home" to Rosie is either her apartment in New York, which she used to share with best friend Jackie Sherman, or the Beverly Hills home she has rented. Unfortunately, the friendship between Jackie and Rosemary has cooled considerably, because Jackie could never get along with Rosie's favorite beau, José Ferrer.

Between the two homes are 3,000 miles, and she covers them continually. When she makes it to Beverly Hills she is greeted effusively by her cocker spaniel Sam, who for no particular reason is a man hater. Sam will make up to anything in skirts, but disdainfully ignores any male who enters the house, a mental habit that will have to change with a girl as adorable as Rosie.

She seems to have captured the country, from the farmer's daughter to the tycoon's son and including the editors of Time Magazine. The cover portraits painted for the magazine of statesmen, royalty and scientists inevitably stay with the artists, who prize them for their own showings each year. To our knowledge this has been the fate of every painting except that of Rosemary Clooney, for which she sat from 9:30 one night until 2 o'clock in the morning, the only time she could wiggle out of her schedule. That one was bought by Time Magazine, who paid painter Boris Chaliapin the sum of $2,000 for it, and then proudly presented it to Clooney.

If love and affection, professional respect and admiration are music to our Rosie's ears, it looks very much as if she shall have music wherever she goes. END

SO FRESH!

DOES A THOROUGH JOB

All of this was fine for Shelley, but mighty embarrassing for Farley. Stuck with all the promises of undying devotion between them, some of which were thrust into his mouth by irresponsible columnists, Mr. Granger made a few terse statements congratulating Shelley. Then he withdrew into silence. He was not heartbroken by any means, although a great portion of the public looked upon him as a defeated warrior being carried off the field of romance on his own battered shield.

Many months passed. Apparently Farley had come to the realization that he must use considerably more restraint. At least, he carefully avoided public appearances with numerous little starlets who had in mind becoming Farley's next "big moment" for the sake of hitting the headlines. One flashy little number told this reporter: "If I can get this guy to date me a few times I may wind up with a nice studio contract. All I have to do is tell my boy friend to get lost. I'll date Farley for dinner and meet my guy later." Unfortunately for her grandiose plans, and fortunately for Farley, her plot didn't work.

STILL more time swept across the calendar. Then, as in a well-written play, the curtain came up again. On stage came the lissome figure of Dawn Addams, pert, blonde and looking a lot like Janet Leigh. The first time Farley Granger appeared with her in public no one paid any attention. Then, after the third date, photographers began to take notice. "This," they told their editors, "looks like a romance."

Wires flashed across the country. Magazines went to press with an odd assortment of stories. Dawn Addams was the girl who would cure Farley's broken heart. Dawn Addams was going to give Farley the publicity romance a romantic movie star needs. Dawn Addams was a clever little girl who was going to do a lot for Dawn Addams.

It so happens that none of the stories were true. Like Shelley Winters, Dawn might shout, "I don't need Farley Granger for publicity!" Unlike Shelley, she might add, being a highly intelligent girl, "If I wanted publicity Farley would be about the last man I'd date to get it." No offense to Mr. Granger, a wise girl would know that the public probably will never again really believe a romance in his name unless he should suddenly elope and show up the next day in Hollywood with a bride.

Frankly, the situation is one that can reflect considerable undeserved talk about Dawn Addams. True, she is fond of Farley. She openly admits it. What is more to the point is that Dawn Addams is a good friend of Shelley's. They are so close that Shelley, after she married Vittorio, suggested to Dawn that she start seeing a little of Farley, who was getting very lonesome.

Shelley and Dawn are such good friends that just before Mrs. Gassman's baby was born, Dawn borrowed some of Shell's luggage for a trip to New York. They first became friends during the now-lamented jaunt Shelley and Farley took to Europe. Dawn, an English actress, was engaged at the time, and was working in a picture called The Hour Of 13, with Pete Lawford. She liked Farley very much, but not romantically. And that's the situation as it stands right now.

"To be truthful," she says, "I don't know 96 or care what anyone else thinks of Mr.

Granger. I like him because I believe he is a sincere boy. You know, I frequently have people come to my home for an evening. Frequently they'll say, 'What are we going to do?' If I say, 'Oh, nothing much—maybe we'll just sit around and talk,' they seem disappointed. I don't know why Hollywood is a place in which everyone has to be 'doing' something every minute, but that's the way it is.

"Farley is different from most young men. He enjoys a group of people who may sit around until six A.M., just talking about anything that may come to their minds—politics, religion, acting, sex. His company is always stimulating."

On the other hand, Farley has this to say about Dawn: "I love to take her to parties because she's resourceful and self-sufficient. I don't have to dance constant attendance upon her because she enjoys others at affairs as well as she enjoys the group she's with."

All the elements of romance seem to be present; yet anything you may read in columns or magazines about blossoming love between the two is strictly for the birds.

Joe E. Lewis was asked what the "E" in his name stands for . . .
"I took it," he gagged, "from Lizbeth Scott."

Walter Winchell in
The N.Y. Daily Mirror

Sure, they date two or three times a week and their activities are a little reminiscent of the old days between Shelley and Farley. For instance, one night Farley arrived to call for Dawn, impeccably attired in black tie and tux. Dawn came racing downstairs in blue jeans, all set for the Venice Pier Amusement Park.

"We made every shooting gallery and rode on every dizzy contraption in the joint," Farley says. "Dawn in dungarees and I in full dress. Believe me, I never had such a terrific time before in my life."

Right here it would be very easy to twist the facts. If he never had a more terrific time, that could mean that he has more fun with Dawn than he ever had with Shelley. And if he had it bad for Shelley in the romance department, he could be about ready to get down on his knees to Dawn.

THAT'S not going to happen for a couple of big reasons. In the first place, Dawn is not naive, nor is she an opportunist. True, she has had enough difficulty gaining recognition in Hollywood to make a publicity romance with a star of Farley's proportions an attractive temptation. But this is one mistake she is not going to make, unless over-zealous editors make it for her.

When she first came to Hollywood, and signed a seven year contract with Metro, she thought she was on her way. "Do you know what a seven year contract can mean?" she asks. "Almost nothing. When the first option comes up in six months you may be 'dead.' At first, I was all excited. I played a couple of small parts; then I discovered that almost everything that was ideal for me was also ideal for Janet Leigh. We don't really look alike, but we're the same type. I haunted the casting department. A wonderful part came along in Ivanhoe. People stopped me on the studio streets to congratulate me on my test. Someone else (Joan Fontaine) got the part. Another fine opportunity went to Diana Lynn. I'm not blaming the studio. The things I could do were turned over to people with 'names.'

"Then I went on a personal appearance tour. When I came home, I was called into the office of Mr. Big and congratulated on doing a fine job. A few days later came the news that I was being dropped. It was tough to take at the time."

Shelley Winters helped to bolster Dawn's spirits. She could have told her: "Look, I have a swell idea. Since they want people with a name, why don't you get yourself one by having a hot romance with Farley Granger?" She didn't. But she did help Dawn meet people who could help her. One of these was the publicist, Russell Birdwell. They had a long talk. Dawn told him many things, including the fact that when she first went to Metro, she felt that she wanted to develop strictly on the basis of her talent alone. For instance, when the studio press agents asked her to give them a bathing suit sitting, she demurred. "I don't want leg art," she told them.

For Mr. Birdwell and the outstanding photographer, Johnny Engstead, she climbed into a bathing suit. The results were gratifying. She did other things that previously had been on the order of "revolting." People began to pay attention. Not only did this girl have talent. She was real gone in the sex appeal department. This, plus a good job of pounding by her agent, Charles Feldman, produced results. Author F. Hugh Herbert, in writing the stage play, The Moon Is Blue, had included a character named Cynthia, who was talked about by the whole cast, but who never appeared in the flesh. When he did the movie version, he wanted to bring Cynthia to life. He and Director Otto Preminger conducted a long search for just the right girl to play the pixy-ish, wanton Cynthia. One good look at Dawn Addams convinced them, with the result that the public will get its first real look at this promising actress when she hits the screen, playing the lusty temptress.

Then, free of a forbidding contract, Dawn was signed to play the role of the bank president's daughter on the new Alan Young Sunday CBS television show. But, the most important thing that has happened to Dawn Addams—considerably more important than being Farley Granger's girl—is her assignment to play a small but potent part in The Robe.

ALL these things have come about without the knowledge of those who may start accusing her of "doing a Shelley Winters" with Farley Granger. As anyone can plainly see, the trend of events can do a grave injustice to this 23-year-old girl who very apparently has every opportunity to reach the popularity proportions of a Piper Laurie or a Janet Leigh in another year's time.

But don't blame the "romance" on Dawn Addams for just one more important reason. She happens to be in love. Not with Farley Granger, but with the terrific French actor, Claude Dauphin, whom you may have seen in April In Paris, with Doris Day, and certainly should see with Bing Crosby in Little Boy Lost. Claude is in Paris now. When he returns, this romance might suddenly end in marriage.

It might end another way, too, unless Mr. Dauphin is wise enough to discount the things he may be reading in the papers these days about Dawn and Farley.

Perhaps Farley Granger is aware of all this. Perhaps he isn't. One thing, however, is certain. If he wants to keep the friendship of Miss Addams as she most certainly wants to keep his, he'll have to take a leaf from his past experiences with Shelley Winters and make it very plain to everyone that this is only companionship.

The Shelley Winters-Farley Granger romance is now a legend, almost as ancient as the brief Greta Garbo-John Gilbert affiliation of a generation ago. May both rest in peace. And may the Dawn Addams-Farley Granger friendship remain exactly that as proof to the rest of young Hollywood that honesty is the best policy.

The picture was scheduled to go on in a few minutes and the electricians were just about to cut off the lights when a long studio limousine pulled up and Marilyn Monroe, alone, as usual, got out and stood uncertainly on the curb. She was dressed in a white gown, cut just a little below the accepted level, and as tight as the skin on a sausage. She carried a white fox stole casually, none of it covering her bare shoulders and back; and with her blonde hair glittering, her eyes doe'd to the fashion and her parted lips luscious-red, she was a sight to behold.

Well, the fans went wild, not just mildly or politely wild but crazy wild, boys and girls alike. And rightfully so, for we were there and must admit that Marilyn made the girls who had preceded her look like hens next to a peacock. As she posed for pictures, her chest high and heaving, one knee pushed provocatively forward and her lips quivering gently, she was just about as sexy a picture as even Hollywood has ever seen—and the fans threatened to riot in their tumultuous appreciation of the moment and the girl.

An executive from another studio stood just inside the lobby chewing an unlit cigar and glowering. He turned to an aide.

"Son," he said, "why can't we find somebody like that. Sex is what they want in the movies now-a-days. Sex with a big S."

"Yes, sir," the aide said, "sex."

In the calm light of the next day, however, an executive at 20th Century-Fox had an entirely different point of view. He had on his desk figures on the business being done by Niagara, and he was almost weeping.

"I can't understand it," he moaned. "We're top-billing Monroe. I was afraid they'd close down the picture in some places because we played her so sexy—but the picture's flopping. How do you figure it out?"

His immediate superior sat with his feet propped up on the desk. "There's only one way to figure it," he said. "Sex is not enough."

And it isn't. It might sell pictures to newspapers and magazines. It might make a star better known than Eisenhower. It might drive fans mad at public gatherings. But sex alone has never, in the history of Hollywood, been enough of an attraction on its own to fill movie theaters or keep a star's name in lights.

There is at the moment a fresh crop of sex queens being readied in Hollywood, presumably to steal some of Monroe's thunder, and all are expected by their studios to make the companies rich. But they won't. Not, that is, unless they have something more on the ball than the ability to create desire—and are handled as actresses rather than attractions.

The most promising new sex queen, most Hollywoodites admit, is Elaine Stewart of MGM, whom you may have seen as the ambitious bit player in The Bad And The Beautiful. Elaine is, photographically, everything that could be desired in a screen beauty. She is a tall, willowy five feet-six inches. She has copper-auburn hair that falls to her shoulders seductively, and velvet-brown eyes. She weighs 118 pounds, and it is allotted elaborately in the proper places. Elaine also has that intangible that might be called "stance," the thing that allows a girl to provoke sex without movement.

Elaine Stewart, though, for all her loveliness and possible talent, is, at this time, purely a sight attraction. Her theatrical background includes just a few appearances on TV and a Martin and Lewis picture in which all she was required to do was look sexy. Her fame lay, before she came to Hollywood, in the magazine field as a Conover model and cover girl. In The Bad And The Beautiful she was used purely as a sex image, a representative of Hollywood fluff that could take a producer's mind off his work and his sweetheart. It is true she spoke her lines well and there was a glimmer of promise of better things if she is given a chance, but in her debut she was a sex attraction and nothing more.

ANOTHER current example of side-show sex is Universal's Mamie Van Doren who is admittedly that studio's answer to Marilyn Monroe. Mamie, until a few months ago Jack Dempsey's favorite date, and well columnized under her true name Joan Olander, is a blonde sprite with a full mouth and curvy figure who bears a remarkable resemblance to Marilyn. However, at this writing, it does not appear that Mamie will be put into the front lines immediately. Her resemblance to Monroe is superficial, according to the reports from picture editors, not enough oomph, even when she holds her mouth open, so Universal has put her into the talent mill to learn to act before springing her on the public in a movie. That is sound judgment.

Roberta Haynes is another newcomer who has been plunged into the sex race. She, if you remember, is the girl plucked from nowhere and given the lead opposite Gary Cooper in Return To Paradise. Her publicity had been pretty run-of-the-mill until she fell into the hands of Russell Birdwell, the dean of Hollywood publicists and a man of ideas. One morning all of Hollywood choked on its coffee as they looked at a picture of Roberta on the back of The Hollywood Reporter. She was as sultry as Cleopatra, and she wore what appeared to be a slip and bra, which was obviously not her size. The picture itself was the end, but the text was stunning. Credits for the photo, wardrobe, etc. and the last line read: "Body by God."

There was the devil to pay, but Birdwell took it in stride. He planned this publicity for shock value—and it worked. Roberta, maybe as a result of the ad, was signed to a contract by Columbia Studio. Miss Haynes, by the way, has an edge on her fellow sex gals. She has a solid background in the theater and is rated a first class actress by her contemporaries, such as Marlon Brando. She may do well.

Another up-and-coming young lady due to dent the crown of the current holder, if all goes well from this point, is Laurette Luez, a newcomer Columbia is grooming for sex-stardom. Miss Luez is a tall, dark curvy amazon, half Portuguese and Irish, who seems to have been endowed with the best beauty points of both races. Her hair is raven-black, her eyes brown and she has a peaches-and-cream complexion.

Laurette is not a complete newcomer, having starred as the Panther Woman in Prehistoric Women, an independent film made a couple of years ago. She was highly publicized at that time and made more girlie magazine covers than anyone else ever did. But she considered this sort of thing a little undignified and refused to pose after a few months. Her background, as an actress, is good. Both her father and mother were on the stage for many years, and as a child of four she made her debut dancing for the Sultan of Jabore in Singapore when her parents visited there.

She has been tabbed by newsmen who met her on a tour for MGM's picture, Kim, in which she played Errol Flynn's seldom-seen leading lady, as "The Flower of Delight Girl," and other such extravagant names. The Hollywood press once gave her a Mickey Award for being the "Best low-cut cleavage on a movie billboard" a couple of years ago. Her startling measurements are 5' 7", 37-24-35. She went to school with Marilyn Monroe.

The one actress, and there should be a question mark after that, who may reach the heights of Marilyn Monroe is a lady known professionally as Lili St. Cyr, a bump dancer from the burlesque circuits. Miss St. Cyr, a tall, magnificently proportioned blonde with emerald eyes and a pouty mouth, has been the queen of the strippers for several years—as well as the toast of the Hollywood night life crowd. In a couple of appearances at Ciro's here she jammed the place every night with an exhibition of a lady undressing, taking a bath and dressing again. She did nothing more. Spoke not a word. But she was a smash.

Naturally the producers asked her to make movies, but didn't get her. Jerry Wald once announced her for one of his films and when she didn't appear he stated he couldn't get her name on a contract because he couldn't afford her salary. That was quite true, because Lili makes more money in night clubs and burlesque theaters than most movie queens and didn't want to take a cut in salary. She has been signed, however, by producer Albert Zugsmith to star in a Technicolor epic that will also feature a moon, a sarong and a lagoon. Then Lili will be better known. If she can act she may cut the mustard. But if she can't, she will no doubt go back to the runways assured that in the movies sex is not enough.

FOR the past couple of years Terry Moore, who used to be practically a child actress, has been working up a storm in the papers using sex as a gimmick. We recall her press agent trotting into our office with pictures of Terry in a bathing suit, trying to tout us on the proposition that Terry was the busiest child in the land. He succeeded in getting some of these pictures into print, and this, coupled with interviews in which Terry is reported to have said she'd give Marilyn Monroe cards and spades and still top her measurements, put Miss Moore into the running in the sex derby.

But all that has changed. Terry got an Academy Award nomination for her work in Come Back, Little Sheba and probably a talking-to by a wise man and is frantically trying to recall all the past publicity along the sex line. She appeared at a party recently in a dress that covered as much as the average sweater. She wants no more of it.

No symposium on sex queens can be complete without a mention at least of that pioneer Jane Russell. Jane was the fore-runner of all our modern skin specialists.

As long as 12 years ago she was heaving her bosom for the movie cameras and pulling down the neckline for the stills. And for sheer beauty and grandeur of form she may never be topped. There was a period of several years in which she never made a picture, but the papers and magazines ran her art anyway. She didn't need a news peg to get into print. Jane, she admits herself, was not much of an actress, but no one expected it of her. All she had to do was appear in a room and the audience got the idea the leading man had in his mind.

But Jane, possibly because she was the pioneer, saw the handwriting on the wall before the others got s'arted and began to brush up on her acting. And nowadays if you mention her obvious attributes to her she sneers at you. Unfortunately she can not start all over again without the low neckline, but she will not make a deal until she knows it's an acting part these days. She, too, has had it. At the present time she is negotiating a new contract with Howard Hughes, who has been her boss since she started, and one of the main articles in the pact will be that she is not required to continue as the national emblem for sex.

A girl can't help growing up, so a new sex attraction is headed our way now in the person of Mitzi Gaynor. Mitzi also came to the movies as a kid and a very talented one at that. She is one of the very best dancers Hollywood has, can sing very well and is a fair actress. But during the past year, personally and professionally, she has matured with a capital M. She appears at parties in gowns that are adult to be sure—and she is the object of every male eye. She used to be a mouse, shy and inhibited in public, and dressed like a dancing school graduate. Now Mitzi waltzes into a room like a young duchess, her almond eyes flirty and her movements the sort that drive strong men mad.

At a recent party a wife began looking for her husband. He wasn't within sighting distance, so she asked her hostess if she knew where he was.

"I believe," the hostess said, "he's talking to Mitzi Gaynor."

"Good," said the wife, "generally he's hanging around the neck of some glamor girl."

The wife should have seen her husband at that moment. He wasn't talking to Mitzi, but he was trying to. He was on the fringe of a mob of males who had Mitzi backed into a corner—and if his wife had taken a look at the way Mitzi had them all panting that night she'd have dragged her old man out of there by the ear. Mitzi has an aloof type of sex appeal, not at all obvious on the screen, that may be the combination required to sell sex at the box office. And as a top-notch dancer she has talent, too.

ACTUALLY, it was sex that really put movies on the map. Valentino can be credited with being the prime assist and he was noted for his ability to ooze passion from every pore as he dragged a panting captive across the Sahara to a lonely tent. The public, it seemed, wanted sex in those days. Maybe they've become bored with it, or maybe they've come to appreciate acting and a good story.

Sex really grew up in the movies, though, with Jean Harlow, also a Howard Hughes contribution. Hughes put meaning into it. And if he wasn't a designer of loose garments he certainly was aware of what was provocative. The dress that Jean Harlow wore in Hell's Angels ought to be in the Smithsonian Institution. It was as much an invention in its day as was the first mixmaster. From the first moment she appeared on the screen in that rag Jean Harlow was destined for greatness—in sex. And until the day she died she never played a part that didn't call for an exhibition of flesh and lust. MGM just recently made Mogambo, a reshuffling of Red Dust, the film that made millions pay to see Jean take a bath in a rain barrel, under the watchful, eager eyes of Clark Gable.

There are some who will deny that Jean was ever a good actress, but most Hollywoodites, after a moment of thought, will say she was. But it was something that had to be considered, for Jean's name was synonymous with sex, not art.

There have been others, too, who today are substantial performers, who were once considered sexy as all-get-out. Barbara Stanwyck, for instance. Now the public thinks of Barbara as one of the reigning artists of the screen, but in her early pictures she was a lusty, lip-biting half-tart that seldom took no for an answer. Barbara learned early in her career, though, that sex is not enough and raised her sights. In doing so, she's become an all-time great.

Some time ago Joan Crawford gave an interview to one of the major wire services in which she was reported to have said that she considered the exhibitionism of some of the younger players of this day slightly revolting. She particularly selected Marilyn Monroe as an example of how not to publicize a movie star. When it was printed there was quite a fuss. Marilyn's studio thought it was unkind, to say the least. Marilyn herself was said to have considered it catty. And the town took up sides.

When Miss Crawford was approached by other reporters for more details, she expressed herself as being sorry she had put her thoughts quite so strongly. She thought back, maybe, to the days when she first came to Hollywood—a Charleston dancer from Texas. She remembered Our Dancing Daughters in which she wore a dress that wouldn't make a fair handkerchief for a grown man. She remembered, possibly, the scene she'd played dancing atop a table, with the Crawford legs showing to the tan line, and the mouth-trembling way she'd look at a prospective lover for a close-up. And she didn't take back what she'd said, but she did reconstruct her opinion, from a wisdom she learned the hard way.

"Maybe," she said, "I should have said that I am concerned, because I know now that sex is not enough." Or words to that effect.

Their dates grew more frequent and slowly Barbara began to notice his sincerity, his truthfulness and above all, his complete respect for her. She decided that here was that rarity in this modern world, a gentleman; and soon realized she was happiest when she was with him. Following his proposal of marriage they discussed architecture and found that both like "comfortable modern"; then weddings, which both agree should be small but definitely inside a church; and then babies, which both want in quantity, but only after they have enough financial security that Barbara can take a year away from work to stay home and care for each new addition.

Barbara has learned to distinguish a feint from a dodge, an infield fly from a Texas leaguer, and a touchback from a safety. Bob has found with delight that she is an avid sports fan, and last March when she visited him on location for Arena in Tucson they not only went riding every day, but when the cast and crew organized a disorganized football game on the set, Barbara got into the act.

"I will now," she announced, holding the ball daintily between her hands, "do a drop-kick."

"Be careful!" yelled Bob. "You're wearing flat shoes—you can't dig in! Honey, you'll go flat on your—"

Which she did. It was one of the things that have proven to Barbara that she should listen to Bob's advice. Before she met him she had always felt rather maternal toward the men she dated. Secure in her personal life as well as her new-found career, she tended to be self reliant and so was forever on the lookout for ways in which she might help other people. Mr. Horton has modified all this, and now Barbara realizes that she tends to be high strung, to fly off the handle quickly, and Bob's comparative calm and good sense have a leveling affect on her own high spirits.

THERE was good reason for her self-confidence. Barbara grew up in the world of show business, the daughter of two highly successful professionals who were famous not only for their talent but also for their charm and their circle of delightful friends. The friends were also in show business, and it was only natural that Barbara should develop at an early age into a mite-sized performer.

She inherited acting ability from both parents, and at five was already dreaming up her own skits. "I must have bored everybody to death in those days. I'm still a ham—I should never eat pork."

From her father, who once played the violin and had his own band, Barbara was endowed with musical talent, and from her mother, who is still an avid jazz fan, a love for all kinds of music. As a result, today she is equally valued as both an actress and a singer, and Barbara loves both so well that she is incapable of choosing between the two.

A lot of practice went into both fields. Her girl friends were enlisted in the production of her plays and soon found themselves relegated to making backdrops out of old sheets and bright crayons. If any of the other girls had ideas of their own they seldom had time to put them across, as the small Ruick was a whirlwind director who scurried everyone else to routine jobs while she took the spotlight. Audiences were drafted from the neighborhood and, as Barbara puts it, "they looked whether they wanted to or not."

Lurene Tuttle had never pushed her daughter into theatricals—Barbara fell into them by herself. Her parents were naturally delighted, but they continued their attempt to seem disinterested and periodically suggested that it would be nice if Barbara grew up to be something distinguished, like an editor of Vogue magazine. All along Barbara knew, despite her youth, that if she had turned into anything other than an actress her parents would have been crushed.

As Barbara persisted in her thespian interests, Lurene Tuttle began coaching her daughter, beginning with pantomime, and Barbara feels that such fantastic and rigorous assignments as being a squeezed lemon or a tree in May were a valuable beginning for her education in dramatics. When she was eight she battered her way into the billing of a recital and chose for her stint a rendition of "Waiting At The Church," a la Beatrice Kay, for which she was to be frocked in her mother's wedding dress. It was bad enough having to hitch up the dress so that she wouldn't trip over it, and even worse when the air raid sirens cut loose and the house lights went out. But her father, sitting in the front row, trained the beam of a flashlight on her, and the small Miss Ruick went through her performance with the nonchalance of a seasoned trouser.

WHEN she was 14 she began singing with the high school band and organized a singing group that appeared twice weekly on a San Fernando Valley radio station. The accompanying skits were written by, naturally, Barbara Ruick. She never went to a party or a prom when she didn't sing, and always returned home with the seven-dollar scale wage tucked away in her evening bag. When she was 15 she fluffed for the first time, in a local little theater production of Stage Door. She delivered her lines, "I don't really want to leave. I don't know what to say." Following that she really didn't know what to say, and solved the situation by walking off the stage.

She wasn't so shaken by the experience that she lost confidence. Less than a year later her mother, who played "Effie" on the Sam Spade radio show, became too ill to go on, and Barbara marched into producer William Spier's office. "You just have to let me do it," she said. "I'm the only one who sounds like mother. And besides, it's the only thing that'll get her out of bed. If I do it this time, she'll have to come to your rescue next week."

She got the job, and it was the last time Barbara was nervous during a performance. It gave her a confidence which has never left her, except perhaps for the times when her mother has been in the audience. Barbara can't explain these reactions—she thinks it may be because she's trying so hard to please, as she did when she was a small girl. She recalls the day she marched two miles in a Girl Scout parade as the flag bearer. All went well until she came to the corner where her mother stood. Then Barbara tripped and went flat on her face. Lurene Tuttle was in the audience the night Barbara forgot her lines in Stage Door, and stranger still, she gave a top-notch TV commercial one day until toward the end of the spiel, when her mind went blank. When she got home she learned that her mother had turned on the program at the precise moment Barbara had fluffed.

Barbara reached the age of 12 before her parents were divorced, and those years of living with show business parents have given her a wisdom that may well help in her own marriage. She feels that she knows the pitfalls of a marriage which combines two careers, what to say and what not to say at the right moments. She was and still is extremely fond of her father, who has remarried and lives in New York, but the divorce itself did not affect her nearly so much as the death, a year before, of Lillian Johnson. Miss Johnson had been Barbara's nurse since babyhood, a wonderful woman who, childless herself, poured out her maternal love on Barbara. She taught the child to love people, she was a second mother to her and her most appreciative audience all through Barbara's childhood. She died on August 15th, and for this reason Barbara has set her wedding date on that day. She intends sending a little prayer up to heaven, in the hope that her beloved old nurse will be able to look down and see Barbara on the biggest day of her life. It is her deepest regret that Miss Johnson cannot be here to see the children that will come some day.

FOLLOWING the divorce Barbara lived with her mother, who continued to guide her through an adolescence that was devoted almost entirely to theatricals. Their relationship is extremely close, and even when Barbara decided to learn about drumming, Lurene Tuttle didn't complain. It all started when Barbara sang with an orchestra made up of college boys, and when drummer Gene Estes left his stand to do a vocal, Barbara would hop up behind the drums and beat out the rhythm for the band.

Two days after her 17th birthday Barbara took off for New York. Determined to make the grade on her own merits she purposely avoided letting anyone know her relationship to her famed parents. She moved into an apartment with four models and proceeded to pound pavements like a novice from Hatsoff, Texas, but her talent shone through. Out of 800 applicants she was chosen with only nine others to appear on Chico Marx's "College Bowl" TV show. Soap operas and commercials followed, and after a highly successful year she returned home to Hollywood, where she shortly copped a contract with MGM. There she went to work with such zeal that studio employees weren't surprised when, during the filming of The Affairs Of Dobie Gillis, Barbara insisted on completing her dance routine despite an attack of flu, and stopped only when she fainted from exhaustion.

At first she lived with her mother, who had remarried, then moved to a small apartment in Hollywood, another in North Hollywood, then to Westwood, then shared a house with Jean MacDonald, then, because the landlady didn't cotton to Barbara's boxer puppy, the two girls moved to another house. Barbara currently is living with her mother again, and has stored a pile of furniture collected in the last two years in the last six residences. There will be enough, she says, to fill any house she and Bob might buy on his GI loan, and she promises that, for a change, she will really settle down for keeps when she gets married.

She has already begun to settle. An incurable mimic, Barbara comes back from New York dropping her R's, back from Alabama accompanied by a southern drawl. She imitates anything, including the makeup worn these days by New York models. When living in Manhattan with the quartet of mannekins, Barbara was enchanted by their black slipstick and penciled lines beneath the eyes. She had arrived in New York with a healthy, scrubbed look, but by the time she came back to Hollywood a year later she was all but suffocated in cosmetics. Lurene Tuttle met her at the airport and couldn't help smiling. "My word," she said, "You have been sick, haven't you?"

AFTER a year of doe eyes, and after a few dates with Bob Horton, Barbara decided to give up the ghostly look, that this was not really for her. The next time Bob called for her at the house, he was met by a pert face that boasted nothing but lipstick—red lipstick. He took an appreciative look, but said nothing.

Barbara couldn't stand it for long. They hadn't been in his car five minutes before she turned to him. "Well—do you like me better this way?"

He reached over and took her hand. "I liked you the other way, too. But this is fine."

"You see what I mean," Barbara says to anybody who will listen. "Bob is a gentleman, a real gentleman. And furthermore, my red-haired mother is charmed right out of her shoes at the idea of a red-haired son-in-law. I was obstinate—I didn't have red hair—but now she has more than a 50-50 chance of having carrot-tops for grandchildren."

Everybody's happy, including MGM, future in-laws, the growing legions of Horton and Ruick fans, and most of all, Barbara and Bob.

Then, he disappeared. Studio executives and friends couldn't locate him for three days. Just before the situation had reached the "missing persons" alarm stage, someone thought to check at his Van Nuys home. Sure enough, there he was, where he had been for almost three days, playing with Donna.

The next day newspaper columns were filled with predictions that the O'Connors would make up, or had already forgiven each other for real and imaginary transgressions. The curtain, however, had just gone up on the embarrassing drama that is so often repeated in Hollywood. Before the week was out it was reported that Gwen was now dating Dan Dailey. Supposedly they had been holding hands in a quiet corner at the Encore, a La Cienega boulevard restaurant to which many film celebrities go to publicly display their grief over a broken romance or their joy over a new love.

Gwen O'Connor was furious. The report is that she had her attorney call the columnist and demand a retraction, a reluctant one which was published a few days later. This was not enough, for newspaper folk are now calloused when it comes to denials. Reporters began to choose up sides. On the day that Sheilah Graham stated that, "the Donald O'Connor's are quietly making up," Hollywood Reporter columnist Mike Connelly had a different version: "Dan Dailey threw a punch at Murray Garret at Peggy Lee's Grove opening. Dailey didn't want the photog to shoot him and Gwen O'Connor, who were NOT celebrating Donald O'Connor's gala Call Me Madam preem, same night and miles and miles from the Grove."

Who is right? Is Dan Dailey a cause celebre in the O'Connor marriage rift? Or was it true that Don had regularly been dating several of the hundreds of cute girls who make the studios a romantic stamping grounds. Why isn't the truth printed? It will be, here and now.

Let's go back to happier days to find the answer. Back to the time that Donald was a carefree young actor more preoccupied with his collection of foreign cars than he was with his career. To the time he proposed to beautiful red-haired Gwen Carter, a Los Angeles High School student, and gave her a two carat diamond ring, payable on time at $50 a week for the next two years.

Gwen was no innocent child who fell head over heels in love with an actor at 15. She had friends in show business and was not star struck. She'll tell you that she didn't think much of Don at their first meeting when they were introduced at a Paramount commissary table. She was 12 and he was a wacky 13. A little more than two years later, it was a different story.

Donald had by then skyrocketed to fame with Bing Crosby in Sing You Sinners, grown out of his briches in a few months and was tossed back into vaudeville, traveling the country with his family. Tragedy had made a man of him, for his beloved brother Billy had died suddenly of scarlet fever, not many days before Hollywood summoned him back for a second crack at stardom. Billy, of whom Don had often said, "He could have been a greater comedian than Bob Hope," meant more to the young actor than he has ever been able to satisfactorily explain. He can only say, "Billy died when I was just getting to know him."

Of course, it may be said that everyone knows sadness in life and that it takes an actor to dramatize his grief. But this was not so with Donald O'Connor. The loneliness of his youth was magnified by the fact that his father died of a heart attack when he was about a year old. Before that, outside a theater in Hartford, Conn., his five year old sister, Arlene, had taken him out for an airing in his baby carriage. Unable to resist the temptation of a candy store across the street, Arlene left the infant Donald at the curb and scurried to buy a sack of sweets. In a few seconds, she was lying dead, run over by a speeding car.

Knowing as we do that the mind of a child retains impressions from early childhood on, and remembering that Donald grew up with no real home other than a long list of theatrical hotels, it becomes a simple, understandable fact that what he always has needed most was a love and security of his own.

His second meeting with Gwen Carter took place backstage at the El Capitan theater. Don had gone there to help a friend named Julia Curtis to audition her ventriloquist act, and ran into Joyce Duffin, another vaudeville acquaintance who was there with Gwen.

"Gwen and I took a look at each other," Donald remembers, "and the whole theater lit up."

Joyce, however, wouldn't give Don Gwen's phone number. A few days later he ran into the two of them in a drug store. This time Gwen was with a big handsome guy. Don took Joyce aside and tried again for the phone number. No soap. That night might have been the end of it if a fellow Don knew hadn't dropped in to watch him work out at a Hollywood gym. Don went two rounds apiece that day with a couple of professional fighters. They stood toe to toe slugging at each other, much to the amazement of the friend, who later said to Don in the dressing room, "If you want Gwen Carter's phone number, I guess it's okay to give it to you now."

"Well thanks," Don replied, "but why all the mystery up to now?"

"Well, the truth is," the friend explained, "that Gwen's boy friend is a very jealous guy. Also exceedingly tough. He knew you two liked each other and he threatened to beat the tar out of you if you tried to date her. None of us wanted to see you murdered, but after seeing you go in the ring I know you can take care of yourself."

Don rushed for the nearest phone booth to make a date. That night he and Gwen held hands at the Casa de Amour restaurant and agreed that people their age, if they should fall in love, should wait a long time before marrying. From that moment on, Gwen never dated another boy, and they would have waited, too, except for circumstances over which they had no control.

It was Don's ambition to become a fighter pilot. He had already taken one test for Air Corps Cadet Training and flunked it. After some months, he tried again, passing with flying colors. On New Year's Eve of 1944, they spent much of the night talking about the question of whether or not they should marry before Don entered the service. They decided to stick to their original promise to wait, but a few evenings later, while visiting at the apartment of their friend, Ally Kirk, the emotional upheaval of impending events was too much for them.

On the spur of the moment, they agreed to elope to Mexico. They jumped into Don's car and took off, stopping for dinner at the Tailspin Restaurant. Here their plans made a crash landing. They fell into an argument about whether or not to tell their mothers. Don decided that if he was now man enough to enter the Air Corps, he certainly was man enough to tell his mother and hers in advance that he was marrying the woman he loved.

They postponed the event for a couple of days. Both mothers agreed that their children would be unhappy if they had to face the anxious days and perhaps years ahead, alone. So, on February sixth, they took off for the border city of Tiajuana, Mexico. They hadn't counted on the difficulties of strict wartime regulations. Border guards insisted that Gwen give up her address book and that Don change the $65 he'd brought along into two dollar bills, no easy trick at four o'clock in the morning. While Gwen argued with the guards to prove that her personal telephone numbers were not the secret codes of a spy, Don hustled off in search of an all night gas station. With these delays, it was almost five A.M. before they reached the main street of Tiajuana, numb with cold, but still grimly cheerful.

Back in the U. S., they found a small hotel which jugged out over the Pacific Ocean, and they'll never forget the cold lobster wedding breakfast.

This was just the beginning of a series of adventures, which if reenacted would make a swell comic movie. Don was shipped off to Texas, eager to start his Air Corps training. To his dismay, the entire cadet program was suddenly called off. All he saw in the future was an endless round of KP and latrine duty. As luck had it, the Air Corps suddenly needed more women than they did men, and Don helped to create a WAC recruiting show. Gwen, like thousands of women at the time, became a camp follower.

Somehow, though, the O'Connors were incredibly happy during these two and a half years. When almost all WACS were being shipped overseas, the recruiting show in which Don was being starred needed a leading lady. Officers in charge pressed Gwen into service and she wowed 'em.

When Don came back to Hollywood and civilian life, everything brightened up. There were those big pay checks again; back income taxes were paid up, and the baby came.

They never loved each other more. On the day of the blessed event, Gwen was so worried about Don's condition that she kept crawling out of her hospital bed to visit him in the father's room.

"Poor guy," she remembers, "he sat there for almost 12 hours, white as a sheet. He must have smoked a whole carton of cigarettes. When it was all over, I looked up through a haze to see him, announcing that we'd had a baby boy."

"No," I told him. "You're hysterical, honey. I saw it. The baby's a girl!" By this time he was the same old Don. He was playing it so straight with the boy routine that it was a couple of days before I realized he was kidding."

UNLESS one is a veteran on the Hollywood scene, it is difficult to understand how merciless the demands of success can be, or why it is that the more famous a man becomes the less chance he has for happiness in private life. Despite the casual atmosphere of show business, the demands of its backstage discipline are terrific, effecting even a thing so small as a man's hobbies. Speaking of his sport car hobby, Don recently dismissed it by saying, "I either had to give up the cars or my career." What he subconsciously meant is that the requirements in time alone caused by doing four major pictures in the period of a year, plus a monthly television show, had cut deeply into his private life.

When Don was doing pleasant little pictures requiring little effort, his home was always filled with friends. He might, as on one occasion, come galloping home with all four Williams brothers from the Kay Thompson act for an impromptu supper.

However, Don's popularity brought incredible demands on his time. It reached the point best illustrated by the time Gwen's maid, to her great surprise, brought in the morning coffee while she was still in bed. The maid had a complaint to make, hardly believable in this modern age. "I'm a good cook," she explained, "but I'm getting rusty. I'm going to have to change jobs unless you and Mr. O'Connor do more entertaining." Gwen promised that they'd try to reform. She planned a dinner party for the following Friday. She called all of Don's friends, but with a single exception, they were all too busy. It was just as well. An emergency rehearsal came up for Don, so he wouldn't have been there anyway.

Such things may seem trivialities, but a happy marriage demands every bit as much attention as a successful career. Recently, Gwen has been very much alone, with the result that any appearance publicly without Don stirred comment. If, while Don was busy talking business at a Palm Springs dinner, Gwen seemed to linger too long in the company of Dean Martin, it was nothing to her. When the story broke that Gwen, immediately after the separation from Don, had been dating Dean Martin, she was in tears. She called Dean on the telephone to make certain that he knew that she didn't have anything to do with the linking of their names. Dean, who had never liked Gwen too much (not all Hollywood personalities are bosom pals), was impressed with her forthright honesty. At this writing, they have never been together, except for a few moments at a time at crowded parties, and although no one expects to give out affidavits that they will never have a date in the future, they most assuredly have not had one up to the present time. Nor has Donald ever dated Mitzi Gaynor, even though they have had their pictures taken together. You can expect, however, that this false rumor will crop up too, if it hasn't already in some irresponsible column. Even so small an item as Gwen's acquiring an agent—at the suggestion of Don, incidentally—seemed to indicate to the gossips that she was more interested in a career than in a home.

ex-wife), she planned to join a troupe of performers headed for Korea to entertain our troops there. Gwen had already been accepted as a good trouper on the Colgate Hour. There was nothing wrong with her carrying on, even though she might never expect to become as famous as her husband. However, she never made that trip. The undercurrent of gossip mounted. One evening Gwen and Don had a lulu of an argument over some infinitesimal matter neither can remember. It may even have been the tone of voice of one or the other that set off the fuse. All they knew was that they were tired; weary of trying to discover where and why they had lost the rich meaning of their life together.

Don moved out.

Today you need only to bend a casual ear to the wind to hear people who know them only slightly to hear phrases like this... "It should have happened a long time ago"... "Gwen wants to be a play girl"... Or, "Don gets around himself."

The rising tide of Hollywood opinion hurries home to the Donald O'Connors more swiftly since their definite rift. But it hasn't prevented them from having dinner together on several occasions, still seeking to discover why it is that, after they attained the goals they set out to achieve nine long lean years ago, they are no longer together to share a triumph now turned bitter.

Currently both Gwen and Don are having a fling on their own, dating other people. But the more they are apart, the more they like each other's company. Gwen came home at four A.M. one morning after a date with a Hollywood playboy, and termed night life a real nothing. Next night she and Don went to the Circle J Ranch, and both declared they had a real ball, and were getting tired of their so-called freedom from domestic woe. That's why real intimates are predicting an early reconciliation despite columnists' reports.

Nor can one fact be denied. Gwen and Donald O'Connor privately admit that they still love each other. If this is so, and they can look at each other across the chasm created by a suit for divorce, they

One little girl remarked sadly that she didn't have the money to come back on. So what did Vic do? He took five dollars out of his own pocket and gave it to her and told her to take a taxi.

THE "little things" which have destroyed many a marriage, both in and out of Hollywood, have been gnawing away at the O'Connor marriage for over two years. Finally, at a friend's suggestion, Don broached the subject of consultation with a psychiatrist. It must be pointed out that young married couples all over the country have done the same thing—not because they are mentally deranged, but simply to try to achieve a better understanding of the science of living. Gwen O'Connor, anxious to make whatever corrections were necessary in her thinking as well as Don's, agreed to the idea.

To their mutual dismay, the news leaked out. There would be little purpose in mentioning any of this here, except that it is important to the O'Connor marital story. A lot of folks in Hollywood laughed at the idea of their seeking psychiatric aid. To them it was one more case of another actor and his wife going a little nutty. The truth was that these consultations brought the two back together, if only temporarily. After a few months during which they earnestly sought to resolve their problems, Gwen and Don went to Honolulu for a second honeymoon.

may be able to retrace their steps and hold on to the happiness they built for each other.

And they don't need this honest attempt to evaluate their lives to realize the most important thing of all: Technically they still will remain man and wife for almost a year. All it takes to assure little Donna O'Connor that Daddy will indeed be home tonight is a couple of telephone calls to a pair of attorneys.

Let's hope they do it!

Bright and early the next morning, Alfred Vanderbilt was out in Culver City watching Ricardo Montalban as he rehearsed with Rita Moreno. These two did a few introductory steps. The camera moved in and the focus was fixed. Director LeRoy turned and muttered to an assistant. "Ready," he said. The assistant shouted, "Ready, Miss Turner."

Dressed gorgeously in an evening gown, the top half of which consisted of a form-fitting jersey trimmed with sequins, Lana emerged from her portable dressing room. Behind her came Lex and the three children.

He walked back to the camera and winked at Vanderbilt. One of the assistants thundered, "Quiet!"

"Okay," LeRoy said softly to his cameraman. "Roll 'em."

The music, a special samba entitled "A Little More Of Your Amour," and especially written for the picture by Mario Lanza's good friend, Nicky Brodsky, was struck up. Montalban took Lana in his arms. They started to dance. They looked into each other's eyes.

On the sidelines, Lex looked on, enthralled and fascinated. What a difference between a musical and the Tarzan pictures he makes.

Lex's two children looked at each other and grinned. Lana's daughter, Cheryl, who has seen her mother in action many times, seemed to grow restless very quickly. She wandered off.

When the "take" was over, Lana came over to Lex. "You were wonderful," he said. She blew him a little feather of a smile, then called out to her child. "Cheryl," she said, "I'll be finished after one more shot. Now you stay here with the other kids. Don't run off." Cheryl, who is nine, the same age as Barker's daughter, nodded and returned to Barker's side. Lex ran his hand through her hair. The camera was rolled back for a medium shot, and Lana and Montalban went into their samba again. Lex grinned as he watched his love-light.

When the Christmas holiday was over and the children returned to school, Lex used to show up on the set himself, or if he had things to do, he usually would arrange to pick Lana up after work. She rarely rode home alone.

It got so that the gatemen at the studio used to kid Lex and call him Stagedoor Johnny.

LEX makes no bones about being daffy over Lana. "She's a wonderful girl," he says, "and I'm more than fond of her. Maybe some people don't think so, but Lana's got an awful lot of depth. She's been around. She knows a good many things, and, insofar as I'm concerned, her friendship is an extremely worthy thing. I can tell you that she's a much higher-type young woman than a lot of the girls you come in contact with back home."

in Connecticut. Lex is a typical product of suburban life, and he pretty much knows all there is to know about stag lines, coming-out parties, and the Junior League.

His younger sister, Frederica, was for many years one of the outstanding beauties at the various country clubs in and around Westchester; and the Barker family is directly descended from Roger Williams, the dissenter who founded Rhode Island. So that in his young life Lex has really mixed with the cream of suburban society, and when he says that Lana has much more on the ball than the girls back home, you can bet his opinion is founded on actual experience.

Lex is the first of his family to desert the world of high finance for the acting profession. To be perfectly honest about it, his father still considers the deviation as a part of growing up and expects that eventually Lex will get into some thriving business venture, Lana Turner or no Lana Turner.

When, after leaving Phillips-Exeter Academy, Lex decided to become an actor, his father looked upon the entire experiment with a jaundiced eye. He agreed to give Lex his head for a while if eventually the boy would join his engineering firm.

"I tried to learn the business from the ground up," Lex says. "I worked around blast furnaces and hot strip mills, but my heart just wasn't in it. I enlisted in the Army, and when I got out, I decided to resume my acting career. Probably if I'd listened to my father I'd be worth a good deal of money today, but I like show business and the people in it. Where in civil engineering are you going to run into a girl like Turner?"

When Lex first arrived in Hollywood—it was in 1945 that he was invalidated out of the Army with the rank of Major—Lana Turner was just a name to him. He was married to an attractive girl named Connie Thurlow. He had a two-year-old daughter, and he was looking for a start in pictures.

The post-war era of 1945-1948 will go down in the history of the cinema as the age of extravagance. Business was so good, motion picture companies were making so much money that they could afford to expand their list of contract players with almost reckless abandon.

Lex was one of them. Fresh from the Army, he'd had very little acting experience, a few years of summer stock, two bit parts on Broadway, nothing else. And yet MCA, a talent agency, got him signed by 20th Century, then Warners', then RKO, and finally, when Sol Lesser was looking for a new Tarzan, switched him from RKO to enact the character fathered by the late Edgar Rice Burroughs.

THERE is an old saying in Hollywood that frequently the price of fame is heartache. Certainly this was true in Barker's case. The more successful his career became, the faster his marriage began to founder. By 1949 Lex and Connie both decided they'd had enough. Six months after the final decree was issued on November 2nd, 1950, Lex Barker took a second wife, actress Arlene Dahl. The willowy redhead was never too sure about the eventual success of the marriage but after changing her mind a couple of times, decided to go through with the wedding ceremony.

As you know Arlene used to be under contract to MGM. So, of course, is Lana Turner. Occasionally when Lex drove over from RKO-Pathé, where Sol Lesser has his headquarters, to see Arlene, he would run into Lana. There would be an exchange of polite greetings and nothing else.

Lana was married to Bop Topping at the time. She had a heart full of troubles, and she wasn't at all "on the make." Only when Topping packed his bags and moved out did she snare Fernando Lamas in a fast three seconds. In 1951 when Lex and Arlene Dahl were first married, the possibility of Lex getting together with Lana was about as remote as a marriage between Margaret O'Brien and Mickey Mouse.

Career trouble is what broke up the Dahl-Barker marriage. That, at least, is what Lex says. He thinks in retrospect that Arlene was more interested in becoming a movie star than in becoming a good wife.

"The best part of our marriage," he says, "was when Arlene left Metro and sat around home for six months doing nothing. Then someone came along and offered her a deal selling lingerie. She thought she'd get into it just as a sideline. It wasn't a sideline at all. It became a big thing. Then her career started up again. She was offered movie jobs. Naturally, she took them. We had one break-up and then decided on a reconciliation. I went out of town on location for three weeks and when I came back she hit me with the divorce idea. She said she had decided that our marriage wouldn't work. Boy! What a reconciliation!"

You have probably heard or read somewhere that Lana first "picked up" Lex at the Marion Davies party, that wild extravaganza thrown in honor of Johnny Ray.

All that Lana did was to ask Lex for a dance since her own date, Fernando Lamas, was none too attentive. Lex was not a stag. He had come to the party with Susan Morrow, but when Lana asked for a dance he gallantly consented.

By now, everyone knows what happened. When Fernando saw his Lana snuggled up in the arms of Lex Barker, the fiery South American from Buenos Aires blew his top.

Two days later the Lamas-Turner love affair was a thing of the past and Fernando was bounced out of Latin Lovers, the film he was originally scheduled to star in opposite Lana.

"I'm sorry," Fernando said, "that Miss Turner refuses to be my friend but I respect her wishes."

A week later, Lamas was dining in public with Arlene Dahl, and Lana Turner was dining in private with Arlene Dahl's ex-husband. In short, the two beautiful actresses had exchanged lovers. By-gones were by-gones.

Arlene and Lamas made no secret of their mutual affection. They were seen everywhere together. Lana and Lex were a bit more circumspect. It took three weeks before their companionship became public property. When it did, it blazed brightly, especially in Palm Springs where both of them spent their vacation.

Not too long ago, Lex, who has a comfortable little apartment a mile or so from 20th Century-Fox, was visited by a family friend from back East. This woman, an elderly lady in her 50's, was touring the studios, and Lex told her to please use his apartment as her Hollywood headquarters.

"During the course of the day," he explained, "you're liable to get tired. I want you to come up to the apartment and rest any time you feel like it. Here's a key."

One afternoon the visitor from back East did exactly that, whereupon the phone in Lex's apartment rang and the lady answered it. Lana Turner was on, and when a woman answered, the actress boiled. When Lex phoned for a date that night, Lana wouldn't talk to him. Presently she did, demanding to know, "Who is the girl you had in your apartment around four this afternoon you two timer, you!"

Lex explained everything satisfactorily, but this merely shows that when Lana gives her heart to any man she expects him to play fair. She has always been a one-man-at-a-time woman.

Oddly enough when you ask Lana about Lex, she weighs her words very carefully. "He's an extremely nice gentleman," she says, "and great fun to be with—or I wouldn't be with him."

When you ask if there is any chance of her marrying Lex, she says, "I've had enough of marriage to last me for some time." Lana has said this before, however, so it doesn't mean much. What does mean a lot is that Barker will not be free to marry until October 15, 1953, at which time Lana will be living somewhere in Europe, probably in Monaco where she is in residence at the time of this writing. Despite the fact that she has earned close to a million dollars in the past 15 years, Lana doesn't have very much money. If she works in Europe for the next 18 months, she can earn approximately $350,000 tax free.

Lana insists, however, that the tax-exemption is not why she left Hollywood. "I just wanted to get away from around here," she explains. "I needed a new outlook, a new environment, to meet some new people."

And being the Lana she is, she also needed a new heart interest. In Lex Barker she has found a most avid one—and as they're saying in Hollywood tonight, "Here are two fine people who really deserve each other."

Marge and Gower Champion own a lovely hillside home equipped with swimming pool because their salary is $2,500 a week and night club appearances bring them another $7,500 a week.

Liz Taylor and her husband Mike Wilding can afford to own a swank modern home overlooking a picturesque canyon, because after ten years in the business, Liz has managed to save more than $40,000 and has signed a new contract which brings her close to $150,000 a year.

But these are the exceptions.

How about youngsters like Roberta Haynes, Joanne Gilbert, Terry Moore, Joyce Holden, Debbie Reynolds, Debra Paget, Janet Leigh, Farley Granger, Bob Wagner, and Dale Robertson?

Let's take a look.

Dale Robertson owns a house out in Reseda, a middle-class community 20 miles from the studio, which he bought on the G.I. loan—nothing down and around $55 a month. It's a simple stucco job, two bedrooms, one for Dale and his wife, and one for their baby daughter Rochelle. Robertson is one of the boys who likes cars, especially convertibles, but no Cadillac or big job for him. He has a business manager who limits him to spending money of $20 a week even though Dale is currently earning $1,000 a week.

Young actresses like Debbie Reynolds, Debbie Paget, Mitzi Gaynor and several others either live with their mothers in small establishments or rent conveniently located apartments.

Typical of the smart young career girl is Joyce Holden. Ever since she came to Hollywood from Kansas, Joyce has lived in a series of bachelorette apartments, one larger than the other. Right now she occupies a two-bedroom garden apartment in the San Fernando Valley. With each move, Joyce adds to her collection of antique furniture by haunting the second-hand antique shops and attending the auctions. Her interest in Early American furnishings began on a farm in Colony, Kansas, where she spent every summer until she was 12. Her aunt and uncle, Vern and Jesse Nichols, owned the farm, and when Joyce grew up and came to Hollywood, they gave her the four-poster canopy bed she had slept on as a little girl.

Like most of the young actresses in town, Joyce likes lots of company. She often invites eight, ten, twelve guests home for dinner. She also believes that every girl living alone should have a pet. In her own case the lease on her apartment expressly prohibited pets of any sort, but when Joyce moved in she found a forlorn, copper-colored cat squatting right in the middle of the living room. The cat still resides in that apartment.

ROBERTA Haynes is another apartment-dweller. Even though she was raised in Encino, not too far from Hollywood, she talked her parents into letting her furnish her own apartment near Columbia Studios. It was this organization which signed Roberta after she had finished Return To Paradise opposite Gary Cooper.

The dark-haired, exotic-looking young beauty began to furnish her three-room flat by buying a box spring and mattress. After that, as she earned more money, she spent it on modern furniture made of wood, wrought iron, and foam rubber. Finishing touches are products of her own handiwork. Drapes, curtains, a few paintings. Because her salary is relatively small, Roberta, who likes to read, buys 25-cent paper-covered books. The money she doesn't invest in clothes, she spends on records and art prints, only she can never decide which prints to frame.

Dawn Addams is another young actress who likes to re-decorate her studio apartment. Dawn is the petite English girl who made such a startling first impression on moviegoers when they saw her in MGM's Plymouth Adventure. Like her own colorful background—her father is an English Army officer and she's lived all over the Empire—her place is unorthodox. It consists of a series of rooms on different levels. The living room is three steps above the street. The dinette is two steps down from the living room, and the bedroom is up one flight on a gallery overlooking the whole apartment. In the tradition of a soldier's family, Dawn has filled her small apartment with mementoes from home, and also a piano, on which her current boyfriend, Farley Granger likes to practise.

Another European who's made a good go of things in Hollywood is German-born Ursula Thiess, one of actor Robert Taylor's great heart interests. Ursula's apartment on Wilshire Boulevard is a far cry from the bombed-out rubble that was once her home in Hamburg.

As you probably know, Ursula's picture on the cover of "Life" is what got her an RKO contract in this country. When she arrived in New York two years ago, she knew no English so that the studio had to arrange for a series of interpreters to go around with her in Manhattan as well as Hollywood. Ursula's Hollywood interpreter was a young girl of her own age named Rosalie Harding. With the bond of language between them, a close friendship sprang up between these girls, and in a little while, Rosalie asked Ursula to leave her lonely hotel room and share a room in the Harding household. When her English was fluent enough, Ursula was sent to India to act in Monsoon. (Continued on next page)

After three months she returned to the Harding house, but then decided that if she was ever going to make the break, she had best make it then. She was convinced that her English was good enough, so she and Rosalie went apartment-hunting. They found a modern suite of three rooms with porch overhanging Wilshire Boulevard. Ursula then bought "Pappy," a French poodle to keep her company.

Like most German girls Ursula loves to cook, and since Bob Taylor doesn't particularly like to make the rounds of night clubs or to be seen in public, many of their dates consist of home-cooked meals.

JOANNE Gilbert, the young nightclub singer who made such a sensational debut at the Mocambo that she was signed by Paramount for Red Garters, represents the school of young girls who live with their mothers.

Joanne's parents are separated which is true of Mitzi Gaynor's, Peggy Ann Garner's, Jane Powell's, Margaret O'Brien's, and many others—and Joanne and her mother occupy a one-bedroom apartment in the heart of Hollywood. "It's really too small," Joanne says, "and now that I'm making a little money we're looking for a larger place. I also drive a '49 Chevy—it's crumpling, it really is—and I guess I'll have to get a new car."

Practically the only young Hollywood star who doesn't own a car is Ursula Thiess, and that's because she doesn't know how to drive.

Joanne Gilbert's night club act is booked in at $3,000 a week, so that it shouldn't be too long before the Gilbert gal winds up with a Ford convertible and at least a two-bedroom apartment.

The youngsters who have the biggest and swankiest apartment in Hollywood are Janet and Tony Curtis; and they certainly deserve it. For five years they've both worked long and hard and have finally reached the point in life where a monthly rental of $400 doesn't tax their financial setup too heavily. Their combined weekly salary is close to $2,500—that is, when they're working. Before they found their current penthouse apartment, Janet and Tony lived in a small furnished job a few blocks away.

As a matter of fact, Joan Evans and her husband Kirby Weatherley occupy that same sort of furnished apartment which is typical of what Southern California has to offer young marrieds in the way of housing.

When Joan and Kirby decided to get married last June, over Joan's parents' objections, the bride-to-be had exactly 24 hours in which to find an apartment. "I think we did the right thing," Joan says, "in renting a small furnished unit to start with. I was making Column South after the wedding and still I could manage to cook and keep house without any extra help. If we had bought a house we'd have had to hire people to run it. I think a small place during the first year of marriage gives the bride more time to devote to cooking and fixing things up."

Joan has another theory that not having to do housework before you're married makes the job more interesting after you've got a husband to take care of. At least it's worked out that way for her.

She had a separate wing in her parents' home, but her grandmother or the family housekeeper was always on hand to cook and pick up after her. Not burdened with the pre-wedding task of cooking, she now loves to prepare three meals a day. According to Kirby, his wife is an inventive and very clever short-order cook. Once she expects guests for dinner, however, Joan is a meticulous planner. A list of reminders to herself reads like this: "Toasted cheese fingers, page 8 in recipe book, make spread before; avocado salad, make before; Beef Casserole, p. 121, ready by 6:00; French peas p. 184, allow time to shell; rolls, don't forget, melt butter; sherbet; coffee, make early."

Or all the young marrieds in Hollywood, the Rory Calhouns seem to have hit the jackpot insofar as houses are concerned. A year ago, Rory asked his Lita what she'd like for a fourth anniversary present. She said a house of their own with grounds and swimming pool.

Rory has the luck of the Irish. He found a family that was moving back East and was ready to take a loss on their 8-room colonial in Beverly Hills. Rory snapped the bargain up without reading the complete terms of sale. Later, much to his amazement, he learned that a swimming pool from the old Will Rogers' estate went with his purchase.

Rory is a crack wood-worker and has already transformed one guest bedroom into a beautifully-pannelled bar. He also hopes to remodel the unfinished structure atop his garage into a large playroom.

The Calhouns, and this is true of most young acting couples, have no full-time cook or housekeeper; so that they run their home on a very casual basis. Their door is always open and it's recognized as a paradise for free-loaders. You can always get a free meal and drink at the Rory Calhouns, practically no questions asked.

In contrast to the old Hollywood standards where butlers and formality ruled the household roost, today movieland goes in for pleasant, relaxed, and informal living. Nowhere is this motif, this way of life, more conspicuous than at the home of Jerry and Patti Lewis.

Jerry, of course, earns more money than any youngster under the age of 30 throughout the world. He averages half a million a year. Thus, when Patti talked him into buying a brick colonial house with pool in the Pacific Palisades, he insisted that he must have one small wing where he could indulge himself in his various hobbies, gun-collecting, movie-making, photography, hell-raising, and so forth.

Jerry decided to build a small, separate rumpus room. The idea carried him away. When construction costs on this small rumpus room hit $20,000 wife Patti called a halt. But not for long. What started out to be a hideaway developed into a de luxe playhouse, and it's here that Jerry and his gang make their wild movie shorts, satirizing well-known film hits.

Right now the playhouse is valued at $120,000, that is with photographic equipment included, but Jerry says it's worth every penny in fun and relaxation.

GENERALLY speaking, Hollywood is neither a country club nor a night club town. Its youngsters are shrewd, intelligent, career-wise and in some cases genuinely cultured. They appreciate good art, good music, and good clothes. But most of all they appreciate their homes on which they lavish a large portion of their earnings.

They feel that their residence and its decor reflects their standard of taste which is why they're always re-modeling, re-decorating, searching for new furnishings, new architects, new modes of expression.

Essentially, they are all artists with a love of beauty and a high regard for style, and more than any other element they are responsible for transforming the old-time sickening, roccoco-ish, ornate, overbearing Hollywood way of life into one that is simple, modern, clean, and stimulating.

In short, the young householders are a credit to the community; much more so than many of the old-timers. END chance of a lifetime

(Continued from page 67) picked up the cards, took them into the manager's office and began looking them over. They were almost unanimously complimentary. But something else was much more important, and the studio men were as excited as kids.

On every card there was one name. Burton. Burton. Burton. "More of this man Burton." "That Richard Burton is something!" "Where has this Richard Burton been?" In their own way, in their own words that theater audience that night made a new star. The studio people were excited because audiences have never been wrong. The movie makers have, but never the audiences. The film went back to the cutting room for minor editing, but the order was out: Don't cut a foot of Burton!

Subsequent events, such as the casting of Richard Burton in the leading role in The Robe, have proven that the movie industry think he's the greatest import since Laurence Olivier, and that he is that rare item in British actors, a he-man morsel for American women. A rugged lad with the fire it takes to sweep American girls from their living room chairs right into the movie theaters.

Now something about the man himself, for you will be seeing a good deal of him.

Richard Burton has no traditional background that could qualify him to be an actor. He was born in 1925 in Pont Rhydyfen in the south of Wales, coal mining country. He was one of 13 children, the tot in a household that depended for its bread on the work its men did in the pits and a youngster of 13 is a man in the coal country. From his earliest childhood, Richard Burton was aware of the poverty about him, but his lot was no different from his neighbors'. He knew the pinch of hunger, the dreadful chill of insecurity, but, he says, he never knew unhappiness in his home, or at any time as a child. The Welsh have backbones that stand up under strong adversity—and they know how to smile.

The Burton boys were all sturdy lads, and as tough as they were rugged.

"We lived in the slums, right in the heart of the slums of our town," Burton says. "My real name is Jenkins, and we were called the Jenks, the scourge of the top end" of the town. There was an Irish family, equally as violent as we, and they were the scourge of the 'lower end' of the town. The two families were in a constant feud.

"When I went to school, being the youngest of the Jenks, I had the full protection of my brothers, and not a teacher dared lay a hand on me—although Welsh teachers are known for their corporal punishment of pupils. But even so, I always considered it an insult to be called a Jenks."

There was actually never any encouragement given the Jenkins boys to get out of the mines and into other lines of work, certainly not into anything cultural. Richard's father, now a man of 80, had been a miner all his life, and just retired a couple of years ago. The boys did, however, take off on their own and today they are scattered about the world working at everything from professional football (soccer) to soldiering. Richard is the only one in the theater.

While he was still an infant, Richard Burton's mother died and he went to live with a sister who was then 22 and married to a coal miner. He remained with her for more than ten years. As he says himself, he was a "rough" boy, and if it hadn't been for meeting a man by the name of Meredith Jones he might still be so today. Very few boys in Richard's district spoke English. Welsh was the common tongue in the homes. Jones discovered that Richard had an ear for English and tutored him. Consequently, when it came time to take the entrance examination into what corresponds to our high school (it was in English, of course) Richard passed—and became the first boy from his district in 35 years to do so.

When he was 13 years old, a double crisis came into his life. His sister's husband came down with an attack of silicosis, the disease which attacks the lungs of miners, and a depression hit South Wales. It became necessary for the boy to go to work, so he became a shop assistant in an establishment dealing in men's suitings and worked there for almost a year until the family's financial lot improved.

This breach in his education was in reality something of a Godsend, as it was to prove later, for when he went back to the halls of learning a new teacher had arrived, a man named Phillip Burton, who has had a tremendous influence on Richard's life ever since. As a matter of fact, when Richard became an actor he took Burton's name.

"Phillip Burton didn't see anything in me at first," Richard says. "I saw something in him. He was an erudite man and seemed to possess all of the qualities I wanted to develop in myself. At that time I wasn't sure just what I wanted to be. I used to admire the eloquence of the preachers at the churches I attended, and I sometimes thought I, too, wanted to be a minister. And then I learned that Burton was a writer and had been an actor, so I went to him one day and told him I wanted to be an actor and asked him to help me."

The announcement that Richard wanted to be an actor may not have been astonishing to Phillip Burton, but it most certainly was to Richard's family. In the district he lived actors were considered "sissy" to say the least, and Richard's brothers could not have been more taken aback.

"I had a vast ego by this time," Richard says, "and it was somewhat deflated when Phillip Burton informed me there were a number of things against me. There was the district. I'd get no help there, as the natives thought the proposition that people got paid for prancing about on a stage fantastic. I had a tendency toward chubbiness; and I was short at 14. But I was persistent, so eventually he gave me a small part in a school play—and later on a larger part. I imagine I was appalling, but it was a start."

Phillip Burton must have seen something of the spark that was to hold legitimate theater audiences in London entranced later on, for suddenly he began a strict supervision of the young man's theatrical activities, having him come to his home a couple of hours each evening for tutoring. He began with a general cultural course of education and then carried on through with speech and the rudiments of stagecraft.

"There were times I thought I'd go mad," says Richard, "but Burton never let up on me. My Welsh accent was very thick, and he'd take a speech from a play by Shakespeare or Shaw and make me learn to speak it exactly as he did. It was very difficult for me. I'd stand in front of him by the hour repeating after him exactly like a parrot. He was in advanced middle age and tended to be pedantic, and he never once, during the first two years he worked with me, ever said he thought I'd be a good actor." (Continued on next page)

At the conclusion of his high school education, at 16, Richard got an opportunity to take an entrance examination for Oxford. It was the turning point in his life, but it seemed certain he would flunk out.

"I could tell you what two and two were," he says, "but beyond that mathematics were a total mystery to me. That's when Phillip Burton came to the rescue again. He began to teach me, and one day put his finger on the kink in my mind that made figures difficult. The result was that I breezed through the examination."

It was while waiting for Oxford that Richard Burton's big break came. He read an ad in a Cardiff newspaper stating that an actor was needed for a role in an Emlyn Williams play, and he had to speak Welsh. Richard was only 16, but he was aware that there was a shortage of actors due to the war, so he applied for the part and got it.

Although Cardiff was only 14 miles from his home town, young Burton had never been there before he applied for that job. The trip itself was almost the peak of a boy's career, but when he found himself in the West End of London a few weeks later, rehearsing on a real stage with celebrated performers he thought he was in heaven. That was nothing compared to the notices. The critics were unanimous in their praise of Burton's talent, all saying, in effect, that he had a "remarkable quality" on the stage.

It is a fantastic thing for a Welsh mining boy to escape the pits, but it is equally odd for any young British actor to escape the years of repertory and make his professional debut in London's West End. Richard Burton had done both. But at the end of seven months, Richard left the play to go to Oxford. At the time he was earning a slim 30 dollars a week. It may not appear so much to Americans, but it was exactly double what his father was making, after spending 60-odd years in the Welsh coal mines.

When he was 17 years old, with a year of Oxford behind him, Richard Burton became eligible for military service, so he enlisted in the RAF, where he stayed for the duration of the war. He is not much of a military man, so he remained an enlisted man all during his service, a period of three and a half years.

Discharged from the Army, Burton found himself at loose ends, much as many young men of his time did. He had to make up his mind if he wanted to remain on the stage or get into some more stable occupation. The stage won, for a try anyway, so Richard took his last bit of money, went to London, and called on a man named Binkie Beaumont, a producer who had seen him act before the service, and barged into his office like a star come to pick up his script.

"It was pretty funny," Richard says. "Although he had asked me to look him up, I knew he didn't remember me. After we had talked a few minutes he excused himself—and I knew when he came back into the room that he had been out looking me up. Well, the result was that that very afternoon they brought in a contract, which I eagerly signed, agreeing to pay me ten pounds a week."

A lot of experience was crammed into that year, which was the term of the contract. Burton appeared in half a dozen plays and in one movie, which he didn't particularly enjoy making. And at the end of that time, feeling he had the world by the tail, he went out and applied for a job as a free-lance actor.

"I'll never forget it," he says. "It was the first and only time I was ever fired. They said I was too young, but I believe they thought I was incompetent. I am glad to be able to say, though, that the director who fired me has since offered me any number of parts, none of which I have been able to take."

It was in The Lady's Not For Burning, a play by Christopher Fry, that Richard Burton first became a real hit, and it was in this play that he made his debut on the American stage in New York. From there on he went great guns. His next job was playing ten months of Shakespeare at Stratford-on-Avon and his reputation was made as far as British audiences were concerned. It was while working at Stratford-on-Avon that Richard got his first big-money movie contract. Alexander Korda came to see him and signed him to a multi-picture deal, which, by the way, Burton is still working out. It calls for a picture a year for five years. It is odd, incidentally, that although Burton has made four of these films none have been made by Korda. He has been loaned to other producers.

Richard Burton is married to a tiny elf of a woman with prematurely greying hair who was formerly named Sybil Williams. They met while he was making his first film, Woman Of Dolwyn. Sybil, still in school, had gotten a job working in the movie during her vacation, and their meeting could reasonably be called love at first sight, for they were married shortly after they met on February 5, 1948. Sybil, too, is Welsh, and was raised in a town just a few miles from Richard's home, but they never met until they came to London after they had grown up.

ALTHOUGH many miles separate Richard Burton from the Welsh mining town that was his home as a boy, he has never lost touch, and each week he writes a letter to his sister, Cecilia James, who raised him, and she reads it to the rest of the family. He is not in touch with most of his brothers, though, claiming, rightfully, that he'd have to have a mimeograph machine to accomplish this. It is an odd arrangement, this letter writing, because to this day none of the family has ever answered one of Richard's letters. But they know he's all right.

Money is not one of the important things in Richard Burton's life, although his current contract to make The Robe is one of the best in Hollywood.

"I have a respect for money, though," Richard says, "because I have seen what the lack of it can do to people. My sister, who is only 45, looks 65 . . . all because of the years of poverty, the malnutrition, the constant need and struggle for money. I think it was for her I've done all this. I wanted her to have money. But I also wanted to conquer the world and make her proud of me."

Life in Hollywood is a lot of fun for Richard Burton. He likes America. He likes people. He likes fast cars and the free and easy way of life. He spends a good deal of his time in the company of other British actors, the James Masons, the Grangers and Robert Newton—but he is making American friends fast. He is a rather shy man until you get to know him, but he warms to people and he appears to be the kind of man who once a friend will remain a friend always.

Off-screen his appearance is vital. His head is large, covered with a shock of dark brown hair, worn long for his role in The Robe. His eyes are intense and probing, and the other features masculine and rather classic. The marks of some childhood pox are on his skin, and he enjoys referring to them as a mark of ugliness. His humor is quick and earthy, and he likes to drift into the male jokes of his boyhood, told in the vernacular of a Welsh brat. He's not a tall man, probably slightly under six feet, but he gives the impression of massive strength when he enters a room. He is, in truth, a splendid figure both on-screen and off.

As he looks back on the strange story that is his own life, Richard Burton would change few things. Life was hard in Pont Rhydyfen, but it was never without love and a laugh. The rowdy character of his formative days made him a man able to cope with any problem of his manhood.

He carries in his heart a great respect and gratitude for Phillip Burton, who, by his interest and hard work, saved the youngest of the Jenks from the pits. He is eager to use the knowledge he struggled to come by so his enthusiasm is boundless. His mind is filled with memories of the boosts given him, so he is a man other actors will find ready to give them a leg up when needed.

All of these things are seen in the man's personality and in his work. Richard Burton is indeed a star who will add to the quality of American movies. END does mother know best?

The whistle which came from Jimmy Stewart's lips at that rejoinder has been echoed admiringly many times since, but also despairingly by would-be boy friends who always find themselves getting nowhere in their attempts to get anywhere with her. Just to catch a few minutes alone with Debra is something practically none of them can boast about. Debra may be 19 today but it is still one of Hollywood's rarities to see her anywhere without her mother, Mrs. Margaret Griffin.

In fact, if Debra should ever be asked that standard courtroom query, "Where were you on the night of (or the morning of, or the afternoon of) . . . et cetera?" she can always tell the truth by replying, "With my mother."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

We were visiting the Kellogg Arabian Horse Ranch and our nine-year-old with his first box camera was anxious to get some pictures. We saw a crowd gathered around one of the stalls and hurried over to see what was happening.

Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Taylor (who were still Mr. & Mrs.) were there taking delivery on an Arabian colt. They were surrounded by autograph seekers on all sides.

Our nine-year-old wormed his way through the crowd until he was right in front of the two stars, then calmly turning his back on them, he took a picture of the horse!

Mother is with her when she arrives at the studio in the morning. Mother is with her when she leaves. In between mother is with her at make-up, hair-dressing and every minute on the set. Mother is there at conferences, at luncheon, during interviews. Mother is not only always there but except for the moments when Debra is actually in front of the camera mother does most of the talking. It is getting so that people who ask Debra a question automatically turn to mother for the answer.

Thus her professional life. Ditto her personal life. It is spent mostly at home with her sisters and brother, their friends, and, of course, always mother. On those occasions when she attends a party (usually one which has publicity implications or is otherwise blessed by her studio) it is always with the same combination escort-chaperon and shadow . . . mother. On arrival, mother's presence is sometimes resented by the host, hostess or guests, but she is so breezy, so full of easy camaraderie, that before long she is hailed as the life of the party. The joking and the laughter centers around her; Debra, the star, the celebrity, is content to sit quietly by, basking in her mother's temporary popularity.

ACTUALLY, since the days of Shirley Temple, whose mother left no doubt that she, and only she, made Shirley's decisions, Hollywood's screen mothers have tended to stay in the background of their children's careers. Mrs. Griffin is one of the few exceptions to the rule. Another was Margaret O'Brien's mother, Mrs. Gladys O'Brien, who once declared, very emphatically, that "A movie child is a child who does as she is told, immediately, the first time." (This was some years ago when Margaret was her studio's prize possession. Nobody seems to know what to tell Margaret these days.) But the mothers of such contemporary stars as Barbara Ruick, Terry Moore, or Debbie Reynolds, for instance, are not at all inclined to such an attitude.

Terry Moore's mother, Luella Koford, the writer, is mainly concerned with how Terry is represented to the public; she simply wants to be of use to her daughter and the best way she can accomplish this is by giving Terry the benefit of her own experience in public relations. "I've done nothing since Terry has been in pictures but watch out for her art," she said not long ago, referring to exerting a restraining influence on Terry's bathing suit pictures in general, and a couple of flesh-colored ones in particular. "I realize the need for sexy art but there has to be a stopping place somewhere."

Mrs. Maxine Reynolds, mother of the bouncing Debbie, is a natural homemaker and has refused to let her daughter's prominence interfere in any way with that most important and warming duty. And as far as Barbara Ruick is concerned she has had parental carte blanche to live her own life practically all her life. As a tot she was permitted to meet the guests when her folks gave parties and show off by reciting for all "with gestures." The guests used to get sick of it, the story goes, but Barbara did acquire a self-confidence and poise that has stood her in good stead before the public. Her mother, Lurene Tuttle, now acting in radio, and her father, Mel Ruick, of the New York stage, have since been divorced, which, of course, has minimized whatever home influence Barbara might have had. Yet her mother approves of Barbara's independence, of her right to make her own decisions no matter whether these involve going off on USO trips or accepting or rejecting the kind of social or professional life she wants to lead. "Barbara can take care of herself," Lurene says.

Debra's mother has actually said these very same words in talking about her. But while she may speak the lines of a modern Hollywood mother, she doesn't play the part. She insists, "The only reason I am with Debra a lot is because Debra wants me around." And Debra always nods in confirmation.

Mrs. Griffin goes even further. She tries to play friend to every boy who wants her to speak a good word for him with her daughter. She has never been known to discourage one; she gives every evidence of enjoying being known as a good sport. She even seems to make a practice of being heard arguing with Debra along this line. "Soandso's a nice kid," you can hear her tell Debra about some fellow. "If I was your age and unmarried I'd love to go out with him." Debra seldom replies.

Is it an act?

A reporter once asked Mrs. Griffin about this. (Debra was right there, sitting dutifully alongside her mother as always.) "You say that Debra has all the freedom she wants, if she wants it. But isn't that just a picture you are painting?" he wanted to know. "Isn't it true that you never let her out of your sight?"

"Oh, somebody's been kidding you!" she scoffed. "Who have you been listening to? I'm not straight-laced. Why, I married when I was three years younger than Debra is right now. It's just Debra's way. She is more interested in her work than anything else right now, that's all. Tomorrow it might be different. Even her sisters rib her about it all the time; keep telling her she's a natural old maid type."

Debra was already nodding in agreement. No reporter can recall any instance when she and her mother ever disagreed—not in public, that is.

The one outstanding truth about Hollywood mother-daughter relationships, an almost unvarying fate, is that they cool; the thicker the pair, the more prominent the star, the quicker and more solid the frost. The latest case involves Elizabeth Taylor and her mother, Sara. It's sad but it is true. Mrs. Griffin is not unaware of this; no one in her position could be. Maybe it was fear, maybe she was kidding, when she said once, "If Debra gets uppity I'll sit on her." Maybe she was kidding because she weighs close to 180 pounds and doesn't mind joking about her plumpness. But she is so much a part of Debra's affairs that it must be frightening to her to contemplate the day when she will have nothing to say about them. In Debra she lives again the thrills and great moments she once knew herself on the stage. When that is taken away from her . . . ?

Debra always explains her preference for her mother's company along personal lines. She says she has Victorian ideals about romance and is not interested in being with young people just for the sake of getting around. "I'm a firm believer in love at first sight," she has said. "Until that happens I have no intention of dating even casually. Being with my mother, my family, is much more enjoyable to me than being in the company of some man in whom I have no permanent interest."

Some boys who have tried to get to know her, and failed, don't think she has told the whole story here. "It's hard to believe," said one, "but there is a lot of little girl in that big girl."

HOWEVER, there are friends of the Grif-fins, studio people close to them ever since Debra got her movie start at the age of 13, who have a more simple explanation for Debra's loyalty to her kin.

"Her parents have a tremendous investment in Debra," said a woman who is associated with Debra's rise to stardom. "It is an investment not only in money but in the sacrifice and hardship that any family finds it must undergo to finance the career of a beauty. Why even after Debra starred in several pictures the principal source of support for the family was not her salary but the steady wage earned by her father as an ordinary painter. Only three years ago Debra was getting $100 a week, with a take-home pay, after agent's commission and all other deductions, including court-ordered savings, of hardly $40 a week! Even now, with a salary of $500 a week a surprisingly small part of it can actually be used for upkeep. The family is still paying off for her first good fur.

"Debra realizes all this. She saw the penny-saving that went on, the scrimping that meant, and still means, living in small, cramped homes, and she wants to make sure that all this effort is justified. And it's because she doesn't want to make any mistakes that might jeopardize this goal, in her personal life as well as her professional one, that she wants the benefit of her mother's judgment always.

"Some people think her mother is foolishly trying to shield Debra from contact with life. They forget Mrs. Griffin was on the burlesque stage for years and that Debra was raised in as raw an environment as you can find in this country. Even if she tried, her mother could hardly keep her in ignorance of life, and she doesn't try. Nor is Debra ignorant. She isn't afraid of unknown pitfalls; it's the common mistakes she doesn't want to make; the ones any young actress knows about and can still trip over. That's where Mama comes in—to help Debra make sure."

There is no doubt that Debra is a serious girl. A good proof are all the "A's" she got as a studio scholar, snatching her lessons on the set between acting sessions. Schooling doesn't come easily this way, as any educator will tell you; there are not only too many interruptions, there are too many glamorous distractions.

Everyone around the Fox studios remembers a weird algebra answer Linda Darnell turned in early in her career when one afternoon she was summoned to class by her teacher right after a tempestuous love scene in front of the camera. Linda finished an equation by writing that "X" equals "TP." It seems she was still thinking of Tyrone Power, whose arms she was just left.

Debra has impressed her teacher with her power of concentration. Once, during some location shooting in New York she had to take an examination in a publicly parked taxicab which the studio had rented for a classroom. Again she got her "A."

ODDLY enough, Debra may be getting some freedom soon from mother's supervision whether she wants it nor not. One of her sisters has become a screen hopeful at another studio. Some weeks ago Universal-International developed a strong yen to have Debra co-star for them with Donald O'Connor in Walking My Baby Back Home. They had a tentative talk with Debra (and mother) and were told that 20th had an exclusive contract.

"But why don't you try my sister, Lezlie Gae?" suggested Debra. (If you like the name Lezlie Gae you might as well know that in the Griffin family colorful names do not happen by accident. Mrs. Griffin, with show-minded foresight, christened all her children with names she thought would look good on theater marquees. Debra's full name, for instance, is Debra-lee. Another grown daughter, now married, is called Teala Loring. Then there is Debra's older brother for whom Mrs. Griffin really reached high, wide and dramatic. He is known as Ruell Shayne.)

The studio took a look at Lezlie Gae and liked her very much. She didn't get the role offered to Debra but she is off to a good start. The only trouble is that which looms ahead for Mrs. Griffin. Universal-International is about ten miles from 20th Century-Fox. She can't be in two places to watch two daughters!

So maybe some changes are in order. But as of this date Debra and her mother are still a going concern. Even when night falls, and Debra pulls back the luxurious, red velveteen, quilted spread over her extra-sized bed and prepares for sleep . . . mother is still there. They even share the same bed!

Even one brushing can stop bad breath all day!*

Every brushing fights tooth decay!

Clean sweet breath - even after eating

*Yes, a single brushing with new Ipana lets you eat and smoke with amazing freedom from unpleasant mouth odor (except, of course, from onions or garlic). In tests, it stopped most cases of unpleasant mouth odor for even 9 hours after brushing.

Dentists say it's best to brush your teeth after every meal... and we agree. But when this is inconvenient, you can still get wonderful results with new white Ipana.

For instance, when you use Ipana in the morning, you don't have to worry about your breath for up to 9 hours... even after eating or smoking. Tests by an independent laboratory proved it.

What's more, every brushing with new Ipana fights tooth decay. It removes bacteria that form the acids that eat into your teeth and cause cavities. So to fight tooth decay effectively, use new Ipana regularly—after meals when you can.

And here's how to take care of your gums before gum troubles start. Brushing your teeth with new Ipana from gum margins toward biting edges helps remove irritants that can lead to gum troubles.

With all these benefits, Ipana now has a new, more refreshing flavor. Thousands of families who tried new Ipana liked it 2 to 1 for taste.

We're sure you and your children will like it, too. Why not try a tube of new, white Ipana today? Look for the yellow-and-red striped carton.

A. Sinatra owes the Government $110,497.97. There has been no talk of jail. Unless Sinatra pays up, the Government will attach his recording royalties, his salary, his property until the delinquency is satisfied.

A. Welles has tax trouble.

Q. Isn't it a fact that Gwen O'Connor filed for a divorce from Donald O'Connor originally because she fell in love with Dan Dailey?

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

Wayne Bell of WFTM, Maysville's local station, crowned Rosie "Queen of Song" in the name of disk jockeys the country over.

WHEN YOU read this, Jane Powell will be touring this country and Canada with her night club act. And by the strangest coincidence, Gene Nelson's public appearances take him to the same towns at the same time Jane is playing!

The rift between Janie and Geary Steffen was a body blow to her fans, to the whole industry, in fact.

The public is more or less used to the romantic failures of the Lana Turners, Ava Gardners, et al. But Jane and Geary and their two children stood for something solid among the younger married set.

Apparently, everything was okay until Jane was loaned by MGM to Warners' to make Three Sailors And A Girl with Gene. So simon-pure was Jane's reputation that even the usually suspicious co-workers thought little of the fact that she and Gene lunched together daily.

The first jolt came when Gene admitted that he and his wife of nine years were separating. (They have a son.)

Two weeks later came the thunderbolt that Jane and Geary had had "trouble" and were attempting to hold their marriage together.

her two children and a nurse, she said, "Unless I have a change of heart, I'll divorce Geary when I return to Los Angeles in six weeks."

She had "no comment" to make about Gene Nelson (as though one were needed!).

Somebody tried to tell me that the trouble between Jane and Geary is that he is a business man and she is an artist; and the attraction between Jane and Gene is that they speak the same language, showbusiness. That's a lot of nonsense if you ask me.

What gets into these young people—the Donald O'Connors, Gene Nelsons, the Steffens, Jane Withers and her husband and all the rest of them? Do they think a change of partners will solve the problems that can only be handled by more inner strength and patience and understanding of the individual?

DESI ARNAZ was all over the Racquet Club in Palm Springs the Saturday night of his and Lucille Ball's first vacation since Desi IV was born, showing a whole set of nude pictures of his son and heir.

"Some boy, eh?" squealed Desi bustin' his buttons with pride over his four-months-old boy. "Already the glamor girls are tryin' to date him—but he gives them all the brush. Some boy!"

Lucille called from their table, "Desi! You bring those pictures right back here! Can't poor little Desi have some privacy?"

Obediently, Desi returned the nudes to his red-headed Lucy. She gave him some others to show of the baby with clothes on.

Desi exhibited these, too. "But they don't do him justice," he sighed.

FRANKIE SINATRA JR., age 10, had his first fight with a kid at school who said that Frankie, Sr. "couldn't sing."

Scratched up but victorious, Frankie reported the battle to his mother.

Nancy said, "Darling, you mustn't fight. Don't you know that if Daddy couldn't sing we wouldn't have this lovely home and all the good things he gives us even though he doesn't live here anymore?"

"From now on when a boy says your father can't sing, just ask him if his father has done as well in his business as your father has done in his."

Little Frankie thought this over.

"All right," he conceded, "and if his father hasn't done as well, I won't fight. But if Griming excitedly, Rosemary is interviewed in front of the theater. She was guest of honor of the gold teen-oge donce that followed.

Elected an honorary member of the Moysville Boy's Club, Rosemary receives her membership cord while the Club, ordent admirers oll, looks on.

Rosemary gratefully acknowledged the honor done her when a street was named for her, Maysville's lady mayor, Mrs. Rebebeh Hord, stands by.

Back in Hollywood once again, Rosie relaxes with her favorite beau José Ferrer, and gives him a report on her triumphant return to her home town.

he has done as well—I'm gonna beat the stuffin' out of him!"

THE LAW of compensation really paid off for Virginia Mayo and Mike O'Shea.

After six years of a childless marriage, they expect a baby in November and they're just about the two happiest people in the world.

This wonderful blessing came at a time when Virginia and Mike thought the breaks were going against them. Mike's career hasn't been going well. And a California court handed down a decision that Virginia (because of our state's community property laws) had to pay the first Mrs. O'Shea $25,000 in back alimony.

When things looked blackest came confirmation of their dearest hope—a baby is coming to them. They're nice people, Virginia and Mike. I'm so happy for them.

I'M NOT losing any sleep fearful that the "scoop" of Terry Moore's "elopement" with Robert Wagner will elude me.

This little gal has a plenty hep press agent. He never misses a chance to get Terry in the papers as the burning heart interest of some very attractive gentleman or another.

Bing Crosby sat down at her table briefly following a golf match. The next day the gossip columns were flooded with news of this newest "romance."

The truth about Terry and young Wagner (a much sought after guy) is that they were in Florida making a movie together. And they went dancing a couple of times.

So, this is blown into a "big story" that Terry and Bob are on the verge of eloping. (I'll wait.)

LISTEN TO THIS: psychiatrists have diagnosed Marlyn Monroe's frequent colds and asthmatic attacks as "psychosomatic" (meaning an illness brought on by a frustration).

"She needs to feel that she is loved and wanted," say the mental-medics. "She suffers physically from a subconscious yearning for affection!"

Wait 'til the Army, Navy and Marines hear this!

I WONDER WHAT Janet Leigh thinks if she happens to remember the interview she gave not too long ago in which she said, "It may seem cold-hearted, but when a couple in our set starts quarreling and having trouble, we just don't see them anymore. It's too dangerous to the happiness of the young marrieds we know to associate with couples who are fighting or divorcing!" Now look what's happened.

The first couple in the set of "happy young marrieds" to turn in their badges were Mona Freeman and Pat Nerney. When their marriage break came, no longer were they among the gay group headed by Janet and Tony Curtis and Jerry Lewis and Patti, invited to barbecues, to make home-made movies and to share vacation trips to Palm Springs or the mountains.

Then the Dean Martins had a serious break before they decided to try again.

Now it's Jane Powell and Geary Steffen on the skid list.

And, horror of horrors, Janet and Tony have spent a great deal of time recently heatedly denying that they are having their problems.

Pretty soon, the only couple left of the "original" group of friends still permitted to join the barbecue-home-movies group, may be Patti and Jerry Lewis!

The "cast" is rapidly pffitting out!

A SOLDIER IN KOREA SENDS HIS THANKS TO LOUELLA AND TO YOU.

Dear Louella,

I wish to express my thanks to you and to MODERN SCREEN for the wonderful response to my request for mail. At first I answered every letter but they arrived in increasingly large numbers. Today I got 62 letters and find it impossible to answer them all. A lot of the letters are being passed on to other GI's and I sincerely hope each letter gets answered.

If there is some way you can convey this information to the many nice people who have written me, I will appreciate it.

As for myself, I couldn't be better. The food is good, we have warm clothing, and I also have 30 points for rotation. What more could anyone ask?

In closing, I again say "Thanks." You have boosted my morale 100 per cent. If you have time to drop me a line, I'll be only too glad to read and answer it.

Sincerely,

John Hughes,

Continued

AFTER BEING the dowdiest-dressed pregnant woman ever to have a baby in Hollywood, Shelley Winters is absolutely startling the natives by showing up at social events a bloomin' fashion plate. She's very, very chic these days.

She came to the Diner's Club cocktail party at Ciro's in a cinnamon-colored cocktail suit with jet buttons, black gloves and, believe it or not, a very chic cocktail hat with tiny jet beads on the veil. It's the first time the oldest citizen can recall Shelley wearing a hat.

When she was kidded about how smart she looked, Shell flipped, "Why should I have spent money looking like I did before Vittoria was born? Now I've got my 'figger' back there's some sense in going overboard on buying pretty clothes."

Another gal at the same affair who looked surprisingly different was Jeanne Crain, who showed up with her hair violently red and very short. And her husband, Paul Brinkman, looked "different" because he had shaved off his mustache.

While we're on the subject of fashions, Ann Blyth's wedding garters will be the most original ever donned by a bride: they are blue-lace with tiny bags filled with rice decorating them.

PURELY PERSONAL: It's touching and a little sad the way Greta Peck (Mrs. Gregory) tries to pretend that all is well between her and Greg. She explains her return to Hollywood while he remains in Europe making movies, by saying "It's better for our children to be here." . . .

Robert Taylor, who has always criticized people for necking in public, necks in public with Ursula Thiess. . . .

Nothing is sillier to me than the argument defending the stars in Europe for 18-months to dodge income taxes, "an actor's career in the big money is so short." Errol Flynn has had a short career? Clark Gable has had a short career? Claudette Colbert? Gene Kelly? Gary Cooper? Gene Tierney? Oh, come now. . . .

No girl ever took sudden, dizzying success with more modesty than Rosemary Clooney. Just love this gal. . . .

Mona Freeman's torch for Bing Crosby is lighting up Sunset Boulevard. I still say, no matter how many dates Bing has with a pretty girl, he ain't thinking of marrying again. . . .

You may not think of "Schnozz" Durante as the ideal lady's man, but his cute, redheaded girl friend, Marjorie Little, cried her eyes out when she (mistakenly) thought he was at a night club with another gal. Guess we better start calling him "Romeo" Durante. . . .

THE SIGHT-OF-THE-MONTH was the Paramount Studio gates opening to permit a sporty Jaguar car onto the lot. The driver was Michael Wilding in bright yellow slacks and sweater and beside him sat a nurse holding three-months-old Michael Howard Wilding on her lap.

Just like his old man, baby Mike was also done up in yellow, but it was a paler shade; a little embroidered yellow cap and matching jacket.

The Wilding "men" were on their way to visit Mamma Elizabeth Taylor who was emoting in Elephant Walk—her first movie since Mike, Jr.'s birth.

THESE FOUR ROMANCES ARE NOW THE HOTTEST TOPICS OF HOLLYWOOD.

Since this first date, Gwyneth O'Connor and Dan Dailey have been fair game. Dan's been blamed for plenty, Gwen's said to long for a career.

Geary threw a birthday party for Jane. But Jane pairing off with Gene Nelson threw all Hollywood for a loop. Only temporarily, says Geary.

Terry Moore and Bob Wagner were supposed to be a "thing" in Florida. But it turned out to be hotter in print than in person. They're just pals.

Wedding plans for Jeff Dannell and Aldo Ray were in the blueprint stage before Rita Hayworth came along . . . now everything's sketchy.

Continued

The Tyrone Powers and daughter Romina examine a gift basket during a recent stay at N.Y.'s Savoy Plaza. Another baby is expected soon.

Louella Parsons, guest of honor at a Masquers' Club dinner, was the first person outside the acting profession ever to be so honored. She was dubbed "Hollywood's leading columnist." Here, she's congratulated by Pat O'Brien and Edgar Bergen.

A beaming Shelley Winters gets a kiss from Susan Boll as Dawn Addams waits her turn. Both Susan and Dawn, along with all of Shelley's other friends, were delighted when tiny, premature Vittoria, pronounced out of danger by the doctors.

Jan Sterling and her husband Paul Douglas are rarely found night clubbing in Hollywood—but when they're visiting New York, that's another story! They really do the town! Jan's latest is Paramount's Pony Express; Paul's in Forever Female.

He is just about the huskiest little fellow you ever saw and so cute that director William Dieterle insisted on shooting a whole minute of footage showing young Wilding in his mother's arms.

He was very blasé about it but kept trying to push Liz' face to the side.

"Hm-mm-mm," observed papa Wilding from the sidelines, "a born actor!"

MARIO LANZA flies into such tantrums that I'm sure the only real solution to his problem is medical care. His latest antic was tearing the mail box off his Palm Springs house when he failed to receive a letter he expected.

And he's re-gained a great deal of weight, although he tries to diet.

I believe that some people are born to be plump and that it is dangerous for them to diet too strenuously.

Judy Garland had all her trouble when she was trying desperately to get thin.

And, everything had been all right with Mario before he took off 75 pounds.

Mario is a great artist. If keeping his physique in shape means losing him on the screen, for heavens sake, let's have him plump.

RITA HAYWORTH'S hair-do for Miss Sadie Thompson is said to be the sexiest yet. Hair stylist, Helen Hunt, created it and it's a halo of soft, loose curls which sway with the Princess' body movements. They "wiggle" when Rita dances. Sounds like Medusa and the snakes in her hair to me—but I'm willing to see it on Rita.

THE LETTER BOX: A wonderful sympathetic letter from Vera Marshall, of New York, about Bing Crosby: "He never in any way revealed or indicated any personal unhappiness in his life. Can others, with less serious troubles, say the same? I say Bing is entitled to a little happiness." You are a fan with rare understanding, Vera.

"Alela," St. Louis, wants to know why Dale Robertson's publicity has dropped off. It was his own idea—and I'm not sure it was a good one.

That's all for now. See you next month.

HOLLYWOOD ABROAD

AN M/S WIRE SERVICE OF LATE NEWS FROM AROUND

LONDON, ENGLAND Vivien Leigh, confined to a sanatorium in Surrey is "getting along nicely" according to Mr. and Mrs. David Niven who are living in the Oliviers' house in Chelsea. Vivien's 20-year-old daughter, Suzanne Holman, recently made a one-line debut in a London show; most of the family missed it. Her lawyer father, Leigh Holman, Vivien's first husband, was rehearsing his role of footman at the Coronation. Ever since 21-year-old Liz Taylor replaced 38-year-old Vivien in Elephant Walk moviegoers everywhere have wondered what sort of role it is that can be played by two such different stars. The script calls for an average English girl, 27 or 28, who goes to India and gets involved with two mean men and an elephant stampede. . . . James Mason has become a disc jockey for the British Broadcasting Company; plays mostly jazz.

PARIS, FRANCE Despite the mounting gossip, Gregory Peck is still seeing an awful lot of young, beautiful Veronica Passoni. He tells reporters: "Nothing to this, only friendship." But it would surprise no one here if eventually Miss Passoni becomes the second Mrs. Peck. (In Hollywood, Greta is reputed to be very worried, although she is confiding in no one.) The film Peck was supposed to make in India, The Purple Plains, has been cancelled, affording him more time in Paris. . . . The British and Scandinavians are shocked that Lana Turner and Lex Barker should be touring the Continent unchaperoned, but fans in the Latin countries don't seem to mind. When Lana and Lex first arrived in Paris they were invited to a cocktail party by someone who had last seen Lana while she was engaged to Fernando Lamas. At the party he turned to Lex and said, "Glad to see you and Lana together again, Mr. Lamas." Lex and Lana left very early.

RAVELLO, ITALY The Ingrid Bergman-Roberto Rossellini love affair has subsided from hot poetry to cold prose. Reason for this, according to intimates, is that Ingrid's movie career—her basic love in life—has slumped sharply. All the pictures she has made with husband Roberto have been flops. Domestically, the Rossellinis are content but not ecstatic. Rossellini, who owns nine racing cars, says, "Ingrid is much more ambitious than I am. Basically, I am a lazy man." Ingrid also feels that she is no longer welcome in the two countries she loves best—Sweden and the United States. However, there is a strong possibility that Bergman may arrive in New York very quietly late in June to see her daughter Pia (renamed Jenny) who lives happily and sedately in a small suburb outside Pittsburgh.

NICE, FRANCE The marriage of Gene Tierney to Aly Khan is expected momentarily here. Aly's financial settlement on Yasmin, Rita Hayworth's daughter, is a court secret, but confidentially, Aly has told friends he settled one million dollars on the little girl. Rita asked for and got nothing.

ROME, ITALY Humphrey Bogart, who has just finished filming Beat The Devil here, endeared himself to local newspapermen when he gave out with a barrage of salty quotes on his favorite subject—Hollywood. Samples of Bogart's interview: "Take it from me, nobody in Hollywood knows how to have fun except me and Errol Flynn. A couple of the girls have the old spark, too. . . . Watch the old hypocrites land on us every time we cut loose. They are always reminding me of my responsibilities to my public. . . . I don't owe my public anything but a good performance. That's what they pay for."

PARIS, FRANCE Charles Boyer, back home again, is trying to live down his movie reputation as a Great Lover. Now 51, the balding Boyer insists he is too old to discuss love, women or passion. "I just want to be known as an actor," he says. "After all, you never hear of Sir Laurence Olivier discussing love." . . . At the hotel George V in Paris where Jacques de Bergerac used to work as a clerk before he married Ginger Rogers, employees say they always knew he would end up with a wealthy wife. "He used to specialize in mature, beautiful women," a friend of de Bergerac explained. Incidentally, it was Evelyn Keyes who first introduced Ginger and Jacques to each other. Jacques, in fact, was Evelyn's friend but she gave him up without a struggle. Evelyn is currently very much occupied with producer Mike Todd in Hollywood.

Starrett (Van Heflin) and his family (Jean Arthur and Brandon deWilde) find that their homestead is being threatened by an ambitious cattle baron.

Shane rides mysteriously into town one day, and conditions strangely begin to improve. His placid mood is broken only by action in crisis.

The champion of the frontier leaves as quietly as he came. A heartbroken, hero-worshipping little boy vows to himself that he will be like his idol.

Shane (Alon Ladd) kept his agility with gun and fists a secret from the people of the small frontier town in Wyoming. But injustice and a murderous feud between settler and cattlemen force him to put down violence with violence.

MOVIE REVIEWS

by florence epstein

SHANE

■ Shane is a beautiful movie, a poetic recounting of the days when bitter feuds raged between cattle barons and homesteaders. Filmed in Technicolor, set in Wyoming with the Grand Tetons forming a vast and awesome backdrop, the movie captures the passion and glory inherent to the American frontier. It is more than a Western, it is a classic with dramatic use of music, fine rhythm of action, tableau effect of photography. The presence of Brandon deWilde, a little boy who observes all through hero-worshipping eyes, transforms the familiar heroes, villains and struggles into symbols of a romantic era in our past. Brandon's hero is Shane (Alan Ladd) a mystery man with a shiny gun in his holster who appears out of nowhere on a proud horse. He stops briefly at the homestead of Brandon's father (Van Heflin) and mother (Jean Arthur). Heflin is the leader of a small group of farmers bullied and threatened by a cattle baron (Emile Meyer) who wants their land for his beef. Ladd is moved by Heflin's courage and determination to stay put. He takes off his gun, changes into work clothes and for a long while conceals his facility at shooting and fighting. But the suggestion is always there that Ladd will prove, to Brandon at least, that he is the bravest man in the West. Ryker hires a gun fighter (Jack Palance) a lean figure in black who lures a brash but honest homesteader (Elisha Cook Jr.) to his death. But Ryker's sights are on Heflin, as everyone knows. The final gun fight occurs in a dim saloon. It is tense, powerful in its quiet approach toward doom and the epitome of all Western gunfights with Ladd twirling his gun magnificently before the dazzled deWilde. There are other scenes, more poignant, less dynamic, but each fits nicely into the whole. Directed and produced by George Stevens, shown on a "panoramic" screen, which is wider and slightly higher than usual, Shane is a complete success. Paramount.

TITANIC

The biggest marine disaster of our times occurred in 1912 when the R.M.S. Titanic, a luxury liner on its maiden voyage, struck an iceberg and sank. Only 712 people survived. The rest—1,517—went down with the ship. This movie is based on that tragedy. Remembered incidents are repeated; actors recreate the roles of known passengers, and the sets are actual reproductions of the ship's interior. But the bulk of the movie is fictional. There's the story of Barbara Stanwyck who is fleeing to America with her children (Audrey Dalton, Harper Carter) as a protest against the snobbish values of her husband, Clifton Webb. But Webb unexpectedly joins them on board and in those few hours before the disaster, the tragedy of their marriage unfolds. There's the story of Richard Basehart, who's returning home in shame, an unfrocked priest, because he can't shake himself free of alcoholism. There's the young college boy (Robert Wagner) who falls in love with Barbara Stanwyck's daughter. There's the rich widow (Thelma Ritter) and the social climber (Allyn Joslyn). The diverging lines of these people's lives are all drawn together in a common nightmare. And as the Titanic founders, each reacts from the depths of his nature. Fox has taken advantage of the real tragedy by superimposing a drama destined to flood you with tears. Maybe that's unfair, even corny, but it works.

HOUSE OF WAX

Here's 3-dimension's first full-length feature film. That's reason enough to see it. That's almost the only reason. The story is an old horror tale you'd expect to find on television but certainly not in this bright new medium. Vincent Price owns a wax museum. His partner sets fire to it just to collect the insurance. He also succeeds in horribly disfiguring and completely maddening Mr. Vincent Price. Vince retaliates by murdering his partner. Then he murders whoever else he thinks will look good in his museum. What he does is immerse the corpses in boiling wax and when they harden and cool he arranges them in artistic tableaux. Phyllis Kirk wanders in one day and comes face to face with an old friend (Carolyn Jones). It's only wax, says Vincent, eyeing her hungrily. Phyllis goes there once too often and soon finds herself about to be immersed. Luckily detective Frank Lovejoy arrives to turn off the heat. But you'll love the 3-dimensions (they hand out polaroid glasses, without which you are sunk). The corpses are in your lap, so's the fire and a few dancing girls (yes, they have dancing girls, too). The Warner-Phonic sound, however, is likely to blast you out of your seat coming at you, as it does, from all sides. Somehow you never connect those sounds with the people on the screen. You connect them with some wise guys in the left balcony. But time ought to do something to improve 3-D, or it's liable to turn into a monster.

CAST: Vincent Price, Frank Lovejoy, Phyllis Kirk, Carolyn Jones, Paul Picerni—Warners

NEVER LET ME GO

Romance, daring, intrigue—that's Clark Gable's meat. That's Never Let Me Go—the adventures of an American newspaperman in Russia who falls in love with a ballerina (Gene Tierney), marries her, and is forced to leave the country alone. His English friend, Richard Haydn, has also married a Russian (Belita) and must also leave her behind. Gable lights on a fantastic idea. Why not sneak the girls right out of Russia? He decides to buy a fishing boat, sail it from England to a beach resort near the town where Gene is performing. At night the beach is crowded with bathers. No one would notice if two of those bathers swam out beyond the breakers to a rowboat, were taken by that rowboat to the fishing vessel, and freedom. Haydn's skeptical, but what—besides his life—does he have to lose? Gable has a friend, a radio broadcaster in Russia, whom he contacts and together they devise a code enabling Gable to make rendezvous plans with their wives. Everything works—up to a point. But there's a run-in with a Russian patrol boat, and after that there's Gable masquerading as a Russian Army officer, and after that there's a chase right into the ocean. After that—well, see it for yourself.

PICK-UP ON SOUTH STREET

Fox calls this "a hit-and-kiss drama." They're not kidding. If it were 3-dimensional the whole audience would be down for the count. Opens in a crowded subway train. Jean Peters (a dish of questionable character) is having her pocketbook picked by Richard Widmark (he has no character). As it happens, Jean is carrying some micro-film marked for Communist agents. Jean's tough, but no Red—she's being used by her boyfriend (Richard Kiley). Widmark's no Red, but for money he'll do business with anybody. Later, though, love turns him into a patriot. The FBI has been trailing Jean, but now they have to find Widmark, too. And Jean's boyfriend forcibly suggests that she locate him and recover the film. Thelma Ritter, a necktie peddler and stool pigeon, plays all sides against each other. She knows every pickpocket in the city and—like Widmark—for money, she'll inform. Jean buys her way to Widmark's shack on the river. (The FBI buy their way, too, but Widmark knows that Thelma has to make a living, and bears no grudge.) Whenever Jean and Widmark meet they're not sure if they feel like necking or knocking each other's brains out—he uses his fists, she rallies with beer bottles. Between him and Richard Kiley it's no wonder Jean winds up in a cast. The plot's awfully tricky, but it sure isn't dull. Like Fox says—"it throbs with raw emotions."

THE GLASS WALL

Vittorio Gassman plays a displaced person who's barred from the United States because he's a stowaway without papers. Immigration officers plan to ship him back to Trieste, but Vittorio has spent ten years in concentration camps and is pretty fed up with the Old World's charms. He escapes to Times Square, hunting a clarinet player named Tom who'll vouch for his character. (Tom, an ex-paratrooper, owes his life to Gassman.) Broadway's garish background provides the people and the excitement of the chase. There's Gloria Grahame—she's taken to stealing doughnuts in cafeterias, but when she hears Vittorio's story she feels like a millionairess; she also falls in love with him. There's Robin Raymond, a hard-working burlesque dancer—she's willing to hide him from the police but her cowardly kid brother won't let her. And there's Tom (Jerry Paris)—he's ready to fight for Vittorio, only his fiancée (Ann Robinson) keeps telling him "not now." Now he has to audition for Jack Teagarden. The law is closing in, Tom's blowing his head off on the clarinet and Gassman's practically dropping dead in the streets. Finally, he makes his way to the UN and the building looms before him like a glass wall, a symbol of a world he yearns for but isn't allowed to touch. His desperation re-awakens you to the promise America holds for all such men. As for Vittorio, he's one of the lucky people who manage, in the end, to get over that wall.

IT HAPPENS EVERY THURSDAY

What happens? The Eden Archive press starts rolling and shakes the foundations of the house in which live Loretta Young, her husband John Forsythe and their two children. To begin with, John was a New York reporter, night shift. His wife was expecting her second child and the way they were existing had no future. Through an ad they bought a weekly newspaper in California. Only that was no newspaper, that was a broken down press with hardly any circulation. As for the seven room dwelling (also in the ad) those were seven rooms above the office, of which two were rented out to pressmen (Edgar Buchanan, Jimmy Conlin). Well, Loretta had her baby in a hurry—it made the first edition—and pretty soon she was out getting ads with the baby tucked under one arm and a briefcase under the other. Eden, California turns out to be a very small town where public opinion is extremely important. Just when the press is really beginning to roll, public opinion almost closes it down. Then there is the problem of rain. The farmers need rain. John decides to go up in an airplane and seed the clouds with dry ice. Only he has to wait for the right cumulus formation. Just when his plane is about to take off the rains came and the town hails him as a miracle maker. A couple of weeks later, though, they are threatening to sue him for damages. It's a busy movie, full of busy people, dreaming up gimmicks, raffling autos, saluting Boy Scouts, selling papers. But there's a nice gay feeling about it. It looks like fun.

CAST: Loretta Young, John Forsythe, Frank McHugh, Edgar Buchanan, Palmer Lee, Harvey Grant—Universal-International.

THE JUGGLER

Kirk Douglas, once a famous juggler, now a DP, arrives in Haifa with only bitter memories. His wife and child were victims of a gas chamber and he himself knew the horror of concentration camps and complete despair. He has an abnormal terror of confinement and when a doctor suggests that he needs psychiatric treatment he runs away from the DP camp. Mistaking an Israeli policeman for a Nazi, Kirk attacks and nearly kills him. Then he becomes a real fugitive, traveling through the back roads of Israel. Along the way he acquires a companion—12 year old Joey Walsh, and they tramp together. Finally they reach a remote kibbutz (communal farm). The boy is injured by a mine blast and is carried into the home of Milly Vitale, a beautiful young girl. For the first time in a long while Kirk feels close to another human being. Eventually, the police arrive and in a wild surge of panic Kirk barricades himself in Milly's house threatening to come out shooting. The strength of Milly's love crumples his resistance and he surrenders to arrest, rehabilitation and—perhaps—a new life. Kirk handles his part sensitively and well, and is surprisingly adept as a clown-juggler. But what really sets the picture apart is the fact that it was filmed in Israel and all of the backgrounds are fresh and exciting. The plot, unfortunately is often found lagging way behind the scenery.

CAST: Kirk Douglas, Milly Vitale, Paul Stewart, Joey Walsh, Oscar Karlweis—Columbia

THE GIRL NEXT DOOR

June Haver's last movie before she entered a convent, recently, is a tender little triangle concerning a night club singer (June), a cartoonist (Dan Dailey) and Dan's son (Billy Gray).

Billy is one of the few child actors you don't mind watching—that boy has charm. They all live next door to each other. June's a new neighbor, celebrating her own arrival with a huge garden party. Suddenly a flock of pigeons swoop down over the guests followed shortly by billows of smoke. Seems that father and son are cooking hamburgers on their outdoor barbecue—the pigeons are theirs, too. June marches over to give them what for—and not much later, it's love. Billy objects. He wants exclusive ownership of his father for purposes of hunting and fishing in the North Woods. While the romance is working itself out June's friend, Cara Williams, is unsuccessfully resisting the advances of Dennis Day. The story's slim, but that's all it's supposed to be. The glow's in the Technicolor, the singing, the dancing and, happily enough, there's enough of that to keep everybody in good spirits.

CAST: Dan Dailey, June Haver, Dennis Day, Billy Gray, Cara Williams—20th Century-Fox

BY THE LIGHT OF THE SILVERY MOON

This is a family affair full of old-fashioned song and sentiment. You keep thinking you've seen all this before, and you have. Nevertheless, the picture's full of chuckles and warmth. Setting's a small town after the first World War. Leon Ames and Rosemary DeCamp are the parents of Doris Day and 12-year-old Billy Gray. Mary Wickes is the faithful but sarcastic maid. They live in a comfortable home, Doris plans to marry her childhood sweetheart (Gordon Macrae), Billy is full of growing boy mischief (he has a turkey he pretends to kill for their Thanksgiving Dinner, but he swipes the neighbor's bird instead) and everybody's happy. Until scandal strikes. Father, after 20 years of wedded bliss, seems to be involved with an exotic actress—Maria Palmer. Seems to be right, because he's as innocent as a babe, but his children don't think so. His children valiantly set about to save him from himself. Naturally, they get all tangled up in their own web and Doris has weepy spells. But one moonlit night at Miller's Pond when the ice is hard and the spirits light, the happy truth is revealed. That actress was merely a business acquaintance of Dad's, kids, so you see, life is beautiful. Especially in Technicolor. This is a sequel, incidentally, to Doris and Gordon's hit On Moonlight Bay. CAST: Leon Ames, Rosemary DeCamp, Billy Gray, Mary Wickes, Russell Arms, Maria Palmer—Warners

WHO'S MAD AT WHOM:

The rumors that Janet Leigh and Tony Curtis were tiffing were spreading as we went to press. As a matter of fact, the neighbors claim they can hear Hollywood's prettiest couple battling! . . . Same stories were circulating about Kay and Brod Crawford, and about Jeff and Marjorie Chandler—again! . . . I've heard there'll be no divorce for Ty Power and Linda Christian—that they'll merely reach a mutual understanding not to "get in each other's way."

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Elizabeth Taylor Wilding's time out to have her baby cost her $60,000 in salary from her studio. And when a magazine offered her $3,000 for an exclusive story about the infant, together with exclusive photographs, she turned it down . . . Jacques Bergerac signed a property agreement under which he will have no claim on Ginger Rogers if their marriage doesn't pan out . . .

Lana Turner is trying to sell the $95,000 mansion in which she lived as Mrs. Topping. She can use the money . . . Lex Barker and Lana have been telling everyone they're SO in love—and yet they act so bored when they're out together. Funny, huh? . . . John Wayne is dickering to buy two hotels in Mexico City. The thing he's most mad at ex-wife Chata about is that she won't let him rent their unoccupied home in the San Fernando Valley. He claims he can get $1,000 a month rent for it and split with her but that she won't come across with an okay . . . It's been just 24 years since Gene Autry recorded a song called "That Silver-Haired Daddy of Mine" and started on his first $1,000,000.

FUNNIES:

. . . Gene Nelson's four-year-old son refused a quivering dish of gelatine. "I can't eat it!" he wailed. "It isn't dead yet!" . . . Marilyn Monroe took a deep breath for a scene in How to Marry a Millionaire and David Wayne said: "It makes Marilyn feel good but it makes me feel better!" . . . Ed Wynn's definition of The Monroe: "A posterior for posterity."

. . . When Zsa Zsa Gabor unveiled her new nightclub act in Las Vegas, Mrs. James Mason sent her this telegram: "No matter how lousy you are, you're still prettier than anyone else" . . .

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Terry Moore and Bob Wagner started practicing their love scenes for Twelve Mile Reef long before anybody asked them to! . . . Before Bing Crosby left for France he told me this: "Disregard all the rumors you hear about me and Mona Freeman and three or four other girls" . . . Would anyone be surprised if Mitzi Gaynor and Richard Coyle got together again, despite her dates with Hugh O'Brian? . . . Ann Blyth and her "Doc," Jim McNulty, are buying their household furnishings one at a time . . . Columbia prexy Harry Cohn ran a private screening, at his home, to which he invited Rita Hayworth and Manuel Rojas, her hottest romance since Aly Khan. Manuel is a Chilean who came to Hollywood with a polo team and liked it so well he decided to stay . . . Anyway, as I was saying, Cohn ran a screening of Rita's picture, Salome, and she and Manuel sat throughout the whole thing holding hands . . . Dick Haymes has been dating Rita, too, but it's Manuel who's her real heartbeat.

Whereupon Pier Angeli started going out with Arthur Loew, Jr. . . . LONG HUNCH DEP'T:

Esther Williams has wanted SO much to have a baby girl this time. And a bathing suit manufacturer promised her that if she did have one he would put out a new set of mother-&-daughter swim suits in their honor . . . Pev Marley, who has been directing Guy Madison's first movie in several years, says: "Give him three years and there'll be no bigger name in movies than Guy Madison" . . . Meanwhile, it looked like Guy and his estranged wife, Gail Russell, would never get together again—unless Gail NEEDS him by her side! And then watch Guy go running to her . . . One will get you five, despite all the rumors, that Byron Palmer won't wed this year.

Loretta Agar, John's wife, went looking for steady work while he served his jail sentence for drunken driving. She has been modeling. After all, a gal's gotta eat! . . . Judy Garland says she wants four more kids . . . People were saying that Vittorio Gassman "better hurry home from Italy to Shelley Winters or Shell isn't gonna be waiting for him!" I lunched perched atop a stool at Schwab's with her two days before her baby was born, and she showed no sign of being angry that he wasn't here to welcome his child. But I happen to know she wasn't too happy about it . . . On a quick trip to Europe this spring, I spent time with Alan and Sue Ladd. Alan was fed up with the life over there and wanted to come home immediately after Hell Below Zero finished shooting. But practical Sue insisted on staying 18 taxfree months.

HOME FIRES BURNING:

June Allyson is AGAIN out of the mood to continue her career, and where have I heard this before? Says she just wants to stay home and take care of Dick and the kids, and this time MGM just might let her! . . . Zsa Zsa Gabor's quick trip to Rome was to determine whether she would continue as Mrs. George Sanders or return to Hollywood and file the divorce papers . . . Patrice Wymore, complete with 30 pieces of baggage, arrived from abroad. But without Errol Flynn . . . Gary Merrill gave Bette Davis an album of photos from her 80 movies for her 45th birthday . . .

ODDS BODKINS:

When Barbara Stanwyck's in the dumps she makes transatlantic phone calls to the Mon-seigneur Café in Paris and gets Roger Baurieux and his 17 fiddle-players to play "My Heart's a Violin" for her . . . Rosemary Clooney thinks her decision to marry José Ferrer is under fire. She thinks her friends and fans disapprove. And if there's anything else that'll make a gal hold on for dear life I haven't heard about it! . . . Maggie O'Brien is still too young for boys, according to those who've asked her mother to okay a date . . . Monty Clift has been running around Hollywood High School's track every morning at seven for his role in From Here to Eternity. Great body-building, this . . . Somebody swiped Nancy Olson's monogrammed panties from the set of So Big at Warners, and she's not amused.

Leslie Caron goes shopping in tight matador pants and a black jersey sweater that are STRICTLY from Hallowe'en. Gosh, this gal dresses peculiarly in public . . . And does Debbie Reynolds have to be so all-fired effervescent at ALL times? Wears a guy out, she does . . . The Sister of Charity at Xavier, Kans., don't use hair-cutting as a ceremony, as do some religious orders, so two years from now when June Haver takes her final vows her curls will be topped by a nun's square cap . . . June, by the way, is waiting on tables for her room, board and schooling, having given up a $3,000-a-week contract at 20th Century-Fox to enter the religious life. One of the nuns she waits on reports: "June is light on her feet and a good worker."

QUICK QUOTES:

Lauren Bacall says she doesn't even look at other men while her Humphrey Bogart is abroad making pictures. Says Baby: "There's no one like him!" . . . Anne Baxter, just back from Texas, said, "The only millionaires I ran into were 76 or over."

SEX APPEAL:

Katie Grayson finished So This Is Love at Warners and told me: "I'll never go blonde again for any reason, not even to star in The Lana Turner Story!" . . . Jean Peters leaned over a table at Ciro's to whisper to me: "I'm ready for romance." The right guy for Jean still hasn't come along . . . Shirley "Little Sheba" Booth is now a tangerine blonde. Looks 30 and sexy. Shirleeeeeeeee! . . . Janet Leigh is, me-thinks, too thin.

Latest Hollywood fad for fingers: nails encrusted with rhinestones and emeralds . . . Doris Day is getting good enough at tennis to challenge Ginger Rogers, who's still the best in town . . . Mexican bulls chased 15 pounds off of Oscar winner Tony Quinn . . . John Barrymore, Jr., and his bride, Cara Williams, were playfully shaking spoons at each other at the Mocambo when a photographer rushed up to snap a picture of them. Yelled John: "Oh no—now everybody will say we're fighting again!"

Gable and a girl named Kelly

by Alice Hoffman

■ If he had not become an actor, and a darn good one, Clark Gable would have made a superb diplomat.

He is charming, tactful, smooth as nylon, and so sincere when denying an allegation, so altogether credible and downright that to doubt him seems like heresy.

You say to him, "What goes with you and Grace Kelly? I understand the two of you were virtually inseparable all through Africa and London? There's even a rumor that you and Grace have some sort of understanding, maybe an engagement?"

Gable fixes you with a manly stare, shakes that handsome temple-gray head of his and says flatly, "That's absurd. The whole story's fantastic. Just because we've made one picture together and we've been out a few times. She's a very lovely girl and a fine actress, but that's all there is to it."

If his history with women were not so replete with similar denials, one might accept Gable's protestations and admit that his friendship (Continued on page 72)

Clark Gable and Grace Kelly met while working on location for Mogambo, 750 miles inland in the bush country of Africa. In this dangerous, lonely environment the two stars found there was little to do after working hours but inspect the animal compounds (above) and sit around the fire and fall in love.

where to find the stars in hollywood

by Nancy Streebeck

■ If I had a dime for every star I've pointed out to tourists I'd be rich. However, if I had five cents for every time they have called me a liar I could retire.

If John Tourist stands on the corner of Hollywood and Vine chances are his attempts will be fruitless and he will return home very disappointed with a huge grudge against Hollywood and all it stands for.

What most people fail to know is that within a one-mile radius of Hollywood and Vine can be found countless numbers of stars.

The El Capitan Theatre which is located one block from the famous corner is now one of N.B.C.'s television centers. On most any Sunday afternoon one can catch the performers from the "Comedy Hour." If they arrive at lunch time they can find the stars going to lunch, probably in their TV costumes. They will either eat across the street at Tips or Dupars, or will walk down to Hollywood and Vine for food at Melody Lane.

The same day (Sunday) will find the stars rehearsing for the Lux Radio Show which is one block south of Hollywood and Vine, across the street from the famous Hollywood Brown Derby.

At approximately two o'clock the stars break for lunch and make their way across the street to eat. I've often seen tourists taking pictures of the Derby with the stars in the background. I've often wondered if they discovered them when the pictures were developed. One day two ladies were posing by the Bamboo Room and Fred MacMurray came out. With a small shrug the lady said, "Why, that man looks just like Fred MacMurray," took their pictures, and continued to talk about the stars they hadn't seen.

During the week there are various places to see the famous, the best place probably being the movie studios. By waiting outside the main gates between five and six-thirty P.M. you can see most every star that is working in a picture at that studio. R.K.O. is the easiest for getting autographs. The stars have to cross the street to get to their cars. Best advice: wait in the parking lot.

During the week an excellent place to find stars eating is Lucey's Restaurant, located at Melrose Avenue and Winsor Blvd. Here the stars from R.K.O., Paramount, and Columbia eat when working on a picture. Between twelve and two o'clock you can usually expect five to 20 top stars either walking or driving in.

During the week many stars eat at Romanoff's in Beverly Hills. Here you can see the stars come out as they wait for their cars to be brought around the block. Frequent noon patrons include Paul Douglas, James Mason, Humphrey Bogart, and Ray Bolger.

At night there are always the famous night spots on the Sunset Strip; Ciro's, Mocambo, and LaRue Restaurant. The stars arrive at LaRue anytime after eight o'clock and at the other nighteries usually after eleven o'clock. The best night is Thursday.

Premieres are always loaded with movie personalities. However, if you aren't outside at least two hours in advance your chances of seeing all the stars are very slim. Best bet is to wait until it is over and go to the Sunset Strip. The stars return there for dinner. You can catch them unrushed, happy, and looking their best.

If you want to meet the stars informally during the wee hours of the morning stop in at Googies which is the restaurant connected to the famous Schwabs' drugstore at Sunset Blvd. and Laurel Canyon. Here you can drink ten-cent coffee next to them.

Some evening when you want to spend a little more of that vacation savings and eat in finery stop in at the dining room of the Knickerbocker Hotel. There you will be greeted by their hostess Betty Brown (wife of actor James Brown) and will probably spot some star close by. It's the favorite eating spot of Joe DiMaggio and Marilyn Monroe.

Here's hoping that your trip to Hollywood will send you home happy and successful. And if you have trouble spotting celebrities just remember to see if they have sunglasses on (or in their pocket), note if their car is foreign or Cadillac, and if they look half as good as they do on the screen. If all these things check then chances are you've just seen another top Hollywood personality.

Louis Hayward, Lucey's.

Danny Thomas at El Cap.

Jane Russell at R.K.O.

Jeff Hunter at Ciro's.

Diana Lynn at the Derby.

FROM THE MOVIES

BY THE LIGHT OF THE SILVER MOON—album by Doris Day* (Columbia).

One of Doris' best LP discs to date, this includes the title song as well as Your Eyes Have Told Me So, Just One Girl, Ain't We Got Fun, If You Were the Only Girl, Be My Little Bumble Bee, I'll Forget You and King Chanticleer.

There's also a good album by Gordon MacRae doing most of the same tunes on Capitol with June Hutton.

DREAM WIFE—Ghi-Li Ghi-Li by Barbara Ruick (MGM).

MAIN STREET TO BROADWAY—There's Music In You by Bill Hayes* (MGM).

TAKE THE HIGH GROUND—title song by Johnny Green* (MGM).

A stirring performance from the sound track by Johnny Green, the orchestra and chorus; coupled with it is the Triumphal March from Quo Vadis.

MOULIN ROUGE—The Song From Moulin Rouge (Where Is Your Heart) by Arthur Fiedler—Boston Pops Orch. (Victor); Mantovani* (London); Buddy De Franca* (MGM); Victor Young (Decca); Percy Faith* (Columbia); June Hutton-Axel Stardahl (Capitol); Stan Fisher-Bobby Hackett* (Okeh); Joe Laca (Tico); Henri Rene (Victor); Nick Perita (Caral); Marshall Royal (Mercury).

This song has an unusual story. Originally it was brought to the publisher just the way it was sung in the film; its title at that time was It's April Again. He decided it was too long, and needed a new title. While he was having it rewritten he showed it to Percy Faith, who made the original record. As you all know, it eventually became a big hit with the new Where Is Your Heart lyrics, and there are at least a dozen interesting versions on record now.

POPULAR

ROSEMARY CLOONEY — MARLENE DIETRICH — *Dot's Nice, Donna Fight! and It's The Same (Columbia).

Two more slightly screwy sides by this strange team, with bright accompaniment by a rhythm group that includes two guitarists and Stan Freeman on harpsichord.

EARTHA KITT—*Uska Dara (Victor).

This one's nothing if not unique! The much-traveled Eartha sings this one in Turkish. The other side, Two Lovers, is a fast and weird thing in English.

JACKIE PARIS—*Only Yesterday (Brunswick).

Jackie is a young singer (he's also a talented guitarist) who has been a favorite among musicians for years, but never quite made the grade in the popular record field. We think you'll like his style.

MORE THAN ONE BILLION HANDS ARE GLAMORIZED EACH YEAR BY DURA-GLOSS—Sold in 28 foreign countries

What's Rita up to now? The princess finally came out of her ivory tower and ran smack into the arms of fourteen eager men.

■ Hardly a week goes by that Rita Hayworth's name doesn't pop up in the gossip columns as having been seen around town with two or three men, and scarcely a month passes that the list doesn't drop old names and add new ones. It is confusing, but to Hollywood citizens it is delightful. Keeping Up With Rita has been, for almost ten years, a favorite pastime of the town. During the months and years she resided in Europe Hollywood didn't seem quite the same, but nowadays the gossips sit back comfortably and chew the latest Hayworth rumor.

To those who follow the game, Rita is the definition of a gay divorcée. She seems always restless, always on the move, and always merry. There is no malice in the interest she creates, for Rita is an exceptionally well-liked person. She gets into occasional small tiffs with the press when she periodically clams up regarding her personal life, and there are sometimes arguments with her studio bosses, a fact which proves nothing except that she is a good businesswoman. By and large, she is fondly regarded as one of Hollywood's longstanding favorites, and her amours add considerable sparkle to her basic reputation as a gentle, thoughtful and easy-going girl.

The current reaction is that Rita's back and the boys are baying. Her marriage to Aly Khan, the split and the ensuing retreat into seclusion created a hiatus of about three years, but as of now things are back to what Hollywood likes to consider as normal.

DANGEROUS CROSSROAD

Jane Powell and Geary Steffen don't deny trouble. But Geary says there's a 50-50 chance of reconciliation in a couple of months.

Jane's name was linked with Gene Nelson's when she co-starred with him in Three Sailors And A Girl. Nelson was recently separated from his wife.

Music-man Dick Stabile and Gene discussed Jane's night club tour. The timing of her trip was fortunate, giving Jane and Geary a "trial separation period," though she often met Nelson en route in the meantime.

Can Jane Powell and Geary Steffen save their flickering marriage that used to be known as "Hollywood's happiest"?

by Consuelo Anderson

■ "Our marriage will succeed. I know the tragedy of separation, because I've seen it with my own parents; I know, too, what it has done to the lives of some of my friends. And, if it were necessary, I'd give up my career to save my marriage."

Jane Powell said that with deep conviction. She said it, not just a few days ago, but shortly after her marriage to Geary Steffen began, in November of 1949. At that time, by the wildest stretch of the imagination, she couldn't possibly have conceived that she would have occasion to recall those earnest words, some four years later. But now she knows, as does Geary, of the tremendous pressures which can well up against an apparently impregnable union. With one voice they exclaim, "Why can't we be left alone to settle our personal problems?"

It is a harsh contradiction to, face, this discovery that Hollywood reporters, who constantly hailed their marriage as "perfect," should now after one brief quarrel be so apparently convinced that these two are headed directly for the divorce court. Yet, Jane Powell should hardly find it in her heart to blame her reporter friends, for they were not the first to break the news. Hollywood's 300 news correspondents, reading the abrupt announcement from her studio that she and Geary had "tiffed" and "hoped" to work things out, were both shocked and surprised.

Jane, never having been through a situation like this before, was only trying to be her honest self. Unfortunately, however, it was not possible for the press to accept this somewhat questionably worded statement and then sit back calmly to wait for another "handout" that never came. As matters stood, (Continued on page 97)

JOAN AND MARILYN TALK

ANOTHER MODERN SCREEN EXCLUSIVE: HOLLYWOOD'S TOP REPORTER REVEALS WHY CRAWFORD BLASTED MONROE IN

■ Hollywood loves a feud better than a blood brother. It welcomes any sort of a fight—a battle always makes for exciting copy. So, when Joan Crawford blasted Marilyn Monroe in the bitterest interview one glamor girl has ever leveled against another, the town was torn apart.

I waited until the fire was smoldering and practically out before I talked to the stars of the now famous feud, Joan and Marilyn.

"Why did you do it?" I asked Joan, whom I have always known to be warmhearted, kind and never before too violently critical of anyone. "Why did you tear Marilyn apart publicly? If you thought she needed your help, why didn't you give it to her in private?"

"You'll be surprised," Joan said, "but that's exactly what I wanted to do. I thought, when Bob Thomas came to get an interview with me on the subject of the Academy Awards—which is what he had asked for—that we were finished after we discussed this topic.

"He was half way out the door and on his way to an appointment at MGM, when suddenly he stopped and said,

PUBLIC . . . AND WHAT MARILYN'S DOING ABOUT IT!

'Don't you think Marilyn Monroe was too sexy in Niagara—and don't you think that dress she wore at an awards dinner was disgusting?'

"Because I was sure our conversation was now off the record, I answered his questions. I was shocked when I later read the interview which contained two lines about the Academy Awards and the rest was all a blast at Marilyn.

"I wish I could say I didn't say those things, but I did say them! I was not misquoted! But, believe me, in the future I will think twice before I (Continued on page 92)

JOAN CRAWFORD GIVES MARILYN MONROE A TIP

By Bob Thomas

Joan Crawford today aimed this curt message at Marilyn Monroe: Stop believing your publicity.

The curvaceous blonde has been the subject of a hot controversy during the past fortnight. Women's clubs have protested about the nature of her publicity and the advertising photos for her pictures.

Adding fuel to the fire were reports that her latest picture, the first with which she could demonstrate her box-office pull, was doing disappointing business. Then there was her much-publicized appearance at an awards dinner.

Miss Monroe showed up in a zipperless metallic gown into which she had been sewn. When she stepped up to get her award as the outstanding personality on the screen, she put on a hip-swinging display that brought the house down.

"It was like a burlesque show," said the horrified Miss Crawford, who was present at the affair. "The audience yelled and shouted, and Jerry Lewis got up on the table and whistled. But those of us in the industry just shuddered.

"Certainly her picture isn't doing business, and I'll tell you why. Sex plays a tremendously important part in every person's life. People are interested in it, intrigued with it. But they don't like to see it flaunted in their faces.

"Kids don't like her. Sex plays a growingly important part in their lives, too; and they don't like to see it exploited.

"And don't forget the women. They're the ones who pick out the movie entertainment for the family. They won't pick anything that won't be suitable for their husbands and children."

The durable Miss Crawford, who has lasted longer than any film star in history, said the Monroe buildup was clever and well planned. It was the work of master exploiters, she remarked, but it got out of hand.

"The publicity has gone too far," she said. "And apparently Miss Monroe is making the mistake of believing her publicity. Someone should make her see the light. She should be told that the public likes provocative feminine personalities; but it also likes to know that underneath it all the actresses are ladies."

The Crawford comments were read to Miss Monroe and she was asked if she cared to say anything about them. Miss Monroe started to make a statement and then changed her mind and replied: "No comment."

Discussing other glamor build-ups, she remarked that Jane Russell had managed herself well.

"Howard Hughes tried to make her out a sexy dish at first," she said, "but Jane managed to keep her feet on the ground."

Then there was Jean Harlow, who was first painted as a platinum blonde vamp. When that novelty wore off, she became a successful comedienne. Apparently 20th Century-Fox has the same thing in mind for Monroe.

Miss Crawford, who is up for her second Oscar with Sudden Fear, added: "I think she'd better become a comedienne—or something."

TEMPTRESS

■ One day last fall three very fancy young ladies marched out of an alley on Main Street in Los Angeles and started walking toward the center of town. Main Street in Los Angeles is not like Main Street in your home town; it is skid row, an avenue of gaudy saloons and pawn shops and cheap restaurants and burlesque theaters. The alley led to the stage door of one of these burlesque palaces—and the three fancy dolls were what you might call dancers, if you weren't familiar with the word stripper.

A few minutes later, attracting considerable attention, the girls halted at the box office of the Philharmonic Auditorium, an emporium of the finer things in stage entertainment, and picked up three tickets for the afternoon performance of a show called Jollyana. A fellow smoking a cigarette in the lobby smirked at the doorman as the girls entered the theater.

"Those kids are from the Follies," he grinned. "What are they doing up here, learning some tricks?"

"Yes, sir," said the doorman. "They come every matinee—to see Mitzi Gaynor."

"Mitzi Gaynor?" said the smoker. "Mitzi Gaynor!"

"Yes, sir," said the doorman.

The customer flipped his cigarette into the street and hurried inside. This he had to see. And he did.

Jollyana didn't travel out of Los Angeles, so you more than likely didn't see Mitzi Gaynor in that show, but if you had you would have understood why strippers from all over the Southern California area came time and again to see Mitzi, to learn a number of things. One was how to strip without removing any garment. Another was how to tantalize a male audience and still remain a lady. But most important, in Jollyana Mitzi Gaynor was giving lessons in how to dance sexy and still be a wholesome, healthy young girl; how to combine apple cheeks and a naughty wink.

Just the other day we spoke to her at length (Continued on page 99)

Mitzi's most sizzling romance at present is with Hugh O'Brian, a young actor who'll soon be seen in The Man From The Alamo.

But Mitzi still hasn't made up her mind about marriage to Hugh. "We've both got a bit more living to do," she admits.

ON HIS OWN

■ The news of his firing came to Mario Lanza like a thunderbolt.

He had just finished a transatlantic telephone call to a friend in London. "Look," he'd said, "it's definite. It really is. I go back to MGM on May 5th. Exactly when the studio will start up The Student Prince again I don't know. Joe Pasternak, the producer is going to Italy to do Flame And The Flesh with Lana Turner. But it's all set. I go back on salary May 5th. When Joe comes back from Italy, probably in July, that's when the picture begins.

"Oh, yes, another thing. I spoke to Vic Damone today. He told me that he and Jane Powell had been testing for The Student Prince. This I can't understand unless the studio feels I'm not to be trusted, that I'll walk off the picture. They don't have to worry. I'm going to give this one everything I've got. I've told that to all the executives, and I'm sure they believe me."

While Mario was talking with such unbridled enthusiasm and happiness, his mother-in-law was trying to get through to him from Chicago. She works at Marshall Field, the well-known department store, and as soon as any news or gossip about her famous son-in-law breaks in the papers, any one of half a dozen salesgirls comes running to her with it.

Five minutes after he finished his London call, Mario picked up the phone in the study of his Bel-Air mansion. His mother-in-law had gotten through. Her voice was charged with emotion.

"It says in the papers," Mrs. Hicks began, "that the studio has fired you."

Mario laughed. "What papers?"

"All the papers, Mario. The Tribune. All the papers."

"It must be a joke, Ma. I just finished a long legal hassel with the studio. Everything's fine. I'm going back to work in a couple of weeks."

"But the newspapers . . ." Mario's mother-in-law insisted. ". . . it sounds very official."

"Okay," Mario said. "Read it to me."

Mrs. Hicks read the official studio announcement to the effect that MGM could no longer put up with Mario Lanza's demands and was terminating his employment contract.

Mario refused to believe it. After all, the papers had been carrying erroneous stories on him for months. This was probably another fantasy conjured up by an imaginative reporter. He handed the phone to his wife, Betty, (Continued on page 83)

Mario and Betty Lanza both adore their son Damon. To Mario, having a male child was the fulfillment of a long-time, deep, desire. Damon was six months old in June.

Ever since Mario and MGM parted, he has had much more time to spend with his children. Long walks and story-telling session are fun for Elissa (left), Colleen, and Poppa.

Mario finally got his freedom, the hard way, from MGM. Now Lanza's on the outside wondering—was it triumph

These are the only color pictures taken of Mario Lanza's family since the birth of his son, and are exclusive to MODERN SCREEN

Usually a boisterous, noisy person, Mario is always strangely subdued when wheeling Damon in his carriage. He has a very protective attitude towards his baby son.

Little Elissa and a playmate pose for our camera on the Lanza lawn. The children and their friends enjoy having Mario sing to them, and he often obliges.

Full of plans for free lance films, a radio and TV show, and a concert tour, Mario is now a happy man again. After a farewell hug for Colleen (above) he hands her back to Betty (below) and goes off for a conference to map out his new career.

MARRIAGE, ANYBODY?

Dick: I like a girl who doesn't need fancy entertainment. Piper and I can have a good time just tripping through the tulips, together.

Piper: Seeing stars is fun—especially if they're tall, dark and handsome, like Dick! But my career usually interferes just at the wrong time.

AN OLD MAID AT TWENTY-ONE?

■ PIPER LAURIE: Well, I'll tell you, it's getting to be like this in the family. I'll say to my mother, "Mom, I've got something to tell you," and she'll drop everything to turn to me instantly. "Yes? Yes?" she'll urge, and her reaction is unmistakable; always the one-track mind, if you know mothers . . . mothers of daughters, that is.

She thinks I'm about to tell her that I've met someone—the one—and it looks like marriage is in the air. But all I've got to among them attractive Dick Long (below) . . . but only dashing Carlos Thompson looks like her current serious heart interest.

Dick: You can learn a lot about people just yakking, particularly if you're working with them. Piper and I have spent hours talking about everything, especially show business.

Piper: My mother isn't pushing me to get married; it's just that she thinks I'm getting to the stage where I should sort of concentrate on it. She likes all my beaux equally.

Piper's romance with Carlos Thompson may last longer than her others . . . he's planning to be in Europe the same time she is, so they won't have to cut their courting short. Carlos, the first Latin in Piper's life, comes from Buenos Aires.

WHO SAYS SO? HERE, IN DIRECT QUOTES, PIPER, FAMILY AND FRIENDS SPEAK OUT ON THE SUBJECT!

tell her usually is some such piece of news as just being put into a new picture or having to leave on some trip. And when I do her face falls and she says, "Oh, that."

"Yes, mom, that."

"Oh, well," she says (meaning "you call that news") and, "that's nice" (meaning "hurry back and let's get down to the real business of your life").

You see, my mother would expect to know soon, very soon, after I made up my mind. We're a family kind of family, I'm a family girl, perhaps even more so than a career girl, I suppose. I don't think I've ever gone out with a boy who hasn't been to my home and whom mother hasn't met. So she feels she would know the boy all right. All I have to do is identify him.

The thing is, if we talk boys, why, mother can take them up with me one by one. And, of course, like all mothers, she has her own point of view. Sometimes we agree about a boy, sometimes we don't. I say she judges them by the way they eat.

She says I judge them by the way they tie their necktie (if they wear one). As you can tell, so far all three of us haven't agreed—I mean mother, me and a boy!

It's not that mother is always pushing me. Not that at all. But I feel she thinks I'm getting to the stage where I should sort of concentrate on this prob . . . well, this issue. If you know what I mean. I mean she is concentrating.

For instance, when I told her about going to Korea (Continued on page 89)

ONCE A TOMBOY!

CYD CHARISSE USED TO PLAY SHORTSTOP FOR THE BOYS . . . NOW THE BOYS ARE STOPPING SHORT FOR HER!

Cyd adores husband Tony Martin but rarely sees him.

■ When Cyd Charisse blew into the movies in 1944 people asked "What is Cyd Charisse?" It sounded more like a dessert than a name, and Cyd lives up to the analogy. Tall and willowy, she is topped off by a swirl of dark hair that suggests the color of smoke. Her brown eyes are wide set and tilting at the corners, and her teeth are perfectly rounded white gems that flash in a disarming smile. The combination adds up to a dish that anyone would consider luscious, and a bit beyond reach, too. Cyd looks expensive and her manner on first meeting seems aloof, almost haughty.

If this is true, it is possibly because she is expecting the usual opening gambit—an inquiry about her name. Cyd figures that in all her life she has met perhaps a dozen people who have not immediately inquired as to the nature of and the reason for her appellation. The answer is quite simple. The "Cyd" comes from her older brother's abortive attempt to say "sister," and the Charisse part of it comes from her first husband, dancing instructor Nico Charisse. (Continued on page 88)

CROSBY AND SON

Under Bing's guidance (here at Versailles, France), Lindsay is adapting to life without a mother. He and Bing pal around, and help each other adjust.

This trip to Europe was the first step for a father whose biggest purpose in life is his devotion to four sons . . . Lindsay, the youngest, needed him most. . . .

BY STEVE CRONIN

Bing planned the European jaunt with Lindsay because he felt the youngster's grief might be lessened by foreign travel and new interests.

■ Bing Crosby and his traveling sidekick, a sharp, polite, well-bred boy of 15 who happens to be his youngest son Lindsay, will return from Europe to Hollywood on June 25th.

This knocks into a cocked hat once and for all the rumor that Bing was planning to remain abroad in order to rendezvous in peace with beautiful Mona Freeman, his sometimes dining companion.

When Bing arrived at Cherbourg aboard the Queen Elizabeth last March, reporters descended upon him and asked first, "Is it true, Monsieur Bing, you are engaged to Mademoiselle Freeman?" and second, "Is it not true that you plan to marry Mademoiselle Mona Freeman?"

Lindsay, who loves to see his old man wriggle out of a tight spot, wisecracked with Sue Robertson, Bing's secretary, as the old groaner, momentarily perturbed, collected his wits for a denial.

"Now, look," Bing said, "I've known Mona ever since she was a kid. There's absolutely nothing to that story. Once in a while down at Palm Springs we took dinner. That's all."

And when Bing said, "That's all," he meant it, because in the three months of his European sojourn, Mona Freeman was the one subject he would not discuss.

"We just came over to play a little golf," Bing explained. "I also thought it wouldn't do Lindsay any harm to get around a little, you know, see (Continued on page 95)

Reporters on the Continent, respecting Bing's bereavement, left him alone as much as possible. During the few interviews he did grant, Bing answered all the questions they asked him except those dealing with his rumored romances.

Noodling around with some local musicians, Bing proves that one antidote for sorrow is constant activity. While in Europe, he and Lindsay steered clear of the big, fancy hotels, preferring the anonymity of lesser-known hostleries.

Liz and Mike's ranch

■ Liz Taylor's voice, softly muted by the deep pink carpet and the yards of pink chintz in her bedroom, wafted through the open glass doors to where Mike Wilding was seated on their small private patio.

"Darling," the voice cooed, "you want to know the two most delicious smells in the world?"

Mike Wilding grinned. "Tell me," he shouted.

Liz shuffled up behind her husband and ever so lightly pressed her lips against his cheek. "Babies and bacon," she mumbled. Then she pulled back. "Let's eat some breakfast."

Each morning before she eats, Liz always runs into the nursery and supervises the splashing bath of her only child. While she does this, husband Mike relaxes on the patio, usually reading the papers and drinking in the California sun he loves. In about 15 minutes, Liz joins him with the early morning report on their heir. Sometimes it's about little Mike's eyes, sometimes it's about his funny cackling. On this particular morning the report concerned itself with their baby's clean, fresh smell.

"Tell you what," Mike, senior, suggested, "if he smells so darn good this morning, why don't you get Chanel to bottle him? We could call it Attar of Baby Porker' or Chanel Number Five Months."

Liz giggled. "Why, that's a marvelous idea!" She sank her gleaming teeth into a crunchy slice of bacon just as the phone rang.

The one change Liz and Mike made in the home they bought was the addition of this "lanai" or enclosed patio. The structural stone wall in the living room was extended, a bar built, and the new corner glassed in.

Liz selected the periwinkle blue couch, then decorator Jim Favour added the purple chair and black tables. The matchstick bamboo curtains are threaded with purple, green, gold and blue wool. The bust is by Epstein.

The dining area is set apart by a low stone wall, and all the furniture for both dining and living areas was custom built. The paintings by Augustus John and Benton Scott are from Liz' father's art gallery.

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

Liz and Mike's ranch house

continued

Liz and Mike Wilding's guest house is a separate and complete unit, joined to the main building by a covered walk. In addition to this comfortable living room, the house has its own bedroom, kitchen, bath.

The latest in modern equipment can be found in Liz' white oak panelled main kitchen. Cabinets were designed for a specific use—narrow file for trays, a deep closet for pots, a felt-lined drawer for silverware.

Mike Wilding answered it. He spoke a few pleasantries into the mouthpiece, then handed the phone to Liz. "It's your agent, the illustrious Mr. Goldstone."

Liz shook her head and tightened her robe. "Oh, nuts!" But she got up and hurried to the phone, and in less than a minute her face was wreathed in smiles. She put down the phone and her violet eyes glistened. "They've offered me Vivien Leigh's role in Elephant Walk. The studio's agreed to loan me out. Aren't you surprised?"

Liz laughed and whirled herself around the white wrought-iron porch furniture, landing finally in her husband's lap and kissing him twice.

"I've never known you to be so enthusiastic about work," he said.

Mike Wilding was being truthful, because ever since he and Liz bought their mountain-top lovenest, and a baby son came along to round things out, Mrs. Michael Wilding hasn't cared a fig for screen work. She's been quite content to fill her life with pure domestic bliss, keeping house, taking care of little Mike, swimming in her pool, riding around with her husband in their low-slung Jaguar.

Compared to this paradise-like existence, no movie script seemed quite tempting enough so that in the weeks following the birth of her baby, Liz returned to MGM as unsuitable all the scripts sent to her. The studio, in turn, suspended their number-one beauty, stopping her weekly salary check of $3,500. Not even this made Liz change her mind about returning to work. She was happy at home and at home she was determined to stay until she got the right part.

You all know what happened. Vivien Leigh suffered a nervous breakdown on the Paramount lot while doing Elephant Walk. Paramount had already sunk a cool million into the production. A new leading lady was a must. So as it does to all movie mothers, the moment came when Liz had to leave her idyllic laziness and incorporate the new role of mother-wife into the old familiar framework of acting, the only occupation she has ever known.

"It hasn't been too easy going back to work," she admits with resignation. "But now that Michael is working again, well, it isn't too terrible."

"She hated to think of me," Mike explains, "lounging around the house, doing absolutely nothing while she had to (Continued on page 76)

■ Across the Pont Neuf, one of the smaller bridges that span the Seine in Paris, you find the Place Dauphine, a quiet, respectable, middle-class French neighborhood.

On the sixth floor of an old-fashioned apartment house, overlooking this picturesque tree-filled square, Gene Kelly lives with his talented, outspoken, beautiful young wife, Betsy Blair, and their only offspring, a charming, bright-as-a-new-penny ten-year-old girl alliteratively named Kerry.

The Kellys live in a five-room flat sub-leased from a lady who used to reside at the American Embassy, which is why when you ask around the Place Dauphine where Gene Kelly lives, the French children in the neighborhood giggle, do a little dance step for you, then point to the sixth floor and shout, "L'appartement Americain."

Ann Blyth's Wedding

It's here—the day all who love Ann have hoped and prayed for, the day her every dream comes true!

■ Now if you happen to be reading this on the last Saturday of this month of June it'll be the moment that Ann Blyth, wearing the wedding dress she dreamed she would, is kneeling before the marriage altar with the boy she prayed she would. At St. Charles, in the San Fernando Valley in California, Ann is becoming the bride of Dr. James V. McNulty. And if you asked her anything about anything else she'd tell you it didn't matter.

"Ann," she can only think to herself, "you are marrying in the church of your devotion to the man of your devotion." And it is true. For though this dark-haired, 24-year-old Irish girl has walked in high places she has been known always for her yearning for simple happiness. She did pray to her St.

Anne that there would be someone someday like the tall, young doctor at her side; quietly strong yet gentle like him, and with a ready smile and an understanding way. And she is not above telling you, "My prayers were answered."

To every girl belongs such a moment as is now taking place at St. Charles—and this is Ann's to remember forever; solemn with the song of the mass, festive with the flowers and further music, and then, with dear friends and relatives looking on, the fateful hush of the ceremony itself.

Yet it is a moment shared by others; not only do those who fill the church know why they have come, those who crowd the street outside for a glimpse of the bride know why they wait. They are caught by a fairy story. (Continued on next page)

Day

Ann Blyth's folks had no riches when she was born. Hers was a childhood of big city nonentity, of bread and milk in the kitchen, ordinary schooling and, seemingly, limited opportunity. But she had riches to give; in beauty of form and beauty of manner as an actress. And here is the magic that touches this wedding—in this country a colleen can become a queen!

None in the church doubts it when she comes down the aisle on the arm of her Uncle Pat Tobin. She seems to move in the white aura of her veil of diaphanous illusion tulle which is as long as the train of her gown of mousseline de soie over white satin. On her head is Chantilly lace, a bonnet embroidered with pearls. Those whom she passes by closely note the tight bodice of the gown, the long sleeves, and that she carries a rosary and a bouquet of lilies of the valley. If they look at her eyes they know that her soul has risen into them and shines through, luminous with tears and love.

Behind her is her court of bridesmaids and by their names you can recognize some of these, too, as princesses; not hereditary, but risen as Ann in their own personal right through democracy's processes and public (Continued on page 96)

St. Charles Church in North Hollywood is the place Ann chose for her late June wedding; she and Jim decided to have the ceremony at 10:00 o'clock Mass. Jane Powell was wed here, too.

Ann Blyth's wedding day marks the end of past loneliness, and the start of a glorious future!

Dennis Day, who's responsible for introducing Jim to Ann, receives his reward!

A long-time friend, Jack Benny was among the first to wish Ann good luck.

Her beloved Aunt Cissy and Uncle Pat helped Ann pack her trousseau. Mr. and Mrs. Tobin, who adopted Ann when her mother died, highly approve of Ann's Dr. Jim.

This is the home in which Ann and Jim will start their married life. It's a Connecticut style farmhouse at Toluca Lake. Ann describes it as "the kind of house that just reaches out and puts its arms around you."

Ann's home cooking will be the kind her husband boasts about. She's been taking lessons, so there'll be no burnt toast and fallen angel cakes in her kitchen! Jim's a lucky man in lots of ways.

GETTING TO KNOW

■ A basically unhappy, fear-ridden beauty, Ava Lavinia Gardner is today happier than she has ever been before. And for three reasons.

She is living in Europe. She is convinced that she and Frank Sinatra can make a go of their marriage, and she is content with her work.

This marks the first time in a decade that Ava has been satisfied with her geographical location, the condition of her love-life, the state of her finances, and the progress of her career.

In short, the belle of Grabtown, North Carolina, now has pretty nearly everything she's clamored for, everything, that is, except children, and with a little luck, they may be forthcoming in the future, especially since Frankie has been touring the Continent, flying to Ava's side at every free moment.

Ava's current peace of mind is very much in contrast to her state of misery when she left Hollywood last November. At that time, you'll recall, it was touch and go as to whether Ava and her crooner would separate or stay together.

Frankie had caught his wife and Lana Turner in his Palm Springs house "cutting him up," to use his own expression, and it looked very much as if this might be the swan song to their marriage. But fortunately, there was a reconciliation, the umpteenth reconciliation between the lovers, and Frankie eventually flew all the way to Nairobi in British East Africa, to be with Ava while she was preparing for work on Mogambo.

Ava says she liked working in Mogambo. "At least," she explains, "I understood the part. It wasn't the same old thing."

It was also good having Frankie around for moral support. When Frank flew back to the States, and Ava went out on location in Kenya, the setup wasn't perfect but Ava made the best of it.

Rodiantly happy today, Ava finds it hard to recall the shy, bumbling girl she once was. For the first time the actress is perfectly content with her place of residence (Europe), state of marriage (ecstatic) and the progress of her career (zooming).

THE WORLD ADORED HER—BUT AVA ALWAYS FELT OUT OF PLACE. NOW SHE'S LEARNING TO UNDERSTAND

YOU

Their early married life was a trying one for the Sinatras. Friends of Nancy Sinatra blamed Ava when Frank divorced her, and there were many times when Ava (far left) and Frank (far right) despaired.

Absence did make the heart grow fonder in Frank and Ava's case. Frank, shown here with pal Van Heflin and his wife, found life just wasn't much fun without Ava. He couldn't wait until he joined her in Europe recently.

Ava's friendship with Lana Turner helped mess up her marriage. Frank accused the girls of "cutting him up"; once called the police to oust Lana.

The Sinatras' joyous reunion in May proved to them once and for all how much in love they are. Both feel that their marriage is on stable ground now.

Ava, with a model at a Parisian fashion show, is now as inwardly composed as she looks on the outside. She's complete mistress of herself at last.

■ The Cadillac limousine—one that was almost as long as a bus—purred up to the door of Jane Wyman's home. Six men, all in tails and top hats, got out and stood in a single file from the doorway to the car while their leader rang the bell. When the maid arrived, she grinned a little foolishly, then excused herself and summoned her mistress. Jane appeared in a moment, elegantly strutted to the car, got in, followed by the men, and the limousine slipped into the traffic headed for downtown Hollywood.

Fifteen minutes later the car pulled up before a rather large but modest building on a side street just around the corner from Grauman's Chinese Theater. The alighting procedure was the same. The men got out, formed a line, removed their toppers and stood like wax images as Jane walked into the building. Then they followed as formally as ushers at a wedding. The door shut behind the lot of them—and a ceremony unique to Hollywood behind that closed door.

DOWN, BOY!

WHAT IS THE REAL TRUTH ABOUT HOLLYWOOD'S

by Jack Wade

■ Scott Brady, his long right leg flung over the arm of a chair, his fingers drumming an angry tempo on the edge of the table, sat quietly glowering. He got up a couple of times and walked around the room, apparently in deep thought. Finally, he pointed a long finger and shook it.

"There's a lot of baloney going around about me," he growled. "You reporters, and a lot of people in this town are messing up my life. The only reason I haven't complained before is that I don't want people to think I'm crying. If you want to know the real truth about my love life—and a few other things—just shut up and listen for a few minutes." Brady stalked around the room gathering his thoughts. His trousers clung neatly to his narrow hips and were cut all right, but it seemed they should be tucked into high heeled boots, regular Tombstone pants. His tweed jacket appeared to be an excellent hiding place for guns, and his shirt was open at the throat, the way a man would wear it if he expected action.

We sat back and did as he said.

As Brady walked up and down he began to look very sorry for himself.

"How do I get this kind of a reputation?" he said. "I hear I'm fickle. Well, I'm a single man and I go out with quite a few girls. But many of the girls I date have been pals for years. I might meet a new girl, like her, and try to get her to go out with me like any other guy, but I'm not fickle when it comes to my old friends. Why, I've never even dated a girl for the publicity department—and darn few actors can make that statement. And that includes Ann Blyth. That rumor was really unfair. I like Ann very much, (Continued on page 74)

NO. 1 PLAYBOY AND TROUBLEMAKER—AND HOW DID HE GET THAT WAY?

"Religion is something I've accepted in sure trust, without knowing its full meaning, just as I've accepted the beauty of a blue sky, my daughters' smiles, or the quiet happiness of a day with Harry."

THE QUIET HAPPINESS

by Betty Grable

My parents drove me to my first Sunday School session back in St. Louis when I was five years old. They let me out in front of a synagogue, which was just across the street from the Episcopal church to which they belonged, and told me to wait there until they parked the car. When they got back I was gone. Nor could they find me with the other children in church. They hunted around the streets and eventually my mother looked into the synagogue. There were no services that day, of course, yet there I sat, all alone in the dark, but unfearful and quite content. Spiritually I have sat thus ever since, boasting no sure knowledge, bathed in no great light, but a believer, trusting and content.

I am still an Episcopalian. My children, whose prayers I hear every night, are being brought up in confidence that there is a Guide who also gives ear (and sometimes it takes them almost an hour to squeeze in all for whom they ask His blessing). Yet I cannot say that I am one to whom religion has come with sharp, clear definition. It is something that I, like most of us, have accepted in such trust, without knowing its full meaning, as I have accepted the beauty of a blue sky, the smiles of my little girls, or the quiet happiness that can fill a household of an evening. There is more to faith than this, I suppose, but for what there is for me, I am grateful. And . . . content.

It may be that I have yet to come to serious thinking in my life—a life that without much credit to myself has brought me far more, (Cont. on opposite page) in material success, I feel, than I deserve. When and if such thinking comes, and with it a deeper meaning of the mystery of existence, I shall welcome it. Yet it is not something that I feel can be hastened. And, of course, I cannot be dogmatic about my belief, I do not feel it has given me a special distinction, I cannot presume in such a direction in any manner.

There are some people who are extremely self-confident and this confidence often extends to every phase of their activity, even to their religion. They seem to know their way in the spiritual world as they do in the temporal one. I have seen such in my profession, moving surely and oblivious to anything which questions the correctness of their attitude. I can wonder at them, admire them, but I cannot emulate them.

I am reminded of an actress with whom I have worked who was such a person. When it was suggested after a rehearsal that she needed further study of her lines (something that would send me flying to my script) she merely replied, "That remains to be seen." And when this girl, as it happened, turned to religion, she did so intensively, even militantly, and sought to convert all whom she knew to her form of worship. Some people can move with such certainty in all they do . . . and others, like myself, must feel their way.

I don't think that in my whole life I have ever planned anything. It just hasn't been that kind of a life. Even today, when my husband starts off something he has in mind by saying, "Two weeks from today I think we ought to . . ." I always come back with, "Let's don't plan, Harry. Let's just see what happens."

I AM not an actress because I planned it—or particularly wanted it. And I was singularly devoid of ambition. I didn't care for dancing school when my mother brought me to it. It was her idea for which I'll be eternally grateful. I honestly feel that she has had more satisfaction from whatever success came my way than I have. And her instinct is still the same. "You can be a better dancer, a better singer," is a steady refrain from her lips. I know; but I am content. When my elder daughter, Vicki, wanted to take ballet I agreed. When she got over the notion, I forgot about it too. I don't consider a career essential to happiness however much happiness it has given me.

I have never pressed for anything with a desire so strong that it shut out everything else, and, I suppose, it is a form of irony that such a girl should have so much. I admit it. My own reaction, in fact, is to compensate for the good fortune by thanking God for it and refraining from swinging my weight around to the disadvantage of others. It is the least I can do . . . now. Perhaps some day a way will open up to do more.

A friend once asked why I didn't insist to the studio heads that I be given a certain part which she thought would be wonderful for me. She wouldn't believe it when I told her that not once since joining the studio have I ever done this. The closest I came was to have my agent suggest a few years ago that I liked the idea of starring in a musical which was on the market and would be pleased if they bought it. The name of it was Annie Get Your Gun. They didn't buy it, as you know. MGM did, and starred Betty Hutton.

Only recently there have been a lot of reports around Hollywood detailing my disappointment at not being assigned to Gentlemen Prefer Blondes. My reaction to this talk has been a mixed one—and without any sense of disappointment in the mixture. First of all I cannot understand why others have (Continued on page 66)

ring, but not both at the same time, says busy

Kathryn Grayson, who refuses to love on the run.

BY SUSAN TRENT

Kathryn Grayson has no time to sing the blues. Rehearsals for her new pictures, and playing with her daughter Patty Kate, keep her much too busy.

Too busy for Romance

■ The new blonde walking around the Warner Brothers studio recently was drawing a lot of wolf whistles from the employees. Most of them figured her to be a new starlet, well worth the whistles, and they were completely surprised when on closer inspection she turned out to be Kathryn Grayson. Katie has joined the ranks of those actresses who offer up the natural color of their hair on the sacrificial altar of their career, and that's just about the way she feels about it. Told that the new silver blonde topping for the role of Grace Moore is extremely becoming, she smiles her thanks and then shrugs.

"I'll put up with it until the picture's finished," she says, "and then back it goes to its natural shade. I can't be bothered with keeping it this way. There isn't enough time."

That statement is the key to Kathryn Grayson's life today. There isn't enough time. Each day is filled to the hilt with activity, both in her professional and personal life. This daily bustle is partly responsible for the fact that her name is seldom seen in gossip columns as having been seen here or there with this oil man or that business tycoon. There are too many other things in her life, things she feels are important, to devote precious hours merely to being seen at the "right" places with the "right" people. Katie had never gone in for the Hollywood social whirl, and actually couldn't care less about it. Home is too much fun. Work is too important.

Katie bought the house where she lives with Patty Kate, her four-year-old daughter, and her parents, long ago, before her first marriage, to John Shelton, and hasn't the slightest intention of moving into another one. It now consists of 16 rooms, a play-room having recently been added, and is large enough to contain the hum of activity that goes on every day. The entire family, including 15 nieces and nephews, is musical—"They can't help it," laughingly explains Katie. "You see they all have voices"—and if recorded symphonic music isn't soaring through the house someone is singing or playing the piano or tuning a violin.

Katie thrives in a household like this. Music has always been the greatest love of her life and it is a blessing to share her home with people who also share her enthusiasm for pizzicato, pianos and pear-shaped tones. The one slight drawback is the fact that almost every night, when she gets home and seeks out an album she'd like to hear, that particular album has been misplaced by a relative who has been playing his own favorites. "Where's the Brahms piano concerto?" Katie howls. And her father's voice booms down from somewhere upstairs. "It's under the coffee table—under that pile of Flagstad records!"

A friend once asked Katie if the hubbub and bustle of the house didn't get on her nerves. "Get on my nerves!" she said. "I'd blow my top if it was ever quiet for more than ten minutes."

ACTUALLY, she has her own rooms on the second floor—a sort of a suite—a bedroom, dressing room and bath, and Patty Kate's room is next to her own. There is also a room that has been turned into an office, and from here Katie runs the household. She is a rarity in Hollywood in that she has no business manager and feels quite capable of taking care of her own financial affairs, which necessarily are many and complicated. With a flair for organization she works on a budget, makes her own decisions regarding investments, and turns out correspondence which equals that of a small business firm. The paying of bills and salaries alone amounts to a great deal of work, and in addition Katie does all the meal planning and marketing herself.

The "office" is the hub and center of the entire house, as is Katie herself, and she manages things so well that when she is away from home everything runs with the precision of the Greenwich clock.

She is not often at home. Despite the fact she has been averaging little more than one picture a year, her time is absorbed by the myriad chores that go hand in hand with a movie career. The long hours at the studio attending conferences, doing publicity, rehearsing, posing for pictures, taking singing lessons, and the personal appearance tours and benefit performances. When she finished Lovely To Look At for MGM she went to South America on a goodwill tour for the State Department, a trip that was intended also to publicize the film, Showboat. It was not, as might be supposed, a vacation. There was a perpetual and compulsory round of teas, luncheons and soirées, and while Katie dutifully threw herself into the itinerary with her usual verve, her thoughts were always with the big house in Santa Monica, California.

When she came back she went to work in The Desert Song and shortly afterward was handed the plum title role of the Grace Moore film. Before that picture was begun Katie was committed to follow it with Mademoiselle Modiste and then a return engagement at MGM to make Kiss Me, Kate.

In between her business and her home she sandwiches a large amount of charity work, notably with the Children's Hospital in Los Angeles. Three years ago when Patty Kate was hospitalized there with a broken leg Kathryn noted the need for new facilities, and while charity workers around town are hoping for a new wing, Katie is plugging for a whole new hospital. Her heart is always with any project concerning children, not only because she loves them without reservation but because she feels deeply that the world we give them today is not a particularly happy one and that the least we can do is to assure them good health and a fine education. philosophy is clear in Kathryn's professional life.

The ambitious drive and urgency for fame common to so many Hollywood stars is not shared by Kathryn. She never asked for a movie career; she wanted only to sing, because she loved music. She was no more than a child when, 13 years ago, an MGM executive heard her sing and plucked her out of the Manual Arts High School to give her a contract with his studio.

In the following years she studied all the arts allied with acting—diction, dancing and dramatics—and before she was old enough to decide what she wanted to do with her life she was a full-fledged movie star. This was a career handed to Katie on a silver platter; it was planned, written, produced and directed for her, and she had nothing more to do than be a good girl and cooperate to the best of her ability. It can truthfully be said that Kathryn Grayson has not done one thing that was not absolutely necessary to further her career, and even today it is improbable that she would walk across the street to ask for a role. She does not say it in so many words, but she gives the impression that being a movie star, to her, is just a job. She is tremendously grateful for the advantages given her, for the fame and fortune that came to her through the organization of MGM. When she is working she is intensely interested and devotes herself to it with unending energy. Yet the moment a picture is finished Miss Grayson retires into her private life and doesn't give movies a second thought until she is once more on call to be in makeup at 7 A.M.

LAST August she left MGM. In a way it was like leaving her home, for she had spent almost half her life there. The split was an amicable one; she left no enemies nor bitter words behind her. It was simply a matter of her wanting more freedom to direct her life as she chose. She wanted the right to appear on television should such an opportunity be offered her. This was the bid that stuck in the craw of the studio executives. She had had for years the right to appear at concerts, yet her studio association was so confining that almost every time she agreed to do a concert it had to be canceled because of forthcoming movie work. There was only one answer, figured Katie, and that was to leave when her contract expired.

She had already done one picture outside the walls of MGM and that was The Desert Song for Warners. When the brothers Warner heard that Miss Grayson was free they snapped her up to a contract for one picture a year and immediately began making plans for So This Is Love. This gives Katie the security she needs, as breadwinner for herself and daughter Patty Kate, and also the opportunity to sing for her supper wherever and whenever she chooses.

Careerwise, she feels there is a whole new life ahead of her now. Metro producers had known her since her adolescence and as a result had difficulty seeing her as anything but a child. When recently one of them saw her with the blonde hair a worried little frown went across his forehead. "But this is not our little girl," he said.

Kathryn Grayson is now 29, has two marriages behind her and is the mother of a four-year-old daughter. She is no longer a child, a fact which is quickly recognized by producers meeting her for the first time. Each has a different reaction, wants to star her in a different type of role, and to Katie the whole future outlook has become one that is exciting because of the variations offered.

While her career seems to have taken wings, is does not make for complete happiness, for Katie is the natural product of a large and warm-hearted family. She had hoped, like most girls, for a happy and lasting marriage blessed by a parcel of children. But having been twice burned she is extremely cautious about a new venture. She dates, of course. There is a mile-long list of men about town who dial Miss Grayson's telephone number quite frequently. They run the gamut from actors to zoologists, but few of them are fortunate enough to tie up Katie for an evening. She is too busy, she says, to take time away from home.

Columnists have rumored a romance here and there, and one was foolish enough to report that Kathryn had been gifted with some fabulous jewels. Miss Grayson promptly denied the statement. She was not in love, she said, she had accepted jewelry from no one, and furthermore she would like it understood that she did not own one thing that she had not bought with her own earnings.

SOME of the men she dates could be classified as playboys. That is, they are sufficiently wealthy not to have to devote a great deal of their time to work. Katie may date playboys, but it is doubtful if she will ever marry one. She has worked so long and conscientiously herself that she cannot conceive of a man who marries and doesn't put his nose to the grindstone forthwith. If and when Katie marries again it will be to a man who, wealthy or not, will be well established in a business or profession which he enjoys and to which he devotes regular hours. If she ever falls in love with such a man she will be perfectly willing to give up her movie career the minute her existing contracts have been fulfilled.

Van Johnson's thumbnail description of June Allyson: "That million-dollar laryngitis!"

The sooner Katie falls in love the better. She very much wants to have more children, not only for herself but for Patty Kate, whose four years already would put quite a breach between herself and any babies yet to come. It was brought home to Katie quite poignantly last December when she asked her small daughter what she would like for Christmas. Patty Kate didn't hesitate a second. "I want a baby," she said.

In the interim, Patty Kate lives in a big house that is overrun with people, including children. Kathryn's parents live with her, as well as a couple of nieces and the child of the couple who take care of the house. The three children are 9, 11 and 13, respectively, and while Patty Kate appreciates the fact that all of them share her world of childhood, she is quite adamant about the necessity of having babies around the house. Her association with the older children has resulted in an outlook far beyond her years. "I think," says Kathryn, "that she would have been that way regardless. She seems so wise for her years that sometimes I feel she knows more than I do."

Patty Kate has had an advantage not offered to many children of Hollywood film stars. She has never had a nurse to care for her but instead has grown up in the bosom of a large and devoted family. Kathryn's sister and two brothers have produced among them 15 children, all of whom live within a short distance of her home, and it is a rare week that at least a half-dozen of this selection does not show up for dinner or the weekend.

Patty Kate doesn't suffer at all from the fact that her mother is a career woman. On the contrary, it all rolls off Patty Kate like water off the proverbial duck's back. Quite some time ago the child watched her mother on the set, singing "Smoke Gets In Your Eyes." The script called for Katie to cry a bit as she sang, and inasmuch as it happened to be about the time of her divorce from Johnston, the entire cast and crew seemed to feel it was an occasion for everybody to weep. They all stood around with tears in their eyes and as soon as the director called "Cut!" Katie put her hands on her hips and looked at the woe-filled faces. "Well, for heaven's sake!" she laughed. "Everybody come off it!" And then she noticed that Patty Kate, then little more than three years old, was also crying. She knelt and put her arms around her daughter. "Look, darling, Mommy's only making believe." She squeezed a few tears from between her lashes. "See? It's a joke. I can cry whenever I want to. Isn't that funny? Now you watch. I'm going to do the whole thing again for the cameras."

The lights were turned on once more and Katie went into her song. This was the perfect rendition and the director was obviously pleased. And then, right in the middle of the scene and the song, Patty Kate let go with a king-sized giggle which registered quite clearly on the sound track.

Part of Patty Kate's charm is the fact that she is so unpredictable. When the studio suggested that she portray Grace Moore as a child in the movie, Kathryn was quite willing that her daughter be tested for the part. Patty Kate, said her mother, was a small hambone, and it might be a good way to get some of it out of her system. A time was set for the test and a scene chosen. Patty Kate, star of the day, couldn't have been more pleasant. She was obediently respectful of all suggestions offered and when the cameras started rolling, went through her paces beautifully. Director Gordon Douglas was charmed, but in the manner of all directors, asked that the scene be done again. Patty Kate looked at him as though he had just sprouted bats in his belfry. "That's silly," she said. "I just showed you I could do it." Boredom set in almost immediately and nothing could coax further performances out of the child.

"That's all," said Kathryn. "I couldn't go through this every day."

So Patty Kate stayed at home while the picture was made, and Kathryn was just as well satisfied with the outcome. She herself loves show business. She likes the people in it and understands their troubles, their foibles and their happiness in their work. She feels it is a good life and has no objection to Patty Kate making a career for herself some day. "It's unavoidable," says Kathryn. "She has a singing voice."

SHE says this with a mixture of pride and resignation and you wonder whether Katie, in spite of touting show business, wouldn't just as soon stay at home and forget the whole thing. You wonder how she finds time to run a house, be a mother, read the books she wants to read and sing as much as she wants to sing—and have a career on top of it all.

We asked if she sometimes didn't feel that life was slipping away from her, if this daily round of a dozen things to do wasn't so compelling that she was losing a chance for quiet happiness. She smiled. "How could I feel that way when my life is so full and happy?"

So that is the answer. Katie, with her boundless zest for life, finds lasting pleasure and enthusiasm in whatever comes her way. She neither seeks nor shuns love, but it is safe to say that when love does come, when a man finally appears on her horizon who meets her rather rigid specifications, Katie will at long last take time out for love.

(Continued from page 61) been able to worry so much more than I have about the matter. Secondly I cannot get over an impression that those who sympathized with me did so because they unconsciously put themselves in my place. They would have felt terrible had they been eligible for the part and lost it, therefore I must. It is a human way to reason, I suppose, but only if you are the sort with drive behind you.

THE world needs such people, undoubtedly; progress apparently depends on it. An actress who has had tremendous ambition and who has driven herself steadily until she has risen to the top, probably gets a tremendous amount of satisfaction out of any achievement . . . and a sense of shock out of failure. But I am not such a one. My career made steady headway and it seems as if I just went along for the ride. It is impossible for me to take myself too seriously as an artist, and certainly not as an important person. When I do, something brings me right down to a realistic evaluation again. I remember five years ago, driving home in a new car and getting for a moment, as girls sometimes will, a sort of Queen-of-all-I-survey feeling. I was listening to the radio when an announcer came on with some news flashes. The very first one proved to be a dilly. "It has just been reported," he declared quite calmly, "that Betty Grable has been killed in an auto accident while on her way home from the races."

When I could get over my amazement, which came only after I was able to convince myself that it wasn't so, and that I was alive, not dead, I gripped the wheel as hard as I could and drove the rest of the way very carefully. It was just a wild rumor turned into a wilder news bulletin . . . but it sure had a punch in it for me.

Or, just the other evening I took my little girls, Vicki and Jessica, to see Call Me Mister. After a few minutes of watching me on the screen, Jessica, who is five and has seen her movies mostly on TV, started to twist in her seat restlessly. "Mommy," she asked, "could we tune this out and get another program?"

No . . . whatever happens to me, professionally, personally, whatever my spiritual future, I think I will know who I actually am and not be confused by what I am painted to be in billboards or newsprint. When you read that I have turned down a picture (as I have sometimes been known to do!) it is not always because I felt the picture was not good enough for me. Some time ago I refused an opportunity to star in a new film (Pickup On South Street) because I thought the part was too good for me. I couldn't see myself doing it justice. Lack of self-confidence? Maybe. I like to think that it was a case of having a sense of responsibility to the public. But perhaps I am just making excuses for myself. People do that, and Betty Grable, as I have tried to point out, can never pretend to be anything but people.

People are happiest, everyone agrees, when they are doing that which gives them the most satisfaction. Perhaps this is why I sometimes think I was as happy working in the chorus as I have been in pictures. I knew back then, that I was the best dancer in the line. That was something. Now . . . well, I won't discuss how far I might be from being the best actress in my profession.

I CAN remember vividly my stage fright the first time I ever played a straight part in a picture, instead of just dancing and singing my way through the production. The name of the film was A Yank In

The RAF and the star was Tyrone Power whom I had met but never worked with before. I don't think I could have gone through with it had it not been for the understanding of the director, Henry King, and his clever way of handling me.

For the first two days of shooting there wasn't a scene in which I would be needed but King didn't tell me that, and made sure no one else did. Instead he had me report in costume with full makeup as if I was about to go on any moment. He kept me around like this, thinking any moment I was going to go in front of the camera, and finally my nervousness turned to boredom and even resentment. That was what he wanted. When my first scene did come up it was a relief to work instead of a strain!

There were others who helped me forget myself. Don Ameche with his dead pan kidding turning my scare into a laugh, or Walter Lang sitting in his director's chair and crying big tears until I, too, finally started sobbing . . . as called for by the scene he was shooting, and despite my conviction that I would never be able to weep on order.

Perhaps the reason I don't cry easily (and the reason, it might be, why I do not spend much time thinking of the meta-physical) is that my life has not only gone along smoothly, but there have been no great emotional depths or peaks; no one close to me has ever died, no tragedies or near-tragedies have ever happened; none in my family has ever been seriously ill; I can recall no special heights of joy. I think the happiest moment of my recent years was when my horse, Big Noise, won the Del Mar Futurity a few years ago. But there was more than just winning of another race involved. Big Noise was born on our breeding farm, a stilt-legged little colt who for several days could barely stumble around. It was that little colt I was seeing, not the magnificent animal the crowd watched, when he showed his heels to the other horses.

The night before the race someone asked me if I was going to pray that he won. Of course I did not. Whatever my relationship to religion I know that one does not pray for the trivial, and this, and anything involving self advancement or aggrandizement in any way is trivial. If I did this and the time came to pray for a life I would feel that I had used up whatever spiritual good will I had with my Maker. It reminds me, too, of some of the kind of praying you hear about at the track. There are thousands of people there every day who would be very happy to praise God if by so doing they could also pray a winner in whenever they wanted one. I don't imagine He goes in for bargaining.

LIFE rarely turns out the way you expect it will, not in large ways or in small. My mother's great ambition to be a singer was never fulfilled. I was indifferent about a career yet I got one . . . thrust upon me practically. On the other hand, some minor little dreams I had were never attained. Some of these, I admit, were inconsequential, like my idea of what life as the wife of an orchestra leader would be like, or his as the husband of a dancer. I expect we both thought our home would be filled with music and terpsichore. The truth is that in the whole nine years of our marriage he has never tooted a note in the house—and I have never danced a step! There isn't even a trumpet in the house, except one which has been turned into a lamp-base. And I can assure you no cherished ballet slippers, reminiscent of some great triumphant performance; hang on my boudoir wall. Ours was the marriage of two people, and stayed that way; it never yet has become a marriage of a musician and a dancer.

It may seem odd but in a way I am grateful. There is no temperament to worry about, no attitudes that might be expressed as, "I am a special person—I'm a dancer!" or "You have to make allowances for me—I'm a musician!" If either of us ever tried that on the other we'd both have to burst out laughing.

We had other things to learn about ourselves; the sort of life we like to lead, for instance. Soon after our marriage we bought the big house we are in now. It's immense, a marvelous place to entertain. But, in time we realized that we never entertained. With Harry away on tours so much and me busy for long stretches at the studio those periods when we were both home came too seldom to be dissipated in the clamor and fuss of parties. We wanted to enjoy our home, quietly, as husband and wife, father and mother, much more than we cared about enjoying it festively, as host and hostess.

All this we had to learn, and for what we learned I have a word—honesty. I think all people, even the misguided, instinctively know that the solid happiness, the peace-of-mind happiness, has to be built on a foundation of honesty, with one's self and in one's relationships.

I have friends who tell me the reason I have gone so far with my career is not just luck. "You must have been thinking right," they say, giving the word a spiritual significance. Well, it would be very easy to believe them. But who would I be kidding? How would this solve the big mystery I've known about for so long—the mystery of why such good fortune doesn't come to others who for right thinking have me beat a mile? No, it was luck or fate, call it what you will. . . . I haven't found out yet. My job is not to forget this, to know that there is a Someone to Whom I should be thankful and should pay devotion. I am and I do.

getting to know you

In one particular scene in which Ava was working with Clark Gable, Ford didn't like the actress' performance and told her so in no uncertain terms.

In the old days when this happened to Ava, she would cower, retreat, and break into tears. This time she spoke up. "Look," she said to Ford, "if you speak that way to me, you'll get nothing out of me at all. I'll clam up, and we'll louse this picture good."

From that point on, Ford handled Ava gently, and she performed superbly. The director, however, had half a dozen baseball caps with long visors—the kind pilots wear—flown into Africa for the members of his selected team, Clark Gable, Grace Kelly, Bob Surtees, the cameraman, Wingate Smith, his brother-in-law, and a few other choice friends. Significantly enough, Ava was not gifted with one of these caps. But she didn't care.

Location work over, she flew back to London. Frank cancelled a television date in New York, thereby sacrificing $5,000, and flew to her once again.

SINATRA has an ace talent agent in London, a fellow by the name of Jimmy Harding. Jimmy saw to it that Ava had every convenience. An apartment formerly occupied by John Lewis, a one-time member of the British Parliament, was subleased for Mrs. Sinatra.

It's a large apartment with three bedrooms. It's well located in Regent Park. It's tastefully decorated, and Ava makes it her European headquarters. This is where Frank joins her whenever he gets into London.

Jimmy Richards also hired for Ava a beautiful, blonde, tactful secretary named Eileen Thomas. Eileen acts as a buffer between Ava and the world of newspapermen who are always trying to get through to her.

Ava doesn't particularly like to live alone because she gets lonely very quickly, and so when Frank is not with her, Eileen Thomas is. These two became such fast friends that when Mogambo was finished in London, Ava insisted upon taking Eileen with her to Madrid. Ava loves to vacation in Spain and not because of Mario Cabre, either. She has a dear friend, Noreen Grant, an Englishwoman, who lives there, and every chance she gets, Ava takes off for Madrid or Seville, phoning Frank long distance to try to meet her there.

In Spain, Ava is never bothered by movie fans or reporters. Her private life is respected, and this is what she likes. She hates reporters who pry into the status of her love-life or who ask embarrassing questions about her old-time fights with Frankie.

When cornered, however, Ava gives reporters the impression that she is being frank, honest, and down-to-earth. "Look," she recently told one in London. "I've never knocked myself out studying dramatics or screaming about my career. I consider myself darn lucky being a movie star.

If I get a good part I give it everything I've got. I think I know something about emotions, something about the way women feel under different sets of circumstances. That's what I try to put on the screen."

"When I get a nothing part, I just ride with it. There's nothing else to do. You just hope that the next picture will be better . . . As for my marriage, it's just fine. Frank tries to spend as much time with me as possible. I think we've developed a good scheme of things. He's arranged to spend several months working in Europe. That'll cut out all those transatlantic hops."

It was Jimmy Harding, Frank's agent, who set up the singer's Continental tour. By the time this article appears in print, Frank should have sung all through Italy, France, Belgium, Holland, the Scandinavian countries, and Great Britain.

Frank is determined once and for all to allay Ava's fears. And her greatest one is that he doesn't really love her, which, of course, is nonsense—but Ava still has her doubts. She knows Frank like she knows the palm of her right hand. She knows what a charmer he is, how adaptive he can be, how really irresistible.

MANY people don't know it, but Sinatra has more confidence in himself than practically any other entertainer alive. He once said, "If I were going to be a painter, I know darn well I'd be a great one. Once I set my mind to doing something, I really can do it."

There is hardly a girl in the world today that Frank can't enrapture if he sets his mind on the target. Sinatra is a charm boy. He knows the score. He's been around. He's as sharp as a blade. He has known, it is safe to suppose, as many women as any crooner of his age. And this is what has worried Ava sick from time to time.

A friend who once discussed Frankie with Ava reports that the second Mrs. Sinatra cocked her head to one side after the discussion and said, "I know it, all right. Frank has been around."

When Ava married Sinatra she was not expecting a model celibate. She merely hoped that Frank had reached the stage in life where he was tired of sowing wild oats, where one woman was capable of giving him all the love and companionship he required.

Ava is now fairly well convinced that Frank has arrived at that point. Certainly, Frank has proven it to her. In Hollywood while preparing for Eternity, he dined occasionally with Marilyn Maxwell, a flame of yesteryear, but usually he was seen as one of a threesome. Many times he went to dinner with Judy Garland and Sid Luft.

Before he finished Eternity and winged to Europe to join his Ava, Frank was always afraid that someone might carry a ridiculous bit of gossip about him back to London. This would upset his brunette Carolina beauty, and when he arrived, there would be a battle royal.

It hasn't come to pass. The European meetings between Ava and Frank have been warm, rapturous, even tempestuous. Frank stays away just long enough for Ava to miss him terribly and vice versa, so that when at last these two catch up with each other—well, the homecoming is memorable.

There has been talk in Spain to the effect that Frank may remain in Europe with Ava until her 18 months are up, early in 1954.

If Frank is able to satisfy the Internal Revenue people in Washington, and they okay his passport, this may very well come to be. In fact, Frank's agent in London has been looking around for a country home that these lovebirds might rent. Not that Ava doesn't like her Regent's Park apartment. "It's just that a house would be so much better, so much nicer."

Other than for Sinatra's estate in Palm Springs, Ava has no home she can call her own.

Most of the Hollywood stars who are working abroad are motivated in part by the advantageous tax laws. Ava would work abroad regardless of the tax laws, because she prefers living in Europe.

SHE feels that the movie colony atmosphere is not too conducive to a happy family life. She knows this from experience. She knows that movieland is beset with temptation. She knows what life was like in California with Mickey Rooney and Artie Shaw. But as a friend recently pointed out, "Ava has grown enough intellectually to realize that geography does not motivate the sex life so much as a man's basic character. If a husband is going to play around, he'll be just as faithless in New York or Glasgow as in Hollywood or Santa Monica.

"It is my own particular analysis," this friend continues, "that the reason Ava doesn't like Hollywood, that she prefers Europe is because Hollywood arouses a guilt complex in her.

"We might as well face facts, and the number-one fact is that there are many people in the motion industry who feel that the first Mrs. Sinatra, Nancy, got a raw deal. They're wrong, of course, but they blame Ava for the divorce. They point out that if she hadn't been around, Frank would've returned to his wife and three kids. They don't realize that Sinatra might have pushed for a divorce in any case. They point out that Frank had left home before and that after his flings, he'd always returned. This time the temptation of Ava was too great, the pull of (Continued on page 71)

"Ava is a perceptive girl. She knows all this. She knows that Nancy Sinatra has many friends in Hollywood. These people are also Frankie's friends. When they visit Frank, I'm sure Ava wonders what sort of stories they will carry back to Nancy. Ava has always been unsure of herself, especially in Hollywood where so many people remember her as a silly, sexy, drawing girl from North Carolina who was used as a plaything by Mickey Rooney. Hollywood remembers Ava with Howard Duff, Artie Shaw and others. These aren't pleasant memories.

"In Europe, Ava is treated as a famous international movie star. There is nobody in Europe who knew her when she was married to Mickey Rooney, when she acted fatuously and talked foolishly. Abroad, she is a woman of stature who conducts herself with decorum."

In many ways, this analysis rings true. In London, by way of illustration, Ava never makes headlines nor does she cavort around the nightspots. When she is not working on her latest film, in this case, Knights Of The Round Table, she drives out to Richmond, a suburb, and spends the weekend with her friends Richard Attenborough and his actress wife Sheila Sim who are currently starring in an English play, The Mousetrap.

ANYWAY, overseas Ava is infinitely happier than she is in Hollywood. As for Frank, his major forte is adaptiveness, and he can get along anywhere. If the Nevada State Gambling Commission approves of his application for buying into the gambling casino of the Sands Hotel in Las Vegas, he may very well be assured of a large income for life, in which event he and Ava would undoubtedly spend many years away from the rumors, gossip, innuendo and temptations of the movie colony.

In addition to children, all Ava Gardner has ever asked of life is peace of mind. Of late, she's gotten some. After 30 years in this world, it's just about time. END

Except that a few years ago when he was going with Lady Sylvia Ashley and was asked if he contemplated matrimony, he told reporters, "Now, look, boys, she's a very fine woman and I enjoy her company. But insofar as anything serious is concerned, that's out."

Even when he was paying his second wife, Maria Langham close to half a million so that he could be free to marry Carole Lombard, Gable was still shy about admitting his love.

"Carole and I are good friends," he said at the time, "but I'm in no position to discuss marriage or love or anything like that. Say we're just good friends and leave it at that."

On the basis of his established record, it is safe to say that when Gable insists his relationship with an attractive female is casual, it usually is not. For The King, as Spencer Tracy refers to him, has always been a one-woman man—that is, a one-woman-at-a-time man.

on her. He gives her all his ardor, all his non-working time. No diversification for this gentleman. He makes a girl feel as if he is living for her, only for her.

IN the case of Grace Kelly, members of the Mogambo crew insist that during the preparation and making of this film, "Gable had big eyes for Grace."

In Nairobi and all through Kenya, at Thika, Ramuruti, and Lake Naivasha, all through Tanganyika and Uganda, it was Gable and Kelly who paired up, Gable doing everything he possibly could to make things easier for the lovely blonde from Philadelphia who was playing her second large role in motion pictures. Her first was as Gary Cooper's wife in High Noon.

When the location-shooting was finished in Africa, Gable and Grace flew back to Europe. When the picture was resumed in London, reporters and columnists, catching the twosome together at theaters and social functions, also spread the word that The King had found himself a new girl.

During the entire shooting of Mogambo, Grace Kelly was mentioned as the woman who had stolen Gable's heart.

As a matter of fact, she was Clark's constant date. There was no hiding that. In London when they attended Her Majesty's Theater to take in Paint Your Wagon they were surrounded by so many fans who kept talking about "Clark Gable and his new sweetheart" that the manager of the theater had to extend the intermission 30 minutes while Gable and Grace signed programs for eager autograph collectors.

A few nights later when I ran into them at the New Theater where they'd gone to see Dear Charles, Gable was irritated when photographers insisted upon shooting him and his young lady. He scowled, bent his head down, and escaped through the crowd.

In London Clark Gable usually lives at the Savoy Hotel. Since Grace Kelly stayed at the same place and the gossip linking these two became so strong, Gable moved into the Connaught, a conservative hotel several miles away. A week or so later Grace's mother arrived from Philadelphia.

When Grace Kelly was asked if she were in love with Gable or he with her, she said, "I'm afraid not. That's just a rumor and there's nothing to it. Mr. Gable is a very fine gentleman, and he's gone out of his way to help me in this picture. Because of that and because of working with a great director like John Ford and a talented actress like Ava Gardner, this has been a wonderful experience for me."

"Yes, Mr. Gable and I have been out together, to a few plays, things like that, and we spent a lot of time in each other's company in Africa, but actually, it's been very hard work on this film, and there hasn't been much occasion for relaxing."

"I don't go out with Mr. Gable regularly, and he doesn't go out with me steadily. He's just a close friend, but the rumors have magnified everything into a tremendous love affair. I'm afraid it's not."

"When this picture is over I'll be in New York, and Mr. Gable will probably be touring the Continent. I can tell you that we're not engaged, just close friends."

SUPPOSEDLY, the actor's next picture, following Mogambo, is Green Fire, this one to be shot in South America so that Gable can stay out of the United States for 18 months and earn a few tax-free dollars; and somehow it would surprise no one if the 52-year-old star requested this tall, stately, well-bred blonde, not even half his age, to play opposite him; for romance or no romance, Grace Kelly is one of today's finest young actresses.

Moreover, she is an intelligent, worldly, sophisticated young woman of excellent background, and that's the type of girl Gable specializes in, albeit he has picked them much older in the past.

Grace Kelly is the daughter of the John Kellys of Philadelphia. Her father is one of the best-known building contractors in that city, and her brother Jack is an Olympic oarsman who twice won the Henley regatta in London, once in 1947 and again in 1949.

Her uncle is George Kelly, the veteran Broadway playwright who wrote such hits as Craig's Wife, which won a Pulitzer Prize, and The Showoff.

She did her first stage-acting as a child of 11 and in 1947 left Philadelphia for New York where she attended the American Academy of Dramatic Arts for two years.

Grace was a very apt pupil and after reading for Raymond Massey who was directing a Broadway play, The Father, she won the role of his daughter. Massey at the time, said, "In my opinion Grace Kelly is going places as an actress."

His prediction proved correct. The tall, blue-eyed natural blonde was spotted by a 20th Century-Fox talent scout one night and tested for a part in 14 Hours, a film starring Paul Douglas. Grace got the part easily. Business was slow, however, and there were no further movie roles, but since she is not a poor girl, Grace had the necessary funds for further dramatic study. She played Bucks County and then went west where she acted in Denver's Ellitch Gardens which is known as the graduate school of summer stock.

Gene Autry's Mule Train, made in 1950, was the first musical Western to go into the archives of the Museum of Modern Art.

Fortunately for Grace, Hollywood producer Stanley Kramer was looking around for a young actress who was young, pretty, and talented but would take relatively little in the way of salary. He had a western ready to go entitled High Noon. The star of the picture was Gary Cooper whose financial demands are always astronomical. Cooper had agreed to star in the film for $50,000 and 20% of the profits, a deal which will probably net him a half million.

Because Grace hadn't had very much film experience, her salary hovered about the $250-a-week mark.

Kramer, who is always willing to take a chance on youngsters, signed Grace for the femme lead. She was nothing but sensational. When High Noon was finished, Cooper said, "This girl has as much potential as any actress I've played opposite—a great talent."

NOW all you need in Hollywood is one big fat hit, and your agent can start making demands and mulling over the various offers that begin to cataract. Grace went back to New York, picked up some fast dough on television, and the high pressure boys from MCA began scouting around for her in Hollywood.

The Music Corporation of America represents dozens of actors, one of the most valuable being William Clark Gable. When Gable was assigned to Mogambo, the story of a triangle in which a white hunter fools around with a lady and a fast girl, and decides in the end that the red hot baby is for him, MCA asked for the identity of the two women who were to play opposite him.

Twenty years ago Gable had made this story under the title of Red Dust. At that time Jean Harlow had played the vamp and Mary Astor the married lady.

MGM told Gable's agent that Ava Gardner was scheduled to play the Jean Harlow part, but that they had no one for the Mary Astor role. In fact, they said, the British Government wanted them to use British actors and actresses wherever possible.

MCA asked Gable if he had any objections to Grace Kelly. Gable said, "No, she's great." Whereupon Miss Kelly was offered to John Ford, one of the few really great motion picture directors in Hollywood. After seeing some of Grace's work, Ford nodded, "She's good enough for me."

Grace Kelly was flown to Europe, thence to Nairobi in British East Africa, and then 750 land miles out into the bush country. It was in this location that she and Gable became "fast friends."

Ava and Grace were the only two white female stars on the trek, and at night Ava used to hang a lantern outside her tent to scare off the lions, and in this sort of potentially dangerous environment, Gable took on the halo of the protector.

Africa or no Africa, The King is a pretty romantic guy anyway you look at him, and in the span of five weeks' time, Grace Kelly was looking at him plenty.

By the time they hit London, the rumors coupling these two in a torrid romance were in full force. They were so prevalent that Gable became annoyed at them and refused to answer questions concerning his love life.

Reporters are adroit by profession, however, and would start their questioning along this line. "Are you really happy without a wife?" Gable's answer to that one was a fast yes.

"How do you feel about marriage generally? That is, you've been burned a few times."

"I've always believed in marriage as the best state for man and woman, and I believe in it now. If the right girl came along and I fell in love with her and she with me, I certainly would marry again."

MINDFUL of the fact that each of his four wives had had money in her own right, one reporter asked the actor how he felt about a wife who had an independent income.

"If a marriage is right," Gable answered, "a husband will maintain his authority regardless of his wife's income or wealth."

"What qualities are you looking for in a wife, Mr. Gable?"

"I'm looking for a woman who has brains, beauty, breeding and a good sense of humor. I'd like her to know her way around both in and out of the home. I myself don't go in for much entertaining but if entertaining makes her happy she can do all of it she has a hankering for."

"After you finish Mogambo what are your plans?"

"I left my car back in Rome. I'm going to pick it up, drive through Spain and then settle down in a little house I've rented in Majorca. Did I mind the discomfort in Africa? Heck no. A lot of people were bellyaching about conditions, but I loved the whole setup, sleeping on a cot, the mosquito netting, washing in a canvas basin, even hunting. I shot a crocodile and a python, and a few other animals, but I'm really more of a fisherman than a hunter. Basically, I'm a lazy man, and I guess all lazy men love to fish."

"Just one more question, Mr. Gable. Is there any truth to the rumor that while you and Grace Kelly were on location you fell in love with her and that she is currently your girl?"

The King's eyes flashed, his teeth came together, and he shook his head. "That's absurd," he said a moment later. "Right now I've got no girl."

People in Hollywood who know Gable best, however, and there are surprisingly few who know him relatively well, insist that Gable always has a girl, that a womanless life for him is as likely as a wifeless one is for Tommy Manville.

(Continued from page 59) but it got so we didn't dare be seen together, because the 'columnists jumped down our throats for trying to fool people by going out just to make an appearance for the studio.'

We suggested that maybe he was con- tending, then, that he was very fond of all of the girls he'd been linked with in the past couple of years. Real fond.

"That's silly," he snorted. "But how can you tell unless you check? In Hollywood there are more single men than single women actually, but the movie people stick together, maybe because we're all in the same line of work. And the single actresses do outnumber the single actors. That means we're what you might call overworked. So if I seem to go out with a lot of women it's just that I'm trying to do my bit—and, incidentally, not overlook any bets. But I can say that I've never gone out with the same girl twice unless I really liked her."

BRADY kicked a little lint off the carpet and made an expression like Bishop Sheen starting a lecture.

"Do you know what the result of all this kind of talk about me and other actors is going to be?" he asked. "The fans who come to Hollywood to see the stars are going to be able to get a look at more of them in Kansas City. They're all going to be in hiding. They'll be afraid to go out, for fear of being lynched. The sightseeing buses will all go out of business. The drivers will be pointing out Mocambo and such places as former night clubs. And the press agents for those night clubs, who plant all the hot stories on guys like me, will be selling apples.

"Maybe it is the press agents who should be blamed, anyway. One week when I had the flu I counted the items in the columns serviced by those press agents and I was listed as being in 45 spots with about 45 different dames. My agent was going crazy. He kept calling me up, raising the devil. 'I'm telling the studio you're sick in bed,' he screamed, 'and every time I pick up a paper I see you've been out dancing. What are you trying to do to your career?' And the girl I was going with—and whom I didn't want to see because I didn't want to give her my flu—call every hour and told me to die that day. And all the time I hadn't lifted my aching head from a pillow."

We began to feel very unhappy about Brady. Maybe the man was misunderstood.

"Put this down," he demanded suddenly, "if you're going to write anything about all this, tell the truth. I'm a simple man trying to make a living and doing my best to learn my business so I can work at it until I'm an old man. I am not a trouble-maker. I am not fickle. I never give a producer any trouble. I have to stand up for a few rights—and I have to make my own decisions about my career. But a man has to do that in any business."

"And put down particularly that I will never be a long-hair." (In Hollywood parlance it is said of an actor that whenever he kicks over the traces and gets into a fight with his boss, that he has gone "long-hair.") "I don't want to play Hamlet or be another Charlie Chaplin. I will play any part a studio asks me to if I think I can do it and it won't take me backward instead of forward. I would like to spend the rest of my life doing domestic comedies, light little guys who work in factories and have to hurry to work every morning, just like the people who go to the movies. Once in a while I'd like an action movie—a western or something like that. But I'll leave the acting parts to the big actors, the guys who like that sort of stuff and know how to do it. I don't."

We meekly interrupted to suggest that from current reports Scott Brady had set some sort of a record for kicking over the traces. Within a matter of days, a few months ago, he ran afoul of both 20th Century-Fox and Universal-International, and made the final payment on a contract he bought out of at Eagle-Lion. For a few days it had looked as though Scott were trying to be a one-man revolution, and the word had got around that Scott Brady was at last a long-hair, a bad boy, a man who wanted his way or else.

Scott narrowed his ice-blue eyes at us. He ran a strong hand through his already uncombed hair. And he began talking at his usual machine-gun rate.

"If you want to know the real truth about my dealings with Fox and Universal, you've got to know what preceded all this," he said finally. "You see, both the Fox and Universal deals came as a result of the mess I got into with Eagle-Lion. Now that was all my fault. When I got out of the service I came to Hollywood because my brother (Larry Tierney) was here, and the rest of the family was planning to move to California. I had no job—and nothing in mind—so I just took it easy around town for awhile, a few months."

"One day I was in a restaurant and a fellow walked up to me and asked me if I was an actor. I told him to get lost, but he insisted on talking to me, and the next thing I knew I was on my way over to Eagle-Lion studio. We went into a little office and a man sat at a desk behind a big cigar and just looked at me. He didn't say a word for ten minutes. Eventually, he seemed to make up his mind, and he turned to the fellow with me—who was an agent—and said he'd like to talk over a deal."

"I found out right then that actors aren't supposed to have any sense, because they asked me to step outside while they figured out what they were going to do with me. That sounds kind of crazy, but that's the way they do things."

"Well, to make it short, they 'made a deal,' and the following morning I was an actor, maybe a star, at Eagle-Lion. It was as easy as that."

Brady plucked a cigar from a pocket and bit the end off and lit a match. And then his entire manner changed. He didn't look menacing anymore. His face wrinkled into a wide grin and he sunk into a chair chuckling like a small boy. He played with the cigar as though he wasn't used to cigars.

"Boy what they did to me at Eagle-Lion," he said. "I'm not complaining, mind you, because if they hadn't given me a chance I might be installing your telephone here today or picking up your laundry. But I became an actor fast over there. The first picture I was a prize fighter—and I was terrible. But everybody kept telling me I was great. I guess if they hadn't I'd have left town in the middle of the night. Then I was a T-man. Pretty soon I wasn't sure what I was supposed to be I was working so fast and in so many movies. About this time I began to get wise to some facts about Hollywood. I learned, from just looking around me, that an actor in the movies has to conserve his activities. They say you only last about seven years and I could see myself using up the whole seven years in about two. Sure I was getting experience, but it was killing me off. I was making pictures so fast that I wasn't making any sense in them. And I wasn't making any money. So I decided to make a change."

Brady wagged the cigar as though it was a big stick.

FROM that time on," he said, "people thought I was a trouble-maker. I got myself two new contracts, one at Universal and one at 20th Century-Fox. I've worked hard at both places. Recently both contracts were called off—and the stories around town about how it happened would curl your hair. I hear that out at Universal I got into such an argument with Bill Goetz that he threw a book at me and chased me out of his office. They tell me he said I was a bad boy who got too big for his britches, and that I wanted to play roles I wasn't able to. The fact is that Bill Goetz and I separated on the friendliest of possible terms—and never had a harsh word then or ever.

"At 20th Century-Fox they had a clause in my contract that I couldn't do television. I wanted to do TV and I did. That broke the contract. I'm sure I'll work there again some day, because I have a lot of friends out there."

Brady flung his cigar, well chewed now, into the fireplace, and stomped up and down to keep his dander going.

"But that isn't the worst of it—being called a 'long-hair.' They have me nuts now about my private life. Take for instance the stories that were in the papers recently about me and Anita Ekberg. The way it went was that she and I went to Mocambo, I criticized the way she was dressed, we had a knock down-dragout fight and she stormed out of the place in a huff, leaving me alone. How about that?"

"What actually happened was that we went to the Bar of Music, not Mocambo, she had been in a hurry to dress and wore a nice suit. We found out it was an opening night after we got there and that everyone was in evening clothes. We sat down, laughed like the devil for about ten minutes, and then left for some less fancy place together. And we had a wonderful evening.

"But the papers made me look like a real jerk. Look, if I like a girl I don't care if she goes out with me wearing blue jeans and a T-shirt, as long as she looks good. I certainly wouldn't start a beef with a pretty girl in a public place—although the word is around now that I'll slug a woman anywhere. Jimmie Fidler wrote me an open letter in his column that made me hate myself even though I knew all the things I'd been charged with were not true."

UP to this point Brady had been tensed up like a panther on the prowl, and had looked about as dangerous. But at this moment he pulled one of those abrupt about-faces that make him so darned fascinating and likeable. He grinned his wide Irish grin and came straight over to us.

"Maybe you're the guy to set the record straight. Maybe you're the guy to write the truth about me—and my reputation. Just tell them what I've been saying, about my job, about my girls, about my wild, wild ways.

"And another thing. Tell them that I'll be my own man. If I do crazy things, that's me doing them. Not an actor trying to at-

Brady came over and looked at us closely. He gave us a pat on the head that could almost have been interpreted as a blow.

"Now, don't louse me up," he said. "I've got to go. I've got to get another cigar."

And he went, like a T-man who'd just spotted a smuggler.

WE gathered the notes we'd scribbled and looked them over very carefully. They seemed to make sense—and the man certainly seemed to be telling the truth—at least the truth the way he saw it. But all in all he still seemed to come out something of a character.

Let's see. Scott Brady does date more women than any three bachelor actors in town. He walks ahead of them generally, but they don't seem to mind. He opens the car door from his side, not from the sidewalk. We've seen him grab a girl by the scruff of the neck and lead her through a night club door—with a smile on his face, all right, and generally a smile on hers. Maybe that's his kind of affection. Maybe he is a bit of a roughneck with women. But they seem to like it and want to come back for more.

We've seen him walk into a conference room and say exactly what was on his mind, and pound a desk a little. He hasn't always won, so maybe he is considered something of a trouble-maker by some producers. He certainly knows what he wants and means to do—and he does it. Possibly his idea of a simple discussion is another man's idea of a knock-down-drag-out fight. Anyway, he's no sissy.

He may not care what a woman wears, but Scott Brady's date is generally as well decked out as any doll in the room, so maybe he's a little more particular about appearance than he thinks he is. Who's to argue, though, about that?

We believe Scott Brady, though, about not being a long-hair, or ever wanting to be one. We know he's a business man about acting and likes to do the right things. He'll never try for the Old Vic in London, for sure.

Now about being fickle. The man's not that. If you'll listen to him he'll tell you his heart has really belonged to a girl named Dorothy Malone for a long time, and will continue to be hers until she's entirely sure she doesn't want it. The other girls are pals, nothing more. But that's his problem, not ours. It's probably the only problem the poor guy's got. END

"Why shouldn't I be jealous?" Liz asks. "Imagine his having this whole beautiful house all to himself, and playing with the baby, too. But seriously, now that we're both working, we spend all our free time right here at home. We rarely go to parties. The Academy Awards night was the first evening affair for us in months. We hardly ever dine in restaurants, and only a little while ago when Michael suggested that a weekend in San Francisco might be a good change for us, we both forgot the idea before it even developed. It may sound stuffy, but honestly, we're completely stuck on the Wilding brand of homelife."

The Wilding lovenest is every bit as attractive as the lady of the house.

Elizabeth Taylor, because she's worked for the past decade, is one of the few fortunate young actresses who can afford a $100,000 house.

Luckily, she also has the taste, breeding, and background to furnish it with care and discrimination. The house is as fine an example of contemporary design and decorating as can be found anywhere in the country today.

Of course, a good many experts helped Liz make her house what it is today, but it was Mrs. Elizabeth Taylor Hilton Wilding who started the ball rolling, and in every furnishing detail it was she who made the final decision.

Expert number one was her efficient, golf-playing secretary, Peggy Rutledge. After her marriage to Mike Wilding in London, Liz wrote Peg and said, "Please start looking around for a house you think Michael and I would go for." She then explained that what she had in mind was a small place, two bedrooms and maybe a swimming pool, but something away from neighbors, something with clean modern lines, and a house with a view.

Really good houses are not easy to buy. They have to be built according to plans and specifications. You need a good architect and intelligent owners, everyone working in close cooperation. The Wildings were excessively lucky. They had Peg to do the spadework. She eliminated dozens of modern monstrosities offered by the local real estate agents.

Finally last August, Liz and Mike decided upon a rambling modern California ranch house. It is really three separate units joined together by a covered walk.

THE first section consists of the service wing including the parking area, a three-car garage, the laundry, the maid's room, machinery for heating the house and the swimming pool, storage for the freezer, and living space for the Wildings' four dogs and four cats. (Liz Taylor has always been pet-wacky.)

The second unit comprises a complete guest apartment with kitchen, living room, bedroom and bath. At the moment these quarters are being occupied by Liz' brother, Howard, and his wife, Mara.

The best part of the house, however, is where Liz and Michael spend most of their time. This is the third unit and boasts two bedrooms, one for the baby, of course, an over-sized living and dining room area, two baths, and a large airy kitchen. Surrounded by a diachondra lawn, flowering shrubs, and a well-planned rock garden, this butter-yellow house perches on the brow of a hill overlooking Beverly Hills, the Pacific Ocean, and practically all of Los Angeles.

Originally the owner of this house was a Mr. Ted McClellan. Ted is a successful California contractor, and when he erected the house for himself he made certain to use the latest and best building materials. For example, all the wooden finish in the house is solid mahogany including the paneling in the living room, the wardrobe closets in the bedroom, and even the bathroom cabinets.

The fireplace wall and the rock wall, the structural center of the living room, is made of especially selected fieldstone. The enormous window walls in each room consist of expensive plate glass, while the kitchen is basically a housekeeper's dream, a harmonizing blend of white oak, formica, and stainless steel, all functional and efficient.

Lottie, the cook and housekeeper, loves to point out to visitors how every drawer in the kitchen operates on ball bearings. Each kitchen cabinet was designed for a specific use—a narrow file for trays, a deep closet for pots, a felt-lined drawer for silverware, and a series of narrow shelves for spices. Lottie says, "I've worked in many kitchens, but never in one so functional. And what a view you get from the kitchen. Honest, it's like being in heaven."

Even though they had all these architectural advantages to begin with, the Wildings made a few improvements of their own. Liz, for example, who has a good sense of design and a perceptive appreciation of art—after all, it's only natural since she's an art dealer's daughter—thought that the living room as it was when they first bought the house had an uninteresting shape and too little seating space.

She and Mike discussed the problem, gave it some of their thinking, and then decided to extend the structural stone wall and add a glassed-in lanai thereby turning the room into an L-shape.

They also bleached the mahogany paneling a lighter shade and converted a small bar into a music cabinet and record-player. Liz also stood watch over the house painters until they had changed the earthy brown exterior to the color she wanted, a cool yellow.

WHEN it came to furnishing their love-nest, Liz and Mike looked around for an interior decorator with considerable talent and a reasonable money sense. They decided on Jim Favour. Jim had done homes for a few of their friends, Stanley Donen, one of Liz' ex-boy friends, was one of these, and his work is widely admired. Unlike some Hollywood decorators whose bills would frighten even the Aga Khan, Jim's fees are fair, and he insists upon giving his clients a voice in their décor.

Favour says, "The Wildings were helpful and easy to please, a pretty rare combination. They had two requests to start with. Liz told me she wanted a pink bedroom and the dominant note in the living room to be perrywinkle blue.

"We dyed a 20-by-30 carpet a delicate pink. Then we covered a chaise in pink mohair, and painted all the wooden surfaces in the master bedroom a darker shade of pink. Even now we're changing the bathroom fixtures to pink.

"In the living room we decided to cover a contoured couch in Liz' blue. With this color we've used contrasting and blending shades of purple, green, and gold on the chairs and pillows. The match-stick shades, which are the only curtains in the place, are held together by bands of blue, purple, green, and gold wool. The total effect is one of cleanliness, modernity, and comfort."

When Jim Favour says "We," he means of course, Liz, Mike, and himself. "The Wildings," he explains, "played the major role in selecting things. My office merely made up floor plans and furniture sketches, but Liz and Mike did all the choosing."

Except for the dining room chairs and the bleached cork coffee table, all the furniture pieces in the house were made to order. The teakwood dining table, the tall breakfront, the ingenious bar with built-in television, all of these are the handiwork of a California craftsman named Dave Edberg.

As you well know, without paintings, books, and art objects all homes lack personality. Liz' lovenest figuratively reeks with it. This is understandable. Her father, Francis Taylor, is an eminent art dealer, a close friend of such great British artists as Augustus John and Jacob Epstein. Her uncle Howard owns the Young Art Galleries in New York. Her kid brother is a student artist on the G.I. Bill, and her husband Michael once made his living as a painter.

With that sort of background, you simply know that the Wilding house is going to offer the tops in art.

Liz' parents, for example, gave the newly-weds the colorful Masson painting that hangs over the living room couch as well as the Benton Scott clowns in the dining room. Her father also helped them select the Augustus John oils and the Epstein bronze of an Hawaiian girl which they keep on the stone ledge by the fireplace. It was Liz herself, however, who fell in love with and bought the sixth century Tang horse that occupies such a vital location between the living and dining areas. Then for the light artistic touch the Wildings have a comic impression of Liz as a mother-to-be. It was painted and gifted to them by director Jean Negulesco. It bears the inscription, "There's never enough of Liz."

The Wilding house with furnishings is worth a minimum of $150,000, but this fact does not prevent Liz from giving all her pets free run of the place. What the dogs and cats do to the rugs may drive some of the help crazy, but Liz doesn't care. "A house," she says, "is meant to be lived in, not to be shown."

Mary, the Scotch nana who looks after little Michael, agrees with the mistress of the house but insists that a line has to be drawn somewhere. Liz likes to plunk her baby down in the middle of her tremendous bed for a romp with her four cats.

"I don't think the cats will hurt the baby," Mary says, "but you should see what they do to the bedspread. Shockin' it tis. Real shockin'."

"You can live only on the surface . . . or you can live way down deep, to the utmost." That's the philosophy Ann Sheridan shares with you in this, the sixteenth in MODERN SCREEN's personality series written by Hollywood's top name stars.

REAL ESTATE PRICES MUST BE GOING UP all over or is there another reason why dining places seem to be getting smaller, with room only for tiny tables? If you want to eat distractedly just order a full dinner in the average restaurant; the dishes so overflow the table, they have to be pyramided up on each other. Touch at your food with your fork and the plates start sliding apart, including always one or two which fall right off on the floor. When I make a driving trip I always come home with a feeling that the brighter the neon sign over a restaurant the duller the food and the smaller the table. The only safe thing to do is to order a hamburger—well done—and hold it in your hand.

I like to drive because it helps purge all my spleen. I talk to the drivers I pass if they don't do what I think they should. They can't hear me, of course. I'm really talking to myself. But I give full vent to my feelings and when I get home I feel sweet and clean inside, and strangely content.

I TALK TO MYSELF WHEN I DRIVE, as I say, but I never get into a long conversation with anyone else in my car as women are apt to do. I think this habit, more than any other, is the reason women are considered bad drivers. It is when they are chattering away, very often indulging in a gossip tid-bit, that they run afoul of nature's old law about two bodies of matter being unable to occupy the same point in space at the same time. Crash!

In driving through the United States one comes to repose each evening on the hotel or motel bed, and, as far as I am concerned, this over-advertised and generally spring-sprung couch is vastly overrated. Oh, they are soft, all right, but herein lies their functional failure. Every orthopedist I know (and a cow pony falling on me resulted in my back becoming an interesting case for a lot of them) has advised that for proper rest a firm bed is far better than a soft one.

FOR YEARS I HAVE SLEPT on a bed that has a wooden board separating the mattress from the box springs underneath. Some people I know insist on a much harder bed; they use hair mattresses on a wooden support and the devil with any springs. Today, when I have to sleep in the average, soft hotel bed, it feels mushy and terribly uncomfortable. Generally I know I am in for an uncomfortable night. The theory about the inadequacy of a soft bed is a simple one. When you lie on it the heavier parts of your anatomy, the head, shoulders, hips, calves, heels, dig holes for themselves. Since one keeps moving while sleeping, the body spends a good deal of the night climbing out of these depressions. By morning you practically have scaled a mountain. On a hard bed it is possible to roll from side to side easily.

That horse which fell on me was a mare, by the way, and, strange to say, I always remember her gratefully. Horses are not supposed to have any sense but this one showed great consideration, I feel. The fall came because I accidentally pulled her the wrong way while we were riding along a hill. In her almost mechanical obedience to the signal on the rein she was thrown off balance. She landed partly on me on the uphill side, but even in that instant I felt her fighting to roll off. She could easily have rolled over me down hill and badly crushed me . . . but, as if instinctively sensing this, she went the other way and scrambled off on the uphill side. That was back in 1935. When I pull a horse's reins today I check and double-check to make sure that what I want the horse to do agrees with the law of gravity!

IT'S PROBABLY A WILD IDEA but I can't help wondering whether part of the passport examination of any American should be a quiz on his manners. I'd certainly vote for it.

When Diana Lynn talked about the conduct of Americans abroad in this column several months ago she said something which I endorse completely. I came back from Mexico not long ago and during my stay there I like Diana, was not proud of being American. There were too many other Americans there representing their country on a very low level; they were intolerant, loud to the point of raucousness and all-demanding. Their efforts to appreciate the beauty that exists in Mexico, even if it is often framed against a background of poverty, was nil. Their eagerness to point out the deficiencies of Mexican life was, on the other hand, offensively obvious.

I don't know what hits too many Americans when they get to Mexico; they think and act as if they were members of a musical comedy cast. Entirely oblivious of the fact that they are being watched by the citizens of the country they are insulting, they are seized with the impulse to don a sombrero, throw a serape over their shoulders, and caper around with exaggerated Latin gestures for the entertainment of their friends. What the Mexicans must think as they watch the behavior of these "Touristas" I don't know. but I imagine that they are puzzled by the contrast between such inherent bad taste and the greatness of our country.

MEXICO IS A LAND OF FLOWERS, and so is Southern California—when you water it well. I have all varieties of flowers around my home in the San Fernando Valley but my favorites, lilacs, disappoint me because with all their beauty there is none of the fragrance of eastern lilacs. I am now considering a drastic treatment advised by a nurseryman. He tells me to dig a deep trench around the roots of the bush, fill it with solid ice, and cover it up. As the roots freeze there is brought on the necessary state of dormancy which, curiously enough, later results in stimulation of the lilac's natural sweet smell. Isn't it funny . . . you have to darn near kill the plant to awaken it to its fullest life!

Still curiously . . . I should go to such trouble to make a lilac smell like a lilac when I don't even bother to glamorize myself in this manner! I mean, I rarely use perfume. I have perfume, love to have it around, but keep forgetting to wear any. It just doesn't seem to mean enough to me. I do like scented soaps, but this I regard as a pleasant feature of the department of cleaning up.

IT'S FUNNY, WHEN I WAS 17 and probably needed nothing in the way of beauty aids my life was quite complicated with them. In time, as you see, the whole process of looking glamorous has simplified itself down to one important ingredient—soap. (Outside of ordinary make-up of course.) There's a moral in this somewhere. Maybe it is that once you have cleansed the surface and permitted the inner quality to shine through . . . you can do no more (provided you work on that inner quality!).

You change. At 17, when I first came to Hollywood, life was something you lived gaily. This was a lovely attitude which I didn't keep too long. Responsibilities cropped up and I settled down to the serious business of living. Various happenings influenced the change. There was a period of a year and a half when my education along this line was most intense—I was out of work the whole period. There's nothing gay about facing the future with $1.38 in the bank. I think I got started on the simple and uncluttered life about this time. I developed a great respect for such necessities as eating and sleeping, and a corresponding indifference for fancy fripperies. In time I couldn't help but apply this criterion to people; in a friend I seek heart more than brilliance, beauty, or position . . . only the heart is dependable.

ALL I KNEW WHEN I CAME TO HOLLYWOOD is that which a 17-year-old girl learns in a small southern town—what to do till the minister comes. My mother made her girls (we were four) study our cooking, do kitchen stints, she gave us sewing, quilting, crocheting and etiquette lessons, she lectured us on young ladyship generally, and she would not permit us to smoke or drink. We accepted all the facts she gave us but not all of her theories. We cooked and cleaned and sewed her way but we talked to boys our way. We also, all four of us, smoked, but in secret. She found out, of course, about our attitude to boys as well as our smoking, but on the whole she must have figured she was hitting a pretty good average in bringing us up properly.

When we grew up we weren't made to her order, yet, I felt, she was pretty satisfied with us. Our father, who wasn't half as aware as mother about our minor sins, was proud of us. When I made him a pecan pie he acted as if I was just about the best cook in the world; mother, knowing the dozens of things I couldn't prepare, couldn't be so all-out in her admiration. I guess this is just about the way it should be. I needed my father's pride in me to give me confidence and I needed my mother's more accurate appraisal to forestall my having any illusions about myself.

WHEN I SEE A WOMAN WHO IS UNREALISTIC ABOUT HERSELF (say one who wears slacks even though they make her look like a stuffed laundry bag with legs) I am very grateful not only for having had a mother who pointed out truths to us, but also for being one of four sisters who always pointed out anything mother overlooked. So there was little danger that I would grow up to be a girl who leans to baby talk, or sticks to her curls, or waves her hands about helplessly in the hope that men will recognize that she is just a clinging doll who needs their strong, male protection. It was just as well—it's hard to run into fellows who will keep on thinking you're a doll from 17 to 70. Inevitably they wake up to the truth . . . and this is very tough on dolls.

Before I get too far away from the mention of slacks, hitherto made, I might say I am not against slacks per se, as the lawyers put it, or informal wear generally. Yet I do think a woman should dress up more when the opportunity presents itself, and that even a shopping trip downtown should be counted such an opportunity. There are certain smart women in Hollywood who have awakened to the fact that the careless habits of the local femininity give them an unusual advantage and they have seized upon it. They are not loath about putting on a tailored dress, hat, and even gloves when they go out, and the result is that they stand out from the other, less carefully outfitted girls.

IN A SENSE, A SMART, WELL GROOMED GIRL is a compliment to every man who sees her and the men appreciate it; a carelessly dressed girl is making light of both herself and them. And they know that, too. This, incidentally, is one theory of my mother's which I fluffed off when I was younger, but to which I have returned with the conviction that she was so right.

FEMININITY IS A GIFT as life is a gift; being alive you can either just live, or live to the utmost; being a woman you can be either dully conscious of it or make it a worthwhile experience. Can there possibly be a choice?

Reading over all this advice makes me wish that once again I was just a "lil ole Texas gal," just starting out on her career. I do believe I might take some of this advice to heart!

(Continued from page 29) Rojas. Both Robertson and Ray have vehemently denied any romance with Rita. Aldo is engaged to marry Jeff Donnell when her divorce becomes final this fall, and such rumors are therefore undesirable, to say the least. They began when a female columnist printed news to the effect that the Aldo Ray-Jeff Donnell romance had blown sky high, and all because of a girl whose initials were R. H. Inasmuch as Rita was then co-starring with Aldo in Miss Sadie Thompson, the busier brains in town jumped to conclusions. The studio also jumped, and the next day the columnist added, "And I don't mean Rita Hayworth." People remembered that Aldo had hung around the set of Affair In Trinidad, Rita's first picture after she left Aly Khan, and that he had said he would like to make a picture with her. He was a novice at the time and people thought him presumptuous to make such a statement. It turned out however, with Miss Sadie Thompson, that Aldo got his wish, and during the picture's filming he and Rita naturally lunched together. The rumor boiled, the studio dampened it with denials, and although it simmered down to the opinion that the name-linking was all a publicity stunt, Hollywood still kept its tongue in its cheek.

DALE Robertson was even angrier than Aldo. No one knows where it started, but the talk around town was that Dale and Rita had found each other. It was printed that they attended a private party together, and inasmuch as Dale at the time was reconciling with his wife following their separation, he blew his stack. He told Hedda Hopper that he wished the columnists would leave him alone, and he denied that he had ever met Rita. The best Hollywood could do was take his word for it.

This leaves Manuel Rojas and Dick Haymes, concerning whom there are no denials. Last spring when Rita and Dick were both in New York, they were seen together everywhere and returned within one week of each other to Hollywood, where they resumed their alliance. Haymes is still married to Nora Eddington Flynn, but reportedly they have once more agreed to disagree. It is rumored that Nora is seeing Nicky Hilton, Liz Taylor's ex, and the romantic flings of each don't seem to annoy the other. It may be a situation where they temporarily are going their separate ways, during which time they will decide if it is wise, or at least inevitable, to suffer through a formal divorce.

Rita and Dick have been seen at Holiday House and Fracati's, both famous restaurants, and also at Santa Ynez Inn, a pleasant place situated near the Pacific where one may wine, dine, swim or spend a weekend. It is one of Rita's favorite haunts, and one which has romantic memories for her. About five years ago, somewhere between the divorce from Orson Welles and her marriage to Aly Khan, Rita's romance was an Australian actor, and they spent a few idyllic days together at the inn. He had a room in one wing and she a suite in the other, and each morning they met for breakfast and spun out long, lazy days together. It was a quiet sojourn that went almost unnoticed, and those who do know about it say that it ended with a broken heart for the Australian. Evidently he was given to understand quite suddenly that it was all over, and was so disturbed that he left the inn immediately, without his luggage, for the nearest airport. It was only through neat detective work that his plane and destination were learned, and his luggage delivered to him before the takeoff. This was an experience typical of Rita's almost mythical affect on men, and of her sudden changes of heart.

Manuel Rojas reportedly is slated for the same fate. Rojas, to the best of anyone's information, is 26 years old and comes from a highly placed and well-moneyed Chilean family. He came to California last summer, playing polo with an Argentinian team part of the time, and also dabbling in work for the Chilean embassy. According to rumor, the rest of his time was taken up in the pursuit of lovely ladies. Rocky Cooper was among the first, and town talk had it that this was building into a big romance when Manuel met Rita at the Cooper house and suddenly switched allegiance. Not long after he found himself out in the cold when Rita took off to Europe once more to try for a reconciliation with Aly Khan. Rojas became engaged to an American oil heiress, which lasted only until Rita returned to America, and Manuel was her escort at the party she gave the night before leaving for Reno to pick up her divorce. The oil heiress sent back her ring to Rojas, who was still so much in Rita's favor that he met her when she returned in March from publicizing Salome in New York. As this is being written Rita is seen almost exclusively with Dick Haymes, and Hollywood expects that Rojas will soon get his walking papers. It is said that Rita feels he is a social climber, yet on the other hand it is understood that his family in Chile is highly displeased by his wanderings with women. It is strange that such a highly educated young man should be considered to be social climbing in Hollywood, yet Hollywood has a ladder all its own.

It may be that Manuel will get no notice, as happened in the case of Victor Mature. That was back in the days during the war when Mature, in the uniform of the United States Coast Guard, had taken off into the North Atlantic, along with a few thousand other new sailors. He wasn't sure of his destination or of his chances of returning alive, but he was sure that Rita loved him. About this time Rita announced her engagement to Orson Welles, and Mature, in the middle of the big briny, caught the rumor as it spread from ship to ship, then had to wait until he reached land to put in a phone call for confirmation. He wasn't at home to settle the matter, but a pal of his who was appearing in the same show that billed Rita being sawed in half by Orson in his magic act, did the honors for Vic. Mr. Welles was punched squarely in the nose.

Orson was perhaps the most battered of Rita's romances, but to atone for it, he was also one of the probable two great loves of her life. Theirs was a stormy romance and even stormier marriage. For a long time Welles had made a point of seeing every Hayworth movie; he thought her face was the most beautiful he had ever seen. When she joined his magic act Rita fell madly in love with him, and the story goes that she felt life wasn't worth living unless he married her. They were married in September, 1943, four months after Rita's divorce from her first husband, Edward Judson, had become final. She and Welles squabbled continuously, making all kinds of headlines including funny ones, such as the time when Rita had refused to see Orson and he retaliated by waddling up a ladder to her apartment window. There was a definite split and then a reconciliation during which they went to Mexico to "start over again." They honestly tried to make a go of it, but Rita finally surrendered to the inevitable and made her only statement to date regarding a divorce—"I can't stay married to a genius."

During the four years of their marriage, Welles wrought one great change in Rita. She became accustomed to an intelligent man, and found such to her liking. This was undoubtedly responsible for the attraction felt by her for Aly Khan, and the reason that between Welles and Aly, she did not choose to go back to any of her previous suitors. There had been a fling with Tony Martin soon after her divorce from Judson and when following her divorce from Welles someone mentioned Martin, Rita is reported to have said that she was no longer interested. She had become more selective, and inasmuch as there isn't an Orson Welles to be met every day in the week, Rita went through a period of depression in general, and was depressed about men in particular.

The man who lifted her out of these doldrums was a publicity-shy producer, who squired her around Hollywood and Palm Springs, but the healing of her heart didn't last long. The affair broke up after a few short months, this time leaving Rita disillusioned and really ill. She took off on her first trip to Europe, and in Paris went into a hospital for surgery. Her producer is said to have telephoned her often and to have worried enough to contact leading French doctors with admonitions to take good care of Miss Hayworth, but Rita, tired and dispirited, told herself that this was just one more romance that was finished, kaput.

Rita chose the south of France to recuperate and it was here she met Aly Khan. There are some who say Rita has never given herself time enough to get over her respective romances, but this case was not one of rebound. Aly Khan was Rita's second great love, and it is unfortunate that while he filled the bill concerning charm and intelligence, he did not fulfill the standards set by an American girl for a husband. The commotion of their courtship and the violence of their marriage made headlines the world over. They were married in Vallauris, France, in the spring of 1949, and just two years later Rita walked out on him, bringing her children back to the United States. Columbia Studio had Affair In Trinidad waiting for her, and Hollywood had a batch of bachelors doing the same thing.

Peter Lawford has always had a nose for publicity, and few of his ladyloves have escaped the glare of the spotlight when he escorted them to a shindig. In the instance of Rita Hayworth, however, Pete went about it in comparative quiet. It is said that he was the first man Rita phoned on her return to Hollywood, and he continued to date her in an interwoven fashion between all the others who followed. When Rita first returned to town she lived in a bungalow at the Beverly Hills Hotel, and although she insisted she was interested only in her career and her children, her dates included, in addition to Lawford, Cy Howard, Jackson Leightner, Benny Holtzman and Charles Feldman. Feldman is a well known, well-heeled agent around town who has known Rita for many years. During their marriage, she and Orson used to spend many evenings in the company of Feldman and his wife, but at the time Rita returned from Europe Mr. and Mrs. Feldman were separated. As her agent, he necessarily spent a good deal of time with Rita, but nevertheless it was rumored to be pleasure as well as business.

IN THE spring of 1952 Rita moved from the hotel to a home in Beverly Hills, a house that saw a lot of Feldman and also of Gilbert Roland. Roland also had known Rita for a long time and their friendship is easily resumed at any time. She invited him to dinner several nights and eventually it was rumored they were engaged, a supposition which Roland promptly denied. He told a friend, "I'm very fond of Rita. We have mutual backgrounds, both being Spanish. We love Mexico and the bull fights and all that, and I am a staunch admirer, but we have never discussed marriage." It was Roland who defended Rita when the press attacked her for coming back from Europe with a British accent. In point of fact, he telephoned columnists, "She's an actress—if she wants to have an accent, let her."

By July of that same summer, Rita was dating Kirk Douglas. It was a short whirl, the first two dates promising Hollywood another big romance, but something happened on the third date that precluded a fourth. Rita seemed not to care, and three days before Aly Khan arrived in Hollywood to talk things over, Rita had a date with Richard Greene.

Aly's return put a damper on the merry-go-round. During his visit here in August, the only question was would she or would she not divorce him. She had established residence in Reno the preceding summer and could pick up the papers whenever she wished. The upshot of it, of course, was that Rita went back with Aly to try once more. As the world knows, it didn't work out and one day she abruptly left him in Paris and went to Spain. The minute this news hit Hollywood several hearts thumped a little faster, and one Bob Savage even took off in a plane for Europe to seek out Rita, although nothing ever came of it. In Spain she was met at the airport by Spanish Count José Maria Villa Padierna, and for the next two months was seen all over Madrid with him. Tongues wagged that this was a new romance, and again denials were scattered by both parties. Back in New York in December, Rita was reported waiting to welcome the Count to America, and in the interim dining with producer Ramon Hakim. And Hollywood began to bounce happily once more—Rita was obviously getting back in her old form and could once more be depended upon for headlines—this time at home.

SINCE then she has been living up to expectations, keeping the town guessing about her current dates. Since then she has also been disappointed in her attempt to get a trust fund set up by Aly for their daughter Yasmin. She picked up her divorce in January, and in April the Reno court ruled that Aly must pay an annual sum of $48,000 for Yasmin's support. This has little effect as Aly must be in the state of Nevada in order for the ruling to have any validity. However, it was been alleged that Rita's balding ex-husband has settled $1,000,000 on his daughter. True or not, dearth of money will never be one of Rita's worries as her career has zoomed rather than suffered from her recent screen absences. She has bought a new home in Brentwood and settled her two daughters there while she continues to pursue her career.

At this writing Rita has left for Honolulu, where the finish of Miss Sadie Thompson will be filmed. Her leading man in the picture is Aldo Ray, a young man of the earthy type sometimes preferred by Rita, but people are wondering, if reports are true that this coupling is merely a publicity gimmick, who will be Rita's romance during the island sojourn. From Here To Eternity is also being filmed in Hawaii, and gossips have run their fingers down the list of men in the cast of this movie. They shake their heads at Burt Lancaster and again at Montgomery Clift, but they stop when they come to the name of José Ferrer. There, they say, is a likely prospect. A brain, and charm, and Cuban to boot, and they wonder if Rosemary Clooney has thought of the same thing.

Sirens may come and sirens may go, but they have to go far to outdo Rita, who at 35, and 18 years after her first film still can turn on the type of glamor that enchants man. She proves that it takes more than beauty to be a real charmer, for there are many in Hollywood who are perhaps as beautiful, but can't hold a candle to Hayworth. They can talk all they want to about other beauties, but a lot of them spend a lot of lonely evenings at home. Not Miss Hayworth, unless of course she wants to, and that, Hollywood says in high good humor, would be a very rare evening indeed.

(Continued from page 37) and walked through the living room, an enormous rectangle 30 feet wide and 50 feet long, to answer the knocking on the front door. Lanza pulled the door back and there standing in front of him, his face ashen white, was Bob Kopp, Mario's lawyer. "I guess you've read the papers," he said.

In that one moment Mario realized that what his mother-in-law had told him was true. Unbeknown to him, the studio had released the news that it no longer wanted his services.

Mario's first reaction was one of impotent rage. He raved and ranted. For a week he had given a lengthy legal disposition to Loeb & Loeb, the MGM lawyers. For a month his own lawyers and his own agent, MCA, had been negotiating in great friendliness with the studio. Mario, in fact, had previously signed a letter which said in part, "I shall report at the time specified and I shall perform all duties required of me. . . ."

In writing he had given his word that the studio would have no more difficulty with him. All he wanted to do was to complete The Student Prince. After all hadn't he spoken to Eddie Mannix, the studio's general manager? Hadn't Mannix taken his hand, clasped it firmly and said, "Let's let bygones be bygones?"

If the studio hadn't wanted him for the part, why all these involved, prolonged negotiations? Mario couldn't understand it. He still can't. If you have it in your mind to fire an employee, why discuss with him his return to your employment?

MARIO's lawyers insisted upon phoning long distance to Nicholas Schenck, chief of Loew's, Inc., in New York, the corporation which controls MGM.

In essence they told Schenck this: That Mario Lanza had stated in writing his willingness to complete The Student Prince under any conditions at any time.

Schenck said that Dore Schary was running the studio from Hollywood, that he could not intervene, that he could not disrupt his organization by countermanding an order, that if Schary wanted to fire Lanza he probably had just and sufficient cause, and that was all there was to it. Lanza hadn't been an angel. He had cost the studio thousands of dollars. He had been edgy and temperamental. He had loused up work schedules. He had antagonized fellow employees. True, he had earned some $20,000,000 to $30,000,000 for Loew's, but Schary was in charge of production, and if he wanted to make The Student Prince with Vic Damone and Jane Powell instead of with Mario Lanza and Ann Blyth, if he wanted to get Lanza out of his hair once and for all, he, Nick Schenck, would have to go along with him.

By last August MGM was pretty well fed up with the Lanza antics. Mario had carried on in the most astounding manner. To astound Hollywood a star really has to be unique, because over the years, its population has numbered some pretty wacky characters—but never in the history of motion pictures has there been anyone to equal Lanza.

For example, he once hobbled into Dore Schary's office, broke a cane over Schary's desk, and threatened to throw the executive out of the window. Schary, who is the kindest, most thoughtful and the most reasonable of all the executives in Hollywood thought for a minute that Mario was joking. But Mario wasn't. He was deadly earnest. He had been bawled out because of his personal habits on the sound stage and he was furious. In language unrivaled since the dawn of time, hollywood mothers:

mrs. patia power

■ How much adjustment does it take to be the mother of a movie star?

Tyrone Power's mother can give you her answer: She advises without interfering and never barges into his privacy unexpectedly. Consequently, she's always welcome. She's unruffled by gossip and knows that, "If it's anything important he'll tell me about it."

Experience has taught her to be eternally prepared for the unexpected. "When Tyrone was a boy," says Patia, "I could always be sure of finding him where I didn't expect him to be."

Typical was her experience of being ushered to a seat in a movie theater one night by Tyrone when she had been sure he was at home in bed. Without a flicker of recognition he seated her and, with a Sir Walter Raleigh flourish, said, "I trust these seats will be satisfactory, madam."

"Polite boy," remarked the woman with her.

"Yes, very," Patia replied, biting her lip.

Patia is as quick to criticize as she is to applaud Tyrone's performance in a picture or play for she herself was an actress and Tyrone's first teacher. But she doesn't pry into his private life without invitation.

Tyrone, on his part, showers his mother with gifts and attention. No matter where he is . . . and he is an inveterate globe trotter . . . he always remembers dates that are important to her like birthdays, Easter and family anniversaries. He's generous with telephone calls and cables. When he remonstrated with her recently about being overactive and independent for a woman of her years, she merely smiled at him. When she chides him about something he smiles at her. They face the fact that neither of them is going to be completely pleased all the time.

That's their way of life. A good one for those who know how to use it.

GUS the GREAT

by Thomas W.
Duncan

A Book-of-the-Month Club Selection

Ambitious, amiable, possessed of great personal magnetism, Gus Burgoyne lived in a world of thick steaks, expensive cigars and luscious women. He was a man who loved the gaudy excitement of the circus, and whose dream was to own the greatest show on earth. But he was more than this. He was a man who loved the women in his life with a love so rich and robust that it touched on madness. Love was a ceaseless hunger in him that led him on to wild and foolish dreams and deeds . . . to such shame and glory that few men know.

You'll really enjoy this story of his troubles with women . . . of his victories and failures and of his thrilling experiences as a circus man. It's a whale of a novel . . . Don't miss it!

Mario proceeded to tell Schary off at which point the vice president in charge of production came to the conclusion that Lanza wasn't a very rational man. He came to other unprintable conclusions, too. But Schary maintained his dignity.

Lanza did a great deal of boxing when he was a very young man, and potentially in a fight, he is extremely dangerous. One good right by Lanza and anybody can go to sleep for a long time.

MARIO's greatness lies in the freedom of his spirit and the freedom of his actions. At Metro, he used to amaze people by singing out the window, by shouting across the sound stage, by carrying on in a lusty, humorous, sometime boisterous fashion. Mario has an actor's sense of humor which many people don't understand. For example, at the studio he would be walking along one of the corridors of the Thalberg Building. He would run into his producer, Joe Pasternak. Suddenly, the smile on Lanza's face would disappear, and he would clench his teeth in simulated anger. He would grab Joe by the collar and say: "I'm going to kill you, you dirty rat. You hear that? Kill you. Murder you. Because you're a spy, a no good, dirty rotten filthy spy for the Hungarian White Sox."

After a while Pasternak got accustomed to these exhibitions and realized they were jokes, but in the beginning of his relationship with Mario he thought the tenor was serious.

Another time, after he had quarreled with the studio, Mario went to talk with Nick Schenck, the Loew's executive who likes to be called "General."

"You can tell those guys at Metro," Lanza raged, putting on his act, "that I'm a tiger. Do you hear me, General? I'm a tiger and I'll rip 'em all to pieces."

Mr. Schenck quietly told "the Tiger" to sit down and talk things over.

Executives put up with such things from Mario because his pictures made a tremendous amount of money. They gave him such directors as Al Hall and Norman Taurog, such scripts as Toast Of New Orleans and Because You're Mine, and the pictures always made millions.

Despite all the trouble, Mr. Lanza and the studio made up their differences and might have gone immediately into production—except, according to insiders, for the star's desire to have the last word. Right or wrong, it is reported that just as Lanza was to report for work, he was told the name of the man who was to direct The Student Prince. It serves no purpose to mention the director's name, except to say that he has directed many great hits. That he has never directed a top-notch musical is another fact. This, Mario is said to have objected to, declaring, according to informants, that he would work for any director except this one man. To Mario this was a reasonable stand; to the studio it was an indication that even before work started the actor was already beginning to be difficult. Who is to say who was right?

As one executive put it, "These are not times in which we can afford to gamble a second time. After all, we here in the studio are but representatives of the public. We have an obligation to thousands of stockholders. Perhaps Mario Lanza would be satisfied with another director. Perhaps not. It seems to us that if he were sincere, he would not object to placing this picture in the hands of the one man the best brains of the studio have concluded is the man for the job. To put it bluntly, we feel that he should act and sing and leave executive decisions to executives. He cannot seem to realize that we are as anxious to have a hit picture as he is—more anxious perhaps if that is possible."

So, at last reporting, the matter stood deadlocked. The studio issued another statement saying that this time Mario Lanza was fired for good. Lanza is said to have taken the news with much more calm than anticipated. He was so calm that some people suspected he was secretly delighted despite a lawsuit hanging over his head.

"Just think," he exulted, "I am a free agent at last. I can make independent pictures. I can go out on concert tours, work on television, have my own radio show again."

This perhaps is so, but there are many in Hollywood who insist that Mario is whistling in the dark—that so-called Big Money is going to be very careful about investing in so temperamental a man. They say that it is more than probable that Mario will repeat, in some way or other, his past performances—that there is no way of curing his acute distrust of people and the neurotic belief he has that he has been robbed, tricked, abused, and deceived beyond all endurance.

Mario, meantime, is singing a milder tune. "Long ago," he says, "I came to the conclusion that I could bring a little joy into the world by singing. That's my position in life, and I'm happiest when I'm singing, especially when I'm free."

"I'm sorry that my departure from Metro wasn't an amicable one, but I tried; I honestly did. I was willing to complete the picture anywhere, anytime, under any director assigned to me. The studio might have told me that they didn't want me under any circumstances, that they'd had enough. It would have saved an awful lot of time and money."

"Anyway, that's all done with. We've got to look ahead. I've got my freedom. What am I going to do with it? My voice is better than it's ever been. I'm in great physical and mental shape. I've had several offers to go with other studios or to enter independent film production. My agent is considering them."

"There's also radio. I want very much to get my radio show going again. The Coca-Cola people who sponsored my program, that was before the studio refused to let me broadcast, have always been wonderful to me. They're people of stature and understanding, and I'd like to work for them."

"Also on tap is the possibility of going to London and singing during Coronation Week. That's some time in June."

Ever since he and Metro parted, Mario has had more time to spend with his children and to enjoy them. He reads to his daughters, takes them on long drives, spins incredible stories punctuated by operatic arias.

With Damon, however, six months old in June and his only son, Mario is strangely quiet. He wheels the little guy around in his carriage, hums him to sleep, and then sits down beside the perambulator, watching the boy, hoping somehow to protect him from the "slings and arrows of outrageous fortune," but knowing in his heart that he cannot.

"One of the sad things about growing up," Mario says, "is that once in a while people hurt you."

How true that is. All that is left now for Mario to understand is that if he has been hurt he has also hurt others—and for the sake of those who have known and loved him there must come an end to all this. Otherwise, regardless of who has been right or wrong, there will be triumph for no one—only tragedy. He must also understand that this can end only where it began—in the amazing, sometimes delightful and almost always deep and disturbed, mind and heart of Mario Lanza himself.

■ Quote: I am a motion picture actress. I love going to stage plays, but my fascination with the footlights is only as an out-front member of the audience. I've had offers to go on Broadway but I have turned them down. I'm content with Hollywood, which has given me a wonderful life. . . . Should mothers be afraid to send their daughters to Hollywood? I don't think that it's what's so wrong with Hollywood that causes girls to wind up with something so wrong with them. It may be what's wrong with the girls in the first place. . . . Why am I usually carefully dressed? It's because people pay money to see an actress because they like her. I want to look equally well in person for these same people. If they like me well-dressed on the screen, I don't think I should short-change my friends by looking careless in private life. Besides, I don't go for slacks and hair blowing in the breeze. I'm not the type. . . . Are there no homebodies in Hollywood? There are a lot of us. For instance, my husband and I once tried to tear ourselves away from home for "a change." We went to Palm Springs, which is a beautiful place, but it wasn't beautiful enough for us. I was restless when the sun went down. I wanted to be in my own home. Everyone to everyone's own tastes, but I can't see myself spending two or three nights a week in a night club. If I did, I'd figure that there was something seriously wrong with me that I didn't want to stay home, instead. . . . How do I stay slim? Just born that way, I guess. I have a weight problem. Not to lose weight, but maintain it. I eat about six times a day—little snack meals consisting of milk and sandwiches or milk and fresh fruit, with a big dinner in the evening. . . . How can people be happier? Well, I'm not the world's greatest authority, but if you are discontented, try to develop a love for your work. Say to yourself every day, "No matter what happens I'm going to enjoy what I do today." The first thing you know, you actually will start to enjoy each day, and should be a lot happier for it! End quote.

An intimate report on the private lives of top television personalities

by Paul Denis

EDDIE FISHER'S PALS: When Eddie Fisher was about to come out of the U.S. Army, the Paramount Theater, New York, booked him—to open the morning he became a civilian. Eddie told the theater, "I've got a friend, Joey Forman. He's a comedian and I want him on the bill with me." The theater, amazed, answered, "We've never heard of Forman, and, besides we've got all the star comedians we want." But Eddie insisted "If you don't take Forman you can't have me." P.S.—Forman, 23, and an unknown, got a feature spot on the bill. . . . Behind this story is a tale of true friendship. When Eddie was a Philadelphia high school student he and Forman and Bernie Rich (an actor) promised each other they would try their luck in New York together—and that, whoever became successful first, would help the other two. Eddie, the oldest, made it, and now that he's got Forman started, he's opening doors for Rich.

JOHN DALY, LOVEY: John Daly hates to admit it, but his wife calls him Lovey. It's an old Southern expression she picked up when she went to school in Virginia. Daly retaliates by calling her The Duchess, in private. When others are around, he calls her Maw or Kit, although her name, actually, is Margaret. . . . Daly, incidentally, is looking forward to his next meeting with Basil Rathbone, having just discovered that Rathbone was also born in Johannesburg, South Africa. Although they're friends, they never realized that the other came from the same home town.

GODFREY'S FAVORITE THOUGHTS: Arthur Godfrey has clamped down on interviews, claiming he's too busy and too worried about his leg operation. But the many mottoes and inspirational sayings hanging on the walls of his office do much to reveal his thinking:

"Even if you are on the right track, you will get run over if you just sit there."

"The fellow who waits for something to turn up may find that his toes do first."

"We haven't got so far to go as we had, regardless of what we are doing."

"The great thing is to get your work done, and see and hear and learn and understand."—Ernest Hemingway.

"If you don't like it, get out. But while you're there, defend it."

"Individual freedom alone can make a man voluntarily surrender himself completely to the service of society. If it is wrested from him, he becomes an automaton and society is ruined. No society can possibly be built on a denial of individual freedom. It is contrary to the very nature of man, and just as a man will not grow horns or a tail, so he will never exist as a man if he has no mind of his own. In reality, even those who do not believe in the liberty of the individual believe in their own."—Mahatma Ghandi.

THE HAL BLOCK FIRING: The replacement, by Steve Allen, of Hal "Dimples" Block on "What's My Line?" caused a rumpus because Hal had become enormously popular. His fan clubs howled, as a hush settled over the mystery firing. Now here's the true story: Block had become too prankish and had developed the habit of leaping up to kiss pretty girl contestants. He also talked out of turn, and drowned the lines of Arlene Francis, Dorothy Kilgallen and Bennett Cerf. The program's producers warned him to correct his ways, but Hal, a wealthy former gagwriter, kept forgetting.

Hal didn't need the salary he got on that show, but his ego was immensely gratified. The show was Hal's first contact with fame—and he loved it like a true ham.

JERRY AND DEAN'S PRANK: Sponsors have been complaining of the high TV costs, much of it due to poorly organized rehearsals. Yet the zany Martin and Lewis recently saw a prop bed on a TV set and climbed in, to catch up on missing sleep. The director didn't have the nerve to wake them up. Result: lost time and money.

ARLENE FRANCIS INHIBITED: Arlene Francis starred on a recent Hollywood Screen Test, and in one scene, she had to throw a pie into the face of an actor. She refused, and confessed to director Alton Alexander that she simply didn't have the nerve to do such a thing. Alexander solved the problem by having the actor trip and fall on the pie as she held it. . . . Arlene, incidentally, has bought a $73,000 New York town house and is giving up her Park Ave. apartment.

FRED ALLEN STOPPED: The acidulous Fred Allen was stopped on the street by a gushing lady, who grabbed him by the arms and gurgled: "You're Fred Allen! Oh yes, you are! Just think! Little ole me, a nobody from a small town, talking to the famous Fred Allen! Isn't that just wonderful? Doesn't that prove we're living in a great democracy?" Fred said, dryly: "Not until I answer yes." . . . Incidentally, Fred is feeling much better and will probably have a half-hour comedy quiz on TV this fall.

A MATTER OF DIGNITY: Dagmar posed for a picture, at a Runyon Fund show, with Walter Winchell and Christine Jorgenson. Miss (or is it Mister?) Jorgenson later called over the photographer (Seymour Zee of the Journal American) and said she didn't want to be in the same photo with Dagmar, because, "it's not dignified." The photographer promised to destroy the photo—but it ran in the paper the next day anyway. Weeks later, Miss-Mr. Jorgensen saw the same photographer at another affair and refused to pose for him. . . . How Dagmar feels about this, we don't know yet.

LUCILLE TONES DOWN: Lucille Ball has tinted her flashy red hair to golden red. You won't notice the difference on TV, but Lucille did it for her children. "I didn't want my children to think of me as 'brassy' when they grow old enough to notice," she says. . . . Jinx Falkenburg, who has two children, has taken an opposite course: she's just dyed her dark hair blonde. Flashy blonde, too!

ARTHUR MURRAY DOESN'T DANCE: Kathryn Murray, who's become quite a TV star, enjoys dancing with the instructors at the Arthur Murray Dance Studios. But she doesn't dance with her own famous husband. And the reason is that Murray has the same trouble most husbands have: he can't dance with his own wife.

BOB'S SMOKING EARS: On his "My Hero" show, Bob Cummings gets laughs when he kisses his beautiful office secretary (Julie Bishop) and smoke comes funneling out of his ears. Fans are always asking Bob how he does it, and he explains, "It's simple. Just kiss Julie Bishop. It happens to everybody!"

JACK WEBB AND THE COPS: Jack Webb who flew to New York to meet the press, tells how pleasant it is to be greeted by policemen everywhere and recognized as TV's famous Sgt. Friday. "But in Los Angeles, my home town," he says, "when a cop gave me a ticket, he stopped and exclaimed, 'Why, you're Sgt. Friday!' and then somehow it was too late to tear up the ticket." Oddly enough, Jack is not an honorary member of the Los Angeles police force he glorifies on TV.

ODDS AND ENDS: Peggy Lee is thrilled the way her daughter Nikki, 9, has accepted her new daddy, Brad Dexter. Right after the wedding ceremony Nikki whispered to her mother, "Mommy, make this one do, please." Virgilia Peterson, the erudite moderator of Author Meets the Critics, lives in a plush New York apartment that has everything. Well, almost everything. It doesn't have a TV set. She says she doesn't feel a TV set is worth buying! . . . Tallulah Bankhead slipped quietly into Doctor's Hospital, New York, to have her face lifted. She wants to look nice for her $25,000-a-week cafe debut in Las Vegas. . . . Peter Donald is knee-deep in legal maneuvers, following separation from his wife, Jo, former radio actress. . . . Former kid movie actor Freddie Bartholomew has split with his wife after six years of married life. It's the first marriage for Freddie, now a New York TV director, and the fourth for Mrs. Bartholomew, a publicist. . . . Don Hastings, who's the Ranger on Capt. Video, is 1A and may be called into the army this summer. He's been dating Joyce Hahn, of Newark, N. J., but says he won't marry until after he finishes with the Army. Now 19, he plans to try Hollywood after his Army stint. Wants to be a cowboy actor.

DIANA LYNN SHIFTING: Diana Lynn, who's no longer wearing her wedding ring but who refuses to talk divorce, says she intends to split the next two years between New York and Hollywood. She intends to do more TV work, and maybe another play on Broadway. She did quite a bit of dating while in New York, and Bill Dozier, Joan Fontaine's ex, was a favorite.

EAST AND WEST: Sally Forrest, who's now settled in New York to be with her husband, CBS executive Milo Frank, is making TV her career. . . . CBS has been trying to get Jackie Gleason to move his show to Hollywood, thinking the Coast may be a pacifying influence on Jackie's restlessness. But Jackie, who tried Hollywood several years ago and didn't like it, prefers the excitement of the Toots Shor's crowd. He just rented a huge mansion at swanky Sands Point, Long Island, and plans to live it up this summer. . . . Meredith and Rini Willson will again summer in Hollywood, where they own a modern house on the side of a hill.

PAUL WINCHELL BACK: After a six weeks' illness, Paul Winchell is all right and back in New York to await the birth of his second child. . . . Margaret O'Brien joined the Easter Parade in a demure and jilly getup: large white straw bonnet, white blouse, and full blue silk skirt. Margaret is doing more TV and apparently not hurrying back to Hollywood. Momma is constantly with her, and they dine quietly at places like the Stork and the Colony. There doesn't seem any evidence that Margaret's ever had a date without Momma around. . . . Gerald Farley, Belleville, N. J., asks about Davis Bruce (Donny, on the Beulah show). Bruce, former movie actor, seems to be off the show and Stuffie Singer has the role. . . . Send me your queries about your favorites, and I will try to give you the right answers.

Few people know it, but Cyd's original monicker was even more breathtaking. She was born Tula Ellice Finklea, in Amarillo, Texas. The Tula stemmed from an aunt, the Ellice was borrowed from an uncle, and the Finklea is of Welsh derivation. The fact she began life in Texas astounds most people because Cyd's exotic appearance plus her interesting name give the impression that she has floated to these parts on an alabaster slab, cushioned with carpets from Baghdad and fanned by Nubian slaves. Amarillo comes as somewhat of a shock.

As a matter of fact, wherever Cyd goes she is taken for a native. Her bloodline includes not only Welsh, but French, English, Scotch, and a bit of American Indian. When she is in Paris they remark that she looks so French, when in England she is taken for an upper class Limey, in Italy they accept her as another Latin, and although to date Cyd hasn't set foot on an Indian reservation, she knows what to expect in the way of comment on her first visit.

If she looks expensive, it comes naturally. Her father was a jeweler, and one of Cyd's favorite playthings as a child was the scale on which the diamonds were weighed. The scale was allowed but the diamonds were not, and happily enough the hands-off policy where gems were concerned left Cyd with no frustrations. She can take or leave valuable jewels, and is just as content with a costume bauble as she would be with a diamond that would have fractured her father's scale.

HERE is where the illusion of Cyd's aura of splendor begins to fall apart. It takes a while to probe it, for she has a natural reserve that doesn't lend itself to easy conversation concerning herself, but when her personality begins to come out in the wash of an interview it is even more surprising than the bit about Amarillo. Cyd Charisse, by all counts, should mother little girls and put them in dresses drowning in ruffles. She should sit in a beautifully appointed drawing room and look more like a formal portrait than a human being. But she does not. Cyd has two sons, both of whom are long gone on the happy fact that they are boys, and they do little to quash the evidence. The house is normally quaking with noise and activity, and more often than not Cyd is contributing herself. Nicky, now ten, is teaching her how to blast the seams out of a punching bag, and from all reports she has done the impossible, having garnered grudging respect from her elder son for her athletic ability. Nicky is not old enough to realize or to grasp the unbelievable fact that his graceful mother, who seems always to float through the house, was once one of Amarillo's best-known tomboys.

"It was unavoidable," says Cyd. "I had an older brother." His name was Earnest E., the namesake of his father, and to avoid confusion the family referred to him as "E. E.," which Cyd admits sounds like a captured mouse. E. E. was a year older than his kid sister, and in the absence of a brother he latched on to Cyd and taught her how to kick footballs, scale fences, knock a Texas Leaguer and, most of all, to climb trees. The two kids built a tree house all their own and disappeared into its heights so often and so long that their mother was frantic and their father reread The Theory of Evolution by Darwin.

The art of handling a punching bag requires two attributes—timing and muscles—and Cyd has both. They are two of the reasons why she has enjoyed spectacular success as a dancer. The other is that she loves to dance. Last winter she achieved one of the goals of all ballerinas: she danced in a picture with Fred Astaire. There is little use trying to explode the myth about Mr. Astaire and the thousands of his would-be dancing partners. If there is such a thing as magic feet, Fred has them. Asked about her reaction to dancing with him, Cyd sighed, "Of course I wanted to dance with him! Every dancer wants to. I can't imagine anyone saying no to such an opportunity. The man is fabulous. Nobody can walk like him, no one has his endurance. He can pick up a cane and ad lib a dance that is breathtaking. I don't believe there'll ever be another Fred Astaire!"

The tribute came from her two days after she had finished work with him in The Bandwagon, a time that gave an acid test to reactions, for it is well known that Mr. Astaire is a perfectionist and works so hard that others working with him automatically strive for the same results. Other dancers have been known to retire with curled toes and refuse to take a step for months afterward, but Cyd came out of it still filled with awe and respect.

For part of her reading Marilyn Monroe picked "The Prophet" by Kahlil Gibran. She was so much under its spell she didn't like my kidding question: "Do you think it will make a picture?"

I asked her why she wanted me to read "The Prophet." She said, "It is very inspiring. It is more or less a pattern for everyday living."

*Robert F. Slatzer,
The N.Y. Journal-American*

Her dancing career was begun, unwittingly, by a doctor who recommended lessons as exercise. As a child Cyd was too thin, and Amarillo's rugged winters kept its children indoors for a good part of the year. So she began to study with a local teacher who had been a pupil of the famous Theodore Kosloff. She was eight years old then, and by the time she was 13 her parents decided to send her to live with friends in California where she could further her studies. It ended for Cyd the life she had always known, the summer vacations in New Mexico or Colorado, the pillow fights and daydreaming hours with her brother, the close association she had enjoyed with her father. But it was what she wanted, for she was happiest when she was dancing and her parents, particularly her father, loved dancing.

For two years she studied in California, attending the school of Nico Charisse, and when she was 15 she auditioned for Colonel de Basil of the Ballet Russe. Her father was immediately telephoned back in Texas and asked that his daughter be permitted to join the troupe. Mr. and Mrs. Finklea were not the kind of parents to stand in the way of a talented child, and despite Cyd's youth they let her go. Her father worried about it considerably but her mother was so calm that to this day Cyd laughs about it. "She seemed so trusting that everything would be all right—didn't so much as turn a hair. Maybe it's because I was tall for my age and had always seemed older, but at any rate if she was worried I never knew it. But her grandchildren—they're different! The boys can't stumble over a doorstep that Mother doesn't have hysterics."

For a year she toured the United States with the ballet, during which time her father saw her debut as a soloist. It was providential that he did—he was so proud of her—for it was not much later, at a time when Cyd was en route to Europe with the troupe, that Mr. Finklea died. Cyd returned to be with the family for a while, then re-signed and went to Europe. There was no time to be a tourist; it was a matter of work and more work, and it went on until she was 16. At that time a vacation was announced for the company and Nico Charisse went to Europe to see her. Not many weeks later, in 1941, he and Cyd were married.

This time Cyd's mother was considerably roused—"A little upset," says Cyd and smiles softly. "She wrote that she thought it best if I came home."

The newlyweds returned to California at the outbreak of the war and their son Nicky was born in 1942. Soon after his birth Cyd was introduced to Gregory Ratoff, and the meeting resulted in her dance specialty in the director's picture, Something To Shout About. There was another brief bit of dancing in Mission To Moscow and then in 1945 she waltzed into a solid Hollywood career with her portrayal of the ballerina in Ziegfeld Follies. In that picture she was introduced in her role by Fred Astaire, and although Cyd was already an established star of the dance world, she was only 20 and at the beginning of her movie career, and it is doubtful if she even dreamed then that one day she would star opposite Astaire.

SHE was featured but not starred in four films the following year, and the year after that, 1947, saw her divorce from Nico Charisse, who just recently has remarried. Following the divorce Cyd lived quietly with her mother and son, and her career followed the same quiet level. MGM put her in two more pictures, neither of them giving her much opportunity to display herself as anything but a dancer. This suited Cyd because dancing was closest to her heart, but it did little to further her career, as audiences saw her purely as a terpsichorean and had no opportunity to catch her personality.

In 1948 her luck and her life began to change. At a party given by her agent Nat Goldstone she met Tony Martin, another of Goldstone's clients. Accustomed to meeting tall, dark and handsome men who were also celebrities, Cyd was not particularly impressed and later refused his first invitation to dinner. When she finally did go out with him he took her to a Hollywood nightclub and proceeded to table hop all during the evening. She was even less impressed until she reminded herself, in all fairness, that Tony was only just released from the Army and so deliriously happy to be home again that he couldn't resist saying hello to all his friends.

They were married in May of that year, and if Cyd had been bewildered by Tony Martin as a table-hopping date, she was even more nonplussed by the discovery that she had a country-hopping husband. In his profession as a singer Tony is constantly traveling to theaters in New York, and nightclubs in Miami, and their marriage, the first year in particular, was a series of forced separations. It has got to the point where Cyd is happiest when Tony is busy at a studio from 8 A.M. until 6 P.M., for although he may not be at home, he is at least in the same city. This is assuming, of course, that Tony makes the picture in Hollywood. His last film, Easy To Love with Esther Williams, took him off to Florida for two months, and Cyd worked overtime to finish her role in The Bandwagon so that she could go with him. Cyd herself is sometimes guilty, such as the month spent in Mexico for the filming of Sombrero. Tony went with her for that one, but within a week had to leave for a singing engagement elsewhere. That was about the time that, out of a period of three months, they were together only two weeks. By now the divergent demands of their respective careers have become a family gag, and it is always remarked upon in high glee when they manage to have dinner together.

CONSIDERING the erratic circumstances their marriage has worked out extremely well. And they prove the point that opposites attract, for while Cyd is reserved and not overly fond of crowds, Tony is an extrovert who loves people—all kinds of people. Their friends include youngsters and oldsters, show people and non-professionals. When Cyd is working in a movie she prefers entertaining at home, and their house is seldom without guests, some staying for a sandwich, some for a two-week visit. It is a house that lends itself well to entertaining—big and rambling, with four fireplaces and a swimming pool, and surrounded by stretches of green lawn.

It is a paradise for Cyd, not only because it shelters her family, which now includes Nicky Charisse and three-year-old Tony Martin, Jr., but because she is basically a home-loving person. Despite this she goes along with Perpetual Motion Martin, who cannot sit still for more than two minutes. He may come home dead tired from a series of one-night stands, but after two or three days she notices the symptoms. He sits at the breakfast table sipping his coffee and reading the morning newspaper, but he can't seem to concentrate. He keeps putting the paper down and staring out the windows. Finally he gets to the point. "Honey, let's go somewhere."

And Cyd smiles, "All right. Where?"

"Anywhere!" whoops Tony. "Come on, let's pack!"

As she understands his penchant for activity, so he understands her love of dancing. He is in perfect accord with her career, knowing it makes her happy, and together they have ironed out the wrinkles caused by the combination of their interests.

The Martins love to sleep late and the boys, whose rooms are at another end of the house, cooperate like gentlemen until they hear the first indications that their parents are up and around. Bedlam follows. Tony Jr. pleads for a trip to the playground, Nicky drags Cyd to the punching bag and Tony calls up Leo Durocher to come over for lunch. There follows an hour of discussion, naturally about baseball, and Cyd sits in the midst of the males, doing her darndest to keep up with the finer points of the game. Her tomboy childhood helps her share Tony's enthusiasm for all sports, but while she seemingly thrives in the world of men, she has a secret yearning for a daughter. "I like children and want more, but I'd have another immediately if I could be sure it would be a girl."

It comes out, after all, that while Cyd might seem content in her rough and ready household, she would like to have just one other female around—a little character she could dress in ruffles. Men are fine up to a point, but a girl needs companionship. Tony, for instance, cannot comprehend Cyd's craze for shoes. She keeps them, dozens of them, in a specially built case, and while he only murmurs at the purchase of a new pair of street shoes, he goes into a snit when she brings home what she likes to call "a crazy pair." Shoes are her Waterloo, and the more distinctive the better. Once, when ankle straps were the new rage, she brought home a pair of strapped sandals and the next morning found them in the garden, well chewed by the French poodle.

Shortly after their rescue, Tony was confronted by an irate wife, a soggy sandal in each hand.

"Well?" said Cyd.

He assumed a puzzled expression. "Well?" he said.

"You might not like them," said Cyd, "but did you have to go to such lengths?"

"I don't know what you're talking about," he said, but when he came home that evening he brought her flowers.

THERE is music in their house every waking hour, running the gamut from popular to classical, and if Tony isn't humming a tune, Cyd is working to the rhythm on her practice bars. Tony Jr. has absolutely no interest in dancing and Nicky's surrender has come only recently, with the advent of ballroom dancing shared by students of his school with the girls of Westlake School. Nevertheless, they both prefer hearing Pop sing to watching Mom dance.

They may not appreciate her talent, but some day they will, for Cyd's lithesome grace and twinkling toes are well on their way to becoming world famous. Her torrid hilltop dance as a Mexican girl in Sombrero is calling for air-conditioning of theaters, and her spectacular dances in The Bandwagon have at last convinced her MGM bosses that Cyd is worthy of a big star buildup. Accordingly, they plan starring her in their production of Kismet and are currently considering her for the lead when they make the screen version of Brigadoon.

Right now Cyd Charisse is known as the 11th dancing partner of Fred Astaire in pictures, but it is within the realm of possibility that some day male dancers will be hankering for a chance to play consort to Cyd Charisse, Queen of the Dance. END marriage, anybody?

(Continued from page 39) again to entertain the GI's she dropped her head on her hand and closed her eyes like she does when she is doing a lot of thinking. I knew just what was going through her head: "Piper is 21 now, here she is off on another trip, when she gets back she'll be busy on another picture, and all this time will be time she won't be able to meet anyone new." So I wasn't surprised when she raised her head and said something that, at first, didn't seem to have anything to do with what we were talking about.

"You know, I've been thinking I'd like you to go see the doctor," she said. "You haven't been looking too good lately."

She can't fool me. Being a modern mother she has learned not to take a direct stand on anything like forbidding me to do this or that. Yet, she would rather I didn't go to Korea this time, and maybe, if I see the doctor, he might say I should stick around. You see, Mother not only wants me to concentrate, she wants me to be where the concentrating can do some good. (P.S. I saw the doctor. He always finds something, but not enough to stop the trip.)

MRS. CHARLOTTE JACOBS (Piper's mother): Piper likes to kid about the family putting pressure on her to get married. It's not so really, of course. I know Piper has to find her own happiness in her own way. Naturally, as a mother, I think about it a lot. But I hardly ever say anything, honestly. Once in a while, maybe, like a mother will, I might forget myself and Piper might get the idea I'm hunting. Nothing serious. Sometimes I just happen to say, "You know what I'd like to do, Piper? I'd like to go to a wedding."

PIPER: It's not as if it were my fault. I mean, it might be my fault but there are other things to consider. Every time I meet someone who, well, might mean something, I'm off on the road again, or else retakes have to be shot and I'm busy on the set all day and rehearsing most of the night. Somehow it always seems to get worse right after I get to know a man whom I'd like to go on knowing. But it stops right there. My friends think it's quite a joke. Every time they see me they ask, "Well, Piper, whom are you leaving now?"

Just lately I met a young man and we've been dating quite a few times. I might as well identify him partially, as an actor, but since we're not going to be able to see each other for a long time, for reasons which I will give below, there is no point to my naming him. He is very handsome, unusually intelligent and I enjoyed myself very much when we were out. He is not only a fine performer but quite literate and a conversation with him is not just a time-passing exercise but a rewarding experience.

I've been spending most of my time these past few weeks with him, but it's all over now . . . for a while anyway. Soon I'll leave for Korea. When I get back he is due to go to Europe for a picture. Just about the time he returns I'll be taking off for South Africa. So nice to have met you!

EDITOR'S NOTE: Of course we can't talk for Piper but we can supply some facts for the benefit of any readers who might be wondering about the identity of the actor mentioned here. Following the premiere of Call Me Madam Piper attended a party at Romanoff's and was introduced to Carlos Thompson the Argentinian importation. Both were members of different groups, neither had a partner, and almost immediately they paired off. They sat and danced together for the rest of the evening. When Piper went to the Academy Awards she was escorted by Carlos. He also took her to the big party at Chasens afterwards. They were seen together again not long afterwards attending an amateur performance of Iolanthe at the Westlake School in Bel-Air, and they topped off that night by dining and dancing at the Macayo in Santa Monica. Carlos, though from Buenos Aires, speaks perfect English. He is sharply handsome, and he is certainly "literate" since he is the author of a book printed in Argentina entitled, "All Is God." And, just to tie things in a little closer, it happens that he is leaving soon for Europe on a picture, and he is reported to have used rich, romantic words in describing Piper. Yes, the man could very well be Carlos. And if it is he will be the first Latin in her life.

PIPER: My sister Sherrye, who is two years older than I, was married at 17. This doesn't make me a lady of very much distinction around the house socially. Sherrye has made her mark as a woman while I'm still aiming.

Until last year Sherrye used to talk to me a lot about boys and how to convert boys generally into the boy specifically which, she implies, is the main business of girlhood. She made a big effort to sort of give me the proper viewpoint about this process. And I think she was satisfied with my progress last year because she told me confidently, "Well, by this time next year you are sure to be married."

Well . . . here we are . . . this year . . . and Piper is still unattached. And Sherrye has nothing more to say to me. She just sits kind of baffled and studies me till I think she is seeing me 20 years from now

. . . a squeaky old maid, dry and withered.

MRS. SHERRYE WADE (Piper's sister): Of course all this talk about worrying over marriage is silly as far as Piper is concerned. She's just 21. The thing is that as a little girl she, like a lot of youngsters, thought she would surely fall in love at 16. A girl of 21 seemed then to her like an elderly adult. And some of this kind of thinking still hangs on to Piper. But as far as that goes she could be married now if she wanted to drop her standards . . . which I'm quite sure she won't. Young girls think of marriage like poets do; it's something to sing about and you can't sing until the music starts. You just have to keep listening for it.

PIPER: Any girl my age gets the "whens" . . . you know, when do I meet him, when will he say the word, when will we wed? (And if he doesn't hurry up I'll be so annoyed he'll have a bitter girl on his hands!)

So I keep thinking of it all right. And when I don't think of it things happen which bring it to mind. I have a cousin Joan, in Detroit, who is only 18. Somehow, in my mind, she is just a baby; in fact I used to baby her and give her advice like Sherrye gave me (I think sometimes I passed it on word for word, with a very wise look in my eyes). Well, Joan has just let the family know . . . she is being married in June!

A smart girl is one who knows how to play tennis, golf, piano—and dumb.

Marilyn Monroe

As if this wasn't enough, consider what happens with my old high school crowd. There were 25 of us who stayed pretty close; anything that happened to one was supposed to be passed on to the other 24. Well, eventually, after high school, marriage began happening, of course. The first one got married, then another, then soon there was a half-dozen who could say, "Call me Mrs." But it didn't stop there. In the past year and a half there has been a grand rush and the score is now 23 married, two single.

Not that it made me frantic or anything; after all I had my career, I was busy, I had little time to get around . . . I kept telling myself. And all the time I had one tiny consolation; I had company, I wasn't the last, the 25th . . . yet. It was the idea of it, the thought of the other 24 girls saying, "Poor Piper! Can you imagine? Still single!" All that sympathy . . . a girl could drown in it.

Two days ago, two days before I wrote this, I dropped into Wil Wright's for some ice cream and ran into a man I knew—the brother-in-law of the other remaining single girl. He came up to me and I saw that he was breaking into a faceful of news that he just had to tell me. "No! Not that!" I said to myself. But it was. She, Karlyn Glasser, the last girl between me and utter (if temporary, I hope!) ignominy, was engaged. She'll be married this summer. This summer . . . when I'll probably be on a train, or a plane, or very likely trying to fall asleep in a tent on the African veldt by counting antelopes or gnus or whatever they use out there for sheep.

"Isn't that great news?" asked Karlyn's brother-in-law.

"Wonderful!" I cried, but I didn't blame him for looking at me in surprise. My voice did sound funny. I tried to tell myself I wasn't upset, and I knew that deep within me I was happy for Karlyn's sake. But what did it make me? When the ice cream came I took three spoonfulls and couldn't taste a thing, so I just left it there.

VIVIAN LEWIS (waitress at Wil Wright's): I remember the night Piper came in. She always finished her ice cream. It was quite a blow to have her leave her dish practically untouched. We thought it was us.

BETTY MITCHELL (Studio publicist): Pooh! Don't let Piper kid you. She's young, beautiful and famous. Also happy.

ROSE DONOHUE (Betty's assistant): Yes, but she wants to be young, beautiful, famous and in love. And she knows only that will bring a real happiness.

PIPER: Of course, there is my father who never talks much and has to be really drawn out on the subject of romance. I wonder how he feels and I am beginning to get a pretty good idea. When I was 16 or 17 and went out with a boy as much as twice he'd be sure to ask, sooner or later, "Say, isn't this getting to be serious?" Nowadays? Well, now I can go out a half dozen or more times with the same boy and he doesn't say a word! He only looks as if he might be quite willing to listen to some announcement.

MR. ALFRED JACOBS (Piper's father): H'm'm.

PIPER: If he has changed, if he is taking another view of things, like it's time I made a move, well . . . I can only point out that mother was 22 before she married him.

MR. JACOBS: H'm'm'm.

MRS. JACOBS: We've been married 26 years and we are very happy. Piper will be too. From what I hear she has gotten a lot of proposals but she says the boys are kidding.

ROCK HUDSON: I proposed to Piper while we were doing retakes on The Golden Blade. I said, "Piper, after this picture is over let's go to Mexico. Of course, we'll have to be married." I guess that wasn't the way to frame a proposal properly. But anyway she said, "Thank you. And now let's get back to work." So we went back to work.

DICK LONG (currently in All American at Universal): Of course Piper and I have discussed marriage . . . theoretically. Since we first worked together in Universal's dramatic school three years ago I guess we've yakked about everything under the sun at one time or another.

You learn a lot about people just yakking . . . especially when you're working with them. Piper's a good sport . . . concentrating on her career . . . (the hours we've spent talking show business) . . . but interested in other things and other people and their problems. Her mother and father are like that, too . . . warm, friendly and comfortable to be with.

A date with Piper is always fun—and sometimes unusual. For instance Christmas 1951. I was in the service then . . . enroute to Korea. Three days after I landed in Japan who should show up but Piper. There to do camp and hospital shows. Was I glad to see her!

PIPER: Everybody kids a girl about marrying. My Aunt Dorothy was visiting us and asked me if I was thinking of marriage. I said, "Sure." She said, "Wonderful! I'd love to be able to attend the ceremonies while I'm still here."

The grips on the set always ask me when I'm going to get married. The cameramen have a whole conspiracy. They keep pretending to be worried about a haunting look creeping into my expression. They say I really must do something about it . . . like going to my own wedding.

Marriage, anybody?

(Continued from page 57) The building into which Jane Wyman walked that night was the famous Hollywood Masquers' Club—and Jane was one of the few women ever to enter its portals. Definitely she was the only lady movie star to be asked into the building. The occasion was as unique as the incident appeared. For that night the Masquers were giving Jane Wyman an honorary dinner, something they have reserved for only the most renowned male actors—and a feast and tribute no Masquer ever thought would be accorded a female.

The Masquers who were there that night will tell you there has never been a happier evening in the club, nor were more enthusiastic speeches ever aimed at a celebrity. Two hundred men sat about the room, the dais was jammed with stars, executives and officers of the club, and in the very center sat Jane, the lone woman. Speakers arose and, as they do at such banquets, told of the qualities of the guest of honor and of the laurels she had won.

There was Vince Barnett, the comedian, who spoke of the early days in Jane's career and told how she had never changed with success. "But he didn't tell," Jane said, "about how he used to feed me when I was hungry." There were the casting men who had given her a helping hand, the actors who had spoken to directors about her when she needed the jobs and the boosts; and the directors themselves who bragged now that they had been lucky to get her. And then Jack Warner, the head of Warner Brothers, who modestly said: "Jane has been working for me for nearly 15 years now—and just for that she ought to be given a banquet."

Then Jane was called upon to speak. She had prepared something in her mind, an outline expressing thanks for the honor of the night. But as she stood up to talk it all went out of her head, and she just looked down at the table cloth, so they wouldn't see the mist in her eyes, and spoke extemporaneously. She started with the man at the foot of the table and she told how good a friend he had been—and then she went the length of the board and all about the room, and she picked familiar faces from the crowd and gave credit for her success to all of them one by one. Afterwards they all drifted about the club house and talked and sang songs together. When the doors closed finally in the small hours of the morning, the caretaker shuffled off to his quarters muttering happily that it had been the grandest Masquers banquet of them all.

Thus, it would seem that in 1953 the star of Jane Wyman has risen to its zenith. That with almost 20 years of screen acting behind her she has reached the promise of her career. She has received just about every recognition Hollywood gives its own, as well as accolades from the public and press of almost every nation. She has an Academy Award. She has been known as the sexiest of the leggy young contract girls—and she lasted to get an Oscar for a believable portrait of a mute drab. She has been married, has had children, has been divorced and married again. And today she stands as proof that in Hollywood anything can happen if a girl has talent and fortitude. And luck.

WHAT is Jane Wyman's life like today? Well, those who have known her since she first came to Hollywood as a blonde young dancer say that the years have been more than kind to her. She has embellished the face and figure that even as a kid stopped traffic on the studio lots. She has all the vigor she started with, and certainly the health. Time has brought her riches, too—and she lives a bit differently than the early days—in a fine home, with the ice box and deep freeze well filled.

With her husband of a few months, Fred Karger, Jane has a household of five—her children, Mike and Maureen, and Fred's 11-year-old daughter Terry. They live a rather simple life, built around the activities of the kids when they're not working. But in the evenings, except for the few occasions when they dine out or go to small parties, Jane and Fred make it a family affair around the TV set or a cornpopper in the fireplace.

"What I really want out of life now," Jane said, pert as a teen-ager impersonating a grown-up, "is the relaxation that is supposed to come after a long stretch at the factory. I want to take it easy between pictures now, and maybe between assignments get a chance to travel to Europe and see the sights of the world I've been too busy to look at before."

Actually, it is a little difficult trying to think of Jane Wyman taking things easy. An average day in her life consists of rising at 6:30 A.M. for an early studio call, keeping the make-up staff in stitches as she gets ready for the day, coming on to the set like Gangbusters and chattering like a Minah bird until lunch, doing a publicity interview from 12:00 to 1:00 and then back on to the set with the same enthusiasm until the 6:00 whistle blows. After that she's ready for a hearty dinner, a party, fun with the kids, or a quiet session with a novel before turning out the light for a few hours' sleep. This routine is not pressed upon her. She demands it.

A few weeks ago Jane threw a party. Most of the people attending were from the movie she was making or they were working on other films. About 11:00 the fearsome early risers began to drift, and at midnight Jane and Fred saw the last of them to the door. Fred looked a bit sleepy, but Jane was wide awake. As she started up for the shut-eye that was to last her until six or so the next morning, she frowned. "I guess they didn't have a very good time," she said. "Nobody wanted to stay."

"Yes, dear," her husband said, not troubling to remind her that other people weren't made of iron.

Maybe Jane Wyman has been saving up for the lusty life she manages to cram into every 24 hours now. For the past five years, ever since she has been divorced from Ronald Reagan, she has been a bachelor girl, with most of the spare time on her hands that the average bachelor girl falls heir to. Although she has been linked with men a few times during that five years, the times between were long and the romances few. She had interests, all right, but none of the purpose a girl can find with a man of her own. Now she is catching up.

FRED Karger, Jane's husband, is a perfect mate for her. He is not at all the Hollywood type of man, not the playboy sort who haunts the parties and dates a different doll every night. Fred comes from a rather well-to-do family, but he has always worked for a living. For a few years he has been the leader of an orchestra that played for most of the society parties given in Los Angeles and Pasadena, and a few Hollywood parties. During the day he is composer, arranger and the supervising musical director of Columbia Studio. As a matter of fact, although they have known each other casually for years, it wasn't until Jane began making Let's Do It Again at Columbia that they first became more than casually attracted to each other.

Music is a kindred interest with Jane and her husband. Fred is a fine pianist and accompanist, and there is nothing that pleases Jane more than to have someone suggest she sing. If you've heard any of the records she has made or seen her with Bing Crosby in their Paramount pictures, you know she's not bad. With music for a starter they began discovering other compatible likes and now they are practically as one on every subject. This is quite a feat with a girl as singularly positive as Jane Wyman Karger.

"I don't know how anybody stands me sometimes," she said. "I get an idea about something and that's it. Maybe sometimes I'm wrong, but while I think I'm right I can't be fooled with. It must be a kind providence that brought Fred and me together. He not only thinks the way I do—I find myself agreeing with him as soon as we begin discussing something."

It is a very difficult thing in Hollywood generally for a movie star to find a husband she can also work with. In the case of an actress and actor being married you'd think it would be a cinch, but it isn't. Directors married to stars seldom get a chance to make movies together. But it looks as though Jane and Fred will be able to overcome this problem. Jane is definitely interested in making musical pictures, as well as records, and Fred can be the musical advisor around the house. Even if a film isn't a musical there is always a score. This makes it possible for them to go abroad if they want to and still not have to give up part of the career of one of them.

Professionally, Jane Wyman has never been in better shape. Not even right after she won the Oscar for Johnny Belinda. She has a couple of unreleased musicals in the can and as this is being written she is getting ready to begin one of the most demanding roles of her career in So Big.

"The thing that bothers me about this picture," Jane said, "is that I have to look 18. Then I go to about 60. That's a big jump."

Well, Warner Brothers aren't too concerned. She can play 18 without make-up, and a bit of old grey hair and a swab or two of pallid make-up, a nest of wrinkles and she's 60. But the studio does feel that So Big is one of its most important films in years, they plan it on a grand scale, so Jane can be sure that next fall when it is released she will have another important dramatic offering to offer the critics and award-givers.

ONE of the early maddening ambitions of Jane Wyman's life was to be a dramatic actress. And it was at Warner Brothers, where she has made her biggest hits in the past few years, that she developed her most awful frustrations. Casting a picture in those days of box-office magic, when, as the saying goes, all a theater manager had to do was open the door and stand out of the way to let the customers charge in, was done according to a casting book. If a producer had to make a picture in which an actress was to lose her baby to a rich husband, all he had to do was get an actress who could cry. If he wanted a comedy, he got an actress who could tell a joke or hit the leading man in the face with a ripe tomato.

Jane Wyman, in the casting books, was a cute little buffoon who could dance. Period. She spent several weary years trying to tell the men in the front office that she could also cry—and would like to get a chance to make an audience cry, too. One day a part came up that Bette Davis was being considered for, but Bette for some reason or other couldn't make the starting gate. Jane, who usually walked around the lot in slacks and sweaters, decided to make an impression as a sad one, and for a week or two she wore what were practically widow's weeds to the studio. Nothing happened. She'd trot about like a saddened woman in search of a tombstone, but no one paid any attention, except to say, "Hi Janie," just as always.

She tried throwing a sombre note into lunch in the commissary, dropping in at-tired as Mother Hubbard, or close to it. Nothing happened. Then one day she saw a producer eyeing her carefully. She put on the sour puss and waited. Sure enough he came over to her table and gave her a closer inspection. Finally he spoke.

"Do you think," he said, "that you could play a burlesque dancer? I've been watching you—and you seem to me to be just the type."

"Out of my way," Jane cried and dashed from the commissary.

The way she got Johnny Belinda is that producer Jerry Wald saw her dressed like a cutie one day and, being a great believer in off-beat casting, decided she was just the type to play a deaf mute.

It is a strange thing that today, after topping all the laurels she needs as a dramatic actress, Jane Wyman likes nothing better than to have her agent call up and say that somebody wants her for a crazy musical.

Time has been kind to Jane Wyman—and the Jane Wyman of today will be the first to tell you that. Along with the progress of her career, her emotional life has been fruitful. While she was married to Ronald Reagan she was very much the housewife and early mother. They were serenely happy together until their different interests broke them up. When the separation did come it was not one of the ugly messes that are so common in Hollywood, but a grown-up facing of a mutual problem. And even after the divorce, when most movie couples are victims of sniping tongues and speculations, Jane managed to keep a dignity in her position of grass widow.

The only other romances of consequence she has ever had were the ones with Greg Bautzer, which she herself will admit was just fun, and the short-lived engagement to Travis Kleefeld. There has never been a nicer young man to invade the stars' domain than Travis, so there was no finger of defamation pointed at her in that matter either. In between, Jane has kept her lady-like character and was still able to keep her reputation as a fun girl and, incidentally, a great wit.

THIS year is a new beginning of the road for Jane Wyman. What has happened to her in her life before this year has been wonderful, but it has not been fulfilling enough to satisfy her. She began 1953 with a rainbow shining across the hill from her bedroom window on New Year's Day, and she vowed, she says, on that morning to start to find all the happiness and good things that are promised folks who find the end of that rainbow. During the early part of the year she fell in love and her home was filled as fully as her heart. She is at an age now where she appreciates the comforts that can come from children, and where she can look long at the trophies of her craft that fill her den and feel a warmth from them.

She wants to build a dream that will come true.

"I guess I haven't knocked around much," she said, "but somehow I feel as though I have and I want the fruits of the hard work I have done to be about me from now on. I've loved my home and my family before, but never as much as now. This is my year to move."

There will be another ceremony at the Masquers Club in Hollywood one of these nights soon. One that Jane is not aware of at the moment. It is called The Spelvin Award. It has been given to very few actors and, again, no actresses. It is named after the legendary actor who has appeared on many playbills but has never existed, George Spelvin. George Spelvin is the name used in the theater when an actor plays two roles—and does not desire to be billed in one of them. It is actually a tribute to a performer of great versatility.

One night soon the long limousine from the Masquers will again pull up before Jane Wyman's home. The six men in the top hats will alight again and escort her to the club. She will once again be the only woman in the place, a girl and 200 men. The usual speeches will be made. And Jane will be called upon again to make an address, to talk to and about the fellows she has known all of her professional life. And then the Spelvin Award will be in her hands. It is a statue of a man in a tall silk hat, a bit battered but still doing a show. That's Jane Wyman, a woman, but the only one in her line of work to get this recognition.

And when she gets home, she'll put it in the breakfront along with the rest of her prizes, and she'll treasure it always. But it won't mean the cap on a career for Jane. No, sir, she's looking ahead. She's just going to get going in 1953.

There was so much honesty in what Joan said and so much distress in her voice that I reached over and patted her hand.

We were sitting in a quiet corner, away from the other guests at a small dinner party at my home. Dinner was over—and I knew Joan wanted to talk to me. And you can bet I wanted to talk to her!

When the others started talking or gathered around the piano to sing, I motioned for Joan to join me away from the group. (I think most of them would have given anything to have heard what we were saying for the Crawford vs. Monroe feud was still the talk of the town.)

Joan and I have been friends for many years now and I feel I understand her very well.

I sincerely believe she would give anything in the world if she had never said those things about Marilyn. But, once the damage was done, you've got to admire her spunk for saying she was not misquoted!

She was in the firing line—but she was standing there taking it—and saying she was sorry! You've got to admire a girl like that.

Joan leaned toward me and said softly, "There's still room in this town for both of us. I feel if I were to meet Marilyn face to face I'd say, 'Hi, there,'—and we'd shake hands."

"The fight seems to be more with her studio (20th) and the press against me rather than the fans although I have had a few letters of criticism.

"One was from a sergeant who is great Marilyn Monroe fan. He enclosed an awful picture of me in a bathing suit with my hair all fizzy. The caption was to the effect that I was skyrocketing like the Fourth of July. The sergeant wrote: 'This is exactly how Miss Monroe dresses today, only you haven't her good points!'"

It was typical of Joan to tell this on herself.

She went on, "I wrote to the sergeant and told him that the blatant picture most certainly was me. But I explained that I had since learned that flaunting your sex in clothes, photographs or in action is not good for an actress."

"Perhaps I subconscious" felt I could help Marilyn because I had worked so hard to overcome the many things wrong with me and I am still grateful to more experienced actresses who gave me advice—and criticism—along the way.”

It was almost time for us to rejoin my guests unless I was going to be a rude hostess and I said so to Joan. She nodded. Then, as we rose, she said quickly:

“Louella, just one more thing. I do want Marilyn to know how bitterly sorry I am that this interview was ever printed. But for this thing to go on and on, as though someone had been murdered, is ridiculous.”

We now lap-dissolve (as they say in movie scripts) back to a conversation I had with Marilyn the day after Joan’s blistering interview hit the press.

She had been crying her eyes out all night. Her voice was so choked up she sounded as though she had a terrible cold.

“I don’t believe Miss Crawford said those things about me,” she whispered. “Everybody’s calling, calling, calling, to see what I have to say. What shall I do?”

“Say ‘No comment’ to everything—and then you can’t get in trouble,” I advised my little blonde friend.

But three weeks later, with letters from the fans pouring in, I called Marilyn again and told her I thought the time had come for her to say something.

The intervening weeks had calmed Marilyn down to a noticeable degree. This time she really had a bad cold and she had been out of the hospital just 24 hours when she dropped by my house in the afternoon.

SHE looked very pretty if still a little ill and her suit was simple and in good taste. I remembered the first time I had met her, just as she was starting her sensational climb, at a party at Joseph Schenck’s home. The dress she wore was cut too low and she looked like a siren—until she opened her mouth.

Then I realized what a shy, ill-at-ease girl she really was, despite all her lush, sexy beauty. Her sudden, dizzying success had given her confidence—but not much.

Marilyn slipped into a chair and tossed her jacket back because the day was warm. After we had chatted a minute about this and that, she got to the point.

“Miss Parsons,” she has never called me Louella—nor does she call many people by their first name, “I don’t want to feud with anyone. All I want is to get to feeling well again and get good pictures at the studio and learn to become a better actress.

“I think the thing that hit me the hardest about Miss Crawford’s story is that it came from her. I’ve always admired her for being such a wonderful mother—for taking four children and giving them a fine home. Who, better than I, knows what it means to homeless little ones.

“Although I don’t know Miss Crawford very well—I met her once at a dinner party, she was a symbol to me of kindness and understanding to those who need help.

“At first, all I could think of was ‘Why should she select me to blast?’ She’s a great star. I’m just starting. And then, when the first hurt began to die down, I told myself she must have spoken to Mr. Thomas impulsively, without thinking.

“In view of many things that have happened since the article appeared, I’m beginning to look on it as a blessing in disguise. If it had never been printed I might never have realized how many friends I have, even ones I’ve never met.

“Lots of GIs wrote me letters saying, ‘We like you the way you are.’ Miss Parsons, that meant a lot to me. It’s one thing that made me decide to go to Korea if I never do another thing in my life. I couldn’t get over the fact that so many kids, who were having it so bad themselves, didn’t want me to have my feelings hurt.

That’s not all. People in our business were so unexpectedly kind. As you know, I don’t know many stars outside of the few I’ve worked with. Think of it, Betty Grable, the biggest star on the 20th lot asked me to lunch with her and she said:

“Marilyn, don’t let this get you down. I’ve taken plenty of criticism and so have other actresses. Just keep plugging. The important things are your career—and trying to improve yourself.”

Marilyn enthused, “I love Betty,” (notice she doesn’t call her “Miss” Grable), “she’s such a good person. Maybe this seems silly, but we were doing a scene for How To Marry A Millionaire and Betty noticed I had no polish on my toes as I had worn in a previous day’s work. She ran and got that polish and put it on herself.

“There were no press agents or newspapermen around so she didn’t do it as a grand gesture.

“And Mr. William Powell is another who went out of his way to be kind to me. He said, ‘You remind me of a girl I loved very much. You don’t look like Jean (Harlow)—but you have the same warmth and inner radiance that made Jean such a lovable person.’ I think that is the sweetest compliment I ever had.

“And you have been so good to me, Miss Parsons,” she said, impulsively. “That’s why I feel I can talk with you and tell you the way I feel because I know you will make it sound right even if I don’t always express myself just right.”

I told Marilyn she “expressed” herself all right because she’s always honest and never tries to fool herself—or others.

She knows she first attracted attention because of her sexy appearance—but she’s trying as hard as she can to improve herself as an actress.

For this reason, the part of Joan’s article which hit her the hardest was the reference to her vulgar walk in Niagara.

She said, “You see, the character I played was a tramp. The role called for me to wear very tight dresses and high heels. The combination of a dress I could scarcely move in and the high heels caused me to ‘wobble’ when I walked.

“With all the publicity I’ve had and everything, I suppose it will be hard for many people to believe that I never deliberately throw my sex around, thinking, ‘If I do this, it’s sexy—or if I look a certain way, it’s sexy.’”

I know what Marilyn meant. At a party, she’s never thinking of how she can slay all the males present. She never flirts, or tries to attract attention, or makes a “play” for the men.

For a girl so over-abundantly endowed with sex appeal, there have been few men in her life.

She had an unfortunate early marriage; she loved Johnny Hyde (the lovable little agent who helped her career so much) without ever being in love with him. For the past two years there has been no other man in her life but Joe DiMaggio.

Compare Marilyn’s “love life” with the records of some of our glamor queens and it’s modest, indeed.

SEX has been the stepping stone to her career—and she’s not knocking it! But the lowcut dresses and the dreamy-eyed photographs have served their purpose, and she’s eager to go forward as a performer and as a person.

“This is why I’m gradually getting over the hurt of Miss Crawford’s interview,” Marilyn said just before leaving. “It’s over and done with and I shan’t think about it anymore.

“I’ll just keep on believing she didn’t really mean all those things she said to Mr. Thomas.”

And she didn’t, Marilyn. Believe me. END

at home abroad

(Continued from page 48) adaptive and speak French fluently—Betsy and Kerry went to the Berlitz School in Los Angeles—they're still as American as Main Street.

Like all innocents abroad they hunger for home; and they're determined to return to Beverly Hills come September of this year.

"I've worked and traveled all over the Continent," Gene says, "France, England, Italy, Spain, Switzerland, all these places have got their strong points, but for day-to-day living, you can't beat the United States, and that goes for life in Pittsburgh as well as Hollywood."

Kerry Kelly, who is her father's image, feels like that, too. "Daddy was doing a picture in Munich," she recalls, "when we first came over here, but I never went to school in Germany. I went to school in Paris. It's called La Petite École. It's sort of a semi-private school. It's very nice, and then I went to school in London when Daddy was working on Invitation To The Dance. And in Switzerland I went to a school where you go to class in the morning and ski in the afternoon and, really, that's the best school of all. But even so, I can't wait to get back to Beverly Hills."

By June, 1953, Gene Kelly will have been away from the U. S. for 17 months. In that time he has completed three films, The Devil Makes Three, Invitation To The Dance, a picture in which there is no dialogue, only ballet, and Crest Of The Wave.

In those 17 months, Kelly has been the target for as vicious a gossip campaign as has ever been directed toward any actor.

First, it was said that he and Betsy had separated and were planning to divorce, and second, it is still being said that his patriotism is open to question because, after a year and a half abroad, he does not have to pay any Federal income tax.

Just for the record: Gene and Betsy Kelly have never been happier, and Gene is as honest, patriotic, and law-abiding as any man living. During the last war he volunteered for duty in the Navy and pulled a good long stretch.

But we'll get to that tax and patriotism question later. First, the matter of his domestic relations.

"I don't know how those rumors start," Gene insists, "and I don't care. They're not true, and I don't even want to honor them with any discussion. Ask Betsy for her opinion. She's got some ideas on the subject."

Betsy says, "It's very funny, no kidding. Friends back in Hollywood send us clippings all the time. Gene and I are breaking up, they say. That's the tenor of most of them. Where these columnists get their information from I don't know. Probably from returning travelers."

"Geographically, it's true that Gene and I have been separated, but that's only because he was working in London, and I was working in Paris or in Italy."

"When we were in London, we were living in Robert Donat's house, and Gene was working very industriously on Invitation. I tried to get a job, any kind of acting job. After all, Kerry was going to school, and I had a lot of spare time. I read for a part, a good role, in something called Letter From Paris. They liked my audition, and said 'Okay, you're in.' Only I couldn't get a labor permit."

"Just about then, Tola Litvak (Anatole Litvak the director) asked me to come to Paris and work with him as dialogue director and general assistant. He was starting to prepare The Girl On The Via Flaminia, and he needed a couple of assistants to teach the cast English. Sidney Chaplin, Charley's son, and I luckily got the jobs.

"I came to Paris. Gene and Kerry and Lois (Lois McLelland is Gene's secretary and a very close family friend) remained behind in London."

"Right there the stories started. Gene and Betsy had each gone their separate ways. It was ridiculous, of course. I flew back to London practically every weekend. Kerry was in school from nine to four every day. It worked out extremely well."

"It so happened that the picture with Litvak took a pretty long time. Tola is a very careful director, you know. Everything has to be just so."

"EVENTUALLY the entire cast and crew went down to Nice. Tola insisted that Sidney and I stay in the same hotel with him. He didn't want us to corrupt the cast. They knew just enough English for the picture, and he didn't want them to get too good. Someone found out about Tola's orders that the dialogue directors stay in the same hotel with him, and the again another rumor started."

"Anatole Litvak was going to make Betsy

Molasses and wheat germ and yogurt don't make ya live longer . . . it just seems longer!

Jimmy Durante

Kelly a big star. He was going to give her the lead in the picture. Lead? I didn't even get a bit. Anyway the gossip mongers had me coupled with Tola. It was laughable, but that's how the rumors got back to the States. Supposedly, I was leaving Gene."

"Anyway, by last Christmas, Gene and I were both free, and we took Kerry to Klosters in Switzerland. She stayed there and went to school for a while, and I went to Nice and finished up my work."

"In March, all of us jumped into our Sunbeam Talbot and toured Spain. In May, Gene went back to London to start work on Crest Of The Wave. So any day now you can expect the divorce rumors to start all over again. Kerry and I plan to go skiing, probably in the south of France, near the Alps. Someone will say, 'Where is your husband?' And I'll tell the truth, that he's working in London. And you'll see the gossip will begin once more. Just a vicious cycle. Honestly, it gets on Gene's nerves, but I don't mind it any more."

"If people knew how hard dancers worked, they'd realize that someone like Gene hasn't got enough strength or inclination to fool around after a hard day's work."

As to the tax setup the Kellys find themselves in, Betsy has a few words on that subject, too, but better to let Gene speak for himself.

First, however, some background. In 1951 the Congress of the United States passed a tax law in which it is stated that any U. S. citizen who remains outside the continental U. S. A. for 18 consecutive months need not pay any income tax.

This law was passed because the Army of the United States was building bases all over the world and was finding it increasingly difficult to secure defense workers.

In order to make the overseas job openings in such uncomfortable countries as Arabia, Greenland, Algeria, and Morocco more enticing, the law was passed, primarily, as an incentive to recruit manpower.

Now it so happens that in 1951, Gene Kelly's first contract with MGM was scheduled to expire. Kelly's films had grossed over $75,000,000 for the studio, and Loew's, Inc. had no intention of letting Kelly go.

In seven previous years the studio had paid him relatively little, especially when one realizes that Gene worked not only as an actor but as a director, choreographer, and writer as well. As a matter of fact, he was regarded by the studio as a one-man unit.

In 1951, Kelly according to Hollywood standards, should have been earning a minimum of $5,000 a week. He was earning less than half that figure. Taxes, expenses, and commissions being what they are, he and Betsy had managed to put aside only a small amount of savings for the proverbial rainy day.

When Gene's contract expired, he was offered many lucrative deals. He could have picked up $10,000 a week at Las Vegas. He could have shared in the profits of independent productions. He could have gone to another studio as a unit producer.

The executives at Metro knew all this. They knew most of all that they must under no circumstances lose Gene. After all, hadn't his American In Paris won the Academy Award, the first time in ten long years an MGM film had garnered that honor?

What sort of incentive would keep Kelly at MGM?

ONE of the bigshots of Loew's, Inc. had the answer. Congress had just passed a new tax law. A man could work outside of the U. S. A., and all his earned income after 18 months would be tax free.

The proposition was made to MCA, Kelly's agents. They investigated in detail. They checked all the legal angles. Gene insisted that he would do absolutely nothing that was not 100 per cent legal and above board.

"Look," he was told, "geologists, oil workers, engineers are going overseas every day in the week under the identical tax setup. Why should you penalize yourself because you're an actor? MGM has millions abroad in blocked currency. The only way they can use that money is to make pictures in foreign countries. It is no legal sin to make a film in London or in Paris or in Italy."

Gene Kelly thought it over. He discussed the proposition with Betsy. If he made three or four pictures overseas, would she come along? Would she have any objections? After all, Metro was going to make the pictures, anyway. Betsy said sure, she'd come along.

As it turned out, Gene flew to Europe first. Betsy stayed behind to sublet the house and then, with Kerry and Lois, followed a few months later.

After the Kellys had been in Europe for about six months—and mind you, they are not the first Americans from Hollywood to take advantage of the favorable tax law—an employee of MCA, the Music Corporation of America and the largest talent agency in Hollywood, began pointing out to a prospective client what a wonderful deal his agency had set up for Kelly.

"He'll have about half a million dollars tax free," this employee explained, "because we're on the ball every minute of the day. MCA doesn't miss a trick."

In a few weeks the particular actress who had heard this sales talk demanded that her agent obtain for her the same deal. "You dope," she told him, "if I make films overseas for 18 months, I don't have to pay taxes. It's legal, you dummy. It's part of the new tax laws. Don't you ever read?"

It wasn't very long before pretty nearly everyone in Hollywood climbed aboard the 18-months bandwagon. Evelyn Keyes was the first, then Gary Cooper, Ava Gardner, Kirk Douglas, Clark Gable, Claudette Colbert, Alan Ladd, Lana Turner.

It is possible, of course, that some of these stars may not have had the question of taxes in mind when they left the U. S., but then again it's entirely possible that the tax forgiveness was the main idea.

Because of this Hollywood exodus, Gene

Kelly is bearing the brunt of public griping.

It is he who is consistently and erroneously pointed out as the first Hollywood star to take advantage of the tax law. What does he have to say about it?

"I was asked to make motion pictures abroad. The tax advantages were pointed out to me. I've made pictures abroad before, even without the 18-months' tax set-up. The law was passed by the Congress. It's on the books, and it's proper and legal. I would sooner cut off my right arm than do anything shady.

"Actors don't have very lengthy careers; that's particularly true of dancers. You can burn yourself out pretty quickly. In saving some money for my old age and providing for my family, I don't see anything morally wrong. In the U. S. there's a 27½% tax depletion allowance on oil wells, because the Government expects them to run dry. Creative people run dry, too; but you don't get any depletion allowance on the inevitable slow-ups of age. "Actors are ordinary human beings. We have the same hopes and fears; only our careers don't last very long. I'm sorry but I don't consider it a sin to put some money away for the day I can no longer work."

THE thing to remember about Gene Kelly is that he is essentially a creative artist, a man who dances because of a life force which propels him. He would dance and experiment with the dance whether he was paid peanuts or a palace.

It is safe to say that he has done more to popularize ballet throughout the world than any other dancer in history. To treat him as a "money man" is to defame his character and to detract from his contributions to international cinema.

When the history of the motion picture industry is written, the name of Gene Kelly will stalk boldly through its pages, and only one adjective will do him justice: "great."

crosby and son

Actually, Bing came over to Europe for two reasons: (a) he likes privacy, to do whatever he feels like doing without attracting public attention and (b) because he knew that a trip would serve as the antidote to Lindsay's sadness brought about by the death of Dixie Crosby.

As a matter of fact, Bing over the years has made it a practice to spend as much time away from Hollywood as in it. Once he finishes a film and tapes a few radio shows, he takes off for the house in Carmel, the one up at Hayden Lake, or the ranch in Elko. Within the next few weeks he and the boys will undoubtedly go up to Nevada and work on the ranch during the summer.

In Hollywood, Bing has the feeling that he is being tracked by bloodhounds. As a writer friend of his once put it, "Let Bing ask for change of a dime, and right away some reporter is making a big thing of it. That's why, after Dixie died, he took Lindsay out of school and went down to Palm Springs. But even there he couldn't get away. The papers played up this thing with Mona Freeman as if it were a full-fledged romance. It wasn't."

BING Crosby is an Irishman who lives in a kind of cathedral-like self-sufficiency. He has few close friends, his closest being Bill Morrow, his writer.

Crosby confides in no one, especially about affairs of the heart. He is not a man who wears sadness on his sleeve. In fact, for a man who makes his living as an actor he is the most atypical actor in the business. The Crosby legend in which Bing has been painted as the gay, carefree, light-hearted, insouciant crooner with no depth of intellect or emotion is at complete variance with the facts.

Bing is a little on the sullen side. He prefers solitude which is why he loves to fish and hunt. He is a man who meditates, who has his own philosophy of life, a man with moods and tempers and discernment.

Take, for example, the way he lived in Europe. Most American stars who come to Paris check in at one of two hotels. The Lancaster or the Georges V. These are plush, expensive hostleries, primarily for foreigners, and if you ever catch a Frenchman living in one of them, the chances are that you'll be rewarded with the Legion of Honor. They have become known in show-business as Hollywood hotels. Rita Hayworth, Susan Hayward, Olivia deHavilland, Clark Gable—when any of these touch Paris, right away it's the Hotel Lancaster or the Georges V.

Crosby, on the other hand, stays at the Trianon Palace, a quiet, expansive, picturesque hotel out in Versailles, ten miles or so from Paris. "It's a good spot," his son Lindsay agrees. "Dad and I can get up in the morning, shoot a round of golf. Nobody bothers you. The service is swell, and of course, it's very historic. Marie Antoinette and all that. Good for my history."

Bing prefers to make Versailles his European headquarters because the newspapermen in and around there rarely bother him. They interview him when he arrives and when he leaves and what he does with his time in between is his own business. There is no daily accounting of his schedule. Der Bingle loves anonymity.

During the middle of April, for example, he, Lindsay and Bill Morrow jumped into their car and pulled out of Paris, heading for the Spanish border. Their itinerary was their own affair. No one cared. No one ogled them. No one asked for snapshots, autographs or interviews in any town enroute.

When the trio arrived at Biarritz, they stayed for a day at the home of the celebrated French comedienne, Gabrielle Dorziat with whom Bing appeared in Little Boy Lost. Bing was asked to show up at the Cannes Film Festival and said casually enough that he might drop in for a few hours, but he was anxious to get to Spain and introduce Lindsay to the bullfighting scene.

After Spain there was the Italian tour and then the return to Paris. By this time, Bing, who is much less a disciplinarian than Dixie was, became convinced that Lindsay had had enough fun and enough golf. It was time for the lad to settle down to some serious study. Bing engaged a well-known painter named Mayo, to work with Lindsay on his painting for at least three hours a day.

It's too early to tell at this point, but it looks very much as if Lindsay has a great deal of potential as an artist. "I like to paint," he says, "and I learned a lot in Paris, but I don't really know yet what I want to be."

Lindsay's twin brothers want to become ranchers and his older brother Gary talks of becoming a football coach.

WHEN Bing took Lindsay out of private school in Beverly Hills last year, the opinion was offered that the boy's education might suffer. Actually, Lindsay believes, "I've learned more these past few months than I have in years of schooling."

Bing believes in formal education very strongly—he sent his boys to a Jesuit preparatory college and he himself went through Gonzaga, but when Dixie died, he realized wisely enough that for a few critical months, months of transition, he would have to be both mother and father to Lindsay. He would have to give him both affection and companionship.

Bing has done the job extremely well. Lindsay has not only adapted himself to life without a mother but new horizons, new vistas have been opened up for him. Bing has seen to it, subtly and seemingly without effort but always according to plan.

Lindsay Crosby is bright and alert without being pushing or forward. In France he and Bing began to speak French to each other, and they had some pretty riotous linguistic sessions.

In view of the fact that Bing took Lindsay to Europe this year, he can't very well put himself in the position of playing favorites which means that come next year, he will undoubtedly have to do the same for Phil, Dennis, and Gary.

Just what effect Bing and his four sons would have on continental Europe is very difficult to tell. Sometimes, Europeans resent Americans for no good reason at all.

Take the incident of Bing and the British Amateur Golf Championship. While Bing was in Paris he said he planned to enter the British golf tournament at Hoylake whereupon columnist Desmond Hackett of the London Daily Express sat down and nastily wrote that Bing should be barred from the tournament. Hackett blasted Bing and insisted that the crooner had turned the 1950 Amateur tournament at St. Andrews, Scotland's oldest golf course, into a cheap circus. He also accused Bob Hope of making an "ass of himself" and "even a bigger ass of British golf."

The attack on Crosby who was playing for charity seemed so unfair that the influential London magazine, "Golf Illustrated" came to Der Bingle's defense. "It has been suggested," the magazine said, "that Bing is not a good enough golfer to play in the event. We do not agree with that at all. He is certainly better than many of the home players who enter."

The magazine then went on to defend

Crosby both as a golfer and a gentleman. It declined, however, to do the same for Bob Hope. Said the magazine, "We rather think that in this instance Bing has been again confused with his friendly rival Bob Hope, whose display of bad manners and bad golf is still unfortunately in our memories."

OUTSIDE of England, however, neither Bing nor any member of his family has ever been adversely criticized. Bing is universally liked although he has never pandered to popularity. "I'm a lazy man by nature," he says, "and I do what comes naturally."

It is the course of Bing's nature to do the right thing. Paul Whiteman who gave the crooner one of his first jobs, has said of Bing, "He goes through life trying to help people, and where he can't help, he always makes sure not to harm. He is a credit to America, a credit to show business, and a credit to the revered memory of his wife." Thousands echo this homage.

If any of Bing's four sons grow up to be half the man their father is, the world will hold them in high esteem. END

There is another close by who is in pink, her Aunt Cis, wife of Uncle Pat, the two with whom she made her home after her mother's death several years ago. Uncle Pat, as are all the men, is in striped trousers and morning coat. Dennis Day, Jim's brother, is his best man; their three brothers, John, Frank and William McNulty, are among the ushers.

THIS is the moment, the moment which was destined to be the first time Ann met her Jim, nearly three years before, only neither of them knew it then . . . they both have said.

"Isn't every eligible man a girl meets a potential suitor in her mind?" a reporter had once asked her. "Didn't you think of Jim that way always?"

She could be thinking of the answer she gave to this question, as she had thought of it many times since. She said she didn't think so—always. But was it true of her and Jim?

They met at a party and when he left he asked if he could call her. She replied, "Yes," and he called her four days later. It was not to take her out to dinner, to dance or go to a show, perhaps, but to the christening of a nephew, Dennis Day's second son. She went and wondered—was this by way of being an introduction to his family?

It was a good thing that she did no more than wonder, that she gave it no greater significance. For in the next two years their work, hers in the studio and on tour, his in his office and the hospital, establishing his medical career, saw them much more apart than together. Then, last fall and winter, they found more time for each other, and a week before Christmas he came over to help her decorate the Christmas tree and seemed not to have his mind on it even when he placed the star on top.

He had dinner with them. Aunt Cis had learned he loved lamb and had made a wonderful roast, yet his plate was practically untouched. Uncle Pat threw questions at him on matters of the day and each seemed to catch Jim's mind wandering. And when the older folks left them alone and they got started on the tree, Jim had kept hanging the decorations upside down. Something told her then. And she was right . . . but barely! He was half-way out the door that night when he suddenly turned back, the words she wanted so much to hear came tumbling out, and her whole world took on new and great dimensions—he wanted her!

From that second Jim was not the same Jim any more, she was not the same Ann. When he went home that same night he telephoned her, within three minutes it seemed, after he left. He said first that he had just wanted to tell her that he had gotten back safely . . . and she had thought warmly and fondly, "He's reporting already." Then, he couldn't just leave it at that . . . he wanted to talk some more.

"Tell me," he asked, "did I propose to you when I was there a few minutes ago?"

"Yes, you did," she said.

"And did you say, 'Yes?'" he pressed on.

"Yes, Jim. I said, 'Yes,'" she told him.

"Ah!" he sighed with relief. "I just wanted to be sure. That it really happened. That it's true."

They went to musicals. They went to concerts. They laughed because in college he had played a saxophone in a band but she had never heard him play. They laughed because he had seen only a few of her pictures and she had far more faithful fans than he.

"How could you stay away from my pictures?" she asked, kidding him.

"Do you go to see the operations I perform?" he came back.

They went to parties. Because Jeanne Crain had teased her about Jim she wanted Jeanne to know about the engagement. "Who was teasing?" asked Jeanne. "I was predicting! I was perfectly sure it would happen."

His mother had told her she knew Jim was going to propose. "For a week before, I never saw such a one as him around the house," she said. "So preoccupied he was!"

Now that it had happened all their friends said the same thing. "We could have told you!" And she wished they had.

A bride's hope must feed on memories and these are the ones that must fill Ann's mind. The home they bought, the Connecticut-style farmhouse in Toluca Lake. It was raining when she went first to see the house with Uncle Pat who had hunted it up. Yet she loved it and when Jim wanted a description she said, "It's the kind of house that just reaches out and puts its arms around you."

But then she was sorry she had said this much because she hadn't wanted to influence him, and when they went to look at it together she said not another word . . . but just watched him. That was enough. It seemed to her that he thrilled as she had at everything; the slant roof, the wide, inviting stairway that greeted you as you entered, the Dutch fireplace, the warm, yellow kitchen, the den you could see into from way out in the back through picture windows.

They took it. She was a bride not only with a diamond solitaire set in platinum, but with a house to take over and furnish and live in!

They decided they wouldn't try to buy all they need at one time but instead to pick up pieces slowly, matching and suiting as they went along. But he had nothing to say about the first household article that came her way because it was a gift—a rolling pin with cookie mold attached.

For the first time since she had met Jim he visited her at the studio. She took him to the All The Brothers Were Valiant set at MGM and introduced him to everyone from Bob Taylor and Stewart Granger to her hairdresser, Florence Erickson, and the wardrobe lady, Tommy McCoy. "This is my Jim," she said. This is how she found herself referring to him—without planning or thinking.

ONLY a few days before his visit the marriage scene from the picture, in which she and Bob Taylor were wed, had been shot. She had worn not only the engagement ring Jim had given her but his second gift, pearl earrings. Now everyone kidded Bob Taylor on his role, telling him that he had been only the stand-in for the real thing.

Well, here before the altar with Jim this is the real thing. Nothing else matters. Only this moment when he takes her hand in his and places the marriage band on her finger to mark the end of loneliness; this moment, the first of many wonderful ones that will stir her heart. END

dangerous crossroads

(Continued from page 31) editors across the country immediately clamored for follow-up news. Jane and Geary had agreed between themselves not to discuss the matter, which everyone admitted was their privilege. They kept that promise to each other, but where was the second bulletin stating that they had not really separated? Clearly, someone in the press department had "goofed," for the only alternative now was for reporters to go out and play detective on their own.

The results were both comic and grim. One columnist fairly stated that the entire affair had blown over, at least temporarily. Another stated, without foundation in fact, that Geary had moved away from home to an apartment of his own. Into print went the statement in one paper that Geary was "jealous," and in another, dated from Palm Springs where Geary had taken Jane for a rest, a pointed anonymous item hinting that the young husband of a certain well-loved dancing and singing star was courting disaster with his outside romantic interests. The topper was the prediction that Jane's personal appearance for two weeks at the Desert Inn in Las Vegas was for the express purpose of establishing residence in Nevada in order to obtain the so-called painless six-week divorce treatment.

Most of this news was pure conjecture, for Jane and Geary had at least temporarily made up their private differences. Then, reluctantly, Hedda Hopper reported in her column, "Jane Powell's separation from her husband Geary Steffen shocked me profoundly. I don't believe she'll wait long before getting a divorce. Since she has a night club engagement in Las Vegas I wouldn't be surprised if she stayed there the required six weeks and got her divorce. The guy she fell head over heels for is dancer Gene Nelson, who recently separated from his wife and is the father of a small child."

All Hollywood, including Hedda, hopes that this will not be the case, and in fact the press on first noting the obvious interest between Jane and Gene "sat on" the gossip. They hoped that this would be just another case in which the leading man and his leading lady became infatuated with each other during the production of a picture. It happens frequently, as it apparently did with Jane and Gene on the set of Three Sailors And A Girl. But in most instances, a week or so after the picture is over the temporary unreal romantic atmosphere in front of the camera dies away and everything is forgotten. Sometimes, however, emotions get out of hand, rumors blossom and become fact. Then unless all parties are willing to forgive and forget, divorce becomes inevitable.

Boiled down, all the stories, comments, and rumors come to this factual status of the Powell-Steffen situation: Usually the husband is the last to know in a marital situation of this sort, but unlike other pending divorces, Jane and Geary have remained under the same roof. Up to a day before she left for her personal appearance tours in the east and in Canada, Jane and Geary were together in their Brentwood house, and there had been no physical separation. They both admitted there was serious trouble, but that they had arrived at a definite plan. Jane was to go to Toronto, then to New York, and on to Las Vegas for her two weeks there beginning May 12th. During that time they would consider themselves in a trial separation period.

Columnists, hearing this schedule, insisted that this was the end. They pointed to the fact that Gene Nelson would be in New York at the same time with her.

Jane said nothing. She was incommunicado. But intimates insisted that even then Jane and Geary were earnestly trying to hold their marriage together. They were married in the Catholic church. Jane did not become a Catholic, but took instruction in Geary's faith, and respects his religion. Both of their children were baptized in the Catholic church.

Those who saw Geary Steffen, just before Jane's departure, on his knees, drawn and haggard, earnestly praying, knew the reason. What they did not know was that Jane was also on her knees, praying equally as fervently in another church. They both asked the same grace—to be given strength in the difficult weeks ahead, and wisdom in making their decision.

Let's see how this situation has affected Jane Powell. The truth is that Jane and Geary have long had a thorough understanding on the subject of leading men. She's worked with dozens of them, lunched with them, had them call her "honey," a favorite form of show business salutation; she's listened to their romantic woes, smilingly shrugged off their meaningless and habitual passes. In this case, after the picture was over, Gene Nelson happened to be present at Ciro's the night Geary tossed a birthday party for Jane. She danced with a half-dozen men that night. Certainly, if there had been cause to take serious objection to any male behavior, Geary could have handled it. The son of the great fighter, Willie Ritchie, Geary is a rugged boy himself. No one wants to irk him unduly in his presence or behind his back.

No, whatever the rumored "evidence" concerning the cause of their disagreement, the underlying cause which Jane and Geary decided not to discuss was much more complex than any real or imagined flirtation.

Jane is such a trouper that no one thought to inquire into the state of her health. So, we come to facts. Her second baby was born on November 21st, last year. Being used to rigorous picture schedules, she didn't think that January 15th was too soon to begin work in Three Sailors And A Girl. Unfortunately, the schedule for this film was tightened considerably, due to Warners' decision to close down for a short period. Dance numbers which normally would have been done in two or three days were ordered completed in one. So close was Jane to complete physical exhaustion that she fainted dead away during one number. This, however, didn't prevent her from working the whole day the following Sunday, nor from carrying on other overtime work even though suffering from the flu.

It's no secret that having a baby frequently has a severe effect on any woman's power of endurance; frequently a considerable change for a time on her mental outlook. Jane badly needed a rest, but couldn't have one. As a matter of fact her closest friends maintain that if she hadn't gone back to work so soon after the last baby this might never have happened. This is not to say that she became completely unreasonable and ill-tempered, therefore being the one to blame. Privately, both have admitted to close friends that they each feel responsible for their differences of opinion. By so doing they display the necessary concern for each other that is required to help them through this difficult period in their marriage.

INCREDIBLY, it is a Hollywood habit to read a headline and accept it immediately as irrevocable truth. For this reason, a large portion of the movie colony, preoccupied with their own lives, assumed that Jane and Geary actually had separated from the moment the studio took official recognition of their spat. Very few people noticed that two days later Jane appeared at the airport late at night with Geary to keep an important date—the arrival of the unique three-wheeled English car. The Regal, in which they have an interest, together with Barron Hilton and Quay Sargeant. Jane stood around for nearly an hour in the chilly night air, waiting for the Slick Airways plane to bring the car in. Then she posed with the remarkable machine for publicity photos needed in connection with its impressive premiere showing at the annual Los Angeles Sportsman's Show. If she and Geary were losing their mutual interests, Jane most certainly would have begged off.

The Regal, which travels at speeds up to 70 miles an hour, doing 50 miles to a gallon of gas and selling for just over $1,000, is but one of Geary's carefully planned interests of which Jane has reason to be proud. Not everyone remembers that when they first became engaged it was Geary who held back from an early marriage. He realized that there might not be a long-range future in his job at the time as Sonja Henie's skating partner. Strictly un-Hollywood in his thinking, he was determined to enter a profession in which he could support his wife and future family, even if she were to never again set foot on a studio lot. So Geary prepared himself carefully in the insurance business.

In the months and years that have followed, Geary has established himself as one of the most-liked business men in Los Angeles. True, his daily associates are people who can never catch the headwaiter's eye at Mocambo. Yet, because he has constantly helped "ordinary guys" to build up their estates, he is a solid man in his community. For proof of this, ask around a little about Mr. Steffen.

As one example, consider what the operator of a small machine repair shop has to say: "It took Geary six months to convince me that my insurance program was inadequate. Without the protection he sold me, my trip to the hospital would have set me back $1,000. Not only did he save me a lot of money; he sent me a bunch of new customers. I've never met his wife, but when I do I want to tell her what she already knows: 'In my book, your husband is one swell guy!'"

Jane indeed does know this and usually talks more about him than she does about herself. Her feelings, past and present, are best defined by her good friend, Betty Lynn, who not long ago told a MODERN SCREEN reporter, "Jane is so intelligent about life. She's so sure of what she wants. She has never fallen in and out of love like a lot of other young kids. She knew she'd fall in love with the right man when he came along. And she did. She knew it was Geary, and no one else, because he represented all the fine things that Jane wanted in a husband. He was charming, intelligent and hard working. Having worked so hard herself, she expected no less in her ideal."

Moreover, what Geary Steffen has done for others, he has also accomplished for his own family. If something happened to him, suddenly, they'd be more than adequately provided for if Jane never worked another day in her life. In addition, he and Jane only last year completed the building of a ten-unit apartment house in the San Fernando valley. Next door to this building, they own a couple of additional lots on which they will erect other apartment units, "when they have the money."

BECAUSE they have avoided the shallow Hollywood social life in favor of building mutual interests together, it would be no easy decision to dissolve their marriage. They have both seen close friends who have given up the complex problem of maintaining complete marital harmony. One of these said, on reading the news about them, "I hope that Jane and Geary have the sense to hold on tight to what they have, for the sake of themselves as much as for their children. I didn't, and I have regretted it ever since."

That these two will and are trying to is obvious, for they are very aware that in this modern age three out of every four marriages are failing throughout the nation, with an even higher percentage in

Cecil B. DeMille wanted a mob of extras to rush upon a leper in the market-place, crying "Unclean! Unclean!" The extras were rehearsed as to action, and then handed mimeographed scripts of their brief utterance. But a typist, cutting the stencil, left out two essential letters. When the cameras started grinding, the mob rushed upon the leper, crying "Uncle! Uncle!"

Hollywood. One night, before they were wed, Geary asked Jane, "What do you think ruins most marriages around town?"

They agreed that there are four major causes: career trouble, financial trouble, in-law trouble and the problem of fading love. At that time they took inventory of themselves and believed that they would be able to survive these major obstacles. Today, they have only two hurdles which they conceivably may fail to jump—career trouble and fading love.

The career trouble Jane knows very well. Knows, too that it is something every actress must fight against. Currently there are stories that Jane's new Metro contract was partially dependent on the promise that she wouldn't have another child for three years. The truth is that no such clause can be put in a contract, legally, although it might be "understood." Another factor, blown up out of all proportion, perhaps even in Jane's mind, is the studio's decision to concentrate on glamorizing all of its feminine stars. Most of them now regretfully tell their friends in the press that they cannot pose for pictures with their children; it is against studio "policy."

As for Jane, the policy is an unfortunate complete reversal. Of course, until very recently she was limited to homey little girl parts. This, however, can be blamed more on the short-sightedness of certain producers than on a healthy public interest in her private life happiness. Under the circumstances, with sophisticated and dramatic parts going to other girls on the lot, a less balanced girl than Jane would have decided that the only thing to do to convince producers that she could play something besides gingham roles would be to "do a Lana Turner on the night club trail." Instead, Jane has never sought to "showcase" herself and has turned a blithe but cold shoulder toward romantic intrigue in private life.

AND to what end? Today she commands tremendous money on personal appearances. It appears certain that she will take over the top feminine role in The Student Prince. But if Fate should cost her that role, one of the most important of the year—would she lose it to a glamor girl? No, the most likely star to play it would be Ann Blyth, a close friend of Jane's and a girl who has always been far from the "glamor type."

If there is anything wrong with Jane's career, it might readily be the advice of "career experts" who would give her a false veneer. Taken out of context, Jane's statement in a recent interview, to the effect that, "I've had a little secret ambition to play a bubble or fan dancer or burlesque queen . . . there's something earthy and vital about girls who do these things . . ." sounds a little like a publicity man's idea. Certainly, if the burlesque queen or fan dancer were asked if she'd change places with Jane Powell, "nice girl" roles and all, she'd doubtless give an earthy answer—"Yeah girl!"

To be serious again, as matters stood at last report, Jane and Geary had moved into their two story white colonial mansion on Sunset Boulevard, set far enough back from the street so that the heavy traffic is a mere hum. Matter of fact, they moved into the place while the gossip about them was the heaviest and friends were speculating about their nightly whereabouts. Instead of being separately "out on the town," they were moving in bits of furniture and personal belongings they didn't want to trust to the storage vans.

Instead of buying a whole house full of new furniture, they are installing the old pieces, planning to purchase new traditional furniture as they go along. So interested has Jane been in her new home that when Geary asked what she wanted for her birthday she made him promise to buy only things they could use in the new house—nothing for herself.

There is an air of permanency about this lovely mansion, purchased through their mutual efforts and with the profits from the sale of the home in which they have lived for four years. Almost twice as large as the old place, there are two bedrooms for Geary, Jr., and baby Suzanne, who need their own quarters. There's an extra bedroom too for another possible addition to the family.

Even now, Jane is reported to have cancelled plans for arranging a property settlement and cut short her tour to meet Geary in Las Vegas.

These facts should stand up well against the opinion of skeptics who insist that once there is the slightest break in a marriage, there is no going back; sooner or later the final parting will come. Even so, a veteran observer is greatly tempted perhaps by wishful thinking that if Jane and Geary can get a solid grip on themselves and each other they can go right on with the job of solidifying their marriage.

In fact, he may even mark it down as a certainty as he chooses to believe in what Jane herself has said, to wit: "You've got to make an effort to be happy. You can't just think that you're something special and entitled to it. I have my career; Geary has his work. But we have something more important together. Something we both share—our home and our family. That's what makes a good marriage something to share. If that goes, then I think that love goes, too."

Jane Powell said that in 1951. Now, in 1953. . . ?

(Continued from page 35) about all this. It had been a long time. The last talk we had with her had been two years before, and then she had been a true teen-ager, vibrant as a colt on the first day of spring, eager for the new work in the movies, fanatically infatuated with a young man she'd been engaged to since she was 16, and as sure of the future pattern of her life as only a teen-ager can be.

At that time Mitzi Gaynor was cute, very cute, but in a purely adolescent way. She wore blue jeans and a horse's tail hair-do and flat ballet slippers and she walked like a ten-year-old who had just taken a dancing lesson. Her idea of a big night was to eat early, go to a movie and wind up behind a malted milk in a drug store, and then off to bed for a solid ten hours sleep. She was just 18.

But most of that has changed. This time we talked in the cool, sophisticated Polo Lounge of the Beverly Hills Hotel. Mitzi sat across from us and ordered the way the Duchess of Windsor would, and the waiter bowed and called her Madam. She wore a chic suit, black, naturally, with patent leather French-heeled pumps and a small hat with a veil that almost covered the tip of her nose. Her lips were bright with the proper shade of lip rouge and her eyes were outlined in heavy penciled doe lines like a Vogue model. It didn't look like the same girl at all at all.

Mitzi Gaynor today could well be called the sexiest-looking woman in Hollywood. She is five-feet six-inches tall and weighs a well-distributed 125 pounds. Her measurements are at least adequate, even if you're a perfectionist in this matter. She carries her head high and struts just a little when she walks, not enough to call it a wiggle, but enough to suggest she's got a body beneath the petticoats. She has been blessed with high cheek bones and a narrow chin, which gives her something of an exotic contour above the neck. But it is her eyes that do the real work. They are dark and brooding and very slanted and wide, and Mitzi Gaynor knows how to use them.

On-screen it is possibly the figure you'll remember most about Mitzi Gaynor. In her recent pictures she has been leggy and narrow-waisted and snug-hipped, and she has thrown herself about a good deal in musical numbers. But off-screen it is her eyes you will remember, for they are windows that let you look into a volatile soul, and they are hot and heavy one moment and bright and icy the next, brimming with excitement and anticipation. Man!

I SAW IT HAPPEN

During an engagement of Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis at the Paramount Theater in Frisco a cute little blonde girl, about two or three, wandered away from her parents and joined a gathering of teen-agers who grouped on the steps of the stage.

When the ushers came to chase away the girls Jerry yelled, "Hey! Don't you dare touch her", pointing to the frightened three-year-old. Dean rushed over, grabbed her up and Jerry produced a chair from the wings for her to sit on—right in the middle of the stage! After the show Dean picked her up tenderly, came out into the audience and returned the child to her father.

"What ever happened to that other girl?" we asked eventually. "The one who hated shoes, remember?"

Mitzi laughed. And we felt a thud on the floor beneath the table. We looked and it was a pair of black patent, French-heeled shoes. Nylon-encased feet drummed on the carpet.

"She's still around," said Mitzi with a grin. "Anyway, I can still think better in my bare feet."

"It's been a long time," we said, "since we've talked. So much seems to have happened to you. Now for instance in I Don't Care you suddenly seemed to bloom. Never saw so much skin on the screen before."

"And it's about time," Mitzi said. "I've been so covered up for so long I thought it was time to get out from under. I've been a dancer all my life, but they've always had me in pantaloons or hoop skirts. Nobody thought I had legs. Well, when they began to talk about costumes for I Don't Care I was afraid for awhile that I'd end up walking out on the stage with nothing but a ribbon across my middle reading 'Compliments of 20th Century-Fox.' But it turned out all right, didn't it?"

"It turned out fine," we said.

A man accompanied by a striking blonde walked into the room and was seated at the next table. He apparently suddenly thought he was alone, because he stopped looking at the blonde and got a fix on Mitzi and couldn't break loose.

We ran our finger down a long list of men we'd brought along for the interview. Mitzi saw what we were doing. She waved the list away.

"You're wasting your time," she said, "if you're looking for romance there. Dates. That's all they are. But most of them are wonderful."

"The last time we talked," we said, "you were engaged."

Mitzi's face darkened just a little. "I was very young," she said, "and I thought I was in love. But I guess I really wasn't. I think maybe 16 is too early to make up your mind about such things. I have no regrets, but I wouldn't advise another young girl to do the same thing. Why, do you know that until just less than a year ago if I met a nice man and he asked me for a date I was horrified. I used to snort: 'I happen to be engaged!' and I'd think the fellow was an awful wolf. But I don't want to talk about that. That's in the past."

A CHANGE came in her expression. The eyes had it again.

"If you will forgive the expression," she said, "I'm now in my sophisticated period. I don't want to get serious with anybody. I never go out with the same man too often. When I'm not working I live. For instance, an average day goes like this: I go to lunch with someone, go shopping in the afternoon, meet somebody for cocktails, go home and dress, go to dinner and maybe a show, then have supper and wind up at one of the late spots. I've never done any of these things before—and it's fun."

"And what does your mother think of this?" we asked. Mitzi and her mother are very close and share an apartment together.

Mitzi laughed loudly. "You'd never guess," she said. "She says: 'It's about time!' And I think she's right. You know 21 is about time for a girl to stop fluttering her eyelids. At 21 a girl is a woman if she's ever going to be one. And it's important that she begins living a woman's life. Do you realize I elected Eisenhower last November. It was my first vote—and I won."

We also had a clipping from a newspaper in our pocket. We took it out and read it carefully. Mitzi, it seems, or so the columnist reported, had gone to Palm Springs a few days before for a rest. The first night she was there, quietly sitting in the patio outside her bungalow, two automobiles came screeching into the driveway simultaneously. Two young men came running toward her. One was Hugh O'Brian, the other a Hollywood doctor. They had both gotten the idea of sneaking down for a date with Mitzi that afternoon, had spotted each other on the highway and had raced the rest of the way. She went out with both. And during the rest of her vacation period, according to the clipping, no less than 17 Hollywood men drove to the desert and turned her rest cottage into something resembling the front lobby of Mocambo on a Saturday night.

MITZI had been reading the clipping upside down across from us. When we looked up she was grinning with satisfaction.

"Men—they're wonderful," she said piously. "I never felt so wanted in all my life as I did that trip. Every time I turned around there was another man who'd come down to take me out. And the wonderful part about the whole thing is that none of them were jealous. I guess they all figured it was nice I was so popular. A good deal of the time, four or five of us would go out together."

"I guess you know," we said, "that you're now considered a very sexy dish because of all this. And, of course, the kind of movies you're making now."

"That's all right with me," Mitzi said. "I'm afraid I'm awfully feminine—and I like to be thought sexy. Besides sex is changing. Even in show business. The ballet, for instance, the way it's been done for 100 years, is definitely old hat now. The modern ballet theater is very sexy indeed. Take the new 'Streetcar Named Desire' ballet, the way it's done by Mia Slavenska and her company. It's costumed differently and danced with all the wild abandon that showed in Tennessee Williams' story. And the business is fantastic. People want women in the theater to be sexy nowadays. Not nasty, of course, but sexy."

"I think a woman can be sexy and still have the best of the old-fashioned ideals," she said. "For instance, I like the new me, but I wouldn't change a lot of things about the old me. I still want to marry and have four or five kids and a home and just one husband. Although I go out with a lot of different men I still like the wholesome, ambitious type I admired when I was a kid. I don't care if a man I like doesn't have a dime or any position whatever. If he has the other qualities, the good ones, then I'm for him. If I go on a date it's the kind of date the man can afford. If he hasn't the means to go to Ciro's, we'll go to an inexpensive restaurant. And if he can't afford that, I'll invite him to my house and I'll cook for him." She grinned again. "The only trouble with that, though, is that they all fall so hard for my mom that I have trouble getting any attention at all from them."

"But after all this attention," we said, "don't you think you'll find it rather hard to settle down to just one lad?"

"I should say not," Mitzi said earnestly. "I'm not going to be a jerk about it, but when I finally do decide on one man I won't look at another. That will be it." She blew the veil away from her lips; she had something to say and she wanted it heard good. "But that's the way it's going to have to be with him, too," she said. "I think that women let men get away with far too much in this town. Most of the husbands a girl runs into in Hollywood are part-time husbands and part-time Romeos. My man is going to be so happy with me he won't look at another girl. I think I know how to make him that happy. If he ever does look at another girl the way he should look only at me I'll cut his head off!"

"You don't think," we said, "that marriage can get kind of stuffy? That raising four or five kids will be kind of out of character for the new Mitzi Gaynor?"

"What," Mitzi asked wickedly, "can be sexier than having four or five kids?"

We changed the subject.

"It's been rumored around," we said, "that you and Hugh O'Brian are at least considering matrimony."

"Not yet," Mitzi said. "I've got a bit of living to do before I settle down and so has Hugh. But I like Hugh, maybe more than any other man I know. I think he's a wonderful fellow and is going to be a great actor. I can hardly wait for him to get into his 40's. He's going to be another Walter Huston. You wait and see."

"Are you going to be tagging along with him?" we asked.

Mitzi smiled enigmatically. "Now what kind of a question is that?" she demanded. "I told you we have no plans at the moment, neither of us, but who can tell. I'd like to know Hugh all that time, but as for romance I'm not sure yet, nor is he."

"Getting back to the new Mitzi," we said, "what changed you? What made you take off the teeth braces so to speak and try life as a femme fatale?"

"That's where you're all wrong," Mitzi said. "I'm not a femme fatale, a racy woman, or anything like those things. I'm just a girl of 21 who has come to the conclusion that I want to have fun while I have the youth and energy. I work hard, go to church every Sunday, pay my taxes and write letters to my congressman. In what spare time I have left I like to buy good looking dresses, laugh a lot, flirt a bit, and attract my share of attention from the opposite sex. There's nothing the matter with that."

WE agreed there was very little the matter with that. "But," we pressed, "the whole town is aware of your transformation. All of the magazines are asking about it."

"Good," said Mitzi. "Solid stuff. I like that. It means I'm not in a cocoon—and that people are going to let me grow up, and I won't have to play goody-gumdrops in pictures for the rest of my career like so many girls who get into the business when they're very young do."

"You can tell all those people that Mitzi knows what she is doing. Oh, it's not an act, but I know that living the way I do now is going to help me both professionally and personally. But I want to call your attention to the fact that I haven't ever attempted anything obvious. I wear clothes that suit the occasion. I never wear a low-cut dress to lunch—and I have never bought a dress just because it was low cut. I try to dress with taste and to show off my natural attributes—all of them."

"If people think I'm a flirt, or a temptress, as you put it, fine! I like that, too, because I am a flirt. What single girl in my position wouldn't be? I don't whistle at men in cars but if I'm at a party and I see a nice fellow across the room that I think I might like to meet I might blink my eyes at him a few times so he can see I'm around. If I see a man I'd like to know and it isn't the proper occasion, I might ask someone who knows him to introduce me. If that's not proper what is?"

"I've got a lot of young years left and I'm going to try to make up for some of the time I sat at home watching television. I want to dance every night if I can. And I want to date my share of the boys. And when I play a part in a picture, I want the men in the audience to walk home thinking about me. And that just about says everything, doesn't it?"

We agreed, again, that it did. "But there's just one more thing," we said. "Frankly, we were a little shocked at the sudden change. Don't you think the readers will be a little shocked, too, when we tell them all this?"

Mitzi saw the date she had been expecting standing in the doorway looking around for her. She excused herself and got to her feet. She waved at the handsome chap and started away. Then she turned back, with an afterthought. She tossed us a naughty wink. Man, those eyes!

"I certainly wouldn't want to shock your readers," she smiled. "Please don't do that. But you might explain to them that things are different now. It's blossom time for Mitzi!"

Q. Wasn't the basic trouble with Jane Powell's marriage in the fact that she and her husband were of different religious faiths?—T.Y., SELLERSVILLE, PA.

A. They are of different faiths, but that had nothing to do with the breakup.

Q. Isn't it true that Zsa Zsa Gabor was once Liz Taylor's mother-in-law?
—K.W., MILWAUKEE, WIS.

A. Gabor would have been Liz's mother-in-law if she had remained married to Conrad Hilton a few months more.

Q. Did June Allyson leave MGM because she wants to make pictures with her husband, Dick Powell? If not, what's the true reason?

A. For the past two years, June and MGM have not seen eye to eye on story material.

A. She is reputed to be worth seven million, insists she will never return to motion pictures.

Q. I understand Paulette Goddard and some writer are really blazing. Who is the writer?
—T.R., FINDLAY, OHIO

A. Eric Remarque, author of All Quiet On The Western Front.

Q. Didn't Liz Taylor have a miscarriage in May? Isn't that why Paramount had to hold up production on Elephant Walk?
—S.A., INDIANOLA, ILLINOIS

A. Miss Taylor suffered no miscarriage. A tiny sliver of steel was blown into her right eye. It infected the eye which was cauterized by Dr. Gilbert Struble.

Q. I read that June Haver used to support her mother. What is Mrs. Haver doing now that June has entered a convent?
—R.R., DALLAS, TEXAS

Q. Have Gail Russell and Guy Madison reconciled?
—G.T., NIAGARA FALLS, N. Y.

A. A reconciliation is in progress.

Q. I hear the Janet Leigh-Tony Curtis marriage is floundering. First the Donald O'Connors, then Jane Powell, now the Curtises? Why can't young people remain married in Hollywood?

A. At this point there is nothing wrong with the Curtis marriage.

Q. Has Clark Gable ever paid any support to Josephine Dillon, his first wife?
—R.F., SANTA FE, N. M.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD NEWS

Good "medicine" for Mario Lanza . . . What's the matter with Arlene Dahl? . . . Liz Taylor has a narrow escape . . .

Betty Grable and Marilyn Monroe caused a sensation when they arrived together arm in arm, both dressed in tight white gowns and white fur pieces. Walter Winchell's fabulous party for colleague Louella Parsons was held at Ciro's in Hollywood.

I AM very fond of Arlene Dahl—but she couldn't be acting sillier than she is since she fell in love with Fernando Lamas.

To ask for a retraction of a line in my newspaper column which merely stated that she and her producer Bill Pine and actor John Sutton were going to Atlanta for the premiere of their picture Sangaree is the most ridiculous retraction I've ever been asked to make!

Wailed Arlene, "I love Fernando Lamas and he loves me and I wouldn't go on a personal appearance tour with anyone but Fernando." Now I ask you!!

How silly can the gal get? John Sutton is married and so is Bill Pine. Certainly no one could possibly have read anything verging on a romantic angle in a mere business trip.

But Arlene raised so much you-know-what that Sutton's trip to Atlanta was cancelled and he was re-routed to San Francisco!

Arlene, Arlene—what's come over you? All this silly nonsense is the best way in the world to lose a man. Under similar circumstances, I doubt very much if Lamas would have cavorted in such a manner.

THE BEST thing in the world happened for Mario Lanza when he returned to MGM to record "Beloved"—part of his settlement with the studio calling off all legal fireworks.

When Mario finished his song, every technician on the set stood and cheered and yelled, "Bravo," and, "Mario—there's no one like you."

It did something wonderful to this man who has been so bitter, who has been suffering from the almost neurotic belief that everyone was against him.

His face lighted up with the happiness of a child's. Tears of gratitude came to his eyes. He made the rounds, grasping every hand in a warm handshake.

Maybe this is the medicine he's been needing.

ONE OF THE nicest things ever done by one columnist for another was the beautiful party Walter Winchell gave in my honor at Ciro's.

Plenty of people were surprised. Walter and I are touted to be "rivals" but if my New

IN HONOR OF LOUELLA PARSONS! ALL OF HOLLYWOOD'S MOST GLITTERING PERSONALITIES WERE THERE!

Jeanne Crain is a sexy beauty now. Her low-cut gowns, and fetching new hairdo (for more about the clipping that gave her a new outlook on life, see page 51) turn heads when she and Paul Brinkman step out.

One of the loveliest stars at the party was Esther Williams, escorted by husband Ben Gage, naturally. Esther confided to Jane Russell that "I do two pictures—and one baby—a year!" She's good at both!

In spite of her publicity, Jane Russell wore the most covered up dress at the party. Lucille Ball, who sat in back of Jane and her husband Bob Waterfield, wore a gorgeous emerald pendant necklace.

The guest list included such sophisticates as New York's Cole Porter and the Continent's Merle Oberon. Cole's new musical, Can-Can, had just opened on Broadway, but he flew West for the party anyway.

York confrere had planned the affair for his guardian angel the table couldn't have been more loaded with beautiful flowers—or girls.

When Betty Grable and Marilyn Monroe walked in arm in arm, both in décolleté white gowns, diamond earrings, and long white gloves, I thought the place would come down in a heap.

Betty's husband, Harry James—and Marilyn's beau, Joe DiMaggio, were both out of town so Betty brought Marilyn to the party. The friendship between these two girls is really wonderful.

Esther Williams, in pale green, sat across from me and I had to laugh when I overheard her telling Jane Russell, "I do two pictures—and one baby—a year!"

Jane, for all her bosomy publicity, was the most covered-up belle of all, her sleeveless white dinner dress having a modest stand-up collar.

Lucille Ball's beautiful emerald pendant necklace was a striking contrast to her red hair. She and Desi Arnaz seldom go night-clubbing, so Lucy had as many cameramen around her as the Monroe-Grable team.

P.S. To the catty critic who said Marilyn didn't know her Emily Post in keeping on her long white gloves all through dinner—one of the gloves stuck and wouldn't come off—and Marilyn thought it better to keep both on than to sit there, one off—one on.

THE REDDEST face in Hollywood was Burt Lancaster's when he checked into Cedars of Lebanon Hospital for a minor operation and they wouldn't assign him a nurse until he bought some pajamas!

Burt doesn't use 'em—and plumb forgot about the, er—complications of being without them until he was told in no uncertain terms he'd have to buy some male lingerie.

After Burt recovered from his initial embarrassment, he kidded his nurse with, "I didn't think there was anything about me that hadn't been seen before in a hospital!"

ELIZABETH TAYLOR told me, "No one will ever know how hard I prayed and how deeply grateful I am that I did not lose the sight of one eye after that accident on the set."

Continued

Liz had been working in the face of a wind-machine on the set of Elephant Walk when a bit of rusty flint blew into her left eye—and for five breathless days this beautiful girl did not know whether her sight would be saved. It was a terrible experience for Liz who says, "I shall never stop returning thankful prayers."

There have been few pictures more jinxed than Elephant Walk—first Vivien Leigh's breakdown and then this near-tragedy to Liz, who replaced her.

Thank heavens the doctors say she is no longer in jeopardy.

THERE WAS an odd expression on Geary Steffen's face as he sat ringside at Jane Powell's nightclub debut in Las Vegas when she sang "Bye, Bye, Baby" and "It's Too Late Now" more or less in his general direction.

His pals say Geary is burning over the "maybe-and-maybe-not" attitude Jane is taking about their reconciliation.

After Geary flew back to Hollywood, Gene Nelson flew up to Las Vegas. But Jane still says she's taking a lot more time to make up her mind.

WHEN BOB WAGNER returns from location on Twelve Mile Reef in Florida, he's moving out of the apartment Debbie Reynolds decorated for him—and into a house.

This time, Terry Moore is doing the decorating honors.

Maybe my original guess that this was a location "publicity romance" was wrong.

FRANK SINATRA and Montgomery Clift became very buddy-buddy in Honolulu shooting From Here To Eternity. The whisper is that the boys had almost too much fun doing the nightclubs.

But it doesn't show in their work. I hear both boys are great.

EVERYTHING happens to poor Shelley Winters. No sooner did she get her man, Vittorio Gassman, back in Hollywood after months of separation than he came down with the virus flu.

They had successfully dodged all their friends and slipped out of town for a second

Ten hours after their departure—Shell and Gassman were back home!

"Some second honeymoon," yipped Shell.

But she went about setting up two nurseries at home—one for baby Vittoria as far away from her ailing pappa as possible; and another for Vittorio and his medicine bottles.

GOSSIP FROM London is that Lauren Bacall gave Humphrey Bogart a hard time for dining with a Greek beauty on several occasions before she arrived in Europe.

Bogey said the Greek was a guide to museums, etc.

"Since when did you become interested in Greek culture?" Baby is supposed to have yelled at her lord and master (?????????).

THIS SEEMS to have been "Be Nice To Louella" Month.

Another big party in my honor was given by the Masquers Club, a theatrical organization for men only.

What woman wouldn't be thrilled at being the only belle present at a dinner with 400 hosts?

On the dais were such wonderful old friends as Pat O'Brien, George Burns, Y. Frank Freeman (boss of Paramount), Jesse Lasky, Eddie Cantor and such new friends as Jerry Lewis and Donald O'Connor.

George Burns had everyone in stitches when he kidded me about the way I fight for "scoops."

He said, "Once, Hedda Hopper printed that I gave the worst performance she had ever seen. And, Louella called me and yelled, 'When you have a story like that—give it to me FIRST.'"

I noticed that Donald O'Connor had a very funny expression on his face when Jerry Lewis started to speak. Jerry's talk was along the lines that he didn't know who Louella Parsons is but he never turned down a free dinner, etc, etc, etc.

Later, Donald told me that his speech began exactly like that and he had to throw away all his prepared laughs.

I'm very glad he did, because Don's tribute to me was one of the sweetest and most sentimental I have ever received. He said

Are you in the know?

Which can be a threat to poise?

- ☐ A callous heart ☐ A callused heel

We're talking about those beat-up loafers she's wearing. The soft shoe routine is fine—'til they get too loose; then, being slip-shod can cause a callus. Shoes should fit snugly. Protects your looks; poise. Of course, at problem time, poise and Kotex go together. That safety center gives extra protection. And Kotex holds its shape; is made to stay soft while you wear it.

More women choose KOTEX*

Have you tried new Delsey* toilet tissue—the only one that's fine and firm and soft—like Kleenex* tissues? Each tissue tears off evenly—no shredding, no waste. And Delsey's double-ply for extra strength. Don't you think your family deserves this new, nicer tissue? Ask for Delsey at your favorite store. If Delsey is not on hand, have them order it for you.

When asked to dinner, should you be—

You were positive Mary's mom said this Tuesday. ("Dinner . . . a few friends.") Or did she mean next Tuesday? Double-checking would have spared confuddlement. Saved barging in, a week ahead, to find the family re-hashing Sunday's roast! Better not be "hazy" about certain other "dates", either. Or the kind of sanitary protection to choose. Remember, Kotex prevents revealing outlines. Those special flat pressed ends let you glide through any occasion—with a heart as light as helium!

If he's just an acquaintance—

- ☐ Try siren tactics ☐ Pay your own fare

Your friendship's casual. Comes along a bus—and suddenly your purse develops lock-jaw! A chance meeting doesn't mean he must pay your way. Best you pay your own. DON'T HOLD your breath until Liz and Dan Dailey reconcile. All the excitement about their being together for a weekend in Santa Barbara with little Dan, III—was purely an accident.

Liz took their son to the famed Alisal Ranch to get over a cold.

Unknown to her, Dan was in Santa Barbara to ride in a horseshow. When he heard his ex and his son were there, Dan came a-callin' and took them out to dinner.

"All the bitterness between us is over," Liz said, "and it's best for our boy that we be friends in the future. Dan is a wonderful father and little Dan loves him so much.

"But it isn't true that we have plans to reconcile. We have never discussed the subject."

I asked, "Liz, would you like to resume marriage with Dan?"

She said softly, "I don't quite know how to express myself—but what I mean is that I don't want to close the door to such a possibility."

Are you listenin', Dan?

IF TONY CURTIS and Janet Leigh are having their secret troubles they're the best actors in the world. It's been a long time since I've seen such tenderly passionate love scenes as Tony and Janet play in Houdini.

The radiant warmth that these two feel for one another is caught by the camera and turns the story of the world's greatest magician, Harry Houdini, into an enchanting young love story.

You'll see a new Janet here—she's just utterly delightful. While Tony doesn't physically resemble the great Houdini, he gives a fine acting performance and an equally fine job of the magic tricks.

Dear Miss James, KG

Thanks for your wonderful review of my new Warner Bros. picture, "So This is Love," in Technicolor, (the Grace Moore story). As for my beauty care, it's Woodbury Cold Cream made with Penaten—to help the fine oils penetrate deeply. It cleanses and softens deeper than any cream I've ever used. Woodbury leaves skin so radiant it gives you that poise that makes beauty more than skin deep.

I'm sure you'll give Woodbury "resounding applause," too.
Sincerely,
Kathryn Grayson

Continued

"I feel I'm doing the right thing," June told me, "although naturally it's a wrench to leave old friends and associates. As you know, I've wanted for a long time to make pictures with Dick (Powell, her husband, who has just turned director)."

Junie went on, "And, in a few years, I expect to retire to that old rocking chair—or at least to a farm!"

So, our gal starts retiring by signing for The Glenn Miller Story with Jimmy Stewart and So This Is Paris for Milton Sperling at $150,000 per picture!

PERSONAL OPINIONS: Rita Hayworth has lumbago—and it's painful. But why did they have to publicize it? Of all the unglamorous ailments for a glamor girl—this is it. . .

The Dean Martins are reconciled but Jeanne looks anything but happy to me. . .

On the other hand, when the divorced Donald O'Connors date they seem to be having a ball. . .

Jeanne Crain's hair gets redder and shorter by the minute. . .

There are many things John Wayne could have said in his property settlement fight with Mrs. Wayne which he didn't! . . .

There is no more casual girl in Hollywood about her career than Betty Grable. She's on suspension again from 20th for refusing a loanout to Columbia for The Pleasure Is All Mine. Betty could be happy with her husband, her children and her horses for the rest of her life without ever making another picture. . .

My money says that Bing Crosby and Mona Freeman will resume dating as soon as he returns from Europe. When Bing first left with Lindsay, Mona heard nothing from him. Recently, she received a big, fat airmail letter telling her all about their adventures. After looking over the Continental beauties, I guess little Monie seems the prettiest.

CLOSE-UP OF Jeff Chandler: He's the most mentioned star in my fan mail this month. Surprisingly, he seems to appeal to both 'teen-agers and more mature women. . . At June Allyson's delighted with her new status as a free-lance actress. She's very anxious to work with her husband Dick Powell as her director.

33, his hair is salt-and-pepper-gray and no one's going to make him "dye" for his art. . . . He gives the impression of great vitality and strength and yet falls asleep faster than a baby. . . . It's a household joke with his wife and two little girls that Daddy may or may not get through dinner before dozing off. . . . He likes to dress "sloppy" but because it's good business for an actor to be well groomed in public, he's just blown in a couple thousand dollars on a very snazzy wardrobe (which he hates!) . . . He isn't good at fixing things around the house. If a fuse burns out, Mrs. C. does the repair work. . . . He has good reason to think that his stomach is made of steel. It's nothing for him to polish off a lunch of seafood cocktail, enchiladas and watermelon! . . . His secret yearning is to be a comedian. He'd rather be Jerry Lewis than Jeff Chandler (so had Tony Curtis!). Jeff does a devastating imitation of Lewis for friends and would like to do it at a benefit or something—but he's scared. . . . He lives by a very simple philosophy believing that life is like a bank: You can take out of it no more than you have put in!

THE LETTER BOX: "I may be as old fashioned as my name which is Sarah," writes Sarah Murphy, Atlanta, "but I just don't get all these unmarried movie stars traveling around together with no one seeming to think a thing of it." Oh, yes "somebody" thinks something of it, Sarah. The studios hate it but don't seem able to prevent it.

What a fan Red Skelton has in Barbara Behrman, Westfield, New Jersey. Her ode to Red covered six typewritten pages! Barbara's favorite movie gal is Doris Day.

MODERN SCREEN take a bow! Keith Walker writes from Cheshire, England, that M.S. is the "best written magazine in the fan field. I can't stand the slush in most of the others."

Jo-Nell Wolfe, Washougal, Washington, accuses me of failing to note what a fine actor Rory Calhoun is becoming. "He should be taken out of Westerns and given important things. I think Rory would have been wonderful in The Robe."

That's all for now. See you next month.

Bing Crosby's companion at a big charity ball in Paris was the Countess des Cors. Will she be giving Mona Freeman future competition?

what divorce did to me

by Mona Freeman

■ I read this romantic nonsense about myself and Bing Crosby and I marvel at how the gossips can really dream it up.

Actually, I don't quarrel over every word printed or said about me—no one in the public eye can be that sensitive. But I shudder at the effect speculations and assumptions have on wives who read them. And I don't laugh it off. I think it does a lot of harm. The idea that divorce is a license to do what you please is not only mistaken, but a bad and dangerous example to hold before every housewife who is weary of hard work and dull routine.

The total effect of all the printed gossip is to give the impression that divorce gives a woman a chance to go have a mad fling for herself. It just isn't so. I've known more heartbreak in the past year than ever before in my life.

I didn't budge out of my apartment for six months. And now I'm pictured as a gay party-girl. Reading some of these recent magazine stories people must think I'm out doing the town. It is not true.

The public does not notice how much time has elapsed. To them, it seems that one minute you are married, the next you are divorced, and then you're living it up, just having a ball for yourself. I don't blame them. But, as a divorcee, I know how ridiculous these gossip-inspired opinions are.

PICTURE OF THE MONTH

THUNDER BAY James Stewart and Dan Duryea, just out of the army, head for Louisiana with schemes of being the first wildcatters to pump oil out of the Gulf of Mexico. Jay C. Flippen, an oil company president, stakes them and thereby nearly falls into bankruptcy. The local shrimp fishermen hate these guys whom they accuse of dynamiting their hauls to Kingdom Come as well as sullyng their daughters (Joanne Dru, Marcia Henderson). But not so. Stewart and Duryea are men of principle where those daughters are concerned. And Stewart's a man obsessed by the dream of finding that "black gold." Naturally, their money runs out, their time expires, squalls come up, the fishermen grow belligerent. The screen's so wide the Grand Canyon would be lost in it—well, almost. Anyway, the screen's the thing that lifts Thunder Bay out of mediocrity and makes it exciting. And then there's the sound—stereophonic is what they call it, which means you never know where the next voice is coming from. It's directional, supposed to come from wherever the speakers actually are. This is Universal-International's first go at the new, improved medium so you can't be too harsh on them. You really get to see how an off-shore drilling operation works and capture some of the thrill that comes with a strike, which incidentally, bathes that screen in oil. Cast includes Gilbert Roland, Antonio Moreno, Robert Monet, Henry Morgan. Technicolor, too.

ALL I DESIRE Ten years ago (that was 1900) Barbara Stanwyck walked out on her husband (Richard Carlson) and three children to avoid a scandal about her and Lyle Bettger. Barbara went into vaudeville, wound up below the dog acts. Now a letter from teenage daughter Lori Nelson brings her home. Carlson's now a school principal, quietly admired by Maureen O'Sullivan. Barbara likes it at home, is willing to stay, but Lyle Bettger's still around to press his dishonorable suit. He goes a little too far and gets shot by the lady. Accidentally, of course. But Barbara's ready to run again. Only this time, her husband bestirs himself to act like a man—U.I.

LET'S DO IT AGAIN Jane Wyman's built—and almost all of it shows in this Technicolor foolery. She's married to songwriter Ray Milland who has a penchant for taking business trips to Chicago. Actually, he never leaves Manhattan, just disappears into the bistros with Valerie Bettis who specializes in grinding out tribal ritual dances. So Jane cooks up her own romance—which unfortunately leads to divorce. Enter Aldo Ray a straight-from-the-shoulder millionaire. He goes for Jane. Milland sneers and goes for Karen Booth, but you know where his heart is. And where Jane's heart is. Tough getting back together. But they make it.—Columbia

YOUNG BESS An all-star cast in lavish Technicolor makes Young Bess an impressive historical drama. It is based on the life of Elizabeth the First (Jean Simmons). Early in life she fell in love with Thomas Seymour (Stewart Granger) who became Lord High Admiral of the English fleet, but this love was doomed. Charles Laughton plays Henry the lusty king who racked up wives like an adding machine. Deborah Kerr is the softly beautiful Catherine, one of his wives who later married Thomas Seymour. Rex Thompson is the sickly little boy King Edward. Kay Walsh, Guy Rolfe, Cecil Kellaway, Robert Arthur contribute to this costume masterpiece.—MGM

Immediately after you use Bobbi your hair has the beauty, the body, the soft, lovely look of naturally wavy hair. And your hair stays that way—your wave lasts week after week.

Bobbi's so easy to use, too. You just put your hair in pin curls. Then apply Bobbi Creme Oil Lotion. Rinse hair with water, let dry, brush out—and that's all. No clumsy curlers to use. No help needed even for beginners.

Ask for Bobbi Pin-Curl Permanent. If you like to be in fashion—if you can make a simple pin curl—you'll love Bobbi.

Easy! Just simple pin-curls and Bobbi give this far easier home permanent. When hair is dry, brush out. No separate neutralizer, no curlers, no resetting.

"EX..." or Exquisite?

As Laura read Jim's old love letters she had no idea what had broken their engagement. She spent many a lonely evening before she discovered that sometimes there's a breath of difference between "ex" and "exquisite." Once she corrected her trouble*, she gradually won Jim back. And exquisite she was as he carried her across the threshold . . . a girl with breath as sweet as the blossoms in her bridal bouquet.

Listerine Antiseptic not only stops *halitosis (bad breath) instantly . . . it usually keeps it stopped for hours on end. This superior deodorant effect is due to Listerine's ability to kill germs.

No chlorophyll kills odor bacteria like this . . . instantly

Germs are by far the most common cause of halitosis. Because they start the fermentation of proteins that are always present in your mouth. In fact, research shows that your breath stays sweeter longer depending upon the degree to which you reduce germs in your mouth. Listerine instantly kills these germs by millions, including the bacteria that cause fermentation. Brushing your teeth doesn't give you any such antiseptic protection. Chlorophyll or chewing gums do not kill germs. Listerine does.

Clinically proved four times better than tooth paste

No wonder that in recent clinical tests Listerine Antiseptic averaged four times better in reducing breath odors than the two leading tooth pastes, as well as the three leading chlorophyll products, it was tested against. That's why we say, if you're really serious about your breath, no matter what else you may use, use an antiseptic. Kill those odor bacteria with Listerine—the most widely used antiseptic in the world. Rinse with it night and morning, and before any date where you want to be at your best.

LISTERINE ANTISEPTIC STOPS BAD BREATH

4 TIMES BETTER THAN CHLOROPHYLL OR TOOTH PASTE

THE GREAT SIOUX UPRISING The Union Army needs horses and Lyle Bettger, who supplies 'em, isn't above stealing 'em from the Sioux tribe. The Sioux chief (John War Eagle) is so enraged he's about to enter the Civil War on the Confederate side. Jeff Chandler wanders into camp. Chandler wins Eagle's confidence but shortly loses it when more horses are stolen. There are a whole bunch of ranchers who have a run-in with Bettger and his gang. The foreman of that gang—Stacey Harris—murders one of the ranchers, pins it on Jeff. He's in hot water with everyone except Faith Domergue. She's a horse-trader, too, but legit. Jeff escapes a lynching mob, only to face more brutality among the Indians. In the end he wins both vindication and Faith's hand.—U.I.

DANGEROUS WHEN WET The father of Esther Williams (William Demarest) and the mother (Charlotte Greenwood) and the kid sisters (Donna Corcoran, Barbara Whiting) are all health faddists. Promoter Jack Carson promotes them all into swimming the Channel. At the crucial moment, though, only Esther's allowed to chance it. Her training period's broken down by the appearance of playboy Fernando Lamas who'd rather she made love. Carson's too busy being pursued by Denise Darcel (another swimmer) to keep an eye on Esther. This Lamas does constantly—and the way she looks in bathing suits it's no wonder.—MGM.

THE MOON IS BLUE Barbara Bel Geddes starred in it on Broadway. Maggie McNamara brings this delightful comedy to the screen, assisted by Bill Holden and David Niven. Story of a pick-up on the observation roof of the Empire State Building that leads to love in an apartment several blocks away. Holden's just broken off with Dawn Addams (Niven's daughter). This makes Dawn a little hysterical, understandably. Niven views the proceedings with high humor (he's generally very high) and makes a play for Maggie himself. The dialogue's fast, clever and risqué but that's no complaint.—U.A.

THE BEAST FROM 20,000 FATHOMS Top science writer Ray Bradbury inspired this movie about a pre-historic monster who's awakened from a long doze by an atomic blast at the North Pole. Professor Paul Christian swears he saw the beast. Among the people who consider Christian nice but nutty are

Army Colonel Ken Tobey, noted paleontologist Cecil Kellaway and several psychiatrists. Kellaway's assistant (Lee Hunter) thinks Christian's sane enough to marry. Strange things start happening from Nova Scotia to Massachusetts—fishing ketches destroyed, lighthouses ripped to nothing, docks strewn with debris. Comes the day this animal crawls onto the Fulton Street pier and terrorizes New York. An exciting wind-up brings things back to normal. —Warners.

TAKE ME TO TOWN This is the tale of Vermilion O'Toole (Ann Sheridan) who started out in a dance hall and ended up teaching school. Ann's being escorted to prison (she was framed) with bad boy Philip Reed when she jumps the train right into the life of Sterling Hayden. He's a preacher, also a logger, also a widower with three sons (9 year-old Lee Aaker, 5-year-old Harvey Grant and 3-year-old Dusty Henley). When Dad leaves them for a few days on a job they pick up Ann, bring her home where they hope to install her as their new mother. The town ladies flip their lids, especially prudish Phyllis Stanley. When Sterling returns he tells Ann go but next day she saves Dusty from a bear, cooks a wonderful dinner and looks quite gorgeous in Technicolor. It's love, and when Sheridan stages a show to get money to build a church, it's marriage to Sterling plus a new job teaching Sunday School —U.I.

REMAINS TO BE SEEN Based on a Broadway comedy Remains To Be Seen is a snappy story of the murder of a millionaire (Morgan Farley) who is found dead in his Park Avenue apartment, and two minutes after he's dead someone sticks a bread knife in his chest. Crazy goings-on involving the house manager Van Johnson, the corpse's unloving niece June Allyson, his attorney Louis Calhern, his doctor John Beal and a slightly schizoid woman of mystery, Angela Lansbury. Between finding the murderer (if you can call it murder) and falling in love, June and Van act cute all over the place. Van's a jazz addict, bot on drums; June's a jitterbug, quick on the upbeat. It's a true mating of minds. —M-G-M.

FRANCIS COVERS THE BIG TOWN Donald O'Connor, copy boy on a big New York City newspaper, has a real flair for bringing in news stories before they break. This is very helpful to gossip columnist Nancy Guild (whom he adores) and crime reporter Larry Gates (whom he hero-worships). But these two just use him for their greater glory, pump him about where he gets his information. Simple, he says, he gets it from Francis the mule who gets it from the police horses. Every time Donald admits this, he's given a psychiatric examination. But he has his day—in court, where he's on trial for murdering tycoon Lowell Gilmore. Only person, or thing, that can prove Donald's innocence is Francis. —U.I.

what divorce did to me

(Continued from page 16) and grow, just like Baron Munchausen's cherry trees. You hear about yourself in places you've never been, and with people you've never met. One person tells another, it's printed in one place, rewritten and added to for another publication. Everybody gossips about a divorced person. I probably did it myself until I was divorced. I'll never do it again.

I used to read the kind of stories they are writing about me now as exciting bits of news. Now they excite only my anger!

The plain truth is that I am having a hard time getting adjusted—and so does every other person who goes through a divorce. How about giving us a chance? I know I am just one of too many thousands, but every other person who has gone through a divorce and is a parent will, I am sure, understand my problem.

I have a child, whom I dearly love. She has to live with my decision and the world I have created or torn apart. It is my responsibility, for which she will either blame or thank me. No mother wants to make her child's world one of bewilderment, full of strangers.

MONIE has to go to school and face the inquiries and comment of her school-mates. I do not forget this fact. Above all I hope for the chance for Monie to grow up normally.

Normal growth and normal home life are becoming more and more unusual in our society today. It is a growing rarity to find a happy marriage. Many young couples are having a difficult time, trying to hold their marriages together.

If they pick up a newspaper every day, they are constantly confronted with broken marriages. Next, they read about these divorcing couples dating freely. It all sounds like a merry exchange as it is dinned upon by the radio, newspapers, magazines, columnists, etc. With this unending barrage, it is no wonder that so many couples decide that it is so much easier to call it quits and get a divorce. Many of them are victims of this propaganda of our times—which sells newspapers and magazines, and sells marriage out.

Divorce is a serious matter, but you'd never realize it from most of what you read or hear. I can say, from my own experience, it is not attractive, or easy.

My religion means more to me today than it ever did before. It has been the only thing that has helped my troubled mind and spirit, and given me hope for the future. It has disciplined my thinking a great deal, too. And I believe I am gaining a perspective. Some of the things which used to be most important to me are more properly rated now, I'm sure. I think a long time before I arrive at an inflexible opinion. It takes two people to make a successful marriage, and it takes two people to make a marriage fail. While I still do not think it at all probable that my husband and I will ever go back together, I am not going to destroy the friendship we saved from our marriage, and I am not going to think a reconciliation is utterly impossible.

IN most cases, pride and ego are the worst hazards to reconciliation. Those qualities, plus emotional or economical insecurity often becloud logical thinking.

During a tense period, such as often leads to divorce, almost any married person gets the feeling of being trapped. If the family economic situation is bad—that adds to it.

Actually, once the idea of divorce enters the picture as a release—when the wife starts figuring how much alimony or child support she can get—and the husband starts wondering how much he would have left to support another wife—that couple is ready to tell it to the judge. If they decide that their income can't stand the strain of the economical necessity—that is a tragic set-up for all concerned. But most couples act in haste. There's nothing new to acting in haste and repenting in leisure.

And believe me, "going home to Mother," isn't an automatic answer. Parents don't particularly want you back.

They may dread the day when their daughter leaves them to be married, but most of them adjust after the wedding—and dread it more when their son-in-law becomes an ex—and the daughter wants to come back home.

Then there are the specific, unpublicized problems in the life of a divorcee. No. 1—Loneliness. Perhaps men think of divorcees as "fair game" but women never think of themselves as "fair game." They only think of themselves as lonely. They don't think of every man they meet as a potential husband, but they do think about and they do need emotional security—someone to believe, trust, and be fond of. Sex is not at the top of this list. You think twice before marrying again, even when there is not a religious barrier. That year's necessary wait in California, between the interlocutory and final divorce, is the best law the state has!

One thing I have discovered over and over since my divorce is the inability of most people to face their problems. They try to hide them, evade them, not talk about them, which just adds up to problems unsolved. The resultant tragedy is that few people truly understand each other, or have any idea of how to help another human being. I guess all of us hide behind false faces all too often.

I have spent a great deal of time in Palm Springs since my divorce, most of it as the guest of Mousie and Bill Powell.

I find myself thinking more and more about a lot of the people I see there. Most of the people who can spend a lot of time at resorts are rich in material things, and most of them have problems too—that their money can't buy them out of. And there are any number of terrible things people can have to cope with. But they smile and they laugh and they sit and drink and talk about getting their poodles clipped. Or who is a good manicurist. Or complain about the way their hair is done. Or the kind of canasta hands they've been having. Gee, but they're lonely, too. Always in a crowd and always alone.

I get frightened.

THE thing that scares me is to see people concentrating on the details of material living and letting the big problems go unsolved or enduring them with no hope of solution. And I believe that is exactly what too many of us are doing.

I can "escape" to Palm Springs, but I hurry home because, once I'm there it kind of upsets me. It is okay as long as I am playing tennis, which I love, or basking in the sun, or seeing good, reliable old friends—but I can only take just so much of that, too. It is this that has made me revalue my life and re-appreciate the invaluable help and protection of my religion.

I want to understand my problems, and I am working on them. I want to live a good life and to be a good mother. I read inferences and inuendos about what I'm doing and it sounds like I am racing down that primrose path so vividly described by some of the writers. I'm not racing anywhere. I'm walking slowly, carefully, on the path all divorcees know.

It is not a journey I would recommend to anyone.

the battling WAYNES in court

The verdict isn't in yet, but the preliminary rounds indicate that the divorce between Duke and Chata Wayne will be the bitterest in Hollywood history.

BY SANDY CUMMINGS

■ This happened just before John Wayne left for Mexico, for Camargo in Chihuahua to be exact, where Duke is making Hondo for his own independent motion picture company, Wayne-Fellows, Inc.

Wayne was striding out of Superior Judge William R. McKay's courtroom when I edged up to him and said, "How's it going, Duke?"

The actor took out a handkerchief and mopped his brow. "You know," he said, a wry grin forming itself on his lips, "I may never get married again."

And Duke wasn't kidding, either, because his second wife Esperanza Bauer Wayne has been giving him a real bad time in the California law courts.

Ever since they agreed to separate on May 7th, 1952, after six years, three months, and 20 days of marriage, Duke and the former Mexican film star have been at loggerheads.

"Chata" Wayne—the word means "pugnose" in Spanish and is what Duke used to call his wife in happier times—first filed a suit for separate maintenance last year when she hired famed legal light Jerry Giesler to represent her.

Duke answered that suit by announcing that a separation wasn't good enough for him. What he wanted was to be completely free from this 30-year-old beauty, whereupon he in turn filed a divorce suit which is scheduled to come up this October, and it's going to be a lulu.

After Duke filed his suit for divorce, the lawyers for both parties got together. Wayne's financial worth is indeed a complex affair, and it took some time for lawyers Jerry Giesler and Frank Belcher to arrive at some equitable financial settlement for "Chata."

Just before such an agreement was to be resolved, the second Mrs. Wayne decided to substitute lawyers. She hired an attorney named (Continued on page 95)

FROM THE MOVIES

ANNA—title song by Al Caiola (Victor).

Al Caiola is a fine guitarist, but, like everyone who has made other versions since the sultry Silvana Magnano's (reviewed here two issues ago) he has to take second place to her.

LIMELIGHT—Theme music by Frank Chaskfield (London).

MAIN STREET TO BROADWAY—There's Music In You by Freddy Martin (Victor).

RETURN TO PARADISE—title song by Percy Faith* (Columbia); David Rose (MGM); Nat Cole (Capitol); Camoroto (London); Alon Dale (Coro).

Looks as if history is trying to repeat itself—the same star (Gary Cooper), the same songwriting team (Ned Washington and Dimitri Tiomkin) and the same strange fascination about the title song that you found in High Noon. The Percy Faith version, which runs to two sides, has no vocal but is the most interesting performance.

RUBY GENTRY—Ruby by Harry James* (Columbia); Vaughn Monroe (Victor).

The James treatment is a pleasing job, featuring the accordion work of young Tommy Gumino, who's been on tour with the James band for several months. Vaughn's version is less impressive; incidentally, it was one of the last records made before he broke up his band. He's on his own now, big enough in movies and night clubs not to need an orchestra.

SALOME—sound track album* (Decca).

Music and scenes (but principally music) with some interesting symphonic work by an orchestra under the direction of Morris Stoloff.

SMALL TOWN GIRL—My Flaming Heart by Nat Cole* (Capitol).

POPULAR

JUDY GARLAND—*Send My Baby Back To Me (Columbia)

Judy makes her Columbia record debut with a gay, swinging performance on which Poul Weston's orchestra helps bounce her along. The ballad on the other side, Without A Memory, is a good dramatic job.

KAY STARR—*Allez Vous En (Capitol).

Kay does a nice job on this waltz, one of the better songs from Cole Porter's generally disappointing score for the Broadway show Can Can. Capitol has several of the better records on other songs from the production, including Gordon MacRae's C'est Magnifique.

JAZZ

HARRY JAMES—*One Night Stand (Columbia). A 12-inch LP record of hits.

HIS FANS MAY THINK HE'S A BASHFUL BEAU, BUT THE WOMEN IN HIS PRIVATE LIFE KNOW BETTER.

The shy Mr. Cooper

By ALICE HOFFMAN

■ For 27 years, the entire length of his motion picture career, Gary Cooper has led a charmed life.

His virtues have been exploited, and his faults have been neglected.

To the world at large he has become the symbol of the typical American Westerner—tall, quiet, and a perfect physical specimen. He has never in his career played "the heavy," so that in the public mind he has always been rated gallant, trustworthy, singularly simple and loyal.

In the past year and a half, however, ever since his separation from his wife, Coop has been examined with a more realistic eye.

After reviewing his life and the women in it, an incredibly varied assortment of international beauties, after reading for two decades a succession of headlines involving him with Clara Bow, Lupe Velez, Countess Di Frasso, Pat Neal, Dusty Miller, the Mexican charmer called Channele, and now the French beauty, Gisele Pascal—even the most fanatic of Cooper's fans have come to the belated conclusion that Gary is (Continued on page 73)

can Jane forget the Past?

■ It's a big room, the supper room at the Desert Inn at Las Vegas, one of the biggest, flossiest night club rooms in America—and it was jammed to capacity. More than 500 people sat hunched together over white table cloths waiting for something to happen. If you were an idle observer you might naturally think they were waiting for a show to go on. And they were in a sense. The billing outside on the huge electric sign said "JANE POWELL," and the report was she was getting $5,000 a week. Yes, they were waiting for Jane Powell all right, but not just to hear her sing.

Most of the people sitting in that room that night had known Jane Powell, from seeing her on the screen and reading about her in the newspapers and magazines, ever since she was a kid of 14. They had known her as an exemplary wife and mother. But for the past couple of weeks they had been reading a different kind of story. "Will she or will she not divorce her husband, Geary Steffen?" "Is she or is she not in love with Gene Nelson?" There was tension in the room as the audience waited to get a look at her and maybe make a judgment for themselves.

Every opening night is tough, but this was a particularly tough one for Jane, because she knew what they were waiting for, too, and she had to go on with the show as though the customers out there weren't buying anything but her songs. She sat in her dressing room and thought about all this.

Jane saw Geary right before she opened at the Desert Inn, but she was still unsure of a reconciliation.

Surrounded by friends, like the Barron Hiltons (above) the Steffens had little time to themselves.

Many guests were shocked opening night when Jane sang "Good-bye, baby, I'm leaving you."

Jane's troubles started when MGM began glamorizing her. Did she take it too seriously?

EVEN EUROPE'S WORLDLY-WISE COI

■ This past April, an hour before Lana Turner's plane was scheduled to land at Orly Airport outside of Paris, a group of French reporters were discussing the actress.

"Do you think," one asked, "she will come alone or with Texas Barker?"

"His name is not Texas Barker," explained a newsman who had pulled a stint in Hollywood. "His name is Lex. It is kind of an American nickname for Alexander."

and her constant escort, Lex, journeyed to the Isle of Capri. In spite of the dark glasses, the actress was easily recognized everywhere.

CONTINENTALS WERE STARTLED BY LANA TURNER'S FRANK AND OPEN BEHAVIOR WITH LEX ■ By TOM DANCY

"Tex or Lex," the first reporter insisted, "makes no difference. Is he coming with her or is he not?"

"I heard," volunteered a third reporter, "that they tried to book their flight under an assumed name, something like Richardson."

"What I can't find out," one photographer interrupted, "is whether they are married or not. I heard or read somewhere that they had been secretly married."

"I do not even think they are engaged," a French movie representative said authoritatively. Then as an added thought. "His name is not Tex. It is Tarzan."

For half an hour conjecture was thrown about with reckless abandon. One reporter said that Lana would undoubtedly arrive alone, that Lex Barker would meet her at some appointed rendezvous in France or

Italy. "It is the only diplomatic way," he pointed out. "Otherwise there will be talk."

"Why should there be talk?" someone else asked. "This Tarzan is merely her bodyguard. She hired him because she is afraid of Fernando Lamas. He is her real lover."

The announcement that Lana's plane was arriving cut the conversation short. The reporters raced (Continued on page 96)

■ To begin with, I can't think of anyone I'd rather discuss than Rock. It's so easy to say nice things about him. Maybe this won't make MODERN SCREEN happy, because they've asked me to lower the boom on this character, but I honestly can't think of anything horrible to say about him. With some people you can, and when you're asked what you think of them you have to go around corners to think up something nice. But Rock's just as genuine as he is big.

I could, of course, talk about his appetite, which is unlike anything I've ever seen. I remember I first met him the afternoon he came over to the apartment where I lived with my parents on Western Avenue. We were to make our first test together, and he dropped in to talk over the scene with me. Mother asked him to stay to a chicken dinner, and she's never been so thankful that our larder was loaded. I didn't keep track, but I could swear he ate three whole chickens that night. We've teased him about it ever since, but it doesn't seem to dampen his ardor for food. One night when we had a dinner date he arrived at the house before I was ready. About ten minutes later I walked into the living room and found Rock munching on a sandwich mother had made for him. We went directly to dinner after that, and before he brought me home we stopped for a snack in a drive-in. We always do, unless I have to get home particularly early, and even then I'll bet he stops off somewhere by himself for a steak to tide him over until morning.

The wonderful thing about Rock is that he enjoys kidding himself as much as he does teasing others. Like the night he was due (Continued on page 75)

5. Susan Zanuck considers Rock's social sense and good manners a great asset to him.

6. Marilyn Maxwell finds his sincerity refreshing, particularly in Hollywood.

7. Gene Tierney enjoys Rock's company, even while he's growing beard for movie role.

the Price of Fame

■ In Hollywood there are two reactions to newly arrived stars: (A) "He's a jerk and he'll get what he deserves," and (B) "He's a nice guy . . . I hope he keeps his head."

People in the movie industry know, more or less subconsciously, that as success comes to each new star, so also comes a personal battle, one that is often lost. The mental attitude known as Hollywooditis comes as a result of sudden fame and fortune. It is a disease characterized by a swelling of the head and a loss of a normal sense of values, and those strong enough to resist it are few and far between.

Tony Curtis was around town a long time before his good looks were noticed by movie goers, and once that happened his popularity grew to such proportions that his studio was forced to star him in a picture. To Tony, success came overnight and when hand in hand with his flood of fan mail he was accorded an equal deluge of publicity, the people in Hollywood suddenly came to know him . . . the columnists, the publicists, the head waiters, writers and parking lot attendants. They all accorded him the reaction given the nice guys; they hoped he would keep his head.

Tony was a new and refreshing type. His zest for living, his easy laughter, his pleasure in relating the homey incidents of his life on the drearier streets of New York, all in a vocabulary flushed with idioms that could come from nowhere except the Bronx . . . these things made him well liked. They also made him, because of the great contrasts shortly to come into his life, a likely and susceptible victim of Hollywooditis.

In three short, bewildering years he has progressed from a bicycle to a Buick convertible, from a bachelor life to a highly publicized marriage with the glamorous Janet Leigh, from a routine existence in the little frame house in the valley with his parents to a well appointed penthouse on Wilshire Boulevard's fashionable row. And (Continued on page 87)

TOO BUSY FOR A LONG VACATION

Tony and Janet scramble into the motor launch for a day on Lake Mead outside Las Vegas.

The skipper's son decides he wants to be a movie star too, so Tony gives him some hints.

"Pretty good for one day's haul," boasts Tony, who's proud of the beauties they bagged.

TONY AND JANET MANAGE TO SQUEEZE A SUMMER'S WORTH OF FUN INTO ONE JAM-PACKED DAY ON THE LAKE.

A quick look around, and "this is the life for me," exclaims Tony. Janet heartily agrees.

"Now, ya do it this way, see?" instructs the expert. But wait and see who gets the first bite!

"Reel it in, reel it in," he cries gleefully . . . but Janet's so excited the lucky fish gets away.

Lunchtime, so Janet gets stuck with K.P. But no one remembered to bring a can opener!

The day wouldn't be complete without snapshots to show the folks. Janet poses, Tony snaps.

On the way back to shore, the Curtises troll their lines in the water, catch a few more.

"Can you cook it in white wine?" asks Janet, when they deliver their dinner to the chef.

A day's outing can certainly mess up a girl's coiffure . . . but a wash and set works wonders.

Sunburned and happy, the Curtises wait in the Hotel Flamingo's dining room for dinner.

Peck's a good boy now

GREG'S LEARNED THAT HE CAN'T LATE-DATE, NOT EVEN IN NIGHT-

Mrs. Greta Peck (right) and film actress Hildegard Neff (left) are friendly enough in public, but intimates hinted at bitter rivalry a while ago. Hildegard's name was linked with Greg's when they made Snows Of Kilimanjaro, but they're never together now.

Surrounded by admiring women everywhere he goes, Gregory Peck finds it difficult to keep out of the spotlight. But, his trip abroad taught him that a movie idol's life must be above reproach. No more casual feminine companions for him, at least, not in public.

Greg, Greta, and their three sons all went to Europe together . . . but Greta cut short her stay, and returned with the children.

■ One of the first facts of life that a motion picture star must learn is that his public consists of the entire movie-going world. Gregory Peck has found this out now but he learned it the hard way, through personal experience, and he knows the sad truth: that a movie star can't fool around at all, however innocuously, without the world gleaning some glint of truth and magnifying that glint into a juicy news story of domestic discord.

As a result of his behavior in Europe since last June, Greg has seen his name smeared across the front pages of a hundred newspapers.

Practically every columnist in America who deals with affairs cinematic, has announced that Greg and his wife Greta have separated, that a divorce is under discussion, that these two fought like cats all over Europe, that Greta and the three Peck boys left France in a huff because Greg's marital conduct left much to be desired.

Greg has read time and time again the printed innuendo linking him with the Parisian model (Continued on page 81)

SHELLEY WINTERS IS HOLLYWOOD'S MOST ADORING WIFE AND MOTHER. BUT HOW LONG CAN SHE OVERLOOK HER HUSBAND'S SEEMING

CAN THIS

KEEP THIS TOGETHER?

With Vittoria away, Shelley was alone before and after her baby's birth in February.

DIFFERENCE TO THEIR NEW DAUGHTER?

■ If the marriage of Shelley Winters and Vittorio Gassman survives, it will be chiefly because Shelley has never lost anything she really wants. And she wants the elusive Italian—for better or worse—and to date, it's been rough going.

To say that Vittorio has put our emotional Shelley through the wringer is to understate the case. But she's taken it amazingly well. To me it was unforgivable that he was far away when a woman needs a man most. I find it hard to believe his excuse that the Italian government wouldn't release him for one little week, so he could fly to Shelley in Hollywood, when she was giving birth to their baby. But who am I to get mad, when it was all right with Shelley? But let's face it—anything Vittorio does is all right with his adoring movie star bride.

It was really pathetic. Everytime Shelley received a letter from him, she called the columnists to rave of his reviews in the plays that were keeping him 6,000 miles away from her. She was terribly proud of spending $500 a month on telephone calls to her beloved Gassman. It would be (Continued on page 93)

YOU CAN WIN AND LOSE A FORTUNE AT LAS VEGAS. BUT VAN JOHNSON DID BETTER THAN THAT. HE WON HIMSELF A WHOLE NEW SLANT ON LIFE.

"I'm not afraid any more"

by Steve Cronin

■ One evening last April Van Johnson walked into the spotlight at The Sands hotel in Las Vegas. It was his first nightclub appearance in a dozen years but those years didn't show. His almost orange hair, the spray of freckles across his face, the perky maroon bow tie still added up to the American boy—even at 36.

This was the night for Van Johnson. He was about to test himself before the toughest audience of all—a live audience, sitting out there in the dark waiting to be amused.

He spoke his first word as if he'd just discovered he had a voice. But one word led to another and then he was singing. And when the music hit a certain beat he went into a dance.

He worked with a kind of reckless charm, covering the stage like a whole Broadway chorus and everybody thought he was having a wonderful time. Nobody suspected he was so tensed up that if he'd been hit on the head with a piece of the rafter he wouldn't even have felt it.

There was a song he sang about Hollywood and how he didn't want to play there anymore. Goodbye Esther Williams, ditto June Allyson, farewell to all the girls who ever cast a tender eye on this eager, bashful Romeo. And let Leo the MGM Lion roar: Van's ears were plugged.

That song went over big. His wife Evie, who was sitting at a ringside table with Marlene Dietrich and Peter Lawford, applauded along with everybody else. This was Evie's night, too, in a way. She'd rarely been able to drag her man within five miles of a nightclub, and here he was kicking up his famous red socks all over the floor.

Van was a hit, all right. But a couple of odd things happened after that performance, although not necessarily in the following order.

People started saying that Van Johnson wasn't kidding about that farewell song; he really was through with Hollywood. And Van Johnson (Continued on page 64)

Congratulatory telegrams, and admiring friends like Pete Lawford and June Allyson, spurred Van's smash debut at The Sands.

RETREAT TO PARADISE

By Marya Peterson

Jan and Paul's house, set on 14 acres of wooded land, looks more like New England than California. It used to belong to Melvyn Douglas.

A country hideaway five minutes from Hollywood and Vine? Impossible said real estate men. Imperative, said the Douglas'—who got what they wanted.

■ Paul Douglas is a deceptive man. He looks a little like a mug. No doubt about it. Wide-angle nose, jut-jaw, sandpaper voice, truck-driver's shoulders, and practically no neck; so that when you look at Paul and try to imagine what sort of home this rugged, talented star lives in, your first guess is that he occupies an ostentatious pent house or maybe just a simple room in the Hollywood Athletic Club.

There is absolutely no correlation between Douglas' screen personality and his environment.

Douglas and his beautiful, well-bred wife, Jan Sterling, live in one of the great showplaces of the movie colony, the kind of tastefully-furnished, landscaped estate (Continued on next page)

The black and gold chairs and table in the dining room are modern copies of Chinese Chippendale. To offset the rather ornate furniture, the colorful floor, drapes and walls have been kept simple in design.

Because they do lots of their living in their spacious bedroom, Jan and Paul placed many of their favorite books and paintings here. They breakfast lazily on the roomy coffee table when they're not working.

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

Paul found this three-paneled Chinese screen (left) in Tokyo, on his way back from his first Korean trip. It serves to camouflage their record unit. The twin alabaster lamps on either side of the couch (right) are antique urns, found in a little shop in Los Angeles.

The Douglasses, like most movie stars, make use of their pool. It's beautifully landscaped, and they are able to swim there almost all year round. Jan's latest film is Alaskan Seas. Paul's in Forever Female.

Although their seven-room house, located in the Hollywood Outpost Estates section, is rural and in a quiet neighborhood, it's only a five minute drive to the heart of town. They spent $60,000 for the place.

Paul's office, which used to be the fourth bedroom, is a wonderful place for spreading himself around. Here, he spends a lot of time watching sports on television, and catching up on his reading.

you might expect of a Rockefeller or a DuPont or even a Vanderbilt, the type of home that exudes an air of gentility, refinement, and fifth-generation money.

It doesn't look like the kind of house most people imagine that actors live in.

Located on 13 acres of woods that have been manicured with careful casualness, the Douglas property resembles a slice of New England countryside transplanted in California.

Rural and deceptively quiet, it is only five minutes by Cadillac, the approved movietown method of transportation, to the corner of Hollywood and Vine. This district is known as the Hollywood Outpost Estates, and 25 years ago when movie stars lived nearer the studios, it was considered the most exclusive residential district in town.

In fact, it filled up so rapidly that actors who now have the money must go further West to Bel-Air, Brentwood, and the Pacific Palisades for their homesites.

The people who live in the Outpost Estates built their homes soundly and with surprisingly little show so that, for the most part, the basic architectural motif of the district is not rococo; and the sightseeing buses stay clear of it for that reason.

In all truth, Paul and Jan Douglas were extremely lucky in buying their house. The previous owner, another named Douglas—Melvyn Douglas—had sunk more than $150,000 into the property but had to move East to star in a long-running Broadway comedy. Whereupon (Continued on page 92)

"Where do I go from here?"

asks Betty Grable

"One day I'll just up and quit," threatens Betty. And intimates suspect that day'll come when business starts interfering with home life.

Betty glories in her role as wife and mother. The undisputed glamor queen of Hollywood for years has always felt her husband and children came first.

Betty Grable and Harry James don't go out often . . . but when they do, all Hollywood can see for itself how much in love the glamour go-

Harry James gets more of a thrill playing his latest records for his family than filling an engagement in any of the swankiest, big-time night spots.

Jessica and Victoria have a pet parakeet, and teaching it to talk has become a family project. But so far . . . no luck!

Harry's away a lot with the band, so his homecomings are always exciting. Betty rarely accompanies him; she'd rather stay home with their daughters.

BY JIM BURTON

■ It was a lousy, gloomy day in Beverly Hills when Miss Betty Grable, who'd a lot rather you'd call her Mrs. James, stood in the library of her green home and said:

"One day something will happen that'll decide it. Something will come up that I can't walk away from, can't sideswipe, can't meet head on without fracturing something. If it's a locomotive, I'm the one fractured. That's when I'll leave pictures. That's the answer to that question 'Is Betty Grable Through?' If it's an answer."

And what form would it be apt to take?

"Well, for instance. I make a picture. The script is good. The preview is good. The critics like it. The studio likes it. Even I like it. (Continued on page 66)

Here are the first pictures of the sensational new hair-do that told Hollywood Jeanne Crain had kicked over the traces. Here's how it happened.

BY SUSAN TRENT

Some changes made!

■ Jeanne Crain has always maintained that she is no pace setter where fashions are concerned. ("I stuff my purse with notes about other women's clothes.") Last spring, however, she took off on her own and got a haircut that has the whole town talking. The Bobcat Bob, as it has become known, was wholly Jeanne's idea, and she directed every nick of the razor to complete what she enthusiastically calls "the most wonderful haircut I've ever had."

Hair-dos in Hollywood have run the gamut from shoulder length hair for men to a random razor hacking for women, but Jeanne's is different on two counts. First of all it's an exceptionally good haircut for reasons which will follow, and secondly it is indicative of her current rebellion.

Psychologists have said that when a woman shears off her crowning glory she is getting ready to kick up her heels, and this holds true in Jeanne's case. The impulse to cut her hair to a minimum coincided with her urge to leave 20th Century-Fox, the studio with which she has been under contract ever since her movie career began, ten years ago. It is not easy for an actress who has been given her break, her fame, her training, her stardom and her entire professional career within the (Continued on page 79)

It was a Ball!

■ The little guy sat there quietly, remembering ten years ago, not saying anything.

"But what about it, Frank," his friend asked. "How was it? Were you happy?"

"Happy?" For a moment he was baffled by the word, as so many hyper-active people are prone to be. Perhaps it wasn't a specific word. But he shook it off. "I was—I was everything. Happy, I don't know. I wasn't unhappy, let's put it that way. I never had it so good. Sometimes I wonder whether anybody ever had it like I had it, before or since. It was the damndest thing, wasn't it?" He spoke in honest wonder. "But what it really was like, I was too busy ever to know whether I was happy, or even to ask myself. I can't remember for a long time even taking time out to think, which I guess was all for the best. Anyway, what time was there? But I did get my thinking in before it was too late."

What thinking?

"About when and how it was going to end and what I'd do then. I don't care what they say, I never had any ideas about it going on forever. I wasn't kidding myself. But it was my business to get a cushion ready for the fall, make sure about the balloon, you know. Some balloons, they burst, and some, the air goes out of them gradually, it depends on how you treat the balloon. I had to level off slowly or else. It was the only problem that kept me awake nights. It was serious. I think it's worked out all right but it didn't have to. And of course, I was bound to go into a dive at first. And when that happened, some of my pals—" He made a small motion across his throat with his index finger.

"The jerks who loved Frankie, they never even called me up to ask how I was, not a single word. It was like they'd never (Continued on page 69)

SOME LIKE 'EM BLONDE, SOME LIKE 'EM DARK . . . BUT THE BROOKLYN REDHEAD KNOCKS 'EM ALL DEAD.

Susie's got everything!

by Imogene Collins

■ This past Easter when titian-haired Susan Hayward, Brooklyn's 33-year-old gift to Hollywood, was touring Europe with her husband, blond, handsome Jess Barker, these love birds checked in at the Grand Hotel in Rome.

Accompanying them on their first Continental journey and delayed honeymoon—the Barkers had no honeymoon when they were married nine years ago—was an affable young man of 23 who had been loaned to them by the Paris office of 20th Century-Fox to act as a combination guide-secretary-chauffeur. His name is Jean Papote.

In Rome, Jean was approached by several newspapermen and magazine writers. Was it true, they asked, that Miss Hayward was notoriously chary about granting interviews?

"Exactly the opposite," Papote told them. "She is most cooperative."

The next thing anyone knew Susan Hayward was being interviewed and photographed as only the Italians can do it . . . with verve, gusto, and endless questions.

One Roman reporter who spent a good deal of time with Susan later ran into me in front of the Excelsior Hotel which is a lot like Schwab's drugstore in Hollywood (Continued on page 98)

Susan's first bullfight was a thrilling experience . . . particularly when one of the toreadors, Juilo Apocio, (right) dedicated a bull to her. Susan (left) returns the hot he threw her as sign of the dedication.

After the bullfight was over, Susan and her husband, Jess Barker (center) posed with one of the other toreadors, Antonete. Susie particularly wanted the picture to send back home to her twin sons, eight year old Timothy and Gregory.

Susie did lots of sightseeing so she could tell the twins about Europe. The Barkers are planning another trip, the next time with the boys.

Most youngsters have one special dream. Tab Hunter had lots. But the most glorious of all—becoming a movie star—he never even dared hope for!

BY KIRTLEY BASKETTE

a pocketful of Dreams

Tab's always been wild about horses, so a visit to an amusement park wouldn't be complete without a ride on the carousel! Gloria's next picture is Twelve Mile Reef.

A tow-headed, 13-year-old kid sat down at a kitchen table one afternoon a few years ago and wrote a letter to the girl of his dreams:

"Dear Elizabeth Taylor," he scribbled with a stumpy pencil, "I have just seen National Velvet and you are my favorite actress. I think you are wonderful, also your horse, King Charles. I love to ride too, especially jump. Would you please send me a picture of yourself on King Charles going over a fence? Yours sincerely, Arthur Gelien."

After he'd licked the envelope and smudged on a stamp, the kid looked across at a blue framed photograph of a goddess in spangles poised airily on the point of one skate. Every night he prayed, "God bless Mama, God bless my brother, Walt, and God bless Sonja Henie," then kissed the picture good-night. Now, with a sigh, he turned it to the wall.

Not long after that, this same romantic kid was wrapping Christmas packages in Barker Brothers' furniture store on Hollywood Boulevard to earn his living. He picked up one addressed to "Miss Linda Darnell", held it until the boss stared suspiciously, then busily gift-wrapped it with special care. "Brother," he told himself, "how I'd like to deliver this one in person!" That being out, he daringly printed "Merry Christmas, Linda!" in tiny letters, quickly covered the box with brown paper and spent the rest of the day knotting twine and wondering if his new idol would find the message.

Of course, what teen-age Art Gelien was doing—dreaming romantically of glamorous spheres far removed from his own—was not particularly unusual. But what happened to Art and those dreams is.

Tob dates many girls, among them starlets like Gloria Gordon (above), but has no special sweetheart. He was semi-officially engaged to Judy Powell, but they broke off. "I have to get set first," he says.

Popcorn tastes better when a pretty girl feeds it to you, is Tab's theory, so Gloria helpfully obliges. It wasn't too long ago that Tob and his family were so poor they didn't have enough to eat.

Good luck is the one thing Tab always had plenty of, whether it's in games, girls, or careers. His first movie role, opposite Linda Darnell, came because someone just happened to remember having met him.

I THINK GOD HEARS YOU WHEREVER YOU CARE TO TARRY TO THINK ABOUT HIM, FOR I BELIEVE THAT . . .

God lives in every church

by Richard Widmark

■ I am not a Catholic but one day last winter just before Christmas I dropped into St. Patrick's on Fifth Avenue in New York. I hadn't planned to enter. I was walking along, my thinking tied to various difficulties related to my eastern trip, including a heavy schedule of radio appearances, when the cathedral loomed up ahead. Almost automatically I turned up the steps when I got to the entrance and found myself a seat in a back pew. For a half hour I sat there while my mind seemed to give up its thoughts and was bathed, instead, with the deep peace that pervaded the quiet, vaulted interior.

I wasn't conscious of any deliberation of any sort as I sat there, yet when I walked out it was with an ease of being that stemmed from problems solved; what courses I should take about them seemed clear now. It was as if the factors of doubt that had beclouded my judgment before had not been able to enter the church with me, and with these eliminated, the solutions I sought became readily apparent.

This happened in St. Patrick's. It has happened to me also in other churches of other (Continued on opposite page) denominations . . . to none of which I belong. I am very grateful that the absence of an official relationship with religion has not also meant an end to a spiritual affinity with the religious concept of life which I always want to have. I came close to hating all churches in my time; it was a long, arduous climb back to a level where I came to a faith based on the conviction that our clay is the molding of an Unseen Hand.

Religion was no comfort to me in my childhood and youth; it was an irritant, responsible for constant bickering in the home. My father was a Lutheran, my mother a Christian Scientist, and her mother a Catholic. I was tossed up for grabs. There was a period in which I used to creep within earshot as they all argued about me, hotly, furiously. And then I stayed strictly away.

I don't have to tell you how a child instinctively reacts who is pulled this way and that without his even knowing, or even having the ability to understand, what all the furore is about. He resents it. He says, in effect, "A plague on all your houses." Not aloud, of course. To himself. And then he tells himself he will live his own life, and, unfortunately, looks for proof to discredit all who have been tugging at him.

For instance, the man counted most religious in our home town was related to our family and I had a good opportunity to study piety as publicly approved in him. He was not an inspiring example. He was rough, tyrannical, and was known to beat his wife. He also gave me some nasty lickings. The resentment I felt for him also took in the institution with which he was so prominently identified—the church, I'm afraid.

NEVERTHELESS I didn't turn heathen completely. The essence of many philosophies is that life is a search for truth. I was just a boy but this is the only way I can account for my actions for the next 10 or 15 years; I sought. My only clue to truth was the vague feeling that it was "upwards." Evil, of course, was in the other direction. By the time I was in the fifth grade, having attended the Lutheran and Christian Science Churches with my mother and father, I discovered that many of my boy friends were Presbyterians. I found myself impelled to go with them and see what this church was like. Later I visited the Methodist church, and later again, through high school, I was back in Christian Science.

But never through these years was I the open-hearted convert. The old bitterness had not left me completely and I had a sharp eye for religious "cheaters." Nothing angered me so much as those whose goodness was something they draped about themselves when they put on their Sunday clothes.

I think that any psychologist will recognize in this sort of thinking an inner and uncompromising protest, not uncommon with idealistic youth, at the presence of impure motivations in what should be the purest human manifestation—spiritual communion.

I realized then, as I do now, that there had to be Someone, well let's call Him an Understander, much bigger than I, Who had created this unfathomable phenomena called life, and Who alone knew the reason for it. I sensed too, as I do now, that it was good for the soul of man to seek closeness to this source of his being. Religion therefore was wonderful and important to me. But the more I felt this the more I questioned the ways in which I saw it practiced all around me.

I remember that when I left the Christian Science Church, sometime during my high school days, it was not in any spirit of criticism of the church but a dissatisfaction with myself. I could not evade self-incrimination flowing from a feeling that I was selfishly using the church as a crutch. I ran to it when things didn't go well. I saw the same use on the part of others. They leaned on the church, or used it much as a baby uses a pacifier. It seemed to me that God, who created man, would like a little more self-reliance from him and less timidity and weakness. It was no compliment to His handicraft to show yourself in the poorest possible light, nor any service to turn over all your troubles to Him.

People who were born into a church and no longer attend often describe the action of the break by saying that they "drifted" away. What I was fighting against was the easiness with which you could drift to it! Religion was too important a thing in my life to be just washed toward it because this was the thing to do, this was popular.

I remember talking to a friend about it and complaining that a lot of people went to church because it helped make them socially acceptable.

"Would you want churchgoing to be a secret habit?" he asked.

"Well, to move close to God, or feel that this is what you're doing is an intimate process," I claimed.

"That's true," he said. "But in any community there is a comfort to be gathered from seeing your neighbor drink at the same spiritual well and know that he seeks good counsel in his ways. We have laws and regulations in our society to enable all of us to live together peacefully, but these are restraints; the basis of man's security, we all instinctively feel, is the inspiration he gets from religion. Then he is one of us. Then our trust in him is deeper."

I knew what he meant. I knew that in many places the church is the centre of social life. And I knew this could be a good thing properly recognized. In the small towns in which I lived, including Sunrise, Minnesota, where I was born, Princeton, Illinois, where I graduated from high school, and Lake Forest, Illinois, where I both attended college and later taught English and drama, a great many activities were fostered by church groups. And we would have suffered a serious social and recreational lack without them. Yet, even so, these were side inducements to seek God and I couldn't get away from the feeling that one should not require bonuses to worship.

That was my predicament. I asked myself, "What do you do?" And I had no answer. Little by little I stopped thinking about it and grew into maturity as the kind of man you would call a doer more than a thinker. I didn't want to think.

Of course that doesn't work; at least it isn't a final way of life. When things got rugged with me, whenever it was a matter of touch and go, I would find myself looking up and asking, "Please help me."

During World War Two my brother, a pilot in the Army Air Force, had a bad time of it. He was shot down three times in Europe, one time landing with a burning parachute. He was a prisoner of war in Germany for two years. He had to undergo critical brain operations as a result of his injuries. There is no use kidding about my reaction to all this; I needed faith to overcome the worry and anguish which beset me all through this period. Very simply, I turned to God. I knew other people who were like myself; they did not go to church and wear it as a sign of religiousness; just the same they had religion and lived mostly within the concepts of a religious life.

I AM certain that every man has a belief; that there is no such thing as not having one. A man who held otherwise once cited what he said was a regular Sunday spectacle in rural Ireland to prove his point. "As religious a country as Ireland is," he said, "you can go to any small village on a Sunday morning and find that while many men accompany their wives to church, they don't go in themselves. They sit outside, smoking their pipes and gabbing, until their women come out. You can go to Mexico and see the same thing."

He held that this showed the men were tolerant of their wives' beliefs but without belief themselves. My analysis was different. I was and am certain that each of these men had a relationship with God, but one that he felt was entirely private with him, and which he did not like defined in any specific way. It might even be that many of them could not explain their faiths to themselves, nor understand it when explained in the church, yet that did not signify that they were faithless. When I pictured them sitting outside the church on a quiet Sunday morning, I saw them as within the fold, not without.

And so in this way, if in any way, I have a general faith; one which is not formalized, but none the less sincere. Nor do I live away from the church entirely. My seven-year-old daughter Ann has long gone to Sunday School and her mother and I know it is good for her. Our marriage was within the church, the Episcopal Church in Evanston, Ill., because that was her church. And perhaps the best friends I have are regular churchgoers. They were able to establish an official association with their belief; it is necessary, if I am to live in peace with my conscience, that mine remain unofficial.

Yet I use the church, and the atmosphere of the church, any church, is good for me, and whenever I can lend my own particular talent to furthering the tenets of accepted religion, any religion, I do so knowing that it is essentially a good thing to do. It is not necessary for me to examine Catholic dogma, nor accept or reject it, to appear on a Catholic radio program when the broad theme of all the plays presented is, "The family which prays together stays together." This cannot be questioned . . .

THERE are a number of little churches in Hollywood where I like to drop in and satisfy a yearning to turn to a devotional mood. The mood will come as quickly in a Presbyterian church as in a Catholic one . . . to me. I have a hunch it would come as quickly in a synagogue or in a Mohammedan mosque. I think God hears you wherever you care to tarry to think about Him. And I realize I think about Him more often than I had long supposed I did. In fact, in a recent conversation with my wife, I discovered I try to get in touch with God daily . . . and have been all my life.

Mrs. Widmark and I were driving one night when she happened to mention a man we both had known for a long time.

"You know, he still prays every day," she said.

Unthinkingly I laughed. Then, suddenly, I realized that as long as I could remember I had followed the same habit. All through those periods when I was defaulting from one church or entering another, or perhaps staying away from all of them, there had never been a night when, as my head touched the pillow, I had not turned to prayer. It is still true.

a pocketful of dreams

On another day too, he was gliding on the same rink with Sonja Henie, a champion ice skater himself. And on still another a dark-haired, beautiful lady was presenting him with a handsome album of picture stills topped by a great big one of himself embracing that lady, and signed, "Devotedly yours, Linda." He was Linda Darnell's leading man in the picture, whose title sheet called him Tab Hunter.

Maybe things like that could happen in some other place besides Hollywood, California, U.S.A. And maybe they could happen to any imaginative kid whether he believed positively in his dreams or not. But the point is—Art Gelien did, and as a result he's seen them and a lot more come true.

Right now Tab is perched rosilily on the doorstep of great expectations in Hollywood. He's not rich or really famous yet. He has only three pictures to his new name, none of them sensational. But he's swamped with 1,000 fan letters a week, has plenty more screen jobs coming up and what looks like a steady TV contract, too.

Some of this is because Tab's luckily a good looking male animal, with a pleasantly sculptured face, dazzling smile, soft, artistic eyes and a sun-bronzed torso like a Greek god's. Some is because he owns a natural but still unpolished talent. Some more is because Tab has been at the right places at the right times. But mostly it's because of his unconquerable faith in the importance of himself and his future—a faith that didn't flag during some fairly rough going when he was about as unimportant a kid as you could imagine.

TAB was born July 11, 1931, at Bellevue Hospital in New York City. Tab Hunter's folks weren't fashionable—they were poor, desperately poor. His mother, Gertrude, was an immigrant from Hamburg, Germany, married to a man named Charles Kelm who made a living, when he made it, as a mechanic. But today Tab prefers to forget that he ever had a father, and where he is today or what he does is of no interest to him whatever. He was wiped out of Tab's life when he was only two. From then on he took his mother's family name, Gelien.

Before that Tab remembers only flashes of an anxious babyhood in cramped, cold water flats from which furniture was sometimes moved out on the streets by rough men. He remembers being pulled on a sled to the corner grocery one day when there wasn't any market money, and tumbling off in the snow to come up miraculously with a crumpled five-dollar bill someone had dropped there—which meant a meal that night for the family.

In 1933 this insecure nightmare ended for Tab and his brother, Walter, 11 months older. His grandfather, John Gelien, a chef on the Hamburg-American steamers, came into port, and sizing up the intolerably unhappy life in which his daughter was trapped, provided an escape. He bought passage for her and the boys aboard a Grace Line boat bound for San Francisco and staked them to two months' rent on an apartment there.

To earn their living, Gertrude took a job aboard the Matson ships. A woman with a natural healing touch, she learned physio-therapy to qualify as a shipboard nurse. But this meant that Tab and Walt had to be staked out around at pay homes and boarding schools, while she sailed between San Francisco and Hawaii and sometimes Australia. At four and five years of age, kids need their mothers, no matter how good the foster care, and sometimes it was good for Tab and Walt, other times bad. If they showed signs of mistreatment, though, or bad food, their mother yanked them out and found another in the four days she had between trips. It was always a desolate day when the ship sailed out the Golden Gate, but when it came back in, Tab remembers, "that was Thanksgiving, Christmas, Easter and Fourth of July combined!"

Then their mother spent her pay on trim little navy blue suits, white shirts, new shoes and beanies to dress them up, scrubbed them clean, cut their hair and whisked them off to the places they loved to go—out to Golden Gate Park, the zoo, for a swim in Fleishacker plunge, to Fisherman's Wharf. Nothing was too good for her boys when Gertrude Gelien came home, even though each time it seemed she wore the same shabby but clean and well-pressed suit or dress. Even as a kid, Tab sensed that his mother was denying herself everything to give them the very best care in her power, but he didn't know that she got her reward when people

When Sidney Skolsky's daughter Steffie was five, her greatest thrill was attending the races, and she constantly begged to go. Finally, Sidney told her they wouldn't let little girls in. She was satisfied until one day she heard a radio broadcast from the track.

"A perfect day for the big race!" enthused the announcer. "A wonderful day for three-year-olds!"

Steffie began to sob. "Daddy, you lied to me. You heard what the man said—and I'm older than that!"

would stop them on the street and ask to take pictures of "those two darling boys."

They were worth anybody's film too. The Gelien boys looked like Dutch twins, both with thick golden hair, big round hazel eyes and the creamy complexions that revealed their German-English-French ancestry. But underneath they were very different little guys. Walt was stronger, more aggressive and tougher inside than Tab. If you looked close, you could see it in the bonier features, the sturdier body and the eyes that weren't as soft as his little brother's. Walt was a kid of action. Tab was the dreamer. And in the long, lonely stretches between boat departures and arrivals he had plenty of time to dream.

"It was usually the sea and ships then," recalls Tab. "I wanted to be a pirate, then I switched to an explorer. But whatever it was, the big idea was to make a fortune and buy everything in the world for my Mom. Guess it still is."

Soon after Tab was six he didn't have to rely on lonesome daydreams any more. Gertrude Gelien moved her brood south to Long Beach, and after one or two more trips on the Matson line, stayed on shore for practical nursing and physio-therapy with what patients she could scare up. It made things mighty tough financially for a spell. But for the first time in their lives the Gelien kids knew a real home of their own, with their mother there every night, and even though it was only a tiny apartment behind somebody else's house, it looked like Heaven to them. So did the long stretch of beach at the end of the street, and all the kids to play with at Luther Burbank Elementary, the first public school they'd attended.

In Long Beach Tab got a healthy start on the smooth-muscled, six-foot body he owns today. With Walt he played endlessly in the tumbling surf and swam in the salt water plunge on the Pike, although until he learned to paddle he'd have to dive off the high board and calculate the exact spot where he'd come up by the rail. He got new fuel for his dreams, too, although he didn't know it then. He saw his first movie, Robin Hood, with a girl next door, who told him archly, "For you I'll wear my new Easter hat!" What was a lot more important, Tab remembers, her mother bought the tickets.

GIRLS and movies played a big part in Tab Hunter's boyhood. He was nuts about them both. "I guess I liked girls better than boys," he admits now, grinning. "I wasn't a sis, or anything, but they seemed to know better what I was talking about." It wasn't much of a problem for Tab to keep what Walt called disgustedly "Art's harem." Smitten misses swarmed around the blond boy like bees around honey, especially when, along about fifth grade, his mother moved them up to Los Angeles, and Tab's field of operations expanded. In the 68th Street Grade School he met his first real heart-throb. "Her name was Beverly Peck," Tab recalls. "A cute little brunette—real sweet. She was supposed to be Walt's girl, but I liked her best. Every Saturday we'd beg a couple of dimes from our Moms and hop a bus downtown. Her mother worked in a restaurant there so we got a free lunch. Then we'd untie Beverly's handkerchief with the dimes wrapped inside and sit through two shows at Loew's State. It was my big thrill of the week. I couldn't say whether that was because of Beverly or the movies, maybe both."

Of course, all of Tab Hunter's boyhood wasn't spent making like a junior wolf. At 68th Street, St. John's Military Academy, St. Paul's Parochial School and Mount Vernon Junior High, where he bounced around, he was mixed up in everything. At sports, he didn't shine as much as the more rugged Walt did. When Walt played fullback on the first-string football team, Tab struggled along as second-string guard getting his face shoved into the dirt. But he made the swimming and tennis teams and played trombone in the band, although his arms weren't long enough to push the slide out for the low notes. At St. John's he wound up a cadet lieutenant before that year of private school luxury, which Grandfather Gelien financed, ran out. At St. Paul's he sang in the church choir, until the Christmas he was supposed to solo with "Adeste Fideles" and when he opened his mouth nothing came out. But it was at Mount Vernon where Tab's yet vague and unrecognized yearnings got their first airing.

He had a music teacher named Emily Joost who understood teen-agers and what they liked. She let them pound out boogie-woogie in the classroom and swing a popular tune if they felt like it. Night, she played piano in a café down the street and she'd let the more talented kids express themselves there. Some nights, Tab and a girl named Bobbie Turner, whose black hair tumbled over her eyes and whose low, husky voice carried a strange excitement, would stroll down and try out "My Blue Heaven" or "I'm In The Mood For Love" for the customers.

Looking back though, Tab Hunter doesn't remember any infection by the acting bug. "I always felt there was something big and important ahead for me. I believed that," he says, "even as a kid, but what it was I didn't have the faintest idea. Acting—like the stars I worshipped in those movies? Why, that was out of my world! There were too many things in it to bring me down to earth."

THE Gelien were still poor as church-mice. They lived chronically in tiny apartments. Tab's mother just managed to eke out a living with her nursing. But sometimes she'd have to go out on a boat again and sometimes, too, she'd have to take on a factory job at places like Lockheed Aircraft. Both the boys helped. Tab got a paper route for a while, then an errand boy's job at a drug store; he cut lawns and cleaned out garages. At home both boys made the beds, cleaned house, washed the dishes and often cooked the meals. But there wasn't anything dreary about all this to the Gelien boys. Their youngish mother had a rough struggle but she never let a defeatist psychology creep into their noggins. "For every door that closes, two open," she always told them. "You just have to think right and you can do anything. Always have a goal—when you reach it, get another." Those homilies were sincere. She felt strongly that way—also, as Gertrude Gelien says today, "Boys have to be encouraged to try themselves. The answer a parent must give is, 'Yes'—never 'No'." She practiced what she preached on Tab and Walt.

Nobody tried to discourage Tab, not even when he allowed that he wanted to be a horsetrainer, which wasn't his mother's idea of a promising future. She even let him enrolle next year at the Dell Powers School in Hollywood (owned by Mala Powers' mother), a place run primarily for professional pupils, with half-day terms. But Tab didn't want those free afternoons to study tap dancing or elocution. He wanted them to ride. Nights he ushered at Warner Brothers theater at 75 cents an hour to pay for both the school and the horses.

Tab was almost 16 then and in tenth grade at Dell Powers, and he lasted from September to November, when the rains set in and ruined the riding. Then he got restless. Something else was buzzing under his cornsilk thatch—adventure. "I felt like the world was busting with places to go and things to see," Tab explains, "and I hadn't really been anywhere or seen anything."

So all of a sudden in 1946, even if the war had just ended, Tab decided to join the Coast Guard. He upped his age a year and even then had to get his mother's permission, but that wasn't hard.

IT wasn't anything to raise your blood pressure learning his yeoman's stuff at Groton—typing, paper work and such—but on the weekends Tab saw sights aplenty—and in the very place he started out from—New York. He went there every Saturday and caught the New Haven train back Sunday night. It was certainly a different New York from the dreary place he remembered as a baby boy.

Tab had a friend, Dick Clayton (now his agent), who'd had a fling in films and was trying his luck on Broadway. Dick kept an apartment in the Village and gave Tab the key. With a sailor suit, a few bucks in it, the looks and personality Tad Hunter has, a guy can have himself a ball in the Big Town. Tab did.

But the ball was soon over and Tab was back in San Pedro clacking away on his typewriter at the base, Yeoman Third Class Gelien. Each week, though, he'd hitch-hike the 54-mile round trip from the base to DuBrock stables, and to another place, the Polar Palace ice rink where he'd rent skates and learn a few loops and twirls. "Somehow when I was on a horse or skimming along the ice I felt like those kids back in New York," reflects Tab. "I was on wings."

One night, after Dick Clayton came back to Hollywood he called up Tab and took him to a performance of The Skin Of Our Teeth at the little Coronet Theater. A fellow named Paul Guilfoyle was directing the play. Dick knew him and afterwards introduced Tab. Guilfoyle shot a keen look at the big, blond Adonis.

"Interested in pictures?" he asked.

"Why," said Tab, "I don't know. I never thought about it."

"I thought I was telling the truth," Tab says, "but maybe subconsciously I wasn't. Maybe acting was what I was after all the time. Sometimes you just don't know." Anyway nothing came of that—not then.

For the next couple of years Tab Hunter lived for skating. He studied and practiced mornings, noons and nights—whenver his odd jobs let him. He skated for the St. Moritz Club up north, for the Los Angeles Figure Skating Club down south. He entered competitions. He's got a dozen cups, plaques and medals lining a shelf at home from California State, Pacific Coast and National Meets, for pairs, free style.

Tab was just leaving the Polar Palace one day when a Hollywood agent named Henry Willson, who makes a specialty of spotting new faces (he's uncovered Guy Madison, Rory Calhoun and Bob Wagner among others) tapped him on the shoulder. "Want a job in a picture?" he asked.

"I'm an amateur," refused Tab. "I'd have to turn pro to skate for the movies." "I don't mean skating—acting. Just a bit. But it's worth $250 a week."

"Oh," said Tab, "then sure—why not?" He worked two weeks in The Lawless for Pine-Thomas. He said two words. He got a fast $500—and a faster new name. Nobody could ever pronounce Gelien, they told him. "Well, what'll we tab this guy?" they asked at the studio.

"He likes horses—you know, jumpers and hunters," suggested Dick Clayton, who went along. So it was "Tab Hunter" just from those remarks. Now that he's stuck with the name, Tab thinks it's okay enough but a little kiddish. "What'll 'Tab' sound like when I'm 40?" he wonders. Ironically, they could have called him Joe Blow for all the good that quickie bit did him. Everyone forgot Tab Hunter fast—except his friend, Dick. Tab went back to his skating and to keep himself in hamburgers.

Things like that happen all the time to good-looking boys and girls around Hollywood. The crazy chance, the jarring let-down. They can leave scars and even wreck lives if a movie-hope is all there is. Luckily for Tab, that wasn't the case. He was still wrapped up in figure skating, feverishly prepping for the Nationals, and the movie job was just a profitable episode—then. But, next time it was very different. And next time happened because Paul Guilfoyle remembered the handsome sailor he'd seen way back in '47 at the Coronet Theater. Paul was working with Director Stuart Heisler on a picture called Island Of Desire and hunting for an unknown boy to play a shipwrecked Marine with Linda Darnell. "Where's that good-looking kid who's a friend of yours?" he asked Dick Clayton.

Dick knew exactly who the good-looking kid was and exactly where he was, too. At the rink. He found Tab there practicing loops, hustled him over to Motion Picture Center and into Stuart Heisler's office. Tab still had his glare glasses on and his skates under his arm.

"He asked me to take off my shirt," Tab grins. "I felt like a jerk but I did it." Steffini Nordli, who wrote the script, nodded. "I want this boy," she said, just like that. Guilfoyle and Heisler were inclined to agree, but they took him next to the producer, David Rose, who just said "H-m-m-m-m-m-m-m."

"I guess it was right then," Tab believes, "that I knew at last what I wanted—that chance to act. I thought he didn't like me and I was so broken up I left my skates, my glasses and my sweater."

But Rose ordered a test. Tab took it on a Saturday. Then he went home with his first real case of the glooms. "I did the best I could, Mom," he said, like a scrapper who's just been knocked out. That didn't bother Gertrude Gelien.

"Then I know you've got it," she said. Monday Tab walked in for the verdict. When he asked Paul Guilfoyle, "What happened?" he received a grin right back. "Got your passport?" he inquired. "Better start packing. We're leaving pronto for Jamaica."

Since then it hasn't all been a dish of apple dumplings in Hollywood for Tab Hunter. Island Of Desire was no Academy candidate and neither understandably was Tab's first acting effort. In fact, he didn't have another movie job for a full year after that, until Producer Edward Small signed him for three. He's made two of those, Tombstone Express and The Steel Lady with more coming up—but nobody knows better than Tab himself that he's still got a long way to travel. But then, as he points out, it was a long and often rough trip, too, before he hit his stride—and he turned only 22 this past July.

Right now Tab Hunter knows what his new dreams are aimed at. "I want to be a good actor," he says simply, "that's all."

If hard work and sensible living have anything to do with that Tab looks like a sure thing. Until a few weeks ago he still lived with his mother. Now he has a small apartment of his own, with a pull-down bed, in Hollywood. But he still takes Mom his best shirts and socks to wash out and does the rest himself at the Laundromat—the khaki, denim and beach-blue trousers he wears constantly by day. For dress, he has just two suits in his closet, both conservative, one outgrown Tux, and only two pieces of jewelry, his silver ID bracelet and a St. Genesius medal Dick Clayton gave him to make sure he's an actor.

He's no Hollywood glamor boy yet, although he gets around in a quiet way, sees a movie about every night of the week, and there's usually a cutie with him. Starlets Lori Nelson, Gloria Gordon and Pat Crowley blue-ribbon the list right now but the scenery shifts around. Tab was semi-officially engaged a few months ago to Judy Powell, but they called that off and remained such good friends that he sold her his horse, "Out On Bail," which he bought with his first sizeable check but found he couldn't afford to feed. Tab still can't afford a press agent, and he answers his own fan mail. In fact, about his only extravagance—if you can call it that—is a flamingo-red '53 Ford convertible, but he'll be in hock for that a long time.

The main reason Tab Hunter is keeping his fair head cool and dodging the scent of orange blossoms is financial. "Sure I want to get married—someday," he tells you. "I will, too. That's one of my biggest hopes and dreams. But I've got to get straightened around financially first and then, too, I want to do a few nice things for my mother. After all, she's spent her life doing things for me."

Of course, Gertrude Gelien doesn't feel quite that way about it. With Tab gone and Walt married and raising a family, she lives alone in a small Beverly Hills apartment, practices her physiotherapy and looks after herself. But she's not lonely. Two nights a week Tab takes her to dinner, drops by about every day and on her last birthday staged a gala surprise party for the still-youngish lady, who raised him right.

"I knew he would be something important some day," she says with a faint German accent. "Tab is a good boy. If I taught him anything it was to know that God is all around him and that everything is good. He has always got what he wanted and he always will because he thinks constructively and right. He will be a fine actor some day, and what is better, a fine man. You will see."

Mothers have a right to be slightly prejudiced. But most people who know Tab less intimately have the same strong hunch. A boy who can travel as far as Tab Hunter already has on little more than faith in a pocketful of dreams is a pretty good risk in anybody's future book.

He was more or less sick the whole first week. More at the beginning. Less and less as the applause penetrated his numbed exterior.

"I think they like me," he finally admitted, and pretty soon he was able to eat and retain those free meals that came along with the $20,000 a week (for two weeks) the Sands Hotel was forking over.

As for that "farewell" song—he paid $15,000 to have it written and the least he owed himself was a heartfelt rendition. Van isn't about to leave Hollywood. "Hollywood will have to leave me first," he says. "Man, that's my bread and butter!"

But when he does return to Hollywood he'll be full of ideas about the long term contracts he won't sign and the juvenile parts he won't accept. Because today he isn't afraid of making demands on himself or anyone else. Not since Las Vegas.

Fantastic as it may seem, the story of Van Johnson was—until Vegas—the story of a man gripped by fear. A kind of all-pervasive fear that has its roots in some hidden recess of the mind and clings tenaciously to its victim.

But now Van has shaken himself free of that fear. Free and clear. "That engagement made a new man out of me," he says, gleefully. "It's like being born again."

SITTING in his suite at the Sands Hotel, as relaxed as a Yogi, but much less contorted, Van described his nightclub experience as one of the greatest things that ever happened to him.

"That first night," he said, "I walked out of here and over to the Copa Room (where the show was held) in a daze. I don't remember leaving. I don't remember getting there. I don't remember what happened. The first week I couldn't hang onto a meal—that's how confident I was."

"But now—now I can meet people and not be afraid of them. I can walk out of this room and over to the pool, talk to strangers, then come back here and eat steak. You think that's nothing? For me, that's everything. First time in my life."

"Last night after the show I went over to the Golden Nugget for a bite to eat. You think two weeks ago I'd have walked into the Golden Nugget or any other place? Not Johnson. Johnson had to go back to his room, back to Evie and Peter, my own little crowd. That would be the only way I could relax. The only people I could relax with—"

"You know what kind of guy I was? Brother, I was all the words—shy, introverted, inept, frightened. I don't care what you want to call it, I was it. Only another shy person could understand. But now—all because I could get up before a roomful of people—now—" he turned to a friend named Al who was sitting nearby. "Al, tell him how confident I am now."

"Sure," said Al. "Listen. Ask him the first thing he says when he comes off stage. The first thing he says to the director. You know what he says? He says, 'Tell me, what did I do wrong?' Not—'Did they like me?' Now he knows they like him."

It's hard to believe that ten years of stardom, a family, a beautiful home couldn't give Van the self-confidence that live applause did. But, actually, his personal life added to his anxiety and suffered because of it.

Stardom didn't convince him he was a good actor. It convinced him he'd better worry more—he had more to lose.

His homelife wasn't the happiest in the world. Stories about him and Evie often appeared in the press under headlines like, "Why Do They Stay Married?" They stuck together but the main thing they seemed to have in common were bitter words. That isn't hard to understand now. A man who lives with fear can't live with anyone else. He finds it tough enough living with himself.

Simple things grew into large problems. Evie enjoyed parties and nightclubs. Van loathed them. He liked to hide himself in neighborhood theaters.

Once in a while Evie would force the issue and haul him along to some soiree. "But I was a strictly speak-when-spoken-to guy," he admits. "Also the kind who always had to be on time. It would make Evie kind of sore, me beginning to look at my watch nine blocks from the place. You know—always the first one there."

And generally, the first to leave—sometimes with Evie, sometimes angry and alone.

They say it's a man's world. I don't mind one bit being a woman in it.

Marilyn Monroe

"People who read about me think I'm a cut-up at parties," Van says. "That's a laugh. I'm a mouse at parties—or was. I was one of those who sat in a corner."

As for those flaming red socks—Van's badge of unconventionality, his symbol of extroversion. "Those socks," Van sighs. "A crutch. Just a crutch. I'd like to know what an analyst would say about them."

But an analyst isn't going to get the chance to say anything. "Three years with an analyst couldn't have accomplished what two weeks at the Sands taught me," Van says. "It's finding out you can do something that counts. One night in the casino a woman came up to me and said, 'You were fine, Mr. Johnson. Frankly, my husband and I didn't think you had it in you.' That's what I mean."

"When I get back to Hollywood I'm going to try this lunch-at-Romanoff's routine. You know, when you walk down those stairs and everybody turns around and looks at you. I used to have to turn around and leave. Now I've got a side bet with Evie I'll keep going. I'll never be the same again. I feel free."

The future doesn't scare him a bit, although he keeps wondering about the past, trying to figure out how he became so frightened in the first place.

He remembers the time when he was a schoolboy in Newport, Mass. One day his teacher asked all the kids to write down their ambitions and she read them aloud. There were a lot of would-be doctors, lawyers and engineers in that group. But suddenly the teacher drew herself up and a sly smile crossed her face. "Here's a boy," she said, "Van Johnson—who wants to be an actor!"

"She gave it a certain something," Van recalls. "I don't know what. Everybody laughed. Funny how that sticks with me."

But the scorn in that teacher's attitude wouldn't have permanently damaged a boy who wasn't susceptible. All that incident could have done was reinforce Van's mistrust in himself.

A FEW of his friends trace his anxiety back to the time when the bobby-soxers first grew hysterical over him. They remember his return to New York at the height of his popularity. MGM threw him a big cocktail party at the Waldorf. It was obvious to everyone as soon as he walked in that Van was terrified, but he managed to find a few friends and surround himself with them. However, one persistent young woman pushed her way through the circle and told Van she'd be free to fly back to Hollywood with him and there conduct an extended series of interviews—for the press, of course.

"Oh," Van muttered, "but I don't think..."

This girl didn't care what he thought. She was miles ahead of him. Van's eyes began to roll like a frightened horse's, his hands started trembling and all he could think of to do was stand there and drink milk by the quart (MGM had provided this nourishment especially for Van who didn't touch liquor).

"I just wanted to run," Van says. "I knew that whatever I did or said would be wrong. Finally, someone led this girl away. I was petrified, but still I got used to that kind of thing. I don't know. It wasn't the bobby-soxers who scared me. I was always that way."

He was always that way. The fear somehow was born back in his pleasant but uninspiring boyhood, and must have grown a little during his four years in New York where he was a chorus boy waiting for a break, and as the breaks came they were too good for a guy who never thought enough of himself. But Van didn't crack up. He was the kind who grew up. A little late, maybe, but it's never too late for that.

Now Van feels free enough to develop as an actor, to branch out. Once he wanted to learn through fear of failure. Now it's through a real desire to improve, to get the most out of himself for his own enjoyment.

That's why there'll be some changes made in his Hollywood career.

His Metro contract is up in December and very probably Van won't renew it, although the option's his. "Don't get me wrong," he says. "I love Metro. Metro's been wonderful. But a rut can get too comfortable. There's something more I've got to know about myself."

"I'll be 27 in August—and how long can you be a juvenile? The pictures I worked in were nice, and they made money. I just finished one (Easy To Love, co-starring Esther Williams) and I'll make another before I leave."

"What I'd like to do is make two pictures a year, pictures I want to do. How about a heavy? I go for that reverse casting stuff—it can do wonders for a career. I've begged the front office for a heavy, a real dirty dog, a baby-faced killer."

"But two pictures is enough. And then maybe—a Broadway show. Look at Roz Russell and that Wonderful Town thing. Terrific."

VAN's unwillingness to sign a long term contract won't be too much of a shock to MGM. June Allyson's cut loose from them. And stars like Jane Powell and Kathryn Grayson are making and planning personal appearance tours, settling for single picture agreements.

The only surprising thing about Van's decision is he's anxious to take a chance. He's willing to fall on his face on Broadway rather than rest on his laurels in Hollywood and rake in the dough.

"If I flop in New York, then I flop," he says. "It's an experience."

But maybe he won't flop. And he's thought of that, too.

"No one applauds when you finish a scene in a picture," he says. "That noise they make with the hands—it's wonderful."

This metamorphosis he's undergone—that's wonderful, too. "I just feel bad it took me so long," he says. "Listen. You have to walk right into this shy problem. Make it as tough as you can for yourself. You might scare yourself silly, or lose a few meals, but the cure can work. Just look at me. I'm not afraid anymore. It's absolutely amazing."

where do I go from here?

(Continued from page 49) But it loses money. Then I say to myself, 'Betty—you've had it. Get out while you're on top.' That is a law I laid down for myself long ago. Quit when you're ahead. Just so I'll have the intelligence to know when I am ahead. But this much you can bet on—when it happens, it'll happen like that. The way it's always been with me, when I don't like something, I walk away from it. So far. Knock wood. Or I sidestep. Or, if I have to, the old collision. Anything, so long as it's action. I've never sat around and waited for developments. Some people can do it. I can't. Stewing, you know, in your own juice, that's not for me. If there's going to be an end, let it come."

But the end was not yet?
"I'm 36," said Betty Grable James: "That's no state secret. I think I must be one of the happiest people on earth. That's really a shame, isn't it? For your purposes, I mean. Does anyone really want to read about happy people? No neuroses, no problems. I'm a terrible disappointment to interviewers. I want to say something real—real electric. But I can't. I'm too lucky. And there's nothing earth-shaking in a long run of luck, not unless it's at a dice table in Las Vegas. I have Harry, a husband I'm in love with. The children. Home. Career. And the weird part of it all is, every year I feel better. That sounds like a gag, but it's true. Every year I feel better, more full of zing. The problems shake down one by one so along with the zing comes a feeling of peace. Am I too corny for you? Sometimes I'm too corny for me. You know, when I was younger, I was real corny about corn. Very disdainful. Now I know it for what it is, and I love it."

There was no intention, then, except to go on as she was, professionally and personally speaking both?

"No intention. No other intention. Definitely. I've been asked, somebody asked me, 'What makes Betty run?' I don't know, maybe it was a snide question. You get the implications. Over-ambition, too much adrenalin, whatever it was they meant. The way I understood it, they were saying, 'She's got everything, but everything. So why doesn't she ease up?' Well, she doesn't ease up—I don't ease up, I mean—because I like to work. It's as simple as that. I've conditioned myself to work. And I love the work I do. You see what I mean about luck? Or wait. Listen to this: I also love to stop the work I do and come home to the other part of my life that's waiting for me, and that I love more than the work, if that's possible. And it's possible, all right. It's not only possible, it's a fact. Now with all this, how could I tell you or anyone else that something's griping me? How could I complain? How could I put up any kind of beef without people wanting to throw rocks at me? I think some girls must dream about the kind of life that's happened to me. I know one girl who dreamed about it anyway. Me. Betty Grable. And I've always figured I'm pretty much like the rest. I'm the norm. I think that's what audiences have liked in me, the audiences that did like me. So you see how rich I am—not money, to corn another, but—just rich. So they ask—what makes Betty run? Fair question. I've answered. But there's another answer. I'm not running. I'm just cruising. I'm not bearing down and there's plenty of gas in the tank, you'll pardon the turn of phrase."

It was pardoned. It was a good turn of phrase. Betty Grable James in the Year of Our Lord 1953 spoke the truth. Ten years of married life, and nearly 25 in show business, are behind her. She is the most improbable 36 ever conceived. She wore a cool print dress and her platinum hair very short and close to her head like a helmet. Her bright red shoes—she is a pigeon for bright red shoes or bright red anything—had high heels, and these did the usual wonders for her legs, which are too skinny. The gentlemen will please put away their firearms. That is Mrs. James' own appraisal of her legs—too skinny—and here is hardly the time or place to dispute the lady. So long as we are on the theme of disparagement, however, her regard for her own singing, dancing and acting is likewise no more than lukewarm. She has never been heard to comment on her justly celebrated complexion. And where, perhaps a year and a half ago, Mrs. James had sported roughly a chin-and-a-quarter, she was now pared down to one. She was neat and bright and lovely.

"No, but it's true," she went on presently. "I don't bear down. I don't barrel into the turns. Not any more. Would I have taken a ten-month suspension if I'd cared that much? Or here's another: I wouldn't do Pickup On South Street. Would a worrier have refused?"

Miss Grable turned down Pickup On South Street for a good reason. "It was dray-ma. The girl was a floozie, a B-girl. She has beer thrown in her face, she's knocked down. That's one sort of part I can't and won't do. Comedy, song-and-dance, sure. But this was real heavy. Then there's something else: people do come to identify you with the parts you play, and a lot of them know I'm a family type, mother of two children. It doesn't jibe any too well. The main point is, though, it's not for me. Jean Peters should be wonderful in it."

Miss Grable also took a ten-count for declining to participate in The Girl Next Door, which subsequently went to June Haver. She, Miss Grable, went home, worked around the house, rested, rode horseback, readjusted her perspective and didn't brood about a thing. She was—for her—on edge when she accepted the layoff. For the first time in her life, public curiosity irritated her, and when she and James became the subject of undue attention in the turf club of a swank local track, she became aware that she wasn't wholly on the beam. "But I settled that problem," she has since recalled. "It's all right now. That's what I mean about the way I have to cope with things. One by one and in any way I can, but I won't hold still where my own troubles are concerned. I want to move and move quick. You remember how I was then. I wish you'd seen me a month later. I sat back and taught myself all over again that attention is part of our business, that deep down we really love it. Then there was nothing to worry about. If I'd kept on getting annoyed, then I'd've thought it was a good time to get out. But I didn't worry about the layoff, that's the main point. I didn't worry about—oh, Marilyn Monroe, say, or whoever else was doing well, or box-office ratings or not being on the screen. That's one good part about layoffs. If my box-office drops I just say to myself, 'Well, you haven't had many releases, have you, after all?' and I feel all right again. Maybe it's a way of kidding myself, but I don't think so. Anyway, what's so awful about kidding yourself? In small things, I mean. A lot of times it's worked for me. That doesn't mean I prescribe it for others. What's good for me may be terrible for someone else. That's why, please don't ask me for advice. It seems arrogant to dish it out. Just my own case, that I know."

WELL, how about Marilyn Monroe?

"Well, how about her? I should be able to answer that, it's been asked me so many times, but I don't know what I'm supposed to answer. She's a nice girl, I like her, she's fine to work with. You're not going to make headlines with that, but it's how it is. Then I have a stock answer. I've given it so many times in so many different situations, it's a cliché. I'm going to have a record made of it. 'There's room at the top for everyone.' And there is. Not very flashy, is it? I've read flashier. But I haven't a thing in the world against Marilyn Monroe. If we're going to set the world on fire, we'll have to find another way."

This much brought us to a spot topic—and if the present article were an orchestral rendition, we would ask now for a prolonged roll of the drums. Miss Grable was to report to Columbia the following Monday for her first loan-out in years and years, the starring role in a project called The Pleasure Is All Mine, from a Somerset Maugham job. How did she feel about this?

"Fine," said Miss Grable happily. "It's a good part and a cute script. I'm married to two men."

And how did the Johnston Office feel about that?

She smiled. "Well, one's supposed to be dead. Only he isn't."

But she had no objection to the loan-out? Eh?

"Why should I? Fox didn't have anything for me. You know how it goes. I heard I had objections. You hear everything. Unless you stop listening. No objections. No anything. I'm happy in this way, happy in that way, more ginger every day, and I'll go right on working until all of a sudden I stop."

"But when I do stop," she said, "it won't worry me too much because I have a lot to fall back on. It's the girls who live only for their careers that have the problem of retirement. The reaction of idleness could be too violent for them to stand. They're sort of, you know—one-dimensional. But I have Harry, my children, my home. I'll just turn my back and that'll be that."

THE next Monday, as reported by the trade paper Variety, Betty Grable was suspended by Fox for the third time in two years for refusing to report to Columbia for the picture The Pleasure Is All Mine. Miss Grable also "revealed" (Variety again) that she was "trying to get out of her 20th-Fox contract, which expires in September, 1954." The reason ascribed to her for the Columbia balk was Columbia's refusal to tell her the identity of her co-players; Variety assumed she had been counting on William Holden and Henry Fonda, per earlier information printed in the column of Louella O. Parsons. No reason whatever was advanced for her flare-up at Fox. Apropos Columbia, she was quoted directly as follows: "They won't tell me who will be in the film. I didn't want to start extensive rehearsals without knowing. I'll go back in it when they tell me. I hate suspensions, I don't like trouble. But I feel entitled to know who will be in the film."

Thus the time for turning away may have arrived. To MODERN SCREEN's post-interview queries, Fox spokesmen professed bafflement, Miss Grable was elsewhere. Columbia did not even deign to return the call. The entire situation was a top secret operation. At the time this is written MODERN SCREEN can only accept Betty's own statement to us: "All of a sudden I'll stop." Monday was sudden all right, that Monday in May.

That's Betty Grable, 1953. At the top of her beauty and talent and drawing power. But ready to stand dead cold pat on a principle. Do not think for a moment she was trying deliberately to mislead anyone in the talk you have overheard. There is no more honest woman in pictures. Everyone knows it. She has the utmost respect of friend, enemy and neutral. If she doesn't want to talk to you, she won't. But she won't mislead you. Variety's report presumably was reliable, if a short-lived firecracker. In the absence of denials, then, it must be that Miss Grable changed her mind over a weekend for reasons that seemed to her just and reasonable.

SHE had something else to say about retirement. "I could travel," she resumed. "Look at all I have to look forward to. When I've decided I won't miss the screen, I just won't miss it. You know, I've never been out of the United States. Oh, Canada for a little while. You won't believe it, but I've only been in Palm Springs once in my life, getting over an operation. Or the stage. I've done some of that, with orchestras, and then DuBarry Was A Lady in New York. I'd adjust myself to it again, the way I'm adjusted to pictures now. There are so many things to cushion the retirement. I don't ever want to be in the position of the players who can't quit, for money reasons or because they can't change the tempo. Go scrounging for character parts. When I'm through, I want to be through, and living it up in another way."

An enormous portrait of Harry James hung over the mantel. Ten years. The night of July 4, 1943 in Las Vegas, Nevada, was stifling and James' train, due in from New York for the wedding, was hours late. Midnight dissolved into morning, which doesn't normally bother Vegas, but the Justice of the Peace who was to perform the ceremony wanted to go home. So did the necessary clerk. A publicist in attendance proposed an alternative; he would sit on their heads until the train got there. The bride reached the edge of hysterics, and finally left the Last Frontier Hotel to wait at the station. At long last the City of Los Angeles wheezed its noble way to a stop, but with James' car far down the platform. The station proper was surrounded by a knee-high guard-rail in those days to discourage wanderers from getting mowed under. Miss Grable didn't know about that or didn't remember. She ran joyfully forward until she hit the guard-rail. The middle-route was airborne, the landing impressive but painful. But a few cinders weren't going to foul up that day. They were married in early morning, and there was a wedding breakfast replete with friends, well-wishers and displaced crapsshooters who, confronted with a staggering layout of goodies, decided they'd faded destiny and gone to heaven. Ten years ago. There was the customary doubt in Hollywood, which extended best wishes along with side-bets on a six-month-and-not-a-day-more hitch.

"AND this is how it's turned out," said Mrs. James. "Quiet, domestic, no hoopla, none of the problems that go with hoopla. You spoke of crowds, too much attention. As a problem, it doesn't exist. We don't go out. When Harry gets home from the road, he wants to be home. So do I. And he's away a great deal, as he is now, so we don't entertain."

"You seldom entertain?"

"We don't entertain. Not in the Hollywood sense. We're entirely happy living as we do. The horses, the outdoor life, living for the children. What would we want beyond that?"

No bruises whatever?

"Minor. Very minor. Once or twice when I went on the road with Harry, I went strictly as Mrs. James, and then I wasn't too happy. I had a notion I could divorce Betty Grable from the maestro's wife. Same person, of course. It didn't exactly work. And once—" she began to laugh—"I got real frisky about it. Harry was playing a date in Venice. (Venice is a place near Hollywood, whatever Venetians may think about it.) So I got traipsed up in a black wig, covered my wedding ring in some way, and went down there. I was a sensational flop. Our friends were there. 'Hi, Betty! Dyed your hair? Don't tell us what you're made up for, let us guess.' Oh, I was the one. Only one person didn't recognize me. Harry. I was 'introduced' to him. He was real nice. So nice. So very nice. That's when I got mad."

"You're sure he didn't know all along?"

"He didn't know. It was pretty funny."

Hollywood was then, as it doubtless still is, shrill with the word of a new Betty Grable. There's a new Betty Grable every time you turn around, but this time it was a reference to her appearance in Cinema Scope and had some validity. Everyone who had seen her in the new process, clips from the film How To Marry a Millionaire, had come out bug-eyed. It appeared there was one scene in particular in which, flanked by Miss Monroe and Lauren Bacall, she had preempted the whole wide screen simply by appearing on it.

What, then, was her reaction to 3-D?

"Not 3-D. Cinema Scope. It's more a wide screen. You mean me in it? I don't know. I saw a couple of rushes. I thought—well, you know. All right."

Could something along the lines of a New Betty Grable be built around this?

"Well, it's a new medium. Maybe I am moving into a new phase. That'd be all right."

BETTY's had plenty of phases already. She first appeared on a screen for the old Fox Studio in 1930 in a number called Let's Go Places. She did a specialty, evidently at the age of 13.

Nothing came of it, except experience.

Later she did a bit for Samuel Goldwyn in Eddie Cantor's film version of Whoopie.

That was chalked up to more experience.

She got out of town and turned up in a Barbara Stanwyck-Frank Fay play, Tattle Tales, staying with it for several months. Movies yawned prodigiously.

She joined Ted Fio Rito, the bandman. Eight months more. Hollywood went so far as at least to stifle its yawn. She was cast in a Wheeler and Woolsey comedy. She made a few shorts. She hit the road again, with Jay Whidden and orchestra.

Back once more. RKO. Two years. Eatin' steady. Paramount. Two more years. But pictures that never got away from the campus. "Betty," reports the Fox biography, driving home its point with tooth, nail and mallet, "simply didn't care to be the perennial sophomore forever." Also, not for eternity.

Now personal appearances. She stunned 'em. The astute Mr. Zanuck of 20th Century-Fox was most stunned of all. He "beckoned," as Hollywood always does. Never writes, phones or wires. Has to beckon. That was fine for Miss Grable, but first she had the DuBarry Was A Lady commitment on Broadway. She stunned 'em in that, too. Then Alice Faye took poorly. Miss Grable was summoned—once in a great while Hollywood does "summon"—and took over Miss Faye's part in a historic movie titled Down Argentine Way.

And—1953? With the inevitable question mark.

She was married to Jackie Coogan once. As Mrs. James, she possesses or has possessed a number of homes. This one is Home with a capital H. It's green, the greenest home you ever saw. Big, too, but for six weeks earlier this year she handled it by herself, no help, besides driving the children back and forth from school. She loved it. Fourteen rooms anyway.

THE dank air blew through the front door and Betty Grable James shivered in her short-sleeved dress. Goodbye. Thanks a lot. Sorry it couldn't have been more exciting. Could it have been less so? Betty Grable, 1953, is exciting enough for any Friday. END

(Continued from page 53) been. Not my friends. I know who they are now." He named some, with unmistakable fondness and pride. A lawyer, his late publicist George Evans, New York restaurateur Toots Shor. "Toots is like my big brother. Oh, there were a lot who stuck around. But the rest of them . . ." He made the slitting motion again.

"Anyway, let's get back. Here I was, a little schmo from Hoboken. But loaded! All of a sudden, everybody I met was worth 50 zillion dollars, or else I'd heard of them. I went to parties, I swear, I was the only one there I'd never heard of. I wouldn't know a soul. Not even the hostess. They'd stare at me. I'd stare at them. I knew what I was asked for. They wondered if I'd try to melt down the silverware or swing by the tail from the chandelier. Well, I wondered the same about them. It was even. But Hoboken was never like that.

"Sure, for a schmo from Ho', I was too loaded, but there are worse ways to suffer. I'd meet guys, big executives, who'd warn me about spending, and I'd think to myself, 'Brother, you may be heeled but I've got it like you'll never have it.' The weird thing was, it was true then. I was open to plenty of needle for the way I spent. Gold cigarette lighters for my friends. Expensive cars even, now and then. All right, you know something? I've never regretted it, not a cent of it. I'd do the same again. What did I know about money? I could do all the things I'd always wanted to. For my family. One year I sent my mother to Florida for the whole winter. Cost, I think, $5,500, something like that. My money advisors put up a beef. So I said to them, 'I made $850,000 this year, right? And we got something left over?' That was all I ever wanted to know, was there something left over? I guess that's all I want to know now. And I couldn't send my mother to Florida for $5,500? Then why was I working? That's how I looked at it then. That's how I look at it now."

A FEW days before this interview, Sinatra's allegedly tangled bookkeeping of the lush years had, in a sense, caught up with him. Uncle Whiskers wanted $103,000 in back taxes, upped by the newspapers to $109,000.

"That's all right," Sinatra said. "I told 'em I'd get it up by August first, contingent, as my lawyer says, they can establish I owe it. If I owe it, I want to pay it. I just don't know. It was a ball, that's all I know."

How much of a ball, precisely, goaded his memory again.

"Those seven weeks at the Paramount in New York," he said, "after the dam broke. Then the time later. Don't make me say this like I meant it because I'm only trying to answer what you asked, but how many guys had it happen to them? Two radio shows going at once, recordings, personals. I look back now and it was like those creep party effects they have in pictures. Montage. It's hard to remember the separate frames. You know what we finally did? We hired a private ambulance to get me places on time. Had to. I stayed at the Astor while we played the Paramount, right across the street. I was doing six, seven shows a day, and there was no other way. I'd duck into the theater about nine in the morning, get out about one. Hour and a half between shows, I'd work out in a gym we'd rigged up, or eat, or sit in my dressing room listening to the song pluggers, but never use my voice. Never speak at all. First show was nine-thirty in the morning. You ever try to be romantic at nine-thirty in the morning? Don't. The kids'd come in and stay all day. Drive the management daffy. Then when I'd leave the theater—I'm not kidding—some nights there'd be 5,000 of them out there on 44th Street by the stage door . . . you imagine five thousand! It'd take us 20 minutes to get across the one strip of sidewalk to the car, and the kids sticking pins into the cops for holding 'em back. They used to scare me, not on account of myself but one of the kids could have been hurt in the crush. I developed a technique after a while. I just stayed in the middle of my personal riot squad, kept my arms flat against my sides, and let myself be carried along. Twenty minutes to go five yards. Hoboken, where are you now?"

A single incident out of the whole era, predating by a few months the Paramount engagement, has stood out in Sinatra's mind over the years. Evidently it symbolizes for him the prevailing climate of the entire period, and even now he cannot speak of it without being genuinely touched.

"They made with the skinny jokes, but the funny thing was, I was in good shape. I worked so hard, I was dead beat when I went to bed and fell asleep so fast and so hard, a blackjack couldn't have done the job better. I wasn't nervous except now and then when it got too much for me, and I'm always most relaxed when I'm working anyway. I was living it up, the way any Jersey Cinderella would, and my idea of a top gag was to call George Evans, who was the sweetest guy who ever lived, and give him a song-and-dance about how I felt sick or had just piled up my car or had lost my voice. I suppose it was just because I felt so good, I could do those things. George would worry and offer to come right over whatever the hour was, so I'd tell him I was only kidding, but I got a huge yuk thinking how 12 little round men would drop dead all at once if they thought I'd bit my tongue off. You think they wouldn't've? Listen: I took stock back about then and found out I only owned 47 per cent of myself.

"OKAY. So one night I woke up and I wasn't kidding any more. I was sick. I called up a close friend and broke it to him gently. I said for him not to worry but I didn't feel absolutely right and maybe he'd better send over a doctor. It turned out that was a good idea. Strep throat. So they put me in Mt. Sinai Hospital and kept me there until I almost went nuts because I hate to lie around in bed even if I am sick, which is another story, but finally they turned me, loose, and there outside the hospital is this little 12-year-old girl, who the nurses said had been there every day with flowers, waiting till I got out.

"Well, I must have looked terrible because she started to cry when she saw me, and I said something like, 'Waaait a minute, honey, take it easy, I'm the one who's sick, not you.' And the kid said: 'You're sick! Who's sufferin'?' How do you like that?"

The age preceding the golden age of the Sinatra saga has proved more fascinating to its central figure than it has to his biographers. Sinatra, at any rate, is intensely preoccupied with it and full of detailed addenda.

It all began with Major Bowes, the legendary and sometimes tyrannical arbiter of amateur radio talent back in the bad old days of the 1930's. Sinatra's voice won the unqualified approval of the good Major, and by and by he found himself a member of one of the numerous Bowes units that toured the country, stopping over once in a downtown theater from whence he made several unsuccessful efforts to get his idol, Bing Crosby, to come to a telephone.

Back in New Jersey, Sinatra turned professional on an extremely modest scale, singing with the band in a run-down saloon for coffee, cakes and $15 a week. He doubled on a broom. But it so happened the joint was properly wired and within the orbit of a New York radio station which, late at night, made a practice of switching from one outlying bistro to another and so picking up the various orchestras. The audience for this program was small but select. Even better, it was mainly professional, and among its group was a distinguished alumnus of dear old Benny Goodman University, who at that time was considering striking out on his own. His name: Harry James.

Sinatra himself did not learn of the background until much, much later, but James had fallen into the habit of waiting for his bit, and one night the trumpeter turned to a friend and said: "If we ever have a band of our own, that's going to be the singer."

Destiny now went into a buck and wing. It was not long after the James declaration that Sinatra decided he'd had a gut-full of insecurity and made up his mind he'd stick it out just one more week before giving up the saloon and trying his hand at sports writing, a branch of newspaper endeavor with which he was not unfamiliar. That decision came on the afternoon of his night off.

History, however, was not taking any backtalk from upstart balladeers. The girl singer with whom Sinatra alternated wanted that night off herself and asked Sinatra if he'd mind swapping with her. He agreed to stick around, and about midnight, James and entourage turned up. Sinatra was under no illusion as to who his visitor was, but remained cool under fire, since he hadn't the faintest idea he was being auditioned. He did a couple of numbers and James called him over. The band was formed: would Sinatra care to be his vocalist?

"All I could think of," Sinatra said not long ago, "was, 'Lock the doors! Board up the windows! Don't let this guy out!' I had hold of his arm so tight, his fingers went numb."

Thus it was James who dropped the starting gate for the stampe of the decade, James whose sensitive ear first detected what a whole generation subsequently would blow its collective stack over. Sinatra's feeling for him is akin to reverence.

THE James experiment had its troubles but Sinatra was an assured hit. He was good enough for James to boost his salary from $65 to $85 a week during a date in Cleveland, and in those days that was considered money. At any rate, it was double-money to Sinatra, whose daughter Nancy was, so to speak, en route. Sinatra was good enough, too, to be summoned, during a kind of jam-boree in Chicago involving most of the name orchestras, into the anointed presence of the man whose company provided the greatest frame of all to a male singer—Tommy Dorsey. Dorsey spoke his piece, and what he had to say was sweeter than his trombone.

But the tough part was ahead. Sinatra went back to James' hotel room. "He was reading. I walked into the room. I walked out again. I must've done that four times. Then I walked around in circles. Finally Harry put down his magazine. 'What's bothering you? Seven-year itch?' So I told him. I'd've been happier opening a vein. Dorsey wanted me.

"Harry called to his business manager: 'Bring in Frank's contract.' When he had it, he sat there and tore it into little pieces. He did that just because I had a better offer. No getting sore, no talk about letting him down, then or later. How do you like a guy like that? I'll tell you this much, I like him fine."

Sinatra stayed on with James for many weeks after that, the time it took to break in satisfactorily a new singer, who also did well, a youngster named Dick Haymes.

Then he joined Dorsey, the maestro who believed in the commercial advisability of spotlighting his singers and building them up into artful proportions—and the juvenile female of the species did the rest.

"The rest," those two words alone, comprise a staggering over-simplification, evading the issue in spades. One or two serious efforts have been made to get at it, most notably a small book stemming from a profile in one of the country's more urbane publications, but even this wound up thin and one-dimensional. "I couldn't give the guy enough time," Sinatra has explained. "There wasn't enough time for anything."

"The rest," as the world surely has not forgotten yet, was lapel-grabbing and clothes-tearing, police escorts, the goggle-eyed consternation of certain thoughtful elements among the elders, and an income from all sources that has to be heard to be believed.

"I've paid," said Sinatra, "$8,000,000 in income tax so far, take or give a little. So I guess I can raise $100,000 more."

FOR a prescient moment, he seemed about to disclose something. "A guy like me," he said gently. "For only a voice. When James came into that Jersey joint that night, I knew—at least, I thought—I might have something a little unique in a male singer. It was—" He broke off. "No. We'll talk about that later and more clearly." There had been some casual exchange about doing another article at greater length and in a different vein. "We'll save that for Volume Two."

He indulged in a brief session with reverie, then snapped out of it. "One thing I'm very sure of. Most of the time, I went through the whole period what you'd call abnormally calm. I was—well, I think you could say I was in a state of shock. That's a good way to put it. A state of shock. I guess anybody would have been.

"But don't make me sound as though I were talking in the past tense. I'm still in business, you know. In entertainment, one of the bad gimmicks about being up where I was, up there in the freak sensation class, there's only one way to go from there, and they begin washing you up as soon as there's an empty seat in the house. Here in Hollywood, if you don't work for two months, they want to bury you, and it's no fun being buried alive. They want to do interviews with me now about my 'comeback.' Frankly, I don't think I've been away.

"Believe me, I'm a happier man today than I was then. It's all leveled off now the way I hoped it would. I eat right and I sleep right and I'm just another guy making a living. I don't know how long I'd've been able to stand it at the old pace. Probably would have snapped my cap before it was over. Besides that, I don't have to worry any more about where it's going to end, and then what? I've found out—and you know, it wasn't half as bad as I was afraid of. I think I'm growing up, too. Crooners do, you know, just like everybody else."

There likely was something in what he had said. The traces of belligerence that sometimes had marked him, particularly vis-a-vis the working press, had disappeared. Columbia publicity people are unabashedly fond of him, both for the record, which means nothing, and off it, which means a lot.

Sinatra had faced at least one very serious problem, which he acknowledged without calling it by name. "Everyone," he said early in the conversation, "sooner or later comes up against something—something terribly big. You stand up to it or you don't." It's too easy to read tones of sadness into a voice if you happen to be looking for them. More probably he simply didn't want to talk for the benefit of the next booth. "You don't have to like it but you have to do something about it."

The walk in front of Romanoff's contained no more than a scattering of mink stoles and no bobby socks. In 1944, Sinatra had to leave the Waldorf in New York by the cloistered Presidential exit, and his well-informed legionnaires would be waiting for him even there. Now he signed one autograph book hastily, stopped to talk with a friend, and answered a final question—a perfunctory, casual query in view of Sinatra's avowed distaste for dwelling on his private life at any length.

"Ava's fine," he said, "and everything is just great." She had not returned from Africa and England yet, from the making of the Metro picture with Gable under director John Ford. "We couldn't be happier. But this being apart—it's begun to gnaw at me now. Every day makes it tougher. I can't be any clearer than that, can I?"

THE late Mr. Kipling, usually a conscientious man, wrote an epilogue to a wower of a centennial Britannia once held, in which he included the words: "The tumult and the shouting dies. The captains and the kings depart." But he didn't say what happened after that. An improved digestion, conceivably; a clearer perspective, and a sounder nervous system. Sinatra drove buoyantly off, up South Rodeo Drive in Beverly Hills, in a Ford with the top down, and traffic stayed normal as all get-out.

Backstage, Jane stood up now while a seamstress sewed swiftly on a white bouffant evening gown. She was very nervous. Chorus girls muttered softly about costumes that didn't fit. One performer grouched about his billing, and the trainer of a couple of chimpanzees was having a heck of a time with his charges who had never worked in a café before and were going wild over the aroma of sizzling steaks and the tangy scent of centerpieces of piled fruit.

A man came backstage and announced it was going to be a tough audience. "Danny Kaye's out there," he said, "and Jack Haley and Florabel Muir of the L. A. Mirror, who calls an act as she sees it. Places, everyone!"

The show began. The chorus girls pranced out on the stage as the curtain parted and saucily tossed their spangled rears at the audience to the brassy accompaniment of a good-sized orchestra. Jane Powell stood in the wings. She'd have to face them in minutes now and she began to count.

Janie stood there and watched the chimps. Suddenly one of them lunged from his chair and headed for a pile of fruit. An assistant dashed from the wings to retrieve him and slip him a bit of banana. Then the other chimp took off and headed right for Danny Kaye, threw his arms around the comedian and planted a wet kiss on his ear. "He's loved me," Danny roared, "ever since we played the Palace together."

It was all fun, and all unexpected, but it held the show up and Janie Powell had to sweat out those extra minutes. But finally the orchestra began to play her entrance cue. Janie rubbed her moist hands together and stepped to the center of the completely dark stage. Then a spotlight hit her with a ribbon of white, and she began to sing.

"Falling in love with love is falling for make-believe," she sang. Her delightful lyric soprano voice seemed thin in the big room. A voice that seemed to be right at her side spoke. It was Danny Kaye. "The mike, Janie," he said. "The mike's too high."

Janie fumbled for the microphone but couldn't quite make it, so a stage hand slid out and adjusted it for her. She hadn't stopped singing. Tears of exasperation filled her eyes, but no more than half the audience saw them. The rest, thinking the lyric a little ironic, were looking the other way—at Geary Steffen.

The next song was "Good-bye, baby, I'm leaving you. . . ." A woman muttered, "What bad taste!"

Geary Steffen looked straight ahead, paying no attention to the rest of the people in the room. Maybe the songs had no significance for him. He'd heard them all hundreds of times. But maybe they did.

Janie's next number was a hot torch song, something they never let her do in pictures—and the audience ate it up. And the next was a comedy number with another lyric that could or could not mean something.

"How could you believe me when I said I loved you," she sang, "when you know I've been a liar all my life?" Geary stared straight ahead, stone-faced. Janie seemed to be singing directly to him. But Jack Haley frowned slightly. It might have been that he, too, disapproved of Janie's choice of material, in view of the recent headlines, or it might have been something else. But he frowned.

The last number was a tear-jerker for the whole crowd. Everyone, that is, but Geary. His were the only dry eyes as Janie sang "It's too late now. . . ."

The show was over. Janie could have taken a dozen curtain calls, but she took only five and hurried back to her dressing room. Geary got up from his table and walked backstage to see her. She sat at her dressing table, her head in her hands. "I was awful, wasn't I?" she said. "I was terrible."

Geary said she wasn't, kissed her gently on the forehead and retired to a corner of the room. Gene Murphy, the Desert Inn press agent, came in with his report.

"How did I do?" Janie begged.

"Nervous, but great," Murphy said. "You began on a high note and left on a high note."

"Tell me the truth," Janie pleaded. "How was I, really?"

"There's a sweet little old lady out there," grinned Murphy, "who's still standing up screaming for more. Look—in a couple of days you'll have the feel of the room and you'll have no problems. But right now you can consider yourself a smash."

Danny Kaye, who had come back to visit another performer, stepped into the room. Jane threw him a kiss.

"It was lucky for me you were out there tonight, Danny," she said. "Thanks."

Danny grinned. "You'd have done the same for me," he said. "I just spoke to the orchestra leader and he told me that from the way things went at rehearsals he thought you'd be just another wispy coloratura, but tonight you exploded into a full-bodied lyric soprano. That's quite a compliment from him."

"Bless him," Janie said. "But the noise out there. It was awful."

"If you intend to work night clubs," Danny said, "you're going to have to get used to it. If you can't, quit right now."

"Thanks, Danny," Janie said. "I'll remember."

Danny left, but a lot of other people had squeezed into the room. Gene Murphy started them toward the door. Soon Geary and Jane went to the bungalow they shared on the hotel grounds.

It was maybe just an opening night, just another singing date, but then, too, it might have been an important night in the lives of two kids, Jane and Geary Steffen. Anyway, it was full of excitement and promise of drama. A new experience in the career of Jane Powell, a step forward or back in Geary's effort to hold his wife.

As they walked across the wide lawn, this reporter couldn't help thinking about other times they had been together—times when no spotlight shone on Jane or her career. For instance, the time Geary picked her up at the hospital after the birth of their first baby. He helped Janie through the doorway and there, instead of his '49 convertible, was a shiny black Cadillac sedan.

"Geary!" she said, "you shouldn't have done that. You know we can't afford a car like that right now."

"It's all right, baby," Geary had grinned. "I borrowed it from my boss for the day."

That was a scant two years ago. Much has happened during those two years. Many plans were made. Many promises made. Many words were spoken from the heart—and many secrets shared. During that time Jane and Geary Steffen advanced a lot, together. He became the top insurance salesman with his company. Janie got a new cream-colored Cad and a new career. They had another baby. Now they were saying she had another romance.

The question, then, was, and still is, can Jane Powell forget? Can she forget all the plans and promises and secrets? Can she have another opening night in her life? Not on the stage, but in her life? She'll have to forget if she does.

According to Florabel Muir, who interviewed Jane at the Sands Hotel before the opening at the Desert Inn, Jane hasn't made up her mind yet. Quoting Florabel: ". . . she says the verdict isn't in yet, as far as she is concerned, about their future together. 'I will not be able to decide what I'm going to do until I'm finished with this night club tour. When I come back to Hollywood I'll make up my mind one way or the other.'"

We decided to talk the thing over exclusively for MODERN SCREEN readers, however, so we waylaid Janie at breakfast the following morning. She was much calmer. She sat at one of the tables by the pool dressed in a pale blue bathing suit and a white terry cloth robe. She looked rested and not at all uncomfortable, even though she must have known what we wanted to discuss. Young Geary was with her—when she could catch him.

"Coffee?" she asked, as we sat down.

We took a cup, and dodged another one that the little boy tried to serve.

"Sorry to barge in on you like this," we said, "but magazines have to go to press. And there are four million readers of MODERN SCREEN who want to know what is going to happen. Did Florabel Muir quote you properly?"

"Of course it was right," Janie said. "Florabel has never misquoted me. However, you've got to understand that Geary and I can't issue statements for every newspaper or magazine that has a deadline, even though we appreciate the interest everyone seems to have in us right now. Actually, we don't know what's going to happen anyway. But I do know that I was happy Geary came to see my opening."

"Geary says," we told her, "that you're the finest wife and mother he's ever known."

"I'm glad he thinks that," Janie said softly. "And I'll tell you this. I'm a lucky girl for ever having known Geary. I still think that as a man, a husband and a father he's as wonderful now as I've always said he is. No matter where our paths lead us in the future, we'll always feel the same way about each other. That may sound like an old song to you, but it's the truth."

WE decided to press a little. "Remember the night . . .?" we began.

Janie cut us short, her bright blue eyes a little chill. "I remember everything and always will!" she said.

"Your dad was up, too, last night," we asked, "wasn't he?"

"Yes, he was," Janie said. "We've always been close to Dad. He helped us build our apartment houses, you know. He's a contractor."

It was an irrelevant bit of information, but we noticed she still used the words

"us" and "our" when talking about Geary and herself.

Little Geary whacked the table with his spoon and demanded to be let down. Then he toddled off and planted himself in the lap of a portly business man he didn't even know.

"There goes everybody's friend," Janie laughed. "Just like his father. Look, how about getting into a pair of trunks and getting wet? This desert air is drying me out."

"No thanks," we said. "Before you go, tell us a little about your immediate future—the professional future."

"That," said Jane, "is the easiest question anyone has asked me in weeks. I think my next picture will be Hit The Deck, probably with Vic Damone. And while you're writing about my tour, you might say something nice about the wonderful people of Toronto, Canada. I played the Casino there and I couldn't do anything wrong. I'd like to go back there soon, and stay a whole month."

"I hear they're great," we said, "but I noticed that last night when you were working the waiters here stopped serving drinks. They don't do that for very many performers."

"I hope it will always be like that," Janie said, "wherever I go. People can be so kind."

"But reporters," we said, "like me, have to pry. We have to ask you questions and look into your private life whether we like it or not. That's our business."

"But sometimes it's so cruel," Janie said.

"Living is sometimes cruel," we reminded her. "Like right now I've got to go find a typewriter or a slot machine or something and get on with my half-vacation and half-job."

"Well, if you find a typewriter," Janie said, "put something down for me. Write down that I'm still a happy girl, but that Geary has gone away. And that my son is busy making social contacts, as you can see."

"Anything else?" we asked.

"Well," Jane said softly, "you can say that I'm alone—all alone—for awhile anyway."

We took our leave, and walked across the lawn to the lobby of the hotel. And we looked back and saw Jane heading for the pool, a lovely doll of a woman, curvy and tiny and eager. Young Geary was still with the stout man, and spilling the third glass of milk he had cadged. There were just the two of them. It didn't look right.

AFTER awhile we found the typewriter. We'd come to get a bit of sun and cover an opening night. We'd seen drama and maybe heartbreak in the making. And two courageous young people with a big difference of some sort try to pretend it was all very ordinary and that nothing was terribly important except the height of Jane's mike and her career.

The typewriter began to rattle. We remembered that Danny Kaye told us that Jane had "matured incredibly as an artist." We knew that she had also matured incredibly as a woman. That she was piling up memories at a rapid rate. We hoped she'd never have to regret the memory of that opening night at Vegas, the night she might have decided that Geary and she were through. We hoped she'd never regret the memory of the day she told us, "Tell them Geary has gone away. Tell them I'm alone."

A lot of people forget the things that have happened to them in the dark past of their lives. But we have a feeling that Jane Powell is not like them. No, Jane Powell will never forget! END

Instead of being the shy, shoe-scuffling bashful cowboy—"Pleased t' meetcha, Ma'm"—Gary Cooper is one of the greatest lovers Hollywood has ever produced.

He is the American answer to Don Juan, the Montana reply to Casanova, and the West's challenge to Prince Charming.

In off-screen love-making he is the originator of the technique of under-playing.

No flowery phrases, no Shakespearean sonnets, no ardent wooings, and no Latin outbursts—only the blue soulful eyes, the clenched teeth, the few choice words, spoken intensely and haltingly in an almost whispered voice. But above all a sincere man, for sincerity is the keynote of the Cooper approach.

TAKE, for example, Coop's latest adventure. After finishing Blowing Wild in Mexico, he flew into France a few weeks ago to take part in the Cannes Film Festival. There he met Gisele Pascal.

Coop, like most of the American stars at Cannes, was put up at the Carlton Hotel. As soon as he registered, all the excitable Frenchmen began referring to him as Monsieur Garicoupaire, and the local belles began phoning the Festival officials, requesting that Monsieur Garicoupaire be placed in their charge.

In fact the feminine demands for Coop's company were so great that the actor was warned to stay away from the beach in his bathing suit lest he start a riot. Having had his clothes pulled off at a preview many years ago, Coop abided by the advice and took his morning swim at a private beach.

Of all the French beauties who were out to enchant Gary, Gisele Pascal was the one siren no one thought he would take up with. For in Europe this charming, Gallic long-limbed actress has long been recognized as the great and good friend of Prince Ranier of Monaco, the tiny principality in which Monte Carlo is located.

Gisele is one of France's leading actresses, and it has been supposed that eventually Prince Ranier would make her his Princess. Only now, who knows? Because apparently Gisele has fallen for Gary, and the Prince is furious with himself for having given his lovelight permission to attend the Film Festival.

It was at Cannes that Gary and Gisele met at a luncheon. Gisele speaks much better English than Coop does French, and it wasn't very long before these two were gabbing away like old friends.

Somehow the place cards at this luncheon were moved around, and Gisele found herself sitting next to Gary. There was more conversation. Had the American actor been abroad before? Yes, he had. Did he know Cannes and the French Riviera? Not very well. How would he like to see it some evening? With whom? With Gisele, of course. The Mediterranean was very beautiful at night.

They went riding together and dining together; and back in Monaco, Prince Ranier blew his top when Gisele didn't return that night. In fact, she didn't return for a week, and during that whole week she was seen with Garicoupaire, almost always with Garicoupaire.

In Mexico, especially in Acapulco, Cooper could date any girl he pleased, and the chances of it breaking into print were very small since there are no gossip columnists in Acapulco.

In Cannes, however, more than 400 journalists had gathered to cover the Festival, and each of Coop's moves was meticulously recorded.

In a matter of days the Pascal-Cooper friendship was built up as the "Red-hot Riviera Romance," and it was said that Coop, in his subtle Western way, had wooed Gisele away from Prince Ranier III of Monaco.

Reporters said, "The American film star, Gary Cooper, and our own Gisele Pascal have agreed to meet in Paris after the film festival is over. Whether Prince Ranier knows about this we, of course, do not know. For the past week, Mademoiselle Pascal has been spending her time with friends in Cannes."

Coop did come to Paris. Checked in at a hotel. And Gisele was not far behind. She had not returned to her Prince. She had followed Gary's trail northward.

In Paris, the press pounced on Coop. Was it true that the American film star had stolen Gisele's heart, that she had renounced her royal friend for him? Was it true that he and Gisele were madly in love? Was it true that he planned to divorce Madame Garcicoupaire and make Gisele his second wife?

"Look," Coop drawled. "I don't know what this is all about. Sure, I met the girl. She's a good girl and nice company, but my meetings with her—well, they were a very informal thing."

"What do you mean," a reporter asked, and his eyes twinkled, "when you say 'a very informal thing?'"

"Well," Coop continued, "I went out with her several times in Cannes, but I also went out with other girls down there. I mean it wasn't anything exclusive. You know how things are in Cannes. They had all sorts of shindigs given by the various nations taking part in the Festival."

"Didn't you know," another reporter queried, "that Mademoiselle Pascal is almost engaged to the Prince of Monaco?"

"Didn't know a thing about it," said the actor who won an Oscar for portraying a brave U.S. marshal in High Noon. "Never even heard of the gent."

"Isn't it true that she's coming up here to meet you? Isn't it true that she's left the Prince because she's fallen in love with you?"

"Don't know a thing about that," Coop protested, and little beads of perspiration began breaking out on his forehead. "After all, I'm a married man, and my wife and daughter are coming here soon."

"Aren't you divorced from your wife?" the reporter asked.

"No, sir," the actor answered. "I'm just in a state of legal separation from my wife."

There were more questions, all embarrassing to Gary, and finally he ended the interview by saying, "I don't care who's in town or who is not. I'm leaving for Brussels tomorrow morning."

Gisele's friends, however, insisted that the tall French actress had her heart set on Coop and that a little thing like distance wasn't going to stop her.

In Monaco, Prince Ranier said nothing about Gisele for public consumption, largely because the Monacan Parliament has long criticized his friendship with the actress and has urged him to give her up and marry an Italian princess who has a dowry of $3,000,000. Ranier has told the parliament to go fly a kite and has refused to call it quits with Gisele.

For Gary Cooper to get mixed up in this sort of foreign intrigue seems a little far-fetched to most of his American fans, but the simple truth is that Coop is a sophisticated man of the world, a millionaire who knows all the angles and can take darn good care of himself in the clinches.

Clara Bow discovered this a quarter of a century ago when she was the number-one box office attraction at Paramount and the epitome of what a girl should be. She was the "It" girl. Coop was a relative newcomer to the public world of Hollywood—but Clara picked him out because he had "It," too—and the rest of the women in America agreed.

When Coop met Lupe Velez, the original Mexican firecracker, his love affair with this strange, uninhibited, kind and tragic little firebrand must go down in the annals as one of the most tempestuous of all cinema-land romances. And, as things that live at fever-pitch must, the romance cooled down—at least for Gary.

So Coop left Hollywood for a while; and when he did, a part of Lupe Velez died, and that part never came to life again. Coop was the one great love of her life, and Lupe knew that the great love had come and passed. And although until her tragic end she continued her gay, giddy life, tumbling in and out of love, those of us who knew her, realized that in her heart Gary Cooper was inimitable. There would never be another like him.

The romance with Lupe a thing of the past, Coop went to Europe and promptly fell into the arms of the Countess Dorothy Di Frasso. That's the trouble with Gary. Women always find him irresistible. They seek him out, and being a gentleman, he always succumbs to their blandishments. It is popularly held that the Countess Di Frasso polished Gary from a rough diamond into a slick star. This is not particularly true. Coop has always known the Carl Laemmle, Jr., used to be a heavy gambler, as well as an excellent producer. He thought nothing of dropping a few thousand dollars at the track in a day's play. One day when Carl Laemmle, Sr. was at the $2 window, a friend said, "How is it, Carl, that your son bets so heavily, and yet you never bet more than $2?"

"Well, you see," answered Carl, Sr., "my son has a rich father."

score. He may act the hayseed off-screen as he does on, but this is purely an act. It arouses the maternal instinct in women, makes them want to baby him, guide him, map out his life.

The Countess Di Frasso may have thought she was running Coop, but when Gary wanted to pull out of the entente, that's exactly what he did. Even while the Countess was throwing her lavish and memorable parties in Hollywood, and he was supposed to be the unofficial host, Coop was dating Veronica Balfe, a Long Island socialite who had come West to try her luck in the movies. Veronica, better known as Rocky, was the kind of girl the actor had always wanted for his wife: well-educated, well-bred, excellent background, widely-traveled.

They were married in 1933, a regular Park Avenue shindig with all the trimmings, and in 1938, their only offspring Maria Veronica was born.

AFTER the marriage, Coop settled down and concentrated on his money-making career. Aided by the advice of his father-in-law, a one-time member of the Board of Governors of the New York Stock Exchange, Gary began investing his money in Wall Street. Presently, he decided to do without an agent and hired I. H. Prinzmetal, a lawyer, to represent him in dealings with the various studios. He also began requesting percentages of film profits and refused to sign for a picture unless he got anywhere from 10% to 40% of the profits. In Return To Paradise, for example, his latest release, he owns 20% of the net.

When Coop was working with Ingrid Bergman in For Whom The Bells Toll, there was a good deal of gossip concerning their alleged extra-curricular activities, but, actually, until he met Pat Neal during the filming of The Fountainhead, Gary was extremely happy with his homelife.

It so happens that he met Pat after he had been married for 16 years. He had reached that point in life, 50, when he needed youth, enthusiasm, someone to reinforce confidence in himself.

There is no doubt but that Pat Neal fell madly in love with the actor; and he in a restrained way with her. It was here that Rocky, patient and shrewd, displayed her infinite wisdom by declining to play the outraged wife.

She announced their separation but she rushed into no headlong divorce. Let Gary carry the ball. Let him make the decision. Did he want a divorce so that he could marry Pat Neal? If so, he could have it.

Coop was in a spot, a tight spot. Most men when they meet adversity, meet it like cowards. They blame everything on their wives. But this time Coop could blame no one but himself.

In all fairness to Pat Neal, who is a lovely and honorable and extremely talented actress, she put no pressure on Coop. He had made the problem, and now he was stuck with it.

Coop, sensibly, did nothing. He neither divorced Rocky nor married Pat. He continued making pictures, living in the Bel-Air Hotel, and asking Pat for more time in which to resolve a decision.

Perceptive female that she is, Pat realized that she had lost, that after the first full flush, there was no chance of Coop ever marrying her. She took her broken heart and went to New York and signed for the lead in a revival of Children's Hour, one of the truly great stage plays of our time.

As for Coop, he drowned his sorrows with a girl named Dusty Miller. While he was dating Dusty, he saw his daughter every two or three days, took her out dining, shopping, to the theater. He saw Rocky on numerous occasions, and there were half-a-dozen false announcements about a reconciliation.

While these were being blared around town, the American Don Juan took off for British West Samoa to make Return To Paradise and to start his 18-month tax-free tour of overseas duty. When Paradise was finished, he flew back to the States, but only for a day or so, and thence to Canada and Mexico.

South of the border he made another film and found another girl, Channele. When the Cannes Film Festival people invited him to come to France, expenses paid, Coop gave his characteristic slow nod and took off.

In Cannes, two nights after his arrival, he took up with Gisele Pascal; and you all know what happened there.

As he heads for 53, Gary Cooper realizes that in all probability he's had his final fling—after all, Rocky has let him have almost two years of bachelor-like freedom—and it is entirely probable that as you read these very words, Gary and Rocky have reconciled and are touring Europe with their 15-year-old daughter, Maria, a beautiful young woman and the cardinal reason for whatever marital stability the Coopers may have.

The French have an old saying, and it goes like this: "Give a husband enough rope and if he doesn't hang himself, he will find his way home."

leave him to the girls

(Continued from page 35) at our house for dinner after we'd finished a day's work together in The Golden Blade. He told me on the set that he didn't think he'd better come.

"Why not?" I said.

"Because I'll eat too much and embarrass myself. Maybe I'd better tuck in a couple of sandwiches before I come over."

"Don't be silly," I said, and forgot all about it until the doorbell rang at home that evening. The maid opened the door but no one was there, and then down on the doorstep she found a peanut butter sandwich wrapped in wax paper, with a note attached. "Nobody loves me. Nobody eats me. I wish I were dead." Daddy found Rock hiding out in the driveway and dragged him in to dinner.

He's the nicest person to have around because he's so much fun. He laughs at everything and his laughter is so infectious that everyone around him feels happy. Rock concentrates on having fun, and it's one of the reasons he's so refreshing as a date. He doesn't try to be the romantic type of glamor boy whose only goal for an evening is to impress his girl; he's completely natural.

I've seen him in a serious mood only a couple of times, and both of them concerned his work. He's quite sober about it, and when we sat in a projection room to watch a rough cut of The Golden Blade, he began hacking himself to pieces with criticism. There was one scene in which I thought he was quite charming, but he hated every second of it and kept mumbling to himself. I know him well enough to agree with him if I think he does a bad job in a scene, but we can have a knock-down-drag-out when I disagree with his self-criticism.

ALTHOUGH I've seen him serious only about his work, I suspect that Rock has a much deeper side that most people don't know about. I can't put my finger on it, but it's there somewhere, and I think he tries to hide the fact from people. As a matter of fact, I suppose a girl could know him for a long time, figuring she really understood what made him tick, and never suspect that he has a lot more to him than the gaiety that runs on the surface.

The girl who wins him as a husband is going to be a very fortunate and happy person. He has a lot of common sense and knows what he wants in a girl, and he won't make any mistakes. The best assurance I have for the statement that Mrs. Hudson will be lucky is the fact that when I appeared with Rock on Ralph Edwards' "This Is Your Life" program, I met backstage all his relatives and friends who have known him for years. When they spoke of Rock it was with deep affection, and there wasn't an insincere compliment given him that night. I don't know how to explain it, but to me that was a real test, and I could sense that all these people, who know him so well, feel that he is the salt of the earth.

I've known Rock ever since I first came to Universal-International, three years ago. I was pretty much of a kid then, with books under my arm and braces on my teeth, and he used to kid a lot with me when we attended drama classes together. I never really thought of him as a date in those days, and I'm sure he never got any kick out of looking at me, with those braces. He was always more like a big brother to me. AND AFTER SETTING recently, and whenever I know I'm going to spend an evening with Rock I get in a happy mood even before he comes to call for me. He's so crazy—you never know what he's going to do next. He can't sit still for two minutes and spends the evening bouncing, whether it's in his seat at a premiere, or bowling along in his car from one place to the other. When he laughs you can hear it for blocks, and you can't help laughing with him.

He isn't the smooth, polished type of escort. I remember one time he brought me an orchid corsage, and he handed it to me as though he were passing the salt. "Here," he said, and started to riffle through a magazine on the coffee table. He's much more at ease when he gives me silly little presents, like the stuffed bunny he brought over Easter morning, or the goony little doll at Christmas.

He's an awful tease and if he ever gets something to hold over you, he won't let you forget it. One time he and I went to a movie on Hollywood Boulevard and when we came out of the theater and were walking toward the parking lot, I felt something tickling the back of my legs. My petticoat had decided to leave me and in less than a second it fell in a heap around my feet. As nonchalantly as I could I stepped out of it and picked it up and put it in my purse, but I needn't have bothered to be so ladylike. Rock was bent double laughing at me, the big goon, and so many people were turning to stare that I had to beat a hasty retreat away from the scene. Since then, he's never failed to remind me of it whenever I make any effort at being glamorous.

He's unusually observant of people and quickly notices little habits or manners of speech. A mutual friend of ours, for example, has an absent-minded way of counting things. It might be the slats in a Venetian blind or the links in his key chain, and I don't think he realized it himself until Rock began imitating him one day. A publicist at the studio gets knots in her stomach if anybody closes one eye and leaves the other wide open. Rock discovered it, and if he's in a room when Betty walks in, there's always this one great eye staring at her. He's such a tease. He kides me about my habit of puckering my mouth when I'm thinking, and every once in a while, out of the blue, he'll say, "Make a bunch for me"—his way of describing the pout.

ADATE with him is always sure to be fun. There's never any shop talk, and he's a wonderful dancer. Best of all, when I'm with Rock I have a wonderful sense of security. He's still like a big brother. I have a feeling that if I ever had any big problem I could go to Rock and he'd do everything he could to help me. I'll even go so far as to say that, if it were necessary, he'd swing a few punches in my behalf. I think he'll always be one of my favorite people.

■ I have to introduce myself first. I'm what is known as a script girl, in which capacity I stand by while a movie is shooting and watch details like a hawk looking for chickens, however small. For instance, if an actor is doing the same sequence today that he worked in yesterday, I have to make sure he wears the same tie and has a bruise on his cheek the same place it was when scenes were shot yesterday. Script girls usually bounce from one actor to another in succeeding pictures, but Fate picked on me to work with Rock Hudson in eight consecutive pictures. I got to know him pretty well on the set, and after a while found myself spending evenings with him every now and then.

These aren't hard to take, except that I never know where I'll land. He gives me no information whatsoever, and I'm just as likely to end up on a merry-go-round 50 miles away as I am on the dance floor at the Mocambo. As a result, I try to dress in what might be called casual clothes that can take anything from a tango to a trapeze.

Once in a while we take in a movie, and if Rock happens to be in it he agonizes through the whole thing. He squirms so much that he makes me nervous and I might as well see it alone. Half of them I have to go see again, thanks to Hudson.

With all his wackiness, Rock has beautiful manners. They're the innate kind of attentions that well-mannered men do unconsciously. Even if I'm wearing blue jeans and have just whopped up a sensational bowling score, Rock is right there to hold open the car door for me. A lot of people around town could take lessons from him on this.

Mother and I have a house on the hill opposite the place where Rock lives now, and the character has availed himself of a pair of binoculars. He swears he uses

When Rita Hayworth began her career, she was about the ugliest of all the starlet ducklings who ever came to Hollywood. The casting director who first signed her was considered out of his mind.

When the studio bosses looked at her, they were far from impressed. One executive said, "This girl is about as attractive as my maiden aunt, age 56." This remark upset a girl hairdresser and she went to Rita, who was in tears.

"What you need, honey," the girl told Rita, "is a remodeling job." So Rita went into hock—and for what? For an electrolysis treatment.

One week and $1,200 later, she was a raving beauty. Almost three inches of hair had disappeared between her hairline and her lush eyebrows. Now Rita had a high hairline and a solid bit part in a film called Susan And God.

Today studio executives shudder to think they almost lost Rita by a hairsbreadth!

them on our apartment and I guess he does sometimes, because he's often kidded me about the time I got home the night before with some other guy. He's a real joker, but a lovable one.

My mother thinks he's the last word in the new generation. No wonder. When he comes over for dinner he likes to help her putter around in the kitchen (sometimes he eats half the food while he's at it), and one night he washed down the kitchen walls for her. We'd planned to go to a show but began howling at some old wardrobe pictures I had around the house, and pretty soon it was too late for a movie. So he got the ladder and a bucket of suds and spent a couple of hours until the job was done. Then he surveyed it with a critical eye and said, "You know, those walls need painting." When Rock says something like that you know he's going to do it. It may not be this year, mind you, but nevertheless that kitchen is going to get painted by Hudson. He teases my mother about anything he can think of, mostly her name, which is the unlikely combination of Olive Victoria. "Ollie," he says, "I've been practicing my golf swing up on the hill at my place and I've been aiming for your kitchen window. But I can't seem to make it." Mother thinks he's the bee's knees, or whatever they called likable young men in her day.

He and I have a gag about names, the crazier the better. When he was in England he sent letters to my home addressed to such assorted characters as Miss Sydenham Klunk, or Ubaldo Umbrellus or Igor Bodkin—anything but Betty Abbott. I give as much as I take on this score, but it's our own joke and whenever I find crazy notes in my typewriter at the studio addressed to Lavinia or Elspeth, I know who they're from beyond a doubt, without any researching.

A while back I mentioned his fondness for food, and while I do not wish to needle Mr. Hudson, I would mention in passing that when we were on location in Oregon for The Bend Of The River I sat next to him at the table and with my own eyes saw him put away 3 (three) T-bone steaks. As it is, I hardly ever get a square meal when I join him for dinner because he eats half of mine.

In contrast to his clowning, he is quite shy with strangers and has extraordinarily good taste in a quiet way. He brought me a lovely black lace mantilla from Europe and a huge bottle of his favorite perfume, Blue Hour. He notices little things that most men don't, and it is on his suggestion that I put polish on the inside of my nail-tips, which I wear quite long.

I think Rock's greatest appeal, at least to me, is his sincerity in whatever he does. He is a very real person, without a phony thought in his head. I've never heard him say an adverse word about anybody; unless he has something nice to say, he doesn't say it. And because of this, it's pretty difficult to find anything wrong with him. There's plenty to kid about, but nothing to criticize.

■ I guess I met Rock just in time. I've been in Hollywood only a short time, and until I met him I was beginning to think I'd never meet anybody out here with whom I could find a basis for real conversation. I come from a college town back in New England, and I grew up with books and with people who have retained the almost lost art of conversation. When I started work in Back To God's Country, I met Rock for the first time. I knew, of course, that he was an established star and a single man who is quite popular around town, so I never dreamed that here was the one person who could give me point for point in a serious discussion.

It all started one day on the set when we began talking about the picture's title, and before I knew it the chatter had evolved into a conversation about religious and spiritual concepts. I couldn't have been more surprised. Rock appears to be such a gay blade—people probably think he hasn't a brain in his head—and here he was, touting the ancient philosophers like a professor back home. That was less than three months ago, but since then we've had a lot of lengthy discussions. We don't see eye to eye, but I enjoy it just the same and am delighted to at last have a communion of minds with someone. We argue all the time, because I'm more familiar with the modern philosophers like Kant and Schopenhauer, while Rock has steeped himself in the ancients. He dislikes what he calls cynical modernism and has me so curious about his own favorites that I find myself digging into the old Hebraic and Buddhist writings. Currently he has me interested in the Hindu Scriptures, the Gita, which is sort of a correlative of the Sermon on the Mount. It's one of his pets, and he can't wait until I'm well enough versed in its philosophy to spend a couple of hours talking with him about it.

He's wonderful in any discussion because he thinks and talks so logically, and he listens as well as he speaks and doesn't, like so many people, concentrate only on making his own point.

As a result of such a mutual interest we haven't taken time out to talk shop or to dwell much on ourselves. I've had only a few dates with him, mostly premieres, so we haven't really found out too much about each other. Others have said he drives like a wild Indian, but then I like jet planes, so it doesn't bother me in the least.

We've been so serious when we've been together that I smile when I think about his reaction if he ever takes me to a ball game. In school, before I decided it was time to act like a lady, I was a pitcher on the baseball team, a track runner, and I played left end on the neighborhood football team. No matter what a girl's intentions are, it isn't a good thing to let a man think she's nothing but a bookworm, so despite all the time spent in our dusty discussions, I still have a few other cards in my deck.

By VERA ELLEN

I've known Rock a long time and am pretty sure I'll know him for a much longer time to come. He's one of those people who stays a friend forever.

We first met, years ago, when he was new to Hollywood and had dropped in at Ciro's for the first time. He told agent Henry Willson he'd like to dance with me and after Henry introduced us, Rock guided me out to the dance floor. I found him a naturally fine dancer with a good sense of rhythm, but in those early days he had a tricky sort of step that he might have imported from Winnetka. I got so used to it that I didn't even notice when he changed his style, months later. We kidded a lot about the fact that Rock is 14 inches taller than I am, and I used to complain he was so big that I couldn't flirt over his shoulder. I told him, too, that if he were a shorter man it would have been a lot cheaper for us the night we sprayed each other with gold dust for the Photographers' Ball. We had a lot of fun that night, and getting ready for it, too. We went into a paint store for the gold paint and when the salesman wanted to know what we were going to paint, Rock said, "Ourselves." I'll never forget the expression on the man's face. We went as Oscars, you know, and it was easier to put the stuff on than it was to get it off. For a week afterward we'd stop traffic when we drove with the top down on his car, our tarnished faces peering into the world.

In those days Rock was as much of a fan as he was an actor. He took me to his first premiere and was so nervous that his hands were damp and all he could think of was avoiding the train on my gown. I remember that he goggled at the celebrities with more curiosity than the fans in the bleachers. His attitude that night was indicative of the thing I've always admired in Rock—the combination of humility and self-assurance.

He is extremely serious about his career, but despite his great success in pictures, he is the same now as when I first knew him. He still spends his money on records and on plants and flowers. Rock has a genuine green thumb. He can plant a leaf of philodendron in a small pot on the mantel, and in two weeks the leaves are trailing in front of the fireplace. He still loves to tease as much as ever. I had a habit of ending my sentences with the phrase "you know" and he kidded me about it so much that I became aware of it and corrected it. He hasn't acquired any phony manners. He never did make studied compliments. If I happened to wear a red dress and he liked red he'd mention the fact in an offhand way. Rock has a rugged quality, a masculine roughness that is smooth in its own way because he is so natural. He still is more than happy to fix gadgets around a house. He's handy with tools, and I remember I sold my car to him when I went to Europe and when I came back he had painted it himself and fixed it up and it looked like a new automobile. He has always been wonderful with my mother, and if I had to go away on a trip all I had to do was whistle to him about leaving Mother alone, and he'd spend a lot of time with her. The last time, he went over on a Sunday and painted the fence for her.

He has a wonderful sense of humor—you can't be unhappy when in Rock's company. But underneath the humor, he runs pretty deep. After you know him a while you sort of feel there's something there you haven't yet tapped. He's the kind who will always have his feet on the ground because he does a lot of thinking, and his world is a big one.

I think he's right in not being quite ready for marriage. He knows there's a lot of life left in him and he isn't yet ready to settle down. When the day comes that he is, he'll be very cautious, I think, in choosing his bride. Rock needs a girl who is mature in her thinking and gay in her outlook on life. From what I know of Rock, she'll be a very happy woman, for the rest of her days.

AVA AND FRANK SINATRA have again alienated influential segments of the Press, this time in London and in Rome. In London, Frank and Ava fought with airline officials and in Rome, the crooner scuffled with a photographer.

It began when Ava, Frank and 11 pieces of luggage turned up at the London airport seven minutes before their plane was scheduled to pull out for Milan.

"I'm sorry," explained one of the airport men, "you're too late to fly. All passengers must be at the airport at least 30 minutes before departure time."

Frank roared, "This is the last time I ever fly BEA." (British European Airways).

"I'd rather swim the Channel," Ava added.

"I'm sorry," the official continued, "we can't inconvenience a plane-load of 32 passengers just because two people are late."

Ava and Frank caught a plane to Rome instead of to Milan. A photographer there tried to snap their picture. Frank charged and there was a scuffle. The police broke it up. Ava and Frank left the airport muttering to themselves.

CLARK GABLE in Venice, following the completion of Mogambo, has been seen with an attractive beauty. Although Gable would prefer she remain anonymous, her name slipped out. It's Suzanne Daddole. Gable has asked his hotel to say absolutely nothing about the girl. Clark was miffed when the papers discovered his so-called "friendship" with Grace Kelly. This entente was highly publicized in England, in fact so well publicized that Grace's mother came over from Philadelphia for a look-see. A few weeks later, Grace, who played opposite Gable in Mogambo, left for home with mama, and the Metro star departed for Paris. It would surprise no one, however, if Clark requested Kelly for his next film. Until MGM decides what that will be, Gable continues to squire beautiful women around Europe.

CLAUDETTE COLBERT who will shortly wind up her 18-month stay abroad with approximately $300,000 tax free, refuses to discuss her marital status with Dr. Joel Pressman, one of the crack ear specialists in California. Claudette insists that her marriage is perfectly okay, that she's in Europe merely to make pictures, and that she's not running away from discord of any type. In her latest made-in-Italy film, the 48-year-old actress, who was born in Paris, plays an American woman whose G.I. husband was killed in Italy. She comes to Salerno to visit his grave and learns that he had fathered an illegitimate son.

KIRK DOUGLAS, a poor boy who rose from anonymity to fame, is a classic example of what success can do to one man's hat size. Douglas not only fought with director Anatole Litvak while working in Italy, but at the Cannes Film Festival he made it a point to date a new girl every night. "We think," wrote one French reporter, "that this Kirk Douglas is really a frustrated Aly Khan."

OLIVIA DE HAVILLAND, wherever she goes in Europe these days makes new friends. Livvy arrived in Paris a few months ago with her 3-year-old son, Benjie, and she has not only sat for mass interviews but has posed for American sight-seers. "I'm honored," she says, "when my countrymen recognize me." Kurt Frings, Livvy's agent, has been asking $175,000 per picture, and it looks as if he's got her an offer in London to do Deep Blue Sea for Wolff Brothers.

ELIZABETH TAYLOR and VITTORIO GASSMAN are expected in Switzerland for Rhapsody late in July. After Liz finishes that one she is scheduled to meet husband Mike Wilding in London. Actors who have worked with Wilding and who can be as petty as vindictive schoolgirls, insist that Mike is really 43, as if his age made any difference to Liz.

SIR LAURENCE OLIVIER is smiling once again now that his wife Vivien Leigh is well on the road to recovery. Olivier would love to make a picture in Hollywood with his wife, "providing, of course, we could find the right vehicle." Incidentally, there is no truth to the vicious rumor that Vivien Leigh feigned illness to get out of Elephant Walk because she didn't like the story. If she hadn't liked the script she wouldn't have started on the film in the first place.

ROBERT TAYLOR when he checked into London to star in Knights Of The Round Table, was recognized by no one despite the fact that this is the third film he's made in England since the war. Conspirators and Ivanhoe were the other two. Taylor arrived with a three-inch growth of beard. "I prefer the comfort of my own whiskers," he explained, "to the torture of gluing (Continued on page 89)

(Continued from page 51) walls of one studio to pick up and leave that studio. There cannot help but be some bitterness under such a circumstance, and along with it there is a certain sadness. In a way, it is like leaving a college, a school whose campus, whose teachers and whose fellow students have all become dear and familiar through the years.

Jeanne felt the break was necessary, nonetheless. Her first picture was Home In Indiana, a film that put her in pigtails and presented her as an ingenue. She was an overnight success in the role, but the accolades that followed soon began to ring hollow as the public continued year after year to see Miss Crain as an ingenue in pigtails. Jeanne's initial success became her bugaboo, and she herself was only too aware of it. Her fan mail was filled with pleas that she appear in better pictures because, despite the river of publicity that flows out of Hollywood, many moviegoers continue with the mistaken impression that movie stars choose their own films. Finally, in 1950, she won the role of Pinky and in her portrayal of a Negro girl in love with a white man, she proved to the movie-going world that she was both a grown woman and a first-rate actress. Jeanne thought she had proved it, too, to her studio bosses, and sighed in relief at the thought that henceforth she would be given meatier roles. Since that time she has been repeatedly disappointed. Studios sometimes have a tendency to sluff off their mediocre scripts by using their own star-built names to sell them, and when an exceptional script comes along, import outside talent to fill the roles. This happened time after time with Jeanne until finally she could take no more.

It's a nice, comfortable thing to have a steady salary coming in every week and not easy to forfeit it, but by the time Jeanne began work in Vickie she had made up her mind to leave the studio and free lance. She wasn't at all sure what kind of offers she would receive, if any, but she needn't have worried. Within two hours after formal notice had been given that she and Fox had come to a parting of the ways, she had invitations to star in two Broadway plays and in several promising movies.

It was during the filming of Vickie, too, that Jeanne got the urge to cut her hair. It not only showed that she was raring for her freedom; it followed the old principle that when a woman makes any sort of major change in her life, she often changes her appearance and personality along with it. Then, too, it happened in the spring, a time of year when everyone feels along with nature a longing to present a bright new face to the world.

Jeanne's own personality has been undergoing a lot of changes in the last year or two. The rebellion against the gingham-type roles into which she had been cast resulted in her effort to prove to everyone that she had evolved into a mature woman. The fact that she was married and four times a mother seemed to have little influence on the brass hats at her studio, so Jeanne tackled the only other way she knew.

It wasn't hard for Jeanne to do. She has the basic element necessary to glamor—complete femininity. She is an eye-stopper in any crowd and has a flair for the unusual which makes her a stand-out even among her screen sisters. She loves clothes, both for themselves and for what she knows they can do for her, and often remarks with wonder that while California women buy some of the most expensive clothes in the world, they don't take particular joy in wearing them. Life in the movie capital tends to be so informal that much of its female population feel more natural in blue jeans than they do in what is called out here "New York clothes". Jeanne, on the other hand, doesn't feel comfortable unless she is dressed to the hilt for the occasion.

She feels that her Bobcat Bob is her favorite hair-do of all time not only because it gives her an exhilarating sense of freedom that ties in happily with her new professional status, but also because it lends itself to any kind of dress, any type of hat, and any sort of occasion. It is so shaped that it can be brushed forward to cap the face, or reversed and worn off the face. It can be something compelling to go with lace and mink, or something very casual and practical for a set of tennis.

She wore her hair long for many years, during times when other girls were bowing to fashion and visiting barbers regularly. This was out of deference to her husband who, like most men, preferred his wife with long hair. When she was preparing to make People Will Talk, director George Cukor had just returned from Paris, and having noticed that short hair was the rage there, asked Jeanne to have hers cut. She did, but never really liked the style. It was fine for a speedboat ride but it was shaped for a definite part and was a sporty coiffure that could be worn only one way. She recalls the night she was dressing to go to the ballet and tried to pin a rose behind her ear. "It was pretty much of a shock when I realized there was no hair to pin it to."

Jeanne says her Bobcat Bob was done on impulse, but one to which she gave a lot of thought.

She said nothing to anyone about having it done. "I used to be sensible and ask people for their advice on everything, but these days I have an urge to respect my impulses. I haven't any more than anyone else, but I've noticed when I obey them, the results have always been fine. I think they're important, steering you to what you really want to do, and they happen in everything through life, even in romance. Something wonderful happens to you when you meet a particular man. Maybe you don't even know him more than five minutes, but call it chemistry or whatever, it's impulse. That's the way it was with Paul and me. And anyway, it's no fun asking people for advice. You always wind up being what they want you to be or doing what they want you to do—instead of being yourself."

She closely watched the fashion magazine, noticing haircuts she liked and those she disliked. And when enough time had passed after the completion of Vickie she consulted the models she had met when making The Model And The Marriage Broker. She had spent quite a bit of time with them, learning their tricks of posture and carriage, and noticed that their hair was invariably worn in the latest fashion. "Who," she asked them now, "gives the best haircut in town?" They all said the same thing—the Bentley Salon in Beverly Hills.

Paul didn't know a thing about it until he got home from work that night. Jeanne knew he liked long hair, but she also knew that he would appreciate a change when he got used to the new idea. "I think change is the essence of femininity," she says. "In a way, it's a woman's weapon. We all know that men have a roving eye, and wives who look the same year in and year out tend to become taken for granted. If a girl can give her husband a new face to look at every once in a while, he's more likely to stay as interested as he was the first time he saw her. Why are women so fascinated with clothes? It's the easiest possible way to look different. Sometimes you have to gamble on reaction, as I did with Paul and the haircut. But it proved my impulse was right—he liked it immediately and by this time is so in love with it that he probably wonders why I didn't do it sooner."

BENTLEY himself says he has never done a haircut exactly like this. Jeanne explained to him what she wanted, and they worked it out together. He cut it wet, with a straight edge razor, and the results were so admired that the salon has since been swamped with hundreds of requests for an identical cut. It can be done effectively even with straight, fine hair as the cut automatically turns it into a different hair style. It is cut quite short in back, where the hair merely brushes down. On the sides and the top the hair is about four inches long, and there is no part, a combination which allows for many changes. It can be shampooed and dried in the sun and then brushed to whatever shape she desires. It is never combed—always brushed.

"Actually," says Jeanne, "it looks short, but isn't. I don't think a boyish sort of bob ever appealed to men, and I feel this is the most feminine haircut I've ever had. It's even coquettish. It's short enough so that it gives a clean, well-groomed look, and it shows the neck and shoulder line, which I think is very feminine. In classic Greek Sculpture, you'll notice there were few women whose hair hid that line. It gives you sort of a regal feeling and a new lift to your carriage that comes without even trying."

"I think the ideal of every American boy is a girl who looks well but doesn't appear to work at it, and this haircut is so artfully casual that it gives that effect. It's wonderfully adaptable for American life, both for daytime and evening, and you can do dramatic things with earrings or with jeweled coronets in the hair."

Jeanne is one of those rare young women who refuse to permit marriage and motherhood to draw them into a rut. She retains a deep love for excitement and adventure, and now that she is free of a long-term contract, intends to have a complete change of pace in her professional life. "I feel ready to meet any challenge that comes along," she says, and is looking forward to doing a variety of movie roles and, in a year or two, a Broadway play.

The first new adventure on her docket is a picture to be made in Europe, Gentlemen Marry Brunettes. In it she will sing and dance and, she says with an ecstatic sigh, wear clothes designed and made in Paris. The picture will be made in both France and Italy, and inasmuch as this is her first trip to Europe, Jeanne at the moment is living in a cloud of anticipation. Seeing Europe has always been the dream of her life, but in ten years of being contracted to a studio there has not been an opportunity. The only time she has taken off has been devoted to having her children.

She is well equipped to enjoy Europe to the hilt. Both her father and uncle are language professors, with the result that Jeanne speaks French and Spanish rather fluently. History has always been one of her favorite subjects, she is an avid reader, and is so enamored of painting and sculpture that she places Florence higher than any other city on her list of anticipations. She is taking with her a special traveling case filled with sketching material and oils, hoping to bring back impressions done by her own hand, as well as by camera lens. There will be ample time to see things while the picture is being prepared, and Paul will go with her for a week or two at the start of the trip, as long as he can spare from his business, and then rejoin her for another week when the movie is completed.

SHE worries a great deal about leaving all the children, even though she is certain they will be well cared for, as this will be her longest separation from them.

A few years ago she went to New York and was gone three weeks. "It was the longest time I'd been away from them, and the night before we left I didn't want to go. This time it will be more than three months, and I'm sure Paul is going to have to drag me out of the house."

Knowing Jeanne, we would venture to say that once she gets over the initial hump of leaving, she will have the time of her life. Furthermore, it's a rather good bet that the women of Paris, for a change, will be coveting an American haircut. END

Gregory Peck is behaving himself in a manner beyond reproach. He is living the quiet, respectable, middle-class life in an apartment at 45 Grosvenor Square in London.

He has sub-let the apartment from producer Sam Spiegle and has hired a Hungarian cook, a middle-aged woman who not only prepares the most delectable dishes for him but for such guests as Maggie and Leo Genn, Audrey Hepburn's mother, Ronald Neame, and the scads of Englishmen Peck has known since he made Captain Hornblower in England a few years ago.

GREG has always liked home-life—he knew so little of it as the exchanged child of divorced parents—and rather than stay for any considerable length of time at a London hotel, he moved out of Claridge's early this spring and rented Spiegle's flat so that he could relax, entertain in his own way, and for three or four months stop living out of suitcases.

Peck is starring in The Million Pound Note at Pinewood Studios—this is an old Mark Twain story—and will probably not finish the film until some time in July. He is then scheduled to go to Sweden for Assignment In Stockholm and to India for The Purple Plains.

By that time his 18 months abroad should be up, and he'll be able to return to the U.S. with $300,000 or $400,000 tax free.

Greg doesn't mind returning to California with some tax-free dollars, but he doesn't want to come back with the reputation of a Great Lover, which is the kind of reputation someone like Kirk Douglas has been building abroad by flitting from one girl to another.

This is why Greg in London gets up at 6:30 A.M., takes some breakfast coffee, drives to the studio, acts opposite his leading lady, 23-year-old Jane Griffiths, a dentist's daughter from Rottingdean, Sussex, then drives back to his apartment at Grosvenor Square—"It's usually eight when I get back"—has dinner, reads until midnight, then retires.

He is rarely seen in public with any single or unattached women, because he knows now that if he is, the newspaper boys are waiting to splash it all over their papers.

Peck knows, too, that he has an obligation to his wife and three sons, Jonathan 9, Stephen 7, and Carey Paul 4, and that his behavior in Europe must in no adverse way affect the lives of his loved ones across the Atlantic.

Greg realizes now that you cannot date a single girl on several occasions without imbuing in that girl the hope that somehow and in some way she might become the second Mrs. Gregory Peck.

This is the error in tactics the tall Lincoln-esque actor committed last year when he began seeing Veronica Passanie even while Greta and the boys were in Europe.

VERONICA is a plain-looking, dark-eyed, brunette of 21, half French and half Russian, who lives with her mother in a small apartment in Paris on the Avenue Franklin Roosevelt. She works part-time as a reporter for the Paris Presse, an afternoon newspaper, and when you ask her about her relationship with Peck, her eyes flash and she becomes furiously defensive.

Civil War Adventure . . .

South Sea Island Love!

Could two young Confederate officers with one wooden raiding ship swing the tide of war? Could the bravado of their plan completely wreck the North's whaling fleet, scattered all over the high seas?

And what about the girl now living in a puritanical New England town . . . who had once tasted the pagan pleasures of the South Seas? Would she keep their secret?

A grand adventure-romance historical novel that you'll find exciting and absorbing.

"I'm a journaliste," she says, "and when Mr. Peck arrived in Paris, quite naturally I went to interview him. He was very nice. I went out sometimes with him. I am not going to discuss love. What do you mean, do I love him? What business is it? He is a very nice man. It was professional. I am a professional journaliste."

"That's obvious," I said, "but how come you followed him to Rome when he was making Roman Holiday with Audrey Hepburn?"

"I follow him? I did not follow anyone. The paper asks me to go to Rome to do a story."

"What story?"

"To do a story, and while I am there I run into Gregory Peck. He is a very nice man. He recognizes me. So."

"So what?"

"So Gregory Peck is just a friend, and I am a journaliste, and I have a career, and I am not going to answer any more questions."

"But isn't it true that you've told some of your girl-friends that you might one day be his bride?"

Mademoiselle Passanie bristled. "Who tells you I say that?"

"Some girls. I'm sorry I can't reveal their names."

"I never said that. All I say is that he is a nice gentleman and a friend. I am a journaliste, and I work here in Paris. I will not answer any more questions about Gregory Peck."

"Okay, just tell me this, and we'll drop the whole subject. Aren't you flying over to London Tuesday specifically to see him?"

"No, I am going to Nantes this Tuesday and about me and Gregory Peck is nobody's business, and I do not answer more questions."

"Gregory Peck aside, how old are you?"

"Why you ask?"

"Because indirectly Peck has been accused of being a cradle-snatcher, figuratively speaking that is."

Veronica Passanie said she was 21.

"Don't you think you're a little too young for Mr. Peck?"

"No more these questions. I am a journaliste and I do interviews myself."

IN PARIS today you can still hear vicious, unfounded rumors to the effect that Greg and Veronica have been meeting in London, but these aren't true.

Aware of the international stir his friendship with Veronica had caused, Greg realized some months ago when he left Paris for London that this one had best be terminated.

Actually it was a fluke that he met Veronica in the first place. She had asked a Paramount publicity man if she might interview Peck, and the press agent had arranged it.

Months later, Greg was invited to a small gathering in Paris, and everyone was amazed when he showed up with Veronica instead of his wife who was at that time also in Paris.

It seems that Greg and Greta had engaged in a serious spat, that dishes had gone flying all over their place, and that Greg was seeking his feminine companionship elsewhere. Shortly after this squabble, Greta took her three sons and sailed for home on the Ile de France. Greg saw them off. As soon as he was footloose and fancy-free, reporters approached him.

"Okay," one of them said, "tell us the truth. Are you and Mrs. Peck separated because of your interest in Hildegarde Neff and Veronica Passanie?"

Peck said, "Sure, we're separated, but only by the ocean. Mrs. Peck went back to California to put the boys in school."

"How about you and Hildegarde Neff?"

"That's just nonsense. I met her in London at premiere of Snows (of Kilimanjaro) and I haven't seen her since."

"But you won't deny seeing Veronica Passanie?"

Peck said, "Sure, I know her. I've seen her in Paris. But there's nothing serious to it. Never was."

"Is there any truth to the story that Mrs. Peck plans to return to Europe in July or August?"

"I don't know about that yet."

IN Hollywood, Mrs. Peck says, "I don't think I'll be able to meet up with Greg this summer. After all, the boys and I haven't been back too long, and we have to get readjusted. But we hear from Greg all the time. The boys write him—of course, they miss him a good deal. He used to take them down to the beach and go for long walks with them. He's always been a wonderful father."

When Greta Peck returned to California from Europe, she took off for Las Vegas, and immediately a rumor was circulated that she was going to sue for divorce.

"I never had any such intention," she says. "I went to Las Vegas because I'd never been there before, and one of Greg's old friends, Ken Tobey, was going there with his wife. I think to attend somebody's wedding. That's right. Elmer Schneider, a business manager, was getting married and we just went along."

"Everyone said I was getting a divorce. I can tell you that such a thought is farthest from my mind. I hear a million stories about Greg in Europe. If I believe everything I hear, I'll go crazy."

"Greg's going to stay over there until this winter. His father and brother will probably go over to join him. Undoubtedly his name is going to be coupled with the names of some beautiful women. But he's a grown-up man. He's the father of three children, and he knows how to take care of himself."

"I realize that it's very hard being a famous movie star, working in Europe away from your wife and family. There are many temptations. A lot of young girls throw themselves at an actor. Not only in Europe but in this country as well. A man has got to practise self-control or he can wind up in a lot of trouble. The newspapers are ready to pounce on anything."

"If Gregory Peck and his wife are getting along very well, that's no news. But if we've had an argument or two, that's news. I'm not saying that we haven't had any quarrels. That's ridiculous. In ten years of marriage, all couples have disputes. There are quarrels about a lot of things. But we have three children and ten years behind us and I wouldn't ruin all that with a divorce."

THE Pecks were married almost 11 years ago on October 4, 1942 at Christ's Church in New York City; and like many young theatrical couples they were very poor. Greta worked as Katharine Cornell's hairdresser, and Greg played in a series of plays each of which ran no more than two or three weeks.

They lived in an old brownstone on East 40th Street between Lexington and Third Avenues. "It was a small three-room apartment, and I think we paid $14 rent each week."

The Pecks didn't have enough money for a honeymoon until Greg got a lucky break and came out to RKO to test for Days Of Glory. A very wonderful man named Charley Koerner was running RKO at the time—that was in 1943—and when he learned that Greg and Greta had never enjoyed a honeymoon, he gave Greg a check for $5,000 and said, "That's one thing every young married couple should have."

Greg took his bride and went to Phoenix and had a honeymoon at the Camelback Inn and then came back to New York where he moved Greta into the Town House on 38th Street, rent $85 a month.

It was there that Greg and Greta really got to know and respect each other, to learn about their individual quirks and idiosyncrasies, and to understand them.

No matter what European temptations beset her husband, Greta Peck is sure that Greg will never jeopardize his home. He's always wanted one too much.

He was only three when his own parents separated, and he spent his youth shuttling from grandmother to father to mother to St. John's Military Academy to the University of San Diego, and finally Here's a casting switch. In U-I's Sioux Uprising, Jeff Chandler plays a white man instead of the usual Indian!

Sidney Skolsky in Hollywood Is My Beat

to the University of California at Berkeley.

When finally he did strike it fairly rich in Hollywood, his first move was to rent a house, not an apartment, on Sunset Plaza Drive. Then very quickly, Greg bought a larger house on Mulholland Drive overlooking the city. "I've always liked a place," he explains, "where I can put down roots."

When the children began arriving, the Mulholland house was too small. "So we bought another one out near Pacific Palisades. That's where we live now, and that's where our children are very happy. Except," Greta Peck adds, "they miss their father. And I miss him, too. But let's face it, he's an actor, and he's got a job to do, and he wants to do it under the most advantageous conditions."

"His agent, that's MCA, you know, they've been great. They advised him on this 18-month tour, and they keep getting him all these offers. As you probably know when we first came out here, Greg wasn't making very much money. When he did begin earning something substantial, he was paying as much as 80% in taxes."

"In going to work overseas he's thinking of his family's future welfare, and I don't think anyone can blame him for that."

In London, Peck is trying to live down all those stories coupling him with Hildegard Neff, the beautiful German actress who, during the war, traded her last blouse for a loaf of bread. He is trying to soft-pedal rumors linking him to Veronica Passanie, la jeune journaliste, by attending strictly to business.

He's been told his reputation among movie-fans is much too good to endanger, that he's worked too hard and too long to foul up his career, and as a result he's determined to lead a circumspect existence although it certainly won't be a monastic one, for Greg has always liked the girls; and he's not going to deprive himself of feminine companionship completely.

For example, on his way to Cannes to attend the last days of the Film Festival, he stopped off in Paris to see Veronica Passanie, although the French press said, without naming names, that "Gregory Peck left Paris where he was held by an affair with a young journaliste to go to Cannes."

BETWEEN now and December when he returns to California, you may still hear about Greg and Veronica or Greg and some other European beauty, but it won't be anything too serious.

Eldred Gregory Peck has learned his lesson. He is promising nothing but good company, and from here on in, he's playing it very safe.

"A divorce," he says, "is the last thing in the world I want." And he means it. END

"It's that mysterious thing called technique that turns the trick," says Mitzi Gaynor. Here Hollywood's hottest date-bait tells her secret of attracting and holding a man.

Take my word for it

by MITZI GAYNOR, star columnist for August

Friends are for fun, not advice.

Gently does it with man or beast.

Keep an eye on your guy at all times.

I'm a flirt and don't care who knows it.

TO ATTRACT A MAN IS ONE THING, but then comes the important part of a girl's life—the how, when and whether of holding him.

Every girl has her successes, every girl her failures. Out of this, in the exchange of knowledge and experience, is evolved technique. In this spirit, and this spirit only, I offer what I know and think.

I TACKLE THE PROBLEM of holding a man (or not holding him) from the first instant I am aware of him. If I am at a party and a man makes it his business to meet me (and provided I like him), what goes on in my head is something like this:

What was I doing, what was I saying, the first moment he saw me? What angle did I present to him? Did he see me from the side, the back, the front. Was he busy with someone else when he saw me or wasn't he doing anything anyway?

Maybe I realize that when he first saw me I was in an unusually gay mood and he may have the impression that I am just a mad lighthead. Since I like him I want to correct that idea. Life is not just for laughs as far as I am concerned. I try to let him know.

Maybe I am wearing a dress of a certain color and I feel he was attracted by it. Mister, if we keep knowing each other you are going to see a lot of that color. I'll remember. That's a girl's business.

Maybe, on the other hand, I caught him turning his head to look at me when I happened to mention the name of someone important (I hate name drop-pers so much that I hate myself when I happen to mention anyone who comes under that category). So. That's something to keep in mind. It may not be me he is interested in... but the fact that I know somebody he wants to be interested in him. Well, he can find some other way.

WHAT IS THERE ABOUT HIM THAT I LIKE? Is he making sense with his talk, casual, interesting talk, or is he just talking... maybe trying to impress me? What about me? Am I making sense in my talk, et cetera? Does he stack up like a double A date, the one I'd like to dress up for and go out on a Saturday or Sunday evening? Or is he just someone I'd like to go to the beach with, maybe a cocktail party, say... but not the all-out boy friend.

The fellow any girl is looking for, of course, is the all-around date, the one you would have fun with going anywhere, doing everything or even doing nothing... just being with him. Until a girl finds such a person she is never completely happy with any man.

Is he that one? How do you judge? By a feeling you get, of course. But there can be more. By looking and listening and thinking, by being receptive you have a chance to find out about him. And that's where technique comes in. You can chase off the right man, you can attract the wrong man, by not handling yourself right.

THERE WAS A TIME I'D BE SO NERVOUS meeting a new man I'd make the same mistake a lot of girls do, talk too much, and drive him away . . . or at least so drown him in my prattle that he never got a chance to give a picture of himself. I learned to listen . . . to listen for clues about the fellow . . . his interests and ambitions.

I remember admiring a man at a party and then learning that he was a doctor. I thought to myself that we would probably have little in common. Then he came over and I let him talk. Pretty soon he was saying something intelligent about the ballet, something he couldn't very well say unless he liked the ballet. "Ah!" I thought to myself. "If he likes the ballet then he likes music. If he likes ballet and music it is even possible that he might like me . . . and certainly it is possible that we have a common meeting ground for our interests. . . So, you are not entirely pharmaceutical (or medicinal or whatever it is) my handsome medic!"

That overtalking when you meet someone new can be fierce! By the time you separate often neither remembers names or anything said. Maybe you could have had a nice friendship but you goofed it.

I TRY HARD NOT TO JUDGE A MAN by what one or two people may say about him. I have learned that the opinion of the few is not reliable; the opinion of the many may not always be right, for that matter. A man who is strongly individual may often be secretly resented by many of his friends, and they will unconsciously (and sometimes deliberately) reveal this feeling by their remarks and attitude when his name is brought up. What they don't like, however, is exactly what you might like! A strong individual, unless he is hopelessly eccentric, is someone a girl could cotton to and be very happy with: Of course, being individual and just trying to play the part are two different things. One is somebody, the other is a fake. You have to use your judgment like anything!

THE WORST MISTAKE A GIRL CAN MAKE is to play at being something other than she is. What's the point of putting on the Grand

Look, the over-emphasized manner, unless you never want to see the fellow you are meeting again. Because, you can't keep it up, you know. Sooner or later you are going to revert to your usual self . . . and then, floey! Where he might have accepted you, and liked you, for what you really are, it's not so easy to watch you sink from something higher to your real level. He might still like you . . . but with a sense of loss always between you.

There is a little piece of advice I try never to forget when I meet someone new whom I like: "Don't sell yourself!" You're not a car! You don't have to demonstrate all your good points in one grand demonstration. The idea is not to make him go home and add you up! He's not looking for an article. He's looking for a relationship which he feels can develop and grow with time. A pleasant impression, something he may not even be able to define, is the perfect start.

THE IDEAL STATE OF AFFAIRS IN LOVE as far as women are concerned, would come about if men were more interested in women than women are in men. Unfortunately the reverse of this is true. That's just the way it is, that's all. This means that the girl must do most of the thinking in any romance. By your beauty and personality you have attracted him, but so help me, and no matter how beautiful you are, it's by your thinking that you are going to hold him in the long run. Let me prove it: If only beauty counted the relationship would never grow much past what it amounts to the first time because the strongest impression beauty makes is usually the first one. Beauties don't become more beautiful; they can look more beautiful if, fortunately, the beauty has been enhanced by other attractive qualities stemming from character and acquired knowledge. A girl can grow and grow in a man's heart by what she does and how she does it; seldom by the fact that she looks as beautiful today as yesterday.

A GIRL WANTED TO INTRODUCE HER NEW BOY FRIEND to her own crowd. She planned a party at her house. And she used her head. She had him come a half hour before any of the others were due. In this way he didn't have to brace the whole bunch of them at one time by walking in when the others were there. Meeting a roomful of people, all of whom know each other but none of whom know you, can be a bit of an ordeal. He was very grateful for this. He thought his girl had brains and a fine social sense. These are qualities a man would appreciate in a wife. It didn't hurt her a bit. (Incidentally, if a man were planning to introduce his new girl to friends might it not be better to do the reverse? Let her come when everyone else is assembled so she could be the queen bee and make a grand entrance? Shows you how complicated these things can be.)

Another girl I know liked a boy very much but she didn't like the way he dressed. Being intelligent she never revealed her feeling. Instead she complimented him every time he happened to wear something that was in good taste. Since he liked her he liked her praise. Without knowing it he tried for more. There was only one way to do this . . . by experimenting with his clothes. Gradually, he learned what would bring a pleased look to her eyes and what wouldn't.

TO THINK A LOT ABOUT YOUR ROMANCE with someone does not mean to be so concerned about it as to let it become unbalanced. It seems to me that a lot of girls I know have a two-cycle phase to all their affairs; 1) They go round and round madly in love, 2) they go round and round horribly miserable because (they think) it just hasn't gone well. Actually, they, the girls, have pulled the solid underpinning away from under themselves by being too nervous about it all.

One big mistake a girl can make is to be a good sport. Men take good sports on casual dates, call them up at short notice, kid around with them—but never marry them! How do you become a good sport? By letting things ride, by being afraid to cause a fuss when he has committed a fault or is otherwise guilty of failing to maintain his end of the relationship properly. If you have gone with him to a gathering of his friends and he soon deserts you while he takes up old issues with this one or that one . . . that's the time to call him on it right away. What's the use of overlooking this sort of careless attitude to you? Is the possibility of a break-up worse than the probability of a lifetime of being left alone? A major change of attitude is required here if you are ever going to be happy and you had better find out right away if he is capable of making this change.

A MAN SHOULD NOT BE A BRAGGART. If he is he is deliberately misrepresenting himself in an important matter . . . a friendship that might develop into a lifelong association. A girl is always conscious of a man's potential; will he have character, will he have strength, will he make a place for her in the world? She is conscious of it because there is an important role she must play, as a wife and a mother, and she will need strong support. Can he give it? Not if he's a liar about himself. Not if he is so indulgent about his mistakes that he laughs them off and expects her to do the same. Not if he is so self-centered that he rarely can see her point of view.

HOW DO YOU FIND OUT these big things about a fellow? By carefully noticing and adding up the little things.

If he really likes you he'll be interested in what you like. If you find yourself keeping many things to yourself that ordinarily you would talk about—it's time to start wondering how long you can keep it up. If you find yourself going again and again to places which absolutely have no appeal to you, and he hasn't even once gotten the thought that this might be the case . . . how close is he to you, how close can he ever be?

I DON'T MEAN THAT A GIRL SHOULD BE CRASSLY INDEPENDENT I do mean that she should be thoughtfully analytical . . . not only of her feelings, which can lead you God forbid where . . . but of the facts. She should stand aside and look at herself and him as two other people. What would you think of your romance if your friend was in your place? Would you see things about yourself that you don't see now?

A wise man once said that lovers lie to each other . . . but not as much as they lie to themselves.

Is true, no?

Asked if, in his opinion, he has gone Hollywood, Tony gestures wildly. "Gone Hollywood? I don't know what it means. I really don't. I guess a few people here go off their rockers, but everybody we know is a down-to-earth guy who'd rather go to a picnic than a premiere. I don't say they'd rather go back to being poor—that'd be crazy—but they lead sensible lives within their incomes and they don't think they're better than the next guy. What's with this going Hollywood routine?"

He violently defends the slightest peck at Hollywood's collective reputation, and his loyalty is both commendable and understandable. The town and its industry have given him things he never dreamed of having, and to slander it in any respect has never entered his mind.

WHEN he first arrived in Hollywood four years ago he wasn't exactly a naive kid. He had lived a tough life and he had spent two war years on a submarine. He had no notions about the streets of Hollywood being paved with gold. He viewed the town as a dream world where success might possibly come to him, but he came humbly, knowing that his own talent was only a drop in a city that was a sea of talent. He knew that there is no equivalent, in real life, of the Good Ship Lollypop.

Nobody paid any attention to him at first. He was just another cog in the big wheel. The people he was meeting were always going places but they never asked Tony to go along. The first sign of his acceptance came when they began nibbling him. Would he go to the prop department and get the left-handed baseball? Had he drunk any water from the Old Iron spring on the back lot? Tony hadn't been born yesterday. He'd known all these gags from his boyhood, but he went along with them to please the gagsters. He figured it was a small enough price to pay for their friendship. He found his closest friends in Frankie Van, who runs the studio's gymnasium, and a couple of people in the publicity department.

He was content with this life. He wanted to better his career, of course, but the fact that he wasn't invited to the swank parties or asked to hobnob with the big shots didn't bother him in the least.

And then it began to happen. The pictures in which he'd appeared (most of them gave him no more than a few lines of dialogue) were seen by moviegoers, and the fan mail began flooding the studio. The executives soon knew that Tony's flash popularity required his being given a leading role, and fast. They rushed through the script of The Prince Who Was A Thief and put him in the title role. Even before the picture began shooting, things began to change. People who hadn't bothered to smile at him before now gave him a big hello and soon were including him in their social lives. Tony had lived too long and too thoroughly not to know that the new attitude was because he was slated for the big time.

TONY's name landed on the list used for the elegant Hollywood parties. "Go to them," said some, "it's good business." And others said, "Don't get mixed up in that rat race. When you start climbing around on the social ladder it's a cinch you'll be accused of going Hollywood."

When he married Janet Leigh the flint-tongued in town said it was a marriage of convenience for Tony because of the fact that Janet's more established career would help his own to climb faster and farther. When he took a suspension at his studio in order to go away on a trip with Janet, he was accused of growing too big for his boots. Every time he asked for a raise, they said his ego was inflated.

His agent criticized his clothes. He shouldn't wear slacks and sweaters, he shouldn't wear those sharp clothes from New York, he shouldn't buy suits with those wide lapels. To emphasize the point, the agent took an armful of Tony's clothes and gave them away.

Why, people wanted to know, didn't he lose that Bronx accent? Why couldn't he speak English, like other actors?

Did he always have to let his hair flop over his forehead? He must be going Hollywood. That careless lock of hair was the mark of the affected actor.

People he had never seen before approached him and invited him to parties. "I'm a friend of Joe's. You remember Joe. I'm giving a little soiree Saturday night and I'd appreciate it if you'd be there at eight."

Why didn't he buy himself a Cadillac? Every successful movie star has a Cadillac. Why did they live in that little one-bedroom apartment? And then when they moved to the penthouse, do they have to have a penthouse? Why didn't they have a baby? Were they so tied up with Hollywood and their careers that they didn't want children?

"Don't let all this go to your head," he was told by veterans. "Just because 2,000 girls scream when you come out on a stage—well, don't let it go to your head, that's all."

People said they were tired of seeing Tony's picture in magazines, that every time they opened one, there was his picture looking out at them. He must be publicity crazy, they said.

A GI wrote from Korea. "You great American dream, you. How would you like to switch places with me? I sleep every night in a space six by six and eat out of a tin can."

He went into a restaurant, and the people at the adjoining table nudged each other. "Look, he eats—just like everybody else."

He said he didn't like a certain actress. "You shouldn't say that," they told him. "Five years from now you might be broke and you'll be glad to get on your knees and ask her to help you."

When he was on a stage he was taunted by hecklers. They were always men, reacting negatively to his good looks. He appeared in a newsreel in connection with a charity function, wearing a tuxedo with a string tie, and the hair falling over his forehead, and an all-male groan went up from the audience.

WHILE the cloying compliments and jealous criticisms were building up to such pressure, Tony was working harder than he ever had in his life. He was in one picture after another for which he had to learn to box, to fence, and to perform the magic tricks of Houdini. He was in the first year of his marriage, a time when anyone needs peace of mind for the necessary adjustment, and for long weeks he was tormented by his father's serious illness. These things were important, so important that things said to his face or behind his back made little impression other than a sense of tingling annoyance. But every time he paused to take a breath, the flood came pushing in at him.

How has Tony reacted to it all?

To the criticism of his marriage, his suspension and his requests for more money, he reacted by vowing to break a few noses around town. It was then he had his first lesson in controlling his temper. He was told, and had to admit it was true, that every Hollywood star must learn to let these things run themselves out. If every maligned star acted on his impulses, there wouldn't be a straight nose in town. Tony didn't cease being angry; he was furious and rightly so, but he learned the first price of fame in this day and age. A name in the news cannot risk a brawl and the resultant bad publicity in order to defend his honor.

He went only to the parties he wanted to attend. These were given by his and Janet's friends, of whom they have many, and despite outside pressure to attend social affairs, Tony steered away from them.

As for his clothes, he had trouble learning about them. He'd been used to styles that tended toward the zoot suit, and it was difficult for him to tone down his taste. By now he has learned the value of the dark suit and conservative tie, but once in a while something snaps and he buys an article that according to Wall Street and Sunset Boulevard is all wrong. For the first time in his life he has enough money for gimmicks and his natural exuberance makes him want to dabble in fads. The string tie with the tux was one of these things. If Tony had been there in the theater when the audience groaned he would have been hurt.

Concerning his hair—with the exception of his Navy days when it was shorn to a crew cut, Tony has always worn it rather long and it has always, as snapshots will prove, flopped over his forehead.

The criticism of his accent at first bewildered Tony and now amuses him, for by this time he knows the answer. He is censured because his speech retains the twang of the Bronx, yet he knows full well that should he make a studied effort to deliver Oxford English wrapped in pear-shaped tones, he would be the butt of even more criticism.

HE learned to ignore remarks concerning his finances. He didn't buy himself a Cadillac because (a) the Buick was a perfectly good car and (b) he couldn't afford a more expensive automobile. For the same reason, they lived for a year in a small apartment. Like every young couple they hope for a home of their own, but instead of following the Hollywood pattern wherein newly made stars buy homes beyond their income before the ink is dry on their contracts, Tony and Janet lived in crowded quarters in order to save for the home they want. They moved to the penthouse simply because they needed a bigger place. They didn't look for a penthouse; the apartment they liked just happened to be one.

They do want children but they are both young, and wise enough to plan their family in a manner that, when the children do come, they will have a more normal life. Both Tony and Janet are at the beginning of their careers, and as is usual in Hollywood, this is the period when they are working the most steadily. If there were a baby at home now they would seldom see it, but if their respective careers follow the established line, two years should find them working in fewer pictures.

When Tony was cautioned against conceit because of the adulation showered on him, he shrugged. "If two people like me, that makes me happy. That's all I need. If 2,000 people like me, that's very nice, but the difference between two and two thousand doesn't affect me at all."

The hecklers are always there, but they don't bother him. He knows that anybody in the public spotlight has to contend with them, whether he be the head of the Plumbers' Union or the President of the United States. A few of these hecklers got close to Tony, and seeing that he is extremely capable of handling his fists, backed down. To some of them he has said, "You look like a nice guy. Why do you want a fight?" And the resentment has left them like air from a pricked balloon.

Somebody once consoled Tony concerning the brickbats by telling him, "Nobody shoots at dead eagles." And so when people go out of their way to be rude, when people in public bump into him on purpose (one girl did this deliberately, twice, at the time Tony was on crutches because of his fractured ankle), he knows it is only because they are envious of him for one or many reasons.

None of the slaps have made him quite so angry as the letter from Korea. "Sure,

Don Taylor's Santa Monica home has bathrooms papered with movie scripts that Don has done.

I'm sorry he's there, but it's no reason to single me out as a guy who's sleeping comfortably in a feather bed. I did my stint, and I'd have been happy to have a room six by six. When I was in, I slept on a torpedo. I wanted in the worst way to write that guy. I wanted to tell him that I'd have switched places with him when I was in and he was back here doing his geography homework. But you can't do that to a guy who's over there now. I wish I could tell him face to face after he gets out."

TONY's honesty is one thing he will not surrender to his career. When he was told he shouldn't speak of his dislike for a particular actress he said, "Why not? Am I a block of wood? Am I a blessed angel? Everybody in this world dislikes at least one person, and I'd be a hypocrite if I said I didn't."

The comments that he is over-publicized are a perfect example of the fact that no matter which way a star faces, he is pelted by criticism. When actors refuse interviews and photographs they are roundly scolded by the press, yet when they cooperate to the fullest, as have both Tony and Janet, they are told they are too obsessed by publicity. Tony's attitude can best be explained by his honest statement to a Paramount publicist when he went to that studio to make Houdini. "Whenever you want me for anything, call me up. Day or night, Sundays or holidays. I know I didn't get where I am through my acting, because I haven't had that many pictures. I owe it all to the press. They started me off and by now they've put me in a spot where I have a chance to prove I'm an actor."

Needless to say, he is a favorite of the press, who have always found him courteous and helpful. When he and Janet were presented last December with the Golden Apple award for cooperation by the Hollywood Women's Press Club he said simply, "You shouldn't thank me. It's my place to thank you."

TONY's career has brought him great happiness, including a sound and wonderful marriage with Janet and a star on his dressing room door. The temptations and taunts have served only to make him, outwardly, a little more subdued than he used to be, but inside he is still the same effervescent boy who wants to play with the world. He has done what people wanted him to do; he has kept his head. And he proves this when he says, and means it, "I love the acting game and I love Hollywood, but if it ever starts making me unhappy, I'll pack my toothbrush and take off. I can always do something else for a living."

on the false stuff." One of Taylor's European girlfriends, the dancer Ludmilla Tcherina, has been signed by Universal, which means that Ursula Thiess is going to have some competition when Bob returns, probably in September.

ANNE BAXTER touring Europe after her breakup with John Hodiak, hasn't had the European men laying siege to her affections. At Cannes one young actor explained that, "your Miss Baxter is too mental for Frenchmen. She gives me the feeling that she wears brass knuckles on her tongue." It is also true that Anne isn't fantastically wealthy. She's in Munich now making Carnival with Steve Cochran.

JEANNE CRAIN's salary would have jumped to $5,000 a week had 20th Century picked up her final option. Jeanne asked for out so that she could go to England to star in Gentlemen Marry Brunettes. The film is scheduled to get underway on July 15th in London with Jeanne receiving $65,000 in cash, $25,000 in escrow and $5,000 for European expenses.

ERROL FLYNN now that Patrice Wymore is expecting, will have the dubious distinction of having fathered four children by three different wives. In Italy with a dozen other Hollywood stars, Flynn says that he is preparing his fourth made-in-Italy film, William Tell. Back in Hollywood, Nora Haymes, the actor's second wife, claims Errol is delinquent in his support payments. His first wife Lili Damita, who has never remarried, claimed the same thing.

GENE TIERNEY who sent her mother back to the U.S. so that she could spend more time with Aly Khan, recently spent three weeks at Aly's Irish farm in County Kildare. Gene and Aly are inseparable all over Europe. A wedding announcement should be forthcoming very soon. If not, friends say, Gene will be the most disappointed young woman in Europe.

FRANCHOT TONE is having an extremely tough time trying to collect $65,666 on an insurance policy from Lloyd's of London. Tone claims the company owes him that sum for accident injuries suffered in his 1951 fight with Tom Neal over the affections of Barbara Payton. Lloyd's, on the other hand, alleges that Tone was in "a state of intoxication at the time," and not only provoked the fight but exposed himself to "deliberate and exceptional danger" in circumstances barred by the disputed insurance policy.

SONJA HENIE a money-wise woman if ever there was one, is touring Europe with what she calls her Coronation Ice Revue. Sonja, who is worth a minimum of $4,000,000, travels with her husband Winthrop Gardner, a wardrobe mistress, a secretary, a hair stylist, and her own cook. Only member of this entourage who encounters any trouble is the cook. Seems that the hotel chefs on the Continent resent him. Sanja who was faced with a $5,000,000 suit when the grandstand collapsed in Baltimore at her ice show, has won the case. "If I had lost," she says, "I would've been broke, flat broke."

TV TALK by Paul Denis

MOTHER GOES ALONG: Toni Arden, who's 23 and has been on the road since 16, confesses she's never been away from home one night without her mother going along. "Mother feels a girl on the way up needs protection," says Toni, who's also a Columbia recording star. "I love to have Mother with me. She's a great comfort to me. She's been with me every day of my show-business life, including one-night tours, and you know how tiring they are. Her only interest in life is that I should be happy. But she doesn't want to be a typical stage mother, so she stays in the background. She doesn't like to be photographed for publicity pictures. She avoids the limelight. And if I ever meet somebody nice and want to go out, she encourages me. She tells me to get married when I feel it's right." So far, Toni's been too busy singing to settle down.

BEHIND THE OPERATION: Behind Arthur Godfrey's decision to submit to surgery, to repair two jagged hip bones, is the hope he'll be able to stand without pain. And, almost as important, is his eagerness to eliminate the wobble in his walk—a cause for much scurrilous talk for years.

"A lot of people thought I was half crooked," Godfrey says. "My hip wouldn't allow me to mount a horse properly. Once, at a horse show, after I was helped up, the word spread all over town that I had been too drunk to get on alone."

Arranging for the operation became almost a high state secret. Godfrey rested for a week in Virginia, but not at his farm—because that was being watched by fans and reporters.

When he checked in at the Boston hospital, a special guard system was set up to protect him from too-eager fans. Before the operation, Godfrey had received more than 20,000 messages of good cheer, and newspapers ran editorials and cartoons lauding him. The hospital was flooded with mail and tourists, much to the delight and amazement of the hospital's publicity woman. Other hospitals tried frantically to persuade Godfrey to change his plans and use their facilities. Newspapers demanded exclusive bedside interviews, and harassed hospital officials.

In New York, CBS revamped its publicity setup on Godfrey. Walter Murphy, Godfrey's press agent the past few years, was dropped and Mel Spiegel brought in. Spiegel hopes to persuade Godfrey to be at least occasionally available for press interviews.

GLEASON'S HIDEAWAY: With two cars in the garage (one from Frank Sinatra and one from his TV staff), Jackie Gleason decided to do something about it: so he took driving lessons and got his license. Now he drives out to his rented mansion in suburban Sands Point, L. I., almost nightly. "I'm getting sleep for the first time in 20 years," he explains. He wanted to put in a lot of swimming, but discovered that the water's polluted. So he's buying a boat.

The year before, he rented a house in Stony Brook. "But, by the time you walked out beyond the rocks, you were too far out to throw back your sneakers." Jackie's also planning to get in some golfing, now that his Sands Point house is only a couple blocks from golfer Perry Como's house.

EDDIE'S TANK: When Eddie Fisher returned to civilian life, at the New York Paramount Theater, the dressing room windows were closed tight, and an oxygen tank supplied fresh air. The reason was that Eddie suffered from a bronchial infection he picked up in a London fog, while still in the Army. A couple of weeks later, Eddie did collapse from overwork, but recovered in time to make his London Palladium booking, as scheduled. Incidentally, Eddie's publicity staff is playing down the romance angle on the theory that Eddie was in the Army two years and couldn't very well have had time for dates with starlets.

HERB'S MANY MOTORS: Herb Shriner, a hot rod and foreign-car bug, is commercializing on his hobby. He's run two big motor sports shows in New York, and managed not to lose money. Right now, Herb has cut down on his motor toys. He owns only a Phantom Corsair ($8,000, custom-made); a custom-built 1934 Packard sport car; and his baby car, a Play-boy roadster. He also has a 30-foot sloop, anchored at Port Washington, L. I. And, oh yes, he still owns a custom-built landcruiser, a small home-on-wheels and not a trailer. This car, renamed the Safari, is being manufactured, at $6,000 each.

DINAH'S NOT-SO-SECRET SECRET: Dinah Shore and George Montgomery visited New York for the first time in a year and a half. They saw a lot of shows, and insisted, "We didn't see one bad one." Dinah went to Washington to sing before President Eisenhower. George is still chuckling over the way Dinah was tricked into appearing on This Is Your Life, believing she was to work with Eddie Cantor. "I knew about it for four weeks," George says. "She, in turn, thought she was keeping from me the fact she was going to guest on Cantor's show."

BETTE SAID NO: Ed Sullivan tells how he visited Bette Davis backstage to persuade her to do her Tallulah satire on his CBS-TV show, for a $10,000 fee. She agreed, and then phoned him the next day to say: "Don't argue with me, but I can't do the Tallulah number. I don't think enough people know who she is." Sullivan protested, and Bette replied: "As for the $10,000, forget it. I can't do it." Sullivan says, "The greatest person who's ever appeared on my TV show since I started it, is Helen Hayes."

WHITE-HAIRED NEIL: For a long time, Neil Hamilton used to leave Hollywood Screen Test rehearsals to hurry off to the Royalton Barber Shop every week. Finally, writer Alton Alexander asked, "Do you get a hair cut every week?" Hamilton explained, "No. But my hair's white, and I have to touch it up every week." Hamilton no longer goes to the barber's weekly. Apparently, he's learned to touch up his hair by himself.

NO ROMANCE FOR JONI: Joni James, whose career is zooming, complains she hasn't had a day off since September. A girl who's always had a lot of beaux, she has decided to concentrate on her career. "I've dated one boy for a long time, and I'm very fond of him," she says, "but I wouldn't know what to do with a husband and a career at this point."

BETTY'S DAUGHTER: Betty Furness' 13-year-old daughter, Barbara, wants to go into show business. She's going to camp this summer and studying dramatics. In a year or two, she'll become an apprentice in summer stock, with Mamma's approval. Betty thinks summer stock is perfect for Barbara: "A year or two of apprentice work is really good. If you have any real interest in it, you can watch the actors develop their parts. It's also a lot of fun."

LA ROSA'S TRIP WEST: Julius La Rosa plans to take a month off from the Godfrey show this summer for a slow motor trip to Hollywood and back. "The furthest west I've ever been was Hot Springs, Ark., and that was when I was in the Navy," he says. "I want to see the Grand Canyon, Salt Lake City, the Mojave Desert, and Hollywood. One of my Brooklyn buddies will go with me."

JANIS CARTER MOVES TO N. Y.: Janis Carter, after making 36 movies in seven years in Hollywood, has settled down in New York. She's leased the big penthouse apartment formerly occupied by Margaret Sullivan, and says she's making TV her new career. She's been doing the Revlon commercials and guesting on panel shows, displaying a bright, glib, erudite personality. She's living alone, with her 17-month-old miniature dachshund, Liebchen. She insists there's no big romance in her life at the moment—but I don't believe it.

HERO OF THE SMART SET: Gabby Hayes and his beard went to the Colony Club for lunch. And, although celebrities are a dime a dozen at the snooty Colony, a dozen mink-coated ladies begged Gabby for his autograph. Gabby says it's the same thing when he goes to the Metropolitan Opera: "I get more requests for autographs than when I'm in a lunch wagon." Gabby's NBC-TV show is such a success, Gabby has settled in New York for good, moving into an apartment in snazzy Sutton Place. His wife, Dorothy, ill much of last winter, is much better.

NANCY GUILD DOES EVERYTHING: Nancy Guild, with her husband and daughter Liz, is summing in France. When they return, she will resume her courses at Hunter College, New York. She's going for a B.A. degree, majoring in philosophy and psychology, and says she won't drop her Where Was I? show on TV. She says she can raise a family, run a household, pursue a career, finish an education—and still manage to look like 17—"because I like what I'm doing."

CLARABELLE IS A NEW MAN: With practically no one knowing it, the clown on Howdy Doody's show, Clarabelle, has been changed. The new one is Bob Nicholson, who once conducted the Buffalo Philharmonic Orchestra and who has settled in Larchmont, N. Y., with his wife and two children. Clarabelle was originally an NBC male usher, brought in to keep the kids quiet during the show. Speaking lines would have classified him as an actor and made it necessary to be paid an actor's union salary. So he was kept silent and put in a clown's costume.

ROMANCE: HOT AND COLD: Lisa Ferraday and TV furrier Milton C. Herman are going steady . . . Jack and Joan Carter have finally split, and agreed on a settlement . . . Sydney Smith and Perry Como's producer, Lee Cooley, have divorced . . . The Donald Richards marriage ended up in divorce, too . . . Rosemary Clooney and José Ferrer do their romancing in hot jazz joints . . . Sally Forrest returned to Hollywood to sell their home, while husband Milo Frank, CBS executive, is readying their new Sutton Place apartment in New York. Her delay in returning to New York has launched the rumor that the Franks are having a trial separation . . . Milton Berle gave a big diamond brooch to Ruth Cosgrove the day before her birthday, and a surprise party in his home the night of her birthday, May 14. He's been dating her steadily, and exclusively, for months.

MELVYN Douglas accepted, and Paul and Jan moved in.

"I can't tell you how happy we were," Jan says in retrospect, "to get the house. It answers all our needs. I remember when we first started looking for a place. Paul and I both felt that we didn't want to live so far from town that we had to spend two hours every day driving back and forth from work. Also if after dinner we wanted to go into town, well, we didn't want another long trek.

"What we wanted was a place with trees, privacy, and a feeling of country living not too far away from our work."

That these demands were difficult to meet, Paul and Jan learned quickly.

"What you want," one real estate agent told them, "is a country house a couple of miles from Times Square."

It so happens the Douglasses got the California equivalent. One night the phone rang, and Paul lurched for it. After a few minutes he turned to Jan and said, "The Melvyn Douglas house is up for sale."

Jan Sterling reacted like a girl who has just been given a hotfoot.

"I know that house," she said. "I know it well. Melvyn invited me home for dinner one time."

Paul Douglas arched his eyebrows. "Did you say one time?"

"Don't be silly, Paul. We were playing in something called Three Blind Mice. It must have been ages ago, and he said, 'Why don't you come up to the house for dinner?' and I said, 'Sure.' And I remember I loved it."

"Loved what?"

"The house, you goon. Really, Paul, if it's not too expensive or too run down, let's buy it."

"Let's buy it. Just like that, eh? First," said Mr. Paul Douglas, "I'll have to look at it."

The Douglas house looks much larger than it really is. Actually, it boasts only seven rooms, but they sprawl over two levels of terraced hillside.

A three-car garage, a store room with work bench, and what is now Paul's office occupy the first level. From here a brick walk leads to the picturesque front door on the second level.

Inside on the higher level you find a book-lined living room, a spacious dining room, a large kitchen, and four bedrooms.

Soon after they plunked down their hard-earned $60,000 and moved in, Paul and Jan sensibly decided that they didn't need four bedrooms, so they remodeled one of the smaller ones into a dressing room for Paul who happens to be a most fastidious dresser.

"I was getting pretty tired," Jan says, "of listening to Paul's cracks about how my clothes took up all the closet space. Now he has a whole walk-in closet for himself. People sometimes mistake it for Grand Central."

Another bedroom has been turned into what the Douglasses call "the televising room." Paul used to be a crack sports announcer, so that it's only natural for him to spend much of his spare time in this room watching fights and ball games.

A third bedroom is decorated in shades of pink, and it's set aside for Paul's 10-year-old daughter, Maggie, (child by his third marriage) who comes to visit on weekends and vacations.

Their master bedroom is a large comfortable rectangle with deeply recessed windows and the door leading to swimming pool and brick patio.

"Right here," Paul says, "is where we do most of our living. That's why we've furnished it like a small sitting room. books, paintings, things like that. We eat breakfast on the coffee table and when we're not working, we spend lots of time in this room just gabbing and reading."

Jan's feelings about the bedroom are similarly enthusiastic. "It's a wonderful spot to wake up in," she explains. "It reminds me an awful lot of the rooms I knew when I was a little girl."

JAN Sterling is one "little girl who grew up to be an actress" who had a happy childhood, also money.

From the time she was eight until she was 14, her family lived in the Passy section of Paris, then in the fashionable section of London called Chelsea.

In both of these gracious European homes the rooms had high ceilings, recessed windows, and cozy window seats. Each bedroom offered a fireplace with a beautiful marble mantelpiece, which explains why Jan persuaded her husband into letting her do the bedroom in a modified Victorian décor whereas the remainder of the house is contemporary.

"When Jan wanted to buy some old bibelots," Paul points out, "like these glass-enclosed flowers on the mantel, I balked like a roped steer. Then when she got 'em in the house—well, they're kind of charming, don't you think?"

Paul's contribution to the interior decoration of his favorite room consists of the paintings. Here again, to look at Paul, you wouldn't think it, but for many years he's been an art collector. He owns pictures by Jean Dufy (Raoul's brother) Agna Enters, Bonbois, Edgard, and many others. Several of these artists are friends of his. In fact one of the most valuable of his paintings is a portrait of the actor done by Abe Birnbaum. Abe painted it one evening on a plank of wood using oils from the tubes and a fountain pen.

Douglas also had a hand in selecting colors for the master bedroom. The boys at Toots Shor's may kid him about this, but it was he who went for the buttercup yellow walls, the green rug, blue couch, the coral and pink pillows.

As a matter of fact, one of the most distinguishing features of the Douglas home is that the owners showed courage in colors and open-mindedness in their choice of furnishings.

"When we first bought the house," Douglas recalls, "all Jan and I had in the way of furnishings was books, clothes, paintings, and more books. So we rented the furnishings that came with the house for six months. We thought six months was plenty of time in which to buy furnishings, but then we got busy. We did some pictures, then we flew to Korea to entertain the troops, and before we knew it our six months was up. We went down to W. & J. Sloane's, and it took us all day to buy a double bed and a dining room table. We also had to wait for delivery. I then realized that what we needed was some one who could get into the house and decorate it well and quickly. Some friends of ours recommended Lillian Schary Small. She turned out to be the answer to all our problems."

Mrs. Small is the sister of Dore Schary, head of MGM production and she commands the same competence in her field as her brother does in his. She talked over the decorating ideas the Douglasses had. She made a few suggestions of her own, and within a few weeks, Paul and Jan were well into having a finished home.

THE house has ideal architecture for California living, large windows, doors that open onto gardens and terraces, so the only basic changes Lillian Small suggested were in painting the interior walls. The original color scheme had been a dullish grey. Lillian suggested lively colors. The living room was painted pink and in this rose-tinted shell, an apple-green couch was placed along with orange chairs and a white rug.

Most of the fabrics and furniture throughout the house are modern but among the contemporary pieces, the Douglasses have wisely introduced antiques and imports which add a change of pace to the décor and lends an air of excitement.

One of the imports is a three-panel Japanese screen that Douglas found in Tokyo on the way back from his first Korean junket. The screen is used to camouflage their record unit. Another unusual importation is a tall iron and brass French bread rack. Such racks are still used in French bakeries for cooling and storing long thin loaves of bread. The Douglasses use it for magazines.

The twin alabaster lamps on either side of the living room couch are antique urns that Lillian Small found in a little shop in West Los Angeles and had wired for electricity. The matching armchairs came from an antique shop in Philadelphia. Jan spotted them from a taxi window and made the driver stop. Paul gave her the money for the purchase and she dashed in and bought them.

The black and gold chairs and table in the dining room are modern copies of Chinese Chippendale. Paul and Jan bought these at Sloane's and then had the seats recovered in bright orange to sustain the color theme of the living room. The furniture is rather ornate so that the rest of the room has purposely been kept simple, a bare plank floor, tailored draperies, and no lighting fixtures except the indirect light in the ceiling.

Paul loves this room because it opens onto the garden and in the garden there's a bullfinch in the olive tree who serenades the Douglasses at dinner each evening.

"It's really a great house to come home to," Paul says with a sigh of contentment, "and we bought it because it was so close to the studios. The only thing is that I've now been asked to work in studios that are located in Rome, Paris, and London."

RIGHT now Paul and Jan are living in England where Paul is finishing up a British film entitled All In The Same Boat.

"The nice part about making pictures overseas," he says, "is that it makes you appreciate your home, especially the kind of home we've got."

can shelley hold vittorio?

I don't want to sound too hard on Vittorio, especially as he did finally return to Hollywood when Metro recalled him to do Rhapsody here with Elizabeth Taylor. Also the European attitude towards women isn't the same as ours. When a female over there promises to "Obey," the males take it literally. The tempestuous Shelley, who doesn't know how to obey, has always been a doormat for Vittorio, whom she respects almost to the point of seeming to fear him.

When he was delayed a week, after he'd promised faithfully to be here to get his first look at their daughter—and of course she had screamed the news to everyone—the chagrined Shelley didn't take it out on him. She called Mrs. Charles Vidor and bawled hell out of her, complaining that Charlie was deliberately shooting unnecessary location shots with Vittorio in Italy. After an hour's tirade, Doris slammed the phone in Shelley's ear. Vidor is a good director, but he can't control the weather, and it was rain that delayed the unimpatient father of Shelley's baby.

The handsome Italian is analytical and reserved by nature. Co-actors who worked with him when he made The Glass Wall tell me that the reason he didn't come across as a sympathetic person in the picture, is that he's too cold and contained. Never shows any emotion. Maybe that's why he was so excellent as the heavy in Bitter Rice. Actually Vittorio hasn't made a good picture yet in this country, although I understand he's great in his own language, and is rated Italy's No. 1 actor.

It's one of those unexplained mysteries why Shelley and Vittorio fell in love with each other in the first place. I've never known two people who seem to have less in common. Opposites are supposed to attract each other, but these two seem so far apart, emotionally and in every day interests, they're not even on the same planet.

You'd think they'd have acting in common. But they're further away on this than anything else. Shelley believes that acting is a cerebral process—that you can only play a role by thinking and believing you are that person. She reads everything there is to know about the character she has to portray. Vittorio says acting is instinct—that you merely have to learn some technique, then let yourself go.

Vittorio is reticent. Shelley is a noisy exhibitionist. She lets you know everything she's ever done, is doing, or is going to do. But you never know what Vittorio is even thinking.

THE baby! I never met a mother who wasn't delighted to be expecting. But we heard every little ache, every little flapping of the stork's wings. We can tell you to a dime how much it cost her. And it's really cute the way Shell always just happens to have 30 or 40 snaps of the baby on her. One thing's for sure, she'll make a wonderful mother. But I never saw a less palpitating papa than Mr. Gassman. Anything he feels for that child, and I have no evidence to prove that he doesn't feel strongly for his daughter, is buried deep behind his unemotional facade.

Take the difference in the way they dress. In the early days after the elopement, she was very concerned about getting him American clothes. But he didn't like them and preferred his tailor in Italy. Apparently he didn't think she dressed so well herself. And I sometimes think it was just as well for their marriage that Vittorio didn't see the weird and un-wonderful ensembles worn by Shelley while she awaited motherhood. I'll never forget one particular get-up—a black velvet tummy at the back of her blonde, untidy hair, black velvet pants—since when have pants been good maternity wear?—and that old, long polo coat. And can you tell me one good reason why a woman who is expecting a baby, should not use lipstick in public? Shelley didn't use a smudge of it.

But now she's improving in the dress department. I understand the black pants, tam, et al., were burned before Vittorio returned. I don't know whether it was love for Vittorio, or her press agent's prodding, but anyway, she went to Don Loper to buy quite a glamorous evening gown, and to Juel Park, the swank lingerie shop in Beverly Hills, to get some sexy underthings for her Gassman's gaze. So, she's trying, and you can bet she'll try harder to hold the man she loves "not wisely, but too well."

Vittorio is the only person who can make Shelley shut up. I'm sure she doesn't mean to scream so much, she just gets carried away with enthusiasm for whatever it is she's selling at the moment. But she embarrasses Vittorio. Like the time she gave the party at Naples, after she had sponsored his stage show at the Circle Theater. She was yelling around, shouting, "Hello," seating people. He just looked at her, said a few words in Italian, and she sat down.

It would have been interesting if Vittorio had been here, a few days before he was due, when Shelley was a twosome with Farley Granger at the Mocambo. I don't know what either of them were trying to prove, but the photographers had a field day. And when a pal across the room shouted to Shelley, "You publicity fiend," she roared with laughter, and hollered, "I can't stay at home." Every few minutes she left to phone the house to make sure the baby was okay. She'd had a couple of dates with her old Farfel in the same week, all of which proves that her "engagement" to Granger was, as some suspected, "full of sound and fury, signifying nothing."

THERE'VE been some extra suspicious people who believe that Vittorio merely used Shelley to promote his career in Hollywood. And while she did give him extraordinary help to get started, he is smart enough to know that his talent could open any studio door, and he isn't the type who would pay the price of marrying a girl he didn't love for favors rendered. He was in love with Shelley, and I hope he still is, for her sake, frankly, more than his, because you can't help liking Shelley and even feeling sorry for her.

The way Shell tells it, it was love at first sight when they met in Italy that time she went to Europe with Farley, when we all assumed they were engaged. She was like a fresh breeze from this wonderful America—blonde, breezy, and with limitless energy in a country that was tired, shabby and very stale after the war. At the first meeting, he told Shelley, "Of course you know I'm going to marry you." He liked her legs, her hair, everything about her. Couldn't understand what she said, but that didn't matter—then.

It matters now, because he hates scenes and Shelley doesn't breathe right unless she's promoting one. Like the time she tossed a glass of milk into his lap at Ciro's, because she thought Zsa Zsa Gabor was flirting with her man—or vice versa. She rushed out in tears, but he took his time to amble after her.

Now that they're together again—as of this writing—in their duplex apartment house on North Oakhurst, Shelley will have to clamp down on her emotions, because it's my guess Vittorio wouldn't stick around long with an hysterical woman.

He's used to associating with some pretty chic chicks in Europe. So Shelley will have to watch herself in the eating department. By super-human will power she reduced to normal screen size before Vittorio came home. But she's the type who tells everyone she's dieting, orders a salad for herself, and eats the potatoes and cheesecake off everyone else's plate. She's the first to call attention to her overweight and the first to scream when we write about it!

Shelley can be a hypochondriac. And so can he. He hated the climate when he first arrived, always complained of feeling ill. They would eat out all the time, so I guess he didn't like Shelley's cooking.

Vittorio likes to feel free. Shelley is terribly possessive. She hates to let him out of her sight, and when he went to Mexico for Sombrero, she tagged along, got sick, and she must have been really ill to come back to Hollywood without him. Then she had trouble with her teeth, and her moaning and groaning was heard the length and breadth of Hollywood. She drives her doctors crazy—thinks nothing of awakening them at 3 A.M. for a headache. From the little I know of Vittorio, she'll have to keep her moans under cover—or he'll take cover.

They'll also have to get together on the type of friends they're going to have. He hasn't liked too many of hers. And she hasn't had a chance to see if she likes his—although she told me that his mother was very charming to her before they were married in Italy. But the charm was very conspicuously absent when they drove to Tiajuana to the bull fights, with tennis pro, Jack Cushingham and his girl. Vittorio didn't speak to anyone for 24 hours, and when the enraged Shelley started to scream at him, Vittorio stopped her cold with words to the effect that it was her fault, if she brought along people with whom he had nothing in common.

Shelley is a night owl, and loves to sleep late, and to sleep, period. He's the opposite. Won't stay late for anything except work, and gets up with the light. But unexpectedly, Shelley is good at games and taught Vittorio to play tennis.

She's an extrovert, even when she works. She can get out of character at any time, to scream, or to crack a joke. When he's working, he puts on blinders. You can talk to him, and he doesn't hear.

Intellectually, they're about even, although Vittorio has concentrated mostly on the classics, which he knows by heart from Sophocles to Shakespeare. Shelley is what they call a culture culture—on the make for knowledge in great gulps. They're about the same age—around 32.

B.V.—Before Vittorio—the all-absorbing passion of Shelley's life was her career. When she wanted a role in a picture, directors found it simpler to give in at once, rather than take the beat, beat, beating, from this blonde babe, who must have what she wants, when she wants it. That's how she landed Place In The Sun. George Stevens, who has stood up to some tough propositions in his day, found it simpler to test Shelley. And it was a lucky day for them both when he did. She almost captured the Academy Award.

But I have a hunch that a difficult decision will have to be made—and soon. Vittorio's deal with Metro gives him all the time he wants to work in Italy. He loves his native land. All his strongest attachments are there—his mother, his family—he's very proud of his family. I'll be the most surprised woman in the world if he ever settles here.

SHELLEY, after agonizing weeks of indecision, recently signed a new, long-term deal at UI. Unless she wants to be on perpetual suspension, she won't be able to come and go with Vittorio. So she'll have to decide which is the most important to her—her husband or her career. Sounds corny, put this way, but it's the only way to put it. Because if they are separated six months of the year, this marriage won't have any chance. It'll be tough enough, without the extra straw of separation. It's my guess that when it comes to the actual deciding, that the unpredictable Miss Winners will give up her picture career. She's been too lonely and lost all her life to risk losing what she regards as Love.

She wants to do plays with him. She wants to play Ophelia to his Hamlet. He'll be smart to humor her. Because great love can accomplish the impossible. It could even cement this un-matched couple. And it would be great to make liars of all the Jeremiahs. As it stands now, there is only one person to whom I've talked about Shell and her Gassman, who believes they have a chance to live happily ever after—her press agent, Russell Birdwell. But then, he is notoriously optimistic.

Simultaneously she charged that Wayne had both struck and threatened her.

When Duke was told of these charges he was amazed. "She must be nuts," he said. "Her statements are fantastic. I've only seen Mrs. Wayne twice in the past year, once out at our house and once in the lobby of the Beverly Hills Hotel."

In addition to having the court keep Duke away from her, Mrs. Esperanza Wayne also asked the court to settle the matter of her allowance because she and the actor had been unable to agree.

"Chata" claimed that her husband averaged at least $45,000 per month in salaries, plus "large gains from oil, movie, land, and other investments." She judged his income to be somewhere around a million a year.

As for herself, she said, she had earned only $6,685 last year as an actress. In addition, Wayne had been giving her an allowance of $500 a month. She felt she was entitled to a larger allowance. She said, too, in her petition that she was living "in fear" because of Duke's attacks and she wanted him legally to be prohibited from "inflicting further violence on her."

She told the court that all she wanted was a "reasonable" alimony and that when she and the actor were living together they used to spend $13,091.12 each month. Something commensurate with that figure, Mrs. Wayne implied would be "reasonable." Wayne even $9,000 a month.

Wayne's answer to all this was that he was already paying Esperanza $1100 a month plus $1354 per month upkeep for the house she was occupying in Encino.

He was willing to pay her $900 a month temporary alimony, he added, and "she should get a cheaper house." Wayne also said that his net income last year after taxes and business expenses had come to about $60,000 which was a far cry from being a millionaire.

The discrepancy between what "Chata" wanted and what Duke was willing to give her, the difference between their individual estimations of the Wayne wealth were so great that only a Superior Court judge could decide who was right; so late in May the case came to trial.

Mrs. Wayne said she should get at least $9,000 a month alimony.

Mr. Wayne was prepared to go as high as $900 a month, not a cent more. A difference of $8,100 prevented an agreement.

When Duke marched into the courtroom flanked by his legal entourage he was pretty sore. He knew he had been "tailed" by detectives for many months, detectives supposedly hired by the opposition to obtain embarrassing information they might use in the forthcoming divorce mess.

As a matter of fact, a few months ago the shadowing had become so ridiculous that Duke had copied the number of the license on the car following him. He had learned the driver's name and had called him up the next day. "Look," he'd said, "why don't you ride around with me in my car? It'll be a whole lot easier."

There had been many such irritations, and now he was being compelled to make public his entire financial history.

After he was sworn in, Duke testified that what an actor earns is not necessarily what he keeps. He admitted that he earned approximately $40,000 a month but said that after he paid taxes, tips, expenses, and so forth, "there's not too much left."

He testified that he had made gifts of $8,000 to actor friends who were hard up and explained how he had spent thousands on gifts for studio crews who had worked on his pictures.

"As a rule," Duke told the judge, "at the end of every picture, studio crew members are remembered. I don't know how much these gifts cost. I do know lots of people in three major studios and I know that I gave many remembrances to my professional and personal friends."

The 44-year-old actor, his hair grown long for his role in Hondo, declared that his net income was $59,366 last year and that during his six years of marriage to "Chata" he had saved nothing.

"We spent everything we made during our six years of marriage," he testified, "and I even had to pay my income tax with money borrowed from my life insurance policy." Duke also pointed out that he spent thousands on personal public relations, that he gave extra large tips to everyone trying to build-up good will, and that he was also saddled with the financial burden of paying his first wife, Josephine Saenz, for her support and the support of their four children, 20% of the first $100,000 he earns each year and 10% of everything above that sum.

He admitted that last year between May 25th and June 30th he had collected $122,000 from RKO but insisted that his gross income didn't mean very much since what was left to him was all that mattered. He said that he thought any single woman could live fairly well on the $900 a month he was prepared to offer Mrs. Wayne.

Jerry Rosenthal, Mrs. Wayne's lawyer, then went to the attack. His grilling was relentless. He asked Duke how many suits he owned, how many companies he had interests in, who paid his restaurant checks, his gasoline bills, his laundry bills.

Duke explained that, "I'm practically a small business and have to rely on other people to handle my affairs . . . I haven't seen one of my pay checks in 13 years . . . They go directly from the studios to the Beverly Management Company which looks after my financial affairs."

As for his wardrobe the actor said that as an actor, of course, he had to be well-dressed. "But I never bought a suit unless I needed it . . . and if I had my way I'd seldom wear a necktie."

When he was questioned as to whether or not he sought to conceal his assets from Mrs. Wayne, Duke stated flatly that he had spent the last three years in part trying to get his wife to attend various financial meetings so she could see. "She was spending too much and we just had to get together and figure out some kind of household and personal budget program. I tried my best to keep our home together. I never concealed any assets from my wife and I tried not to argue with her about money. But we never did arrange any kind of a budget."

Mrs. Wayne's lawyer then suggested that perhaps Duke himself didn't have any reasonable idea of his finances. After all, so many people worked on his books.

Duke declared, "I know what's going on in my affairs. When I want to know how I stand in any matter I ask the men I trust to brief me. They do so. I'm not an accountant but I certainly think I have enough horse sense to understand what experts tell me."

The judge agreed with Duke. "When you get a prescription from a doctor," he pointed out, "you don't go to a chemist and have the formulas analyzed. You take your doctor's word for it."

In court with Wayne was a small army

A VACCINE is not ready for 1953. But there is hope for the future.

THE NATIONAL FOUNDATION FOR INFANTILE PARALYSIS of accountants, tax experts, and agents, and when one of these, Bo Roos, was put on the stand, he admitted that Duke had paid income taxes last year of $178,000.

It was also shown that Wayne's earnings from 1950 to 1952 totaled $1,026,072, and that he had earned $122,000, working 48 days this year, and that instead of taking 10% of the gross of Rio Grande and Quiet Man, he had accepted $100,000 for each picture. He did this when Herbert Yates, president of Republic Pictures, had explained that, "We cannot pay you 10% of the gross on each of these pictures and still pay director John Ford (Wayne's best friend) the money he wants and deserves."

Duke had a bit of trouble identifying the various contracts and financial documents handed to him and admitted at one point that, "My attorney always says I should read before signing and I do, but that doesn't always mean I understand it."

THE sad part about the Wayne legal mess is that the two parties involved, the man and wife who once loved each other tempestuously, should now be out "to get" each other.

Duke and "Chata" are enemies. The love they once felt and enjoyed has soured into hate. This whole dispute might have been settled amicably without recrimination and name-calling. But instead what we have and will have is a no-hold-barred fight. It looks as if all the dirty linen will be aired in public.

Why? One intimate of Chata's says, "I think what upset her was when Duke decided that he had had enough. Hell hath no fury like a woman scorned, and my own personal opinion is that Chata expected Duke to come running back to her. When he didn't last year, I think her vanity was hurt. She obviously feels that financially she isn't getting an even break; otherwise I don't think she would've gone into court. "I mean when you've been accustomed to spending $13,000 a month on a household, well $900 doesn't seem very much.

Another thing, and here I think Duke was wrong. When Chata petitioned to use the name Esperanza Wayne which after all is hers legally, Duke fought against it. He wants her to use her maiden name of Esperanza Bauer. That got her sore, too. I'm not an expert on domestic relations, but I do hope they keep this mess out of the divorce courts, because it's not going to be a very nice one."

One of Duke's friends says, "There's only so much a man can take, and for my money Duke has taken an awful lot of punishment in his marriage to "Chata." He's seen her twice in the past year and on those two occasions other people were present and then she goes ahead and charges that he struck her.

"I don't have to come to Duke's defense. He's got more friends in Hollywood than probably any other actor in town. How come, by being a cheat, a money grabber? Heck, no. He's loyal and he's sincere and above all he's fair. He's willing to give the dame $900 a month. Okay, how much was she earning when he first met her in Mexico?

"You can live darn well on $900 a month south of the border, and no one can tell me differently. Chata wants $9,000 a month plus another $20,000 to appraise Duke's books. That's more than a hundred grand a year. She wants more than Duke is paying his first wife and four kids, and she wants it all for herself.

"The whole thing is an unholy mess, and if Duke takes my advice he'll swear off women."

ONLY Duke Wayne has a "new woman," 23-year-old Pilar Palette, a Peruvian beauty, and the chances are extremely good that she will become the third Mrs. John Wayne.

More than anything else, this one fact is probably what motivates the second Mrs. Wayne in her legal hassles against the actor who is the number-one box office attraction in the nation, and wishes right now that he wasn't.

they called them "shocking"

(Continued from page 33) out of the waiting room. The plane landed, taxied down the runway, and came to a halt. The portable stairway was rolled beside the cabin door. The door was open and the passengers began to alight.

LANA was the eighth or tenth passenger to descend; and as she did, there was Lex Barker, at her left following directly behind her, his lips pressed firmly together, his eyes scanning the set-up as if he were determined to protect Lana no matter what might happen.

A bouquet of roses was stuck in Lana's hand. She cradled them in her arms and said, "Thank you, it's wonderful being here." The photographers began shooting away.

Then a reporter ran up to them and said, "The tall one, the one without a hat. He is Tarzan Barker." The lensmen shot Lex, too.

Lana and her escort were rushed through customs, bundled into a car, and driven to the Hotel Lancaster in Paris.

Lex was officially registered at the hotel, but when newsmen called for Lana a few days later they were told that she was occupying, "the apartment of a very dear friend not too far away from the Lancaster, but she is around here sometimes."

Employees of the hotel said later that of course, Lana Turner was staying there. Only they had been asked to say absolutely nothing about the guests.

Lana had been to Paris before, in 1948 to be exact, on her honeymoon with Bob Topping, and some of the French reporters knew a good deal about her.

With Lex, however, it was different, and for a short while many Frenchmen were under the false impression that he was Fernando Lamas, not knowing about the Lamas-Lana battle of last year.

In fact at a fashionable cocktail party off the Champs Elysees to which Lex and Lana had been invited, Anatole Litvak, the director, pulled the prize social boner of the season. He walked up to Lex Barker whom he'd never met before and said, "I'm so glad to see, Mr. Lamas, that you and Miss Turner are still together."

Not long after that, Lana and her broad-shouldered traveling companion pulled out for southern France, Spain, and Majorca.

FOR ten days there was a news blackout concerning them as they lived and journeyed on the Balearic Islands; and all this time Europeans kept asking, "Are they married or aren't they?"

The answer to that, they finally learned, is that Lex Barker's divorce from Arlene Dahl isn't final until this winter; so that as regards California law, he and Lana cannot get married until then. They might get married in any European country of their choosing before winter, but under such circumstances, the marriage would not be recognized in Los Angeles where Lex has his legal residence.

When the film festival opened at Cannes, Lana and Lex flew in from Majorca and were each assigned separate rooms at the Carlton Hotel. After freshening up, they came downstairs and boarded a motor boat for the Ile de Lerins and the traditional lunch which is held for the benefit of visiting film stars and journalists.

Photographers were busy as the two American film stars were whizzed across the inlet in a Chris-Craft, and Lana was most cooperative in posing for pictures. "She was so nice," one photographer said later, "that she didn't even take time out to fix her hat. She looked very good, too. A little plump around the chin, but otherwise, perfect. That Tarzan is a lucky fellow."

Lana and Lex were given a favored table under a pine tree, and in a matter of minutes they were dropping spoonfuls of garlic sauce into their fish soup and eating with great relish. This was the first big party of the Festival, all the stars were there, including Kirk Douglas who had played opposite Lana in The Bad and The Beautiful, acting extremely gay as he rubbed his stubbled chin—he's growing a beard for Ulysses—and bent over to flatter his beautiful date, a blonde TV star from New York who calls herself Roxanne.

Mel Ferrer was also on hand lunching with a French starlet in a Bikini and so was Anne Baxter who was traveling with her mother, trying to forget about her broken marriage with John Hodiak. At Cannes, Anne was referred to by the French as "Tristesse" (sadness) because of the melancholy expression she wore. Anne has a smile like elastic. After it's used it snaps right back into form again, and that's the way she was with the camera boys. As soon as the shutters stopped clicking, she stopped smiling.

Lex and Lana saw all this and then they were interviewed by scads of journalists. Both talked about love, but neither would say anything concerning marriage. "What a wonderful thing," Lana said, "to be in love. Really, there's nothing like it."

Lex took her hand in his and nodded. The happiness in his eyes spoke for him. Again the photographers went to work.

All questions concerning matrimonial intentions or plans were side-stepped by Lana and her escort. She spoke about her work. "I intend to be in Europe for quite some time. My first picture will be The Flame And The Flesh. Yes, with Carlos Thompson. After that, I'm not sure. Yes, we're going to Italy. My little girl? I left her behind in California. Maybe she'll come over later."

Lex admitted that he was more than fond of Lana, that he had known her for some time, that she was the most wonderful woman on earth, that, of course, he

Lana and Tarzan was inevitable, that it would take place momentarily, that when it happened no one should be surprised because these two talented Americans were really very much in love and this trip of theirs wasn't an American publicity stunt. "Actually, they are crazy about each other."

LATER on in Italy, newspapers in Rome said much the same thing. "The two handsome American film stars, Lana Turner, and her new Tarzan fiancé, Lex Barker, are vacationing on Capri. They love each other very much and will be married soon. But first Miss Turner has to make a film in Rome for MGM. It is understood also that Lex Barker will make two pictures here to be produced by Giorgio Venturi. One concerns jungle adventures and the other gangster adventures. First, however, Mr. Barker has to return to Hollywood for another film. He and Miss Turner will probably be married in Europe upon his return."

In Italy, France, parts of Spain, and of course, Majorca which has been a great lovers' retreat for half a century, people are broad-minded. They understand human nature, and there was no vicious gossip about Lana and Lex.

After all, there shouldn't be, because as everyone knows, they are both beyond moral reproach. But in the other countries on the Continent, movie-fans asked each other if Lana might not have compromised her reputation by traveling with a male.

"It may be all right for some anonymous spinster," said one British journalist, "but surely eyebrows have been raised all over Europe concerning Miss Turner and her protector, Tarzan. After all, Europe is not the African jungle. Miss Turner is a figure of international fame. She should watch her step."

In Scandinavia, there were similar cracks. "It would be all right," one theater manager explained, "if they could pass this Barker fellow off as her press agent or even a baggage porter, but he's much too good-looking for that."

To date, Lana Turner has been unable to hold any of her sweethearts, even those who developed into husbands, and in Europe today there's a good deal of discussion as to whether or not her intentions towards Lex are serious and vice versa.

An American actress currently in England who has known Lana for years, says, "I think her tactics as regards Lex Barker are wrong. I'm not an authority on the subject, but I think Lex would marry Lana in a minute. Why shouldn't he? And he probably will. But to me, marriage, in order to be successful, must have a little mystery. A man and wife must get to know each other as they grow old together. Otherwise, boredom sets in too quickly. Lana is essentially a glamor girl. Men are taken with her glamor. That particular quality is not too profound. I'd say it's superficial. A man exposed to it, can get fed up pretty quickly, that is, if he's at all perceptive."

BACK in Hollywood where Lex Barker is probably making a picture for producer Eddie Small as you read this article, there is a strong belief that Lana may never marry Lex.

"This girl," according to one press agent who understands the impetuous workings of the Turner mind, "has finally learned that it does not pay to rush into marriage. She eloped with Artie Shaw; she pulled a quickie with Steve Crane; she was rushed off her balance by Bob Topping; and in every case she lost—not only love but money and position as well."

and she had plans. He just wasn't free to talk about them.

After that interview, Lana and her new love came back to the Carlton to change for the evening's film showings. They saw a Belgian picture about new African problems, and then a Finnish picture about a sorceress.

The next day there were more interviews, and one of the Paris evening papers carried the headline that marriage between moving slowly. Personally, it's a good thing, as I see it, that she and Lex couldn't get married immediately. When they were down in Palm Springs together they were very much in love. Had Lex been legally free, I think they would've been married at once. Now, I'm not so sure. Lana's had time to think. She's always talking about a home and kids.

"Lex has two children by his first marriage. She has one by Crane. Together they've been married six times. Lana knows that she can't retire from show business.

"If they get married you've got the same old problem of two motion picture careers in one family. Very rarely does that work out.

"Lana's no dummy. She knows all this. On the other hand, no man has been as kind and as thoughtful as Lex. He comes from an excellent family, and while his formal education was cut short, he's been around and can hold his own in any type of society. He can give Lana the confidence, the social poise she's always lacked.

"Then there's another thing. This chicken isn't getting any younger. Eligible husbands are growing scarcer. There are millions of guys who'd love to date her, but how many would want to put a ring on her finger? No doubt about it. The choice is Lana's. She's toured Europe with the guy and has seen him in action under all sorts of conditions.

"I have just met," he announced enthusiastically, "the one movie star who was everything. Your Susan Hayward."

"When did...?"

He raised his hand in a halting motion. "Please, no arguments. I have seen everything in the way of femininity you have sent from Hollywood—Jennifer Jones, Bergman, Gabor, Darnell, Colbert, Shelley Winters. No one is more beautiful than Hayward. No one so smart, no one so shrewd, no one so happy. This girl has everything, even twins."

"Obviously," I said, "she hypnotized you. Either that or she bought you lunch."

The Italian reporter shook his head. "All the time you Americans are joking." He took out his notes and scanned them. "Do you know," he asked this in the tone of a man who has made a great discovery, "that your Miss Hayward earns $5,000 a week—that is more than 600,000 lira every week in the year?"

"You don't really love her," I said contemptuously. "You love her American dollars."

No answer. Only a continued recitation of his notes. "Do you know that she has starred in Hollywood's best pictures?" He read them aloud, "Song In My Heart, David And Bathsheba, Snows Of Kilimanjaro, President's Lady, White Witch Doctor."

"Get away from me," I protested. "You sound like a studio press agent."

"She is also happily married," my reporter friend went on, "and what is more I like her husband. He is no David Selznick. He is a mortal man. He comes from South Carolina. Very smart, too. They have twins, two boys eight years old, Timothy and Gregory."

The above is a small sample of the enthusiasm aroused by Susan Hayward on her recent trip through France, Spain, and Italy.

Wherever Susan stopped, people were impressed, first of all by her beauty, then her naturalness, then her honesty and

"I grant that she's a notoriously poor judge of men. But she's learned from experience, and she knows what to look for in a potential husband. If Lex fills the requirements he's got the job. My own belief is that Lana used their European junket as a trial period. You know, to see what sort of companion he'd turn out to be in a foreign environment."

Lana Turner spent some time in Europe five years ago, and her honeymoon then was a tragic experience which she has tried to forget. She conceived a child which she lost. Her husband dropped a small fortune in midget auto racing. The foreign press lampooned her mercilessly. It was a nightmare.

With Lex Barker at her side, Europe has been completely different. It's been an ecstatic heaven. And from what evidence now exists, it looks like wedding bells for Lana in the months to come.

WHETHER Lana can hold Lex when and if she gets him in matrimony is a hypothetical question which at this point no man would like to pass prophecy upon.

Each time Lana Turner gets married she is sure in her heart that, "This time it's for keeps."

Somewhere along the line, this talented, tolerant, courageous actress has got to be right.

Let's hope she finally finds the true happiness she deserves with Lex Barker. END her intelligence, finally by the success of her family-life and her career.

Now that she's back in Hollywood hard at work on The Story Of Demetrius, she makes light of her European vacation, but it was really a triumphant tour, because for many years the fans overseas have had a muddled impression of the real Hayward, not knowing whether she was diffident, sharp, reclusive, fearful, aggressive, or money-wise—all of which adjectives have been used to describe her.

The Hayward they saw in Europe was charming, graceful, diplomatic, and tactful, a beauty who had no worries, no cares, a girl whose mother was looking after the children back home, an actress who was determined to enjoy Europe and her husband.

Susan and Jess had a low-slung Jaguar waiting for them when they arrived in Paris aboard separate planes. "We always travel in separate planes as protection for the boys. After all, if one plane crashed, there would still be someone to look after Tim and Greg," she said matter-of-factly.

THEY stayed in Paris only three days and with Jean Papote beside them, headed for Spain. They took two cameras, a Rollei and a Stereo, and shot some 40 rolls of film. After touring the French chateau country and southern France they crossed into Spain where Susan saw all the historic sites she'd read about when she was Edythe Marrener, a Brooklyn teenager at Girls' Commercial High School.

In Spain, too, they ran into Gene and Betsy Kelly, touring the Peninsula with their little girl, Kerry, which of course, stimulated thoughts of their own two boys. So that night, "we put in a transatlantic call to California, and we spoke to Tim and Greg, and we could hear them perfectly, but they could hardly hear us. But it was reassuring to know that they were both in good health, and we had nothing to worry about. So after Spain we toured the Mediterranean and then headed for Italy."

Susan Hayward is one girl who has worked hard for all her triumphs, first as a model in New York, then as a non-script actress who was kicked around Warner Brothers and Paramount, finally landing with Walter Wanger who thought she had dramatic possibilities. Wanger later sold her contract to 20th Century where the competition, with Anne Baxter, Betty Grable, Linda Darnell, and Jeanne Crain, was pretty tough. For years, Hayward rarely relaxed. Always there were story conferences, wardrobe fittings, subtle and not too subtle maneuverings, for the big roles and the big pictures. Always there was the mad scramble for the fast buck, or for Darryl Zanuck's ear, or the omnipresent agent and his telephone.

In Italy there was none of this. The Italian men stared and whistled at Susan as she strolled the streets, but they did this to all American women.

There were moonlight nights, however, with Jess, near the Colosseum, love-filled nights on the banks of the Arno, that picturesque river which snakes its winding path from the Apennines in central Italy west to Pisa.

Susan and Jess looked back over the nine years of their marriage. Time had winged by so furiously. Only yesterday it was 1944, and they had met in the Hollywood Canteen. Jess had taken her home that first night and had tried for a good-night kiss. She had slapped his face. They had both vowed they would never see each other again. But the physical attraction was too strong. They were both ripe for marriage, and they knew it. So they managed by design to run into each other at the Canteen again. Not long after, they were engaged, and then the engagement was broken twice, but seemingly they needed each other, wanted each other. They married, and a year later the twins were born.

When two people are ecstatically happy, as Susan and Jess were in Italy, and they look back over the years together, every incident is veiled in the net of sweet nostalgia. There is never any bitterness, only the feeling of accomplishment and mutual experience and triumph. Even the serious quarrels that a couple have had take on the aura of happy times, because they've been conquered and they've reached a perfect pattern for life.

In Europe, the Barkers could take inventory of their life. They had come through hard times, not so much financially as domestically, because career-wise, Susan had progressed more rapidly than her husband. She had managed to get the breaks, and since this is not the conventional order of things in America—the man must always be the top breadwinner—there had been frictions and outbursts and consultations with a marriage counselor, and for a while divorce loomed on the horizon. But Susan and Jess are sensible people, and they had worked out their difficulties. They had truly become one of Hollywood's few happily married young couples, and now they were reveling in that realization.

AFTER ten days in Rome, the Barkers decided to let Jean drive their car to Paris while they took the plane. Some of the roads in Europe, especially in Spain where they did the bulk of their motoring, are very rough.

In Paris, Susan and Jess stayed at the Lancaster, and this time fell in love with the city. They were asked to stay over and fly to the Film Festival at Cannes, "But we'd been gone from California about two months, and we were very anxious to get back and see the boys. We had a tough time trying to phone them from Paris."

Susan flew back to the States on a Pan American Clipper and Jess followed a few hours behind aboard a TWA Constellation.

When she arrived in Hollywood in May and reported to the studio, Susan learned that a mild revolution had taken place in the motion picture industry. Two dimensional films were out, and 20th was shooting everything in CinemaScope for wide screen projection. She also learned that Anne Baxter, Linda Darnell, and Jeanne Crain were no longer under contract to 20th and that Betty Grable had been loaned out to Columbia. Dale Robertson had also been borrowed by RKO. In fact, Hayward and Marilyn Monroe were the only two big-name female stars left on the studio contract list.

Susan was also told that she was scheduled to start The Story Of Demetrius with Victor Mature.

Susan Hayward likes to work, and she was glad to get back in harness. "The day she checked in," a wardrobe girl reports, "she looked as happy as a bride returning from her honeymoon."

Actually, Susan is that happy. "For years," she admits, "Jess and I talked about going to Europe. Now that we've been—well, it just gives me a wonderful feeling of satisfaction, and of course, we want to go again."

Jess says that next time they might take their two boys along, "Because Susan misses them an awful lot." Timothy and Gregory are fraternal twins, not identical. They don't even look like brothers, even though they were born a few minutes apart. Tim is heavier, bigger, and more extroverted than Gregg who is basically a shy and imaginative little fellow.

Although she is popularly considered the shrewdest actress in Hollywood and one of 20th's biggest money-makers, Susan Hayward regards herself primarily as a mother and housewife. That's why she spends practically all of her spare time at home with her children. She and Jess very rarely go to night clubs or previews, or throw large parties. She has only one in service, does much of the cooking herself, makes it a point to put the boys to bed, bundle them into the station wagon on weekends, take them on picnics, to drive-in movies, and to toy shops.

SUSAN is also sensible enough to realize that these are the best years of her life and to be grateful for what she has: a seven-year contract at $5,000 a week, the prestige and position of being her studio's number-one female star, beauty, travel, a wonderful home, money in the bank, three cars, the respect of her fellow-workers, and most important of all, the love of a good husband and two healthy sons.

In the words of the Italian reporter, Susan Hayward is "the one movie star who has everything."

When an actress reaches such heights as these, there is only one thing she can do. She must give of herself to the countless thousands everywhere who have contributed indirectly to her great happiness. And Susie certainly does!

—P.T., STOCKTON, CAL.

A. All stars like to receive fan mail and consider the quantities as popularity indications. Mario Lanza, Alan Ladd, Joan Crawford, and Janet Leigh, to name only a few, try to answer all fan mail.

Q. Why was Vic Damone disliked so much when he was in the Army?

—T.Y., MONMOUTH, N. J.

A. Through no fault of his own, Damone was assigned a soft berth in Special Services; he also made the foolish error of driving around Army camps in his Cadillac convertible, a move not designed to win friends among fellow soldiers.

Q. Is it true that Bob Wagner refuses to date girls unless they've been married at least once?

—D. E., VERO BEACH, FLA.

A. Wagner has no dating prerequisites.

Q. My uncle, who works in Hollywood as a publicity man, tells me that Dale Robertson is the most uncooperative young actor out there. Why is that?

W.Y., CHEYENNE, WYO.

A. Dale has a theory that too much publicity is bad for a star; therefore, he has cut down on the number of interviews he'll give.

HOLLYWOOD'S MOST DAZZLING WEDDING OF THE YEAR: A HIGH NUPTIAL MASS JOINS ANN BLYTH AND

Looking more radiantly lovely than ever, Ann Blyth leaves St. Charles church, in North Hollywood, on the arm of her husband, Dr. James McNulty. The fashionable and dignified wedding had more than 600 guests in attendance.

Elizabeth Taylor congratulates Ann after she becomes Mrs. McNulty. Ann had wanted Liz to be a bridesmaid, but Liz' divorce ruled her out of participating in the Catholic ceremony.

Terry Moore and Dick Clayton greet the bride and groom as the receiving line forms. Ann's gown was of white mousseline de soie, with an heirloom lace yoke, and beautiful seed pearl embroidery.

GWEN O'Connor, who wept a bit on the stand divorcing Donald, wasn't so upset she couldn't keep a dinner date the same evening with Dan Dailey.

They went to one of the less prominent cafés to avoid photographers. But the headwaiter nearly threw them when he spotted Gwen and then said to Dan, "Right this way, Mr. O'Connor." (!?????)

On second thought, there's nothing in the property settlement Gwen received from Don to upset her.

They divide $100,000 cash.

Then she gets 20% of the first $100,000 Donald earns; 10% of the second $100,000 and 5% of additional annual income.

Gwen retains custody of their little girl, Donna, age 6, with Don contributing an additional $150 monthly for the child's support. He gets reasonable visitation concessions.

The kid himself—I mean Donald, of course—gets the family dog, O'Flynn, an Irish wolfhound about the size of a Shetland pony with "the appetite of a horse," according to Gwen's testimony.

Oh, yes—I almost forgot—the ex-Mrs. O'Connor keeps the family home in the Valley and Don has just bought a new place in Beverly Hills.

One of Gwen's charges was that Don refused to cooperate in their social life. "He frequently walked out right in the middle of dinner, or else didn't show up at all. And, he hated to go to parties."

In view of all this, it's amusing that his second night as a "free man," Don tossed a party for 25 in his new house and planned the whole thing himself!

Ava Gardner and Lana Turner, who were so chummy-chummy in Europe that Ava met Lana's and Lex Barker's plane in Spain and shared her hotel suite with her, aren't seeing each other since Frank Sinatra arrived.

No, the girls are not tiffing.

It's just that Frankie can't stand the sight of Lana ever since he overheard her and Ava "cutting him up" in Palm Springs during one of Ava's and Frankie's more violent fights.

He even called the gendarmes and had them evicted—remember?

Ever since that time, Lana's been on Frank's deep freeze list—so, in order to maintain the current peace (subject to change without notice), Ava isn't seeing Lana any more.

THE-Most-Pointed-Remark-Of-The-Month: When Gary Cooper was asked by French reporters if he was happy to be reunited with his family, Mrs. Cooper and daughter, Maria, who had just flown in to Paris, big Coop said, "I'm very, very happy to see my daughter again."

I just can't remember ever being at a bigger or better, funnier or more sentimental party than Dolores and Bob Hope gave honoring Bob's birthday, the wedding of Ann Blyth and Dr. James McNulty, and the singing Trapp Sisters from the East.

Jack Benny kisses the bride. At the lavish reception at the Beverly Hills Hotel, guests feasted on all kinds of delicacies, including a ham decorated with "I Love You" in red pimiento.

Ann greets Georg Steffen, estranged husband of one of her best friends, Jane Powell. Jane, ruled out from acting as bridesmaid because of her marital status, didn't attend wedding.

Although almost every glamor girl in town was present it was also a sort of family affair with the Irish mother and father of Dr. McNulty and Dennis Day (they're brothers) plus Ann's aunt and uncle, the Tobins; plus all Bob's brothers and cousins and four children stealing a lot of thunder from the movie guys and dolls.

The beautiful home and gardens of the Hopes in the Valley looked like a section of Honolulu had been flown in—and it almost had. Francis Brown, orchid King of the islands, had literally buried the house with beautiful orchid blooms, just flown in from the islands.

I've never seen Dolores look so pretty or so happy. She actually glowed when Bob cut his birthday cake flanked by all the children. I couldn't get over Linda and Tony, really grown up.

The hostess's dress was a lovely pink lace—and I noticed how many other lovely ladies were in pink, Maureen O'Sullivan and Irene Dunne among them.

I fell completely in love with Jim's and Dennis Day's mother and father. Before the evening was over I was calling them Mollie and Pat and they called me Louella.

Jack Benny, George Burns, Pat O'Brien and Fred MacMurray (it was before his Lily was stricken with a fatal illness) had everyone bent double with their gag that they were just about to put on an act—and then never getting around to it.

From hilarious laughter we swung to sentimental tears when the Trapp Sisters sang a beautiful love song to lovely little Ann Blyth and her handsome doctor, so much in love and so happy it catches at your heart to watch them together.

I was particularly touched during the song when I saw the aunt and uncle who raised Ann reach for each other's hands.

Just about the time the buffet supper tables were set up on the lawn, the moon came up; the scent of the flowers almost overcame us with their sweetness; glasses clinked in toasts to the health of the birthday boy and the young lovers; lovely string music softly filled the air—well, all I can say is that it was a beautiful evening and one long to be remembered.

PRETTY 19-year-old Audrey Dalton (she was so good as the daughter in Titanic) has been secretly married to James Brown since January.

Audrey is one of the three girls brought over by Paramount from England for Girls Of Pleasure Island.

She would like the fans to know that the James Brown she married is a student at UCLA—not the actor by the same name.

GEARY Steffen finally had something to say about his break-up with Jane Powell.

me, I don't want her.

"Anyway," he gulped, "Jane is the most wonderful person, and wonderful mother in the world."

Jane still wants "out" although I hear her romance with Gene Nelson is getting cooler and cooler.

When I talked with her, Jane had a bad cold and seemed weary. "I just want to rest and let our lawyers settle all the problems. If Geary is entitled to 50% of all I've earned (community property—which means everything is equally divided between a couple after marriage—no matter which one has done the earning—is a law in California), I guess his attorney will see he gets it.

"He needn't worry, however, about the religious upbringing of the children. I promised him at the time of our marriage that they would be raised Catholics and I will keep my word.

"Our home is on the market for sale. It's too big, and besides I want to close all doors behind me after our divorce."

The only cloud over the otherwise perfect love story and marriage of Ann Blyth and Dr. McNulty was trouble in the bridesmaids' ranks.

Two of Ann's closest friends, Jane Powell and Elizabeth Taylor, could not be attendants because they are divorcées. Jane had already been fitted for her bridesmaid gown—but when she and Geary Steffen hit the headlines—Janie bowed out because she did not want to embarrass Ann, who is a devout Catholic.

But, the final blow came when it looked as if matron of honor, Jane Withers Moss, wouldn't be able to serve for the same reason as Jane's.

The trouble between Jane Withers and Bill Moss hit the papers—but because it was not a definite break, and they are trying to patch things up, little Ann was able to keep her closest girl friend as her matron of honor.

JEFF Chandler has been dropping into Ciro's regularly to sing with the band! He's practicing up for his tour of army bases with disc jockey Johnny Grant.

As a singer, Jeff's no Bing Crosby. His voice is untrained, but pleasant—and he usually gets a hand from the crowd, many of the customers not recognizing him.

Hear that Marty Melcher has decided he's kept Doris Day too isolated from the press, public, and Hollywood social affairs and is going to let her be seen around more in the future. High time, I say. . . .

Wasn't Tony Curtis (who wants a family very much) being a little bitter when he said, "Janet's career is going so well now—it would be a shame to interrupt it."

Unless the wife of a very popular actor doesn't stop her insane imaginary jealousies, —they may become real. He's irritated to the breaking point. . . .

I'm sorry Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin seem to be in hot water ever since they left Hollywood for Europe. They followed their flare-up aboard the Queen Elizabeth by being inexcusably late for an appointment with the Lord Mayor Kerr of Glasgow—so late he wouldn't receive them. You boys don't act this way in Hollywood. Better come home, kids. . . .

It was a blue, lonely birthday for Marilyn Monroe on June 1st.

She and Joe DiMaggio had slipped away to Ensenada for a quiet celebration. But they no sooner had arrived than Joe received a telephone call from San Francisco with the sad news that his brother Mike was dead—drowned.

They hurried home immediately, Joe leaving Marilyn in Los Angeles as he flew to his grief-stricken family.

"With Joe so heartbroken about Mike, I didn't feel like going anywhere or having any people in for my birthday," Marilyn said. "I just wanted to be alone and wait for his calls when he felt like talking."

Make no mistake about it, these two are deeply in love and hope to marry soon.

I DON'T care what she says to the contrary, Judy Garland is happier and healthier when she's fat!

The strenuous diet and exercise she has been undergoing preparatory to starting her comeback movie, A Star Is Born is beginning to show in her strained expression and a returning nervousness. (Continued on page 12)

Nothing is worth it, Judy. We love you fat, thin, or in between—so don't overdo this reducing thing.

DEBBIE Reynolds just sat down and had a good cry when she learned that Gentlemen Marry Brunettes had been postponed for European production until October. She's never been abroad and she was jumpin' at the idea.

"I'd bought all my clothes," she wailed. "But, Debbie," I laughed, "taking clothes to Paris is worse than hauling coal to Newcastle. Don't you know you're supposed to buy clothes there?"

"Not me," she shook her head, "that's all right for the glamor girls like Ava Gardner and Lana Turner. I wear cute things and where, oh where in all of Paris could I buy a polka-dot bow for under my chin?"

BOB Wagner let his hair grow long for Prince Valiant and his flowing locks never fail to set Terry Moore into gales of laughter.

"You look just like me," she giggles. Fine thing for a guy who's courtin' a gal!

NEVER has a girl battled with stouter heart than Shelley Winters to keep rumors of trouble away from her marriage.

When gossip was all over town that Shell and Vittorio Gassman were quarreling in cafés and that often she broke into tears when they appeared in public, Shelley told me:

"Oh, they're always trying to separate Vittorio and me. I guess the latest gossip started at the Hollywood premiere of Shane.

"For some silly reason, MGM wouldn't let Vittorio wear the dinner clothes which he had made in Italy—did you ever hear anything more ridiculous than that?

"Everyone else was dressed formally and Vittorio was so angry about the whole thing I suppose people thought he was quarreling with me."

Shell, who is nothing if not honest, added wistfully, "I guess we did argue a little, Louella, after I told him it was silly and not to be upset about such a little thing. Anything like this wouldn't bother me at all. But, it's important to Vittorio."

She's such a really good girl at heart, I hope Shelley is always important to Gassman.

Now it's Corinne Calvet and Joan Fontaine feuding on the set of Flight To Tangier at Paramount, and I mean, feuding.

We no more than get past the Marilyn Monroe-Joan Crawford battle than Fontaine and Calvet take over the spotlight.

Seems that Joan, who has an unruly sense of humor, keeps needling the French Corinne by constantly mispronouncing her last name:

Keeps calling her "Miss Culvert" or "Miss Culprit" or "Miss Cravet" as the crew chuckles and Corinne burns or freezes as the case may be.

It isn't amusing for anyone to be ridiculed, but I sometimes wonder if Corinne doesn't go a little out of her way to inspire these feuds.

Just a few months ago she and Zsa Zsa Gabor were locked in a legal battle after Zsa Zsa said Corinne wasn't French at all but a Cockney.

After all the publicity had been milked from this incident, la Calvet dropped her suit.

THE LETTER BOX: A very cute letter in surprisingly good English from Kousuke Nishi, a first year high school student in Fukuoka, Japan, who reads MODERN SCREEN "amandently" (?) and thinks American fans would like to know:

"Most impressed by American movie High Noon and feel restless with the news that Ivanhoe and The Quiet Man is coming. Is this surprise?

"Japanese fans elate over quality. Please, who is Debbie Reynolds, Rock Hudson and Piper Laurie we read about but have not optically known?

"Very pleased to write you, and American movie fans, in English." Thank you, Kousuke, —your English is most "amandently" understandable.

There's not enough space to mention those of you who are "shocked beyond words" over the parting of Jane Powell and Geary Steffen—the letters still pouring in over this unhappy rift.

That's all for now. See you next month.

Americo's favorite TV couple will soon be seen in the movies. Lucille Ball and Desi Arnaz are now working on MGM's Long, Long Trailer.

AN M/S WIRE SERVICE OF LATE NEWS FROM AROUND

AVA GARDNER and FRANK SINATRA are no longer quarreling, but their marriage isn't going too smoothly, either. Frank is playing the British provinces on his concert tour while Ava works in London on Knights Of The Round Table. Unfortunately, Frank's Scandinavian tour turned out to be a great lemon. Scheduled to appear on the stage of a theater in Malmo, Sweden, for at least one hour, he walked off in half that time. Next day Swedish newspapers announced, "Sinatra flops . . . Singing horrible." Whereupon Frank grabbed the first plane and winged to London. Here, he took his bride to the Turpin-Humez prize fight at White City. During the course of the fight, one fan nodded at Ava and said, "Take her up in the ring, Frankie, and show us some real fighting."

GEORGE SANDERS, who almost suffered a nervous breakdown while making New Wine with Ingrid and Roberto Rossellini in Italy, was furious in a most sophisticated way, of course, when he learned that his wife Zsa Zsa Gabor was playing around with Parfirio Rubiras, ex-husband of Doris Duke. "George shouldn't be angry," Zsa Zsa explained in Paris. "After all he had a romance or two in Rome while I was working hard in Hollywood. He will get over it."

DEAN MARTIN and JERRY LEWIS who arrived in England with an entourage of 19—round trip fares for the group came to $26,000—completely devastated British audiences in Glasgow and Scotland. One night Martin and Lewis were taken to the swankiest dinner club in London to watch Nael Coward perform. During the meal Dean jumped to his feet and bowing to the waiter, said, "Shall we dance?" A moment later, Jerry went into his act. Smearing his face with ice cream and crossing his eyes, he shouted, "I don't want you people to think I don't know how to behave in a ritzy joint like this." The Duchess of Marlborough and other members of the British nobility sitting nearby were incredulous. "Who are these strange Americans?" the Duchess asked.

PAUL DOUGLAS is extremely popular in England these days. With what the British consider typical American modesty, Douglas keeps telling reporters, "I'm so ugly all you have to do is put any girl next to me, and she looks wonderful." Paul's wife Jan Sterling who flew over to London with the actor, has winged back to Hollywood leaving Douglas a temporary bachelor. "I love Hollywood, too," Paul says, "except that the work now is over here, and an actor's got to go wherever he earns his bread and butter."

ANNE BAXTER and STEVE COCHRAN, who have just finished Carnival in Munich, were linked together as a romantic item by a hard-working press agent. The truth, of course, is that there is nothing between them. Anne is primarily intellectual and Steve basically emotional, so emotional, in fact, that last Christmas he clouted a party-crasher over the head with a baseball bat. Notified in Munich that he would have to pay the party-crasher $16,000 in damages, Steve said, "I'm not gonna take this lying down. My lawyer and I, we're gonna appeal." Carnival, incidentally, will be Anne Baxter's last film for some time. After leaving Munich, she met with Charles Laughton in London and signed a contract to tour the U.S. with him and Tyrone Power in a recitation of John Brown's Body. The tour begins in Los Angeles on September 20th, and the last time Anne appeared on the stage for a regular run was in 1938 in New York.

CLARK GABLE, whose MGM contract expires later this year, was one of the few actors in Europe who failed to show up at Queen Elizabeth's Coronation. Instead of returning to London, Gable spent his time with Suzanne Daddale, the statuesque Parisian model who gave up her job to travel with him. Together they celebrated Gable's final divorce decree from Lady Sylvia Ashley by sunning themselves on the Isle of Capri where Gable kept saying, "I'm a tired old man after two pictures in a row . . . Don't know what I'm going to do next."

LANA TURNER and her constant escort, Lex Barker, have succeeded in muddling most of the Italian newspapermen assigned to cover them. Lana keeps insisting that she has no marital intentions for the near future, and Lex Barker keeps confiding to the same newsmen that he'll get married in October when his divorce from Arlene Dahl becomes final.

hollywood report

by Mike Connolly

famous columnist for
The Hollywood Reporter

SKIRMISHES OF THE MONTH:

Vera-Ellen and Mitzi Gaynor, who look alike and dance alike, ran into each other at Ciro's and exchanged very cold hello's . . . Jerry Lewis phoned me to ask why the columnists in Hollywood are always hinting that he's breaking up with his wife or that Dean Martin is breaking up with his. I suggested that perhaps they give reporters reason to think so. Jerry said, "When and if the day arrives when I fight with Patti, I'll give up my career, buy two one-way tickets, and take Patti back to Newark with me. My wife is much more important to me than making movies!" . . . Best dancers in town: Gwen O'Connor, Donald's estranged spouse, and Dan Dailey . . . Fernando the Fickle showed up with a brunette (but Arlene's a redhead!) at LaRue . . . Betty Grable and Marilyn Monroe, 20th's two top blondes, merely nodded to each other until they started working together in How To Marry A Millionaire. And you know something? Despite all their denials of any enmity whatsoever I still think there's no love lost between the twain!

June Allyson tells this wonderfully funny story about the unfunny illness of her husband, Dick Powell: "Six days after his appendix burst it was necessary to operate in an attempt to save his life. I saw him right after the operation. There were tubes coming out all over him. Tubes in both nostrils, tubes into his swollen abdomen, tubes in both arms. The doctor said, 'Go in and talk to him, June.' I did. It was the only time I had ever seen Dick give up. You've read about people who just give up? Well, Dick had. I began talking. I don't remember the things I poured out. Who can at such a time? And then all of a sudden he opened his eyes to look at me and his lips began to move. 'This,' said Dick, 'is a heck of a way to quit smoking!' And then I was sure he was going to make it!"

LONG HUNCH DEP'T.:

Clifton Webb, who ought to know, tells us he thinks Marilyn Monroe will develop into the biggest femme star who has ever hit Hollywood. "Not," says Clifton, "because she's so all-fired talented but because she works so hard. It's nothing for Marilyn to go home after a 12-hour day at the studio and stay up till 2 A.M. studying with Natasha Lytess, her dramatic coach. And anybody who works that hard has to be successful." So you thought it was all glamor, hey? . . . The first syllable of Keefe Brasselle's surname—Brass—suits him well. Little Sir Ego, as he's called, is due for the year's most brilliant boost to stardom, thanks to his portrayal of Eddie Cantor in The Eddie Cantor Story. Just wait'll you see this miraculous piece of acting!

Palance

Ann Sheridan was dubbed "The Oomph Girl," remember? Clara Bow was "The It Girl." And now comes Jack Palance, who's been dubbed "The Cruellest Face on the Screen" . . . Greta Garbo swept out of Hollywood in a 1953 model streamlined huff. Too many attempts to invade her privacy, she said, and trotted off to an unannounced destination where she can be alone . . . Oh, almost forgot: the guest list for the Blyth-McNulty wedding reception contained 786 names. A girl has a right to invite a few of her friends . . . Zsa Zsa and Eva Gabor spent two whole afternoons together in Paris when I was there last month scrubbing their diamonds in a sink in Zsa Zsa's apartment . . . Ann Miller also has jewelry to burn—but a different kind. A hot admirer gifted her with earrings made of anthracite . . . What do you suppose it (Continued on page 24)

Rose Point sterling in the mood of romance

A legend of love in silver—Wallace's Rose Point!

It was inspired by the wedding veil of queens, the legendary Rose Point Lace. Centuries ago, a Venetian nobleman found in his gardens a full-blown rose, enshrined in a delicately spun web. He challenged his finest lace-makers to duplicate it and Rose Point Lace was born—a wedding veil for his bride.

In Wallace's Rose Point the full-blown rose, surrounded by silver pearls is sculptured in sterling by famed William S. Warren in exclusive "Third Dimension Beauty." Like every Wallace "Third Dimension Beauty" pattern it is a masterpiece—beautifully formed not only in front, but in profile and back—giving you sterling perfection from every possible view.

Six piece place setting, Rose Point, $35.75. Settings of other patterns from $35.75 to $47.75—all prices include Federal Tax. To learn where you can buy Wallace Sterling, call Western Union by number and ask for Operator 25. She will give you the names of the stores nearest you.

Read the exciting design stories of each Wallace pattern in the 32 page book "Treasures in Sterling." It also contains many helpful table-setting ideas. Write (send 10¢ to cover postage) to Wallace Silversmiths, Department 936, Wallingford, Connecticut.

PICTURE OF THE MONTH

MAIN STREET TO BROADWAY The cast reads like a Who's Who in Hollywood but what makes Main Street To Broadway more than a showcase of big names is the artful way in which the plot is interlaced with celebrities acting as themselves. The plot is simple. Young playwright (Tom Morton) sits up nights torturing dialogue into existence. He has a girlfriend (Mary Murphy) who's excited by his feverish approach to life, but she's from a small town and she thinks she'd rather go back there and marry a nice, quiet guy who putters around in the garden on weekends. The nice young man turns out to be Herb Shriner. While Mary's making up her mind, Tom's suffering in New York—but Gertrude Berg is there to feed him soup and hold up his head. Finally, he finishes a play for Tallulah Bankhead. His agent (Agnes Moorehead) says it's terrible, she won't even show it to Tallulah. So Tom tosses it into the river, although he's not far enough gone to jump in with it. The police pick him up, and maybe you don't believe it, but Ethel Barrymore and Louis Calhern come to his rescue. And Tallulah does that play (Tom kept a copy). There's more—there's Mary Martin singing. There's Helen Hayes, Shirley Booth, Rex Harrison, Lilli Palmer, Faye Emerson, Leo Durocher, too. Even Leo Durocher's son. And that's still not all. Main Street To Broadway is quite a movie! MGM.

MELBA Sixty years ago Nellie Melba was the toast of several continents. She was one of the first opera stars who looked as good as she sounded, and she took advantage of her assets. Another operatic star, Patrice Munsel, brings her to colorful, wistful life in Melba. Her story begins in Australia where she was born. She had a sweetheart there (John McCallum) whom she leaves for Paris and the promise it offers. In Paris, a young Englishman (John Justin) falls in love with her and helps her snare the great Mme. Marchesi (Martita Hunt) for a teacher. After much study Nellie makes her debut and is an instant success at Covent Garden in London. Admirers swarm about her and she enjoys them all, but love seems remote. Until the day John McCallum turns up—in Monte Carlo—and marries her. Life with John is beautiful but brief, because Nellie must choose between him and her career. He goes—and she goes on to greater triumphs alone. Patrice sings arias from Melba's most popular operas (this is the first musical that uses stereophonic sound). The screen is wide, the staging lavish and in color. Robert Morley and Sybil Thorndike are in it too.—U.A.

THE MAN FROM THE ALAMO Glenn Ford's the man. He would have died a hero like all the Texans who defended the Alamo, but lots were drawn to send one of them back to Ox-Bow where Mexicans were destroying homes and families. Ford arrives too late. His wife and child have been murdered, his ranch burned. Only a little boy (Butch Cavell) has survived. Ford takes him to the next town where he, Ford, is branded a coward and traitor. The little boy tells him that Americans disguised as Mexicans were the actual plunderers at Ox-Bow. Since Ford can't convince anyone of this he decides to round up the criminals himself. Victor Jory's their leader and Ford joins his gang. The good men want to hang him and the bad men don't trust him. Fortunately for Glenn, Butch is around to pick him up off the ground when the going gets real rough. And there's Julia Adams who kind of trusted him from the start. Rounding out the Technicolor cast are Chill Wills, Hugh O'Brien, Jeanne Cooper.—U-I.

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA When this highwayman (Laurence Olivier) comes riding, riding, all the girls start sighing, sighing even as he robs 'em. In bawdy England he is a hero but he also has a price on his head and this lands him in Newgate Gaol. The night before he is to hang, a beggar is tossed outside his cell. The beggar has written an opera about the bold and brave Captain Macheath. When he discovers that Olivier is Macheath he shows him the score and the opera unfolds. All about a carefree ladies' man of 300 years ago who is finally betrayed by the women he has been so gaily cavalier to. A man so free of moral obligation can't come to a good end—unless he's awfully charming. Olivier sings—as does the entire cast—to music written by Sir Arthur Bliss. Playwright Christopher Fry provided the lyrics. It's in Technicolor—Warners.

IT CAME FROM OUTER SPACE Richard Carlson's talking up romance to Barbara Rush when what looks like a giant meteor flashes across the western sky and explodes in the desert. No coward, he, Carlson walks right into the seething crater, comes out swearing he saw a space ship. Those are rocks, the Army tells him, staring fixedly at his head. But eerie things begin to happen. People disappear in thin air and when they re-appear act like zombies. Some of them don't ever re-appear. Simple, really. Those spacemen are so ugly they're afraid to show themselves—each one is a viscous bloh with a large eye floating in the center—instead, they take the shape of whatever people they find. But try telling that to Sheriff Charles Drake who's dying to blast 'em back to Mars. The movie, written by Ray Bradbury, is in 3-D on a wide screen with stereophonic sound.—U.I.

SOUTH SEA WOMAN When Marine Sergeant Jim O'Hearn (Burt Lancaster) is brought up for trial the court can't even believe the charges. Desertion, theft—that's okay. But who ever heard of a marine sinking a saloon? Not only a saloon. But almost the entire Jap fleet at Guadalcanal. And without permission. But as you'll discover, if any marine could have done it, that marine was O'Hearn. Virginia Mayo (she met him in Singapore) and Veola Vonn (she met him on an island where she ran a hotel) take the stand. So do various other characters who crossed O'Hearn's path during his exploits. All of them piece together an hilarious story. The whole trouble started when Burt's protégé (Chuck Connors) wanted to marry Virginia and Burt tried to rescue him. Somehow the light went out (they were in a saloon) and they all woke up in the China Sea. Don't ask me what happened. Ask Warners.

THE AFFAIRS OF DOBIE GILLIS If anyone who was responsible for this picture ever even saw a college I'd like to know the name of it. But go fight MGM who has Debbie Reynolds on their side. She's really interested in learning, can she help it if she meets a traveling-salesman type freshman (Bobby Van)? Together they blow up the chem lab, make monkeys out of their professors and turn the campus into a musical comedy set. Barbara Ruick and Bob Fosse—add a couple of pleasant songs and dances to the burdened air. It's not surprising that Debbie's father (Hanley Stafford) is reduced to a gibbering idiot in his efforts to isolate her from her frolicsome friends. He sends her to New York, but that doesn't work. He even calls the cops, and almost gets himself arrested. Well, it's all in fun, as they say. And Donald O'Connor had better watch out for Bobby Van.—MGM

WHITE WITCH DOCTOR Once again Africa (in Technicolor) provides a thrilling background for romance and darker passions. The year is 1907. Nurse Susan Hayward arrives in the Congo to work at a remote hospital post. Right away she meets Bob Mitchum who is being attacked by a wild gorilla (he sends 'em back alive to various zoos). She thinks he's brutal; he thinks she's frustrated. While they're falling in love, witch doctors are trying to cast spells over their competitor (that's Susan) and Walter Slezak (Mitchum's partner) is thinking up ways to steal gold from the dread Bakuba tribe. He gets his chance when Susan is called to the Bakuba village to tend the chief's son. To complicate the situation, Slezak is advancing on the village with greed in his eyes and dynamite on his porter's backs. The real excitement, though, lies in the sound of the drums and the shots of native dancing—20th

AFFAIR WITH A STRANGER Romance in the big city generally involves cab drivers, motherly landladies, starving artists and models. Affair With A Stranger's no different. It's a woman's story with a handsome hunk of man in it. That's Vic Mature, a playwright, unpublished. On New Year's Eve, in the middle of Times Square, he finds Jean Simmons and his worries are half over. She very conveniently falls in love and is shortly providing him with all the meals he'd otherwise have to steal from the automat. But before his movie's through, Mature owns a house larger than Long Island and is rumored getting a divorce from Jean. Flashbacks trace their courtship, his first Broadway flop, the birth of their baby, the strike-it-ich days. Those are the days that usher in siren Monica Lewis. She stars in Vic's plays and makes asses at him off stage. He resists her for a while—the question you may ask is, how long? You may well ask.—RKO (More movie reviews on next page)

Are you in the know?

To start school with a bang—

☐ Be a hide-beater ☐ Try soloing
Don't let those hermit blues set in! Have you a special talent, hobby? Gang up with kindred souls who share it. Help with the school paper, or posters for the fall prom. Or, hop on the bandwagon (who knows—you might be a Rosemary, junior grade!). And don't let calendar cares nag you. With Kotex, you can beat off "outline" blues, for those flat pressed ends don't show—so, your public will never know!

Are these autographs likely to go—

- ☐ To her head ☐ Round her waist

A walking album—your scrapbook belt (new fun fashion)! Make-believe leather with vinyl plastic "window", it holds your heroes' autographs, snapshots—whatever suits your fancy. And here's something for your memory book: at problem time, you can choose a Kotex absorbency that suits you—exactly. Try Regular, Junior, Super.

More women choose KOTEX[®] than all other sanitary napkins

What's on a smart job-holder's mind?

- ☐ The future ☐ The clock ☐ New material

Your heart's set on a big-time career? Better keep your mind on the future instead of each visiting fireman. Show the boss you're dependable. Promotion-worthy. What's more, come "those days", don't count on heaven alone to protect the working gal. Choose Kotex! That safety center gives extra protection—and you get lasting comfort, for this softer Kotex holds its shape!

Which of these "steadies" does most for you?

- ☐ Romeo & Juliet ☐ Kotex and Kotex Belts ☐ Moon 'n' June

Made for each other—that's Kotex and Kotex sanitary belts—and made to keep you comfortable. Of strong, soft-stretch elastic... they're designed to prevent curling, cutting, or twisting. So lightweight you'll hardly know you're wearing one. And Kotex belts take kindly to dunkings; stay flat even after countless washings. Why not buy two... for a change!

SHE HAD TO SAY YES Here's a small town in Arkansas that just sets there and lets the rest of the world go hang. They don't even mention money in this place. They pay each other in livestock and eggs. The town doctor, Boh Mitchum, is more interested in landing a trout named Hercules than any patients. People like Edgar Buchanan, Wallace Ford and Raymond Walburn run the stores and the jail, none of which are ever crowded. So suddenly an hetress (Jean Simmons) slides into town in a flashy Cadillac and wreaks enough havoc to last a hundred years. All she wants to do is repay the people of this town for saving her life when she was a baby. They sent her to a hospital when her father, who was still sniffing for those oil wells, couldn't afford it. How she repays them (mostly by disrupting the entire economy) and how she falls for Dr. Mitchum is what this movie's all about.—RKO

THE MASTER OF BALLANTRAE In 1745 every Scotsman worth his salt was fighting George II. Unfortunately, George II won and no Scotsman could go home again (if he did he was hanged for a rebel). This is Errol Flynn's problem. He owns a castle in Ballantrae, and has a fiancée (Beatrice Campbell). He does manage to see her one night for a kiss, a promise of undying love and some money. The money will take him and another rebel (Roger Livesey) to France. But someone tips off the Redcoats and Flynn is shot, falls into the sea. Dead? No. They fall in with a crew of pirates, fight duels, toss rival pirates overboard, and finally amass a fortune. They return to Scotland, stage a war with the Redcoats in their own castle and Flynn is locked up. Redcoats think they're going to hang him, but they don't know about the secret passage.—Warners.

SEA DEVILS This movie crosses the Channel so much you get seasick. It takes place in the days when Napoleon was threatening to invade England and there were so many spies you never knew which side they were on. That is Rock Hudson's problem. He's a smuggler, owns a little boat. One night Yvonne de Carlo, draped in mystery and a low cut gown, asks him to take her to France. She wants to ransom her brother, she says; he's being held by the revolutionaries. A few hours later Hudson lovingly drops her on the coast of France. Next time he sees her she is all dressed up like a countess who is a French spy. Rock doesn't think twice; he kidnaps and delivers her to the British. Naturally, the British send her back to France, because she is no spy. That is, she is a spy but an English spy. When Napoleon finds that out, there's trouble! And Rock's crossing the Channel again. Among those ashore are Maxwell Reed, Denis O'Dea, Jacques Brunius.—RKO

Whew! Never before in the history of this column has there been such a mountainous monthful of movie music piled on my record changer. Looks as though Hollywood is again becoming aware of how mutually helpful the studios and Tin Pan Alley can be to each other. Following are some of the more interesting items.

ALL I DESIRE—title song by Tony Arden & The Four Lads* (Columbia); Camarata (Decca); David Rose (MGM); Bob Manning* (Capitol).

THE BAD AND THE BEAUTIFUL—Love Is For The Very Young by Victor Young* (Decca).

BRIGHT ROAD—Suzanne (Every Night When The Sun Goes Down) by Harry Belafonte (Victor).

BAND WAGON—sound track album by Fred Astaire, Nanette Fabray* (MGM).

CINEMA RHAPSODIES—Vol. I by Victor Young* (Decca).
This is an EP record by Victor Young's Singing Strings group, featuring Moulin Rouge, Ruby, Hi-Lili Hi-Lo and Change of Heart, the theme melody from Forever Female.

GENTLEMEN PREFER BLONDES—sound track album by Jane Russell and Marilyn Monroe (MGM).
This may surprise you! We already knew Jane was a good singer, but Marilyn does all right too. They both do separate versions of Bye Bye Baby and are featured together on When Love Goes Wrong and A Little Girl From Little Rock.

JENNIFER—Angel Eyes by Nat Cole* (Capitol); Ella Fitzgerald (Decca).

LIMELIGHT—Terry's Theme (now retitled Eternally) by Jackie Gleason* (Capitol); Johnny Smith* (Roost); Ron Goodwin (Coral); Hugo Winterhalter (Victor); Richard Hayman (Mercury); Victor Young (Decca); Noro Morales (Victor); Wally Stott (Columbia); Jimmy Young (London).

This LP features the fine double-length Faith versions of Return to Paradise, Ruby, Moulin Rouge and The Bad & The Beautiful (Love Is For The Very Young).

That is to say, you see, you can say I might be at the time your readers read this and not look stupid to your readers—oh, you know what I mean!—because I still have marriage very much in my mind and so does José!" The year's biggest shock to the entertainment world was Bing's calm announcement that he's ready to retire. He has private business to attend to.

BY JACK WADE

bing crosby: "it's time to quit"

■ It was in June, just before he and his boy Lindsay pulled out of Europe that a jaunty little man named Bing Crosby sat in a large rococco hotel room in Paris and with typical Crosby levity announced his impending retirement.

"I'm 49," Bing said. "I've been around a long time, and I think I've earned a rest.

"They've got me penciled in to do White Christmas with Fred Astaire—I guess that'll roll in August—and then another Road picture with Hope, and that's it.

"Of course, if something very good comes along,"—Bing pressed his right thumb and index finger together—"the pièce de resistance, I'll probably do that one, too. But I've had it, and it's time for me to stop. Why, man, I'm as old as Hope."

"Is Bob Hope thinking of retirement?" someone asked.

The Groaner ran a hand through what is left of his hair. "Of course not." He grinned. "The public isn't that lucky . . . Well, I've got to hit a few today. I'm entered in the French Amateur (Golf Championship)."

And with that Der Bingle was off. Casual, nonchalant, seemingly light-hearted, he attached no importance to his announcement, didn't even consider it newsworthy enough to call a full-fledged press conference. The most fabulous career in motion pictures was on the verge of coming to an end, and its possessor considered it on par with a round of golf.

As a matter of fact that same day, Bing drove out to Chantilly, some 30 miles from Paris, to compete (Continued on page 72)

"Comment ca va, Old Boy?" Crosby's nonchalance captured French hearts at the Moulin Rouge hospital benefit. After his European jount with Lindsay, Bing will go home to moke two more pictures and devote himself to Gory, Philip and Dennis.

HERE IS MODERN SCREEN'S FRANK ANALYSIS OF THE ROBERT TAYLOR-URSULA THIESS COURTSHIP.

Why doesn't he marry the girl?

by Consuelo Anderson

■ It is an unwritten rule in Hollywood that every actor who gets a divorce eventually re-marries.

Clark Gable, Dick Powell, Alan Ladd, Humphrey Bogart, Cary Grant, Michael Wilding—the list goes on and on including practically everyone except Spangler Arlington Brugh, a strikingly handsome 41-year-old actor who for 19 years has been playing in motion pictures under the name of Robert Taylor.

More popular than ever before—the result no doubt of his appearance in Quo Vadis, Ivanhoe, Above And Beyond, All The Brothers Were Valiant, Ride, Vaqueró, and Knights Of The Round Table—Bob Taylor admits that he has lost his heart to Ursula Thiess, the German actress now under contract to RKO. “But I don’t know about marriage. After all, my divorce first became final in 1952, and I’m here in England, and Ursula’s back in Hollywood, and who knows whether anyone’s ready for marriage?”

One sunless afternoon in a small bachelor's apartment overlooking the sound stages at 20th Century-Fox, a tall, lean, well-muscled actor sat in an easy chair reading the afternoon newspapers, reading in fact, his own journalistic cremation.

Like most talented artists, Gene Nelson is a sensitive, easily-hurt man, and when he read that, among other things, he was a "home-wrecker, a regular junior Don Juan, an actor who obeys his first impulses and nothing else," his large blue eyes grew small and flinty. He bit his lower lip hard and there burned into his mind the unforgettable realization that for love, the true love, a man must be willing to sacrifice everything—his reputation, his work, his money, his life.

Sitting there in that furnished apartment, his soul filled with a quiet fury, Gene Nelson asked himself what crime he had committed that such a vicious attack should be visited upon him.

He had fallen in love with Jane Powell, a beautiful, honest, talented young star who had fallen out of love with her husband. For this, he was being treated like a Bluebeard.

The simple truth is that the Jane Powell-Gene Nelson romance is one of the truly great love affairs in Hollywood's long and tempestuous history, also one of the most honorable and sincere, because these two kids are young people of candor, integrity, honor, consideration, and background.

No woman can padlock her heart to love, no man blind his eyes to beauty and it is a tribute to the character of Gene and Jane that never once in this whole romance has either of them stooped to deceit, evasion, or falsehood.

Both were dissatisfied with their marriages long before Jane was borrowed from MGM to star opposite Gene in Three Sailors And A Girl. (Continued on page 81)

"We're more mixed up than this spaghetti," cracks Don O'Connor about his and Gwen's marital problems. But Hollywood suspects he's just laughing to keep from crying. With Gwen concentrating on Dan Dailey (left) there's little chance of an O'Connor reconciliation.

■ When Donald O'Connor's attractive, 26-year-old wife stalked into the California Superior Court a few weeks ago to pick up her divorce, reporters were a little disappointed to find Gwen unescorted by lanky Dan Dailey.

Ever since her marital breakup, Gwen had been seen practically everywhere with the tall, talented hooper, and it was anticipated that in her hour of need he would remain at her side, a bulwark of comfort and reassurance.

In Judge Otto Emme's court, however, there was no sign of the great Casanova that particular day. A friend offered the possibility that he might be enjoying the company of half-a-dozen horses or half-a-dozen girls.

Anyway, Gwen O'Connor, demurely dressed in a tailor-made suit, her marriage ring removed, ambled into court flanked by her attorney Bernie Silbert, a rotund old hand at Hollywood divorces and by Nancy O'Hanlon, the former Nancy Clark of films who is married to George O'Hanlon, the TV comic. Nancy came along as a witness to corroborate Gwen's testimony as to what a bad boy her husband had been.

Great Day Coming!

Even for first-time parents Virginia and Mike started shopping early for their baby. They're going to completely remodel their house, too.

Horses and long-horn cattle will be O'Shea Junior's pets, but until he's really old enough for ranch life he'll need some gentler companions.

Virginia and Michael O'Shea have no preference for boy or girl. As Mike admits, "I'm crazy about little girls, but so it's a baby, so it's ours, so we'll love it." They have definite ideas about the advantages they want to give their child: education, sound religious background, lots of friends.

Feminine Virginia boosts a luxurious christening robe. Practical Mike's all for a plain cozy undershirt. Baby'll have both.

Ginny Jones of St. Louis had lots of books and dollies before she grew up to be a movie star. But O'Shea missed all that, is making sure his kid doesn't.

"So if he wants to be a 6-Day Bike Rider he'll get a good start," says Mike as Mrs. Mike spoofs his choice of vehicle.

"Uncle Bernie" of the famous toy shop has sold Virginia on a cuddly rabbit; Mike had something more rugged in mind.

Virginia's not ready for maternity clothes yet—but she simply can't resist shopping for them. Perhaps Mike's calling her "Fatso" has something to do with it.

"Nothing today, just looking." Mrs. O'Shea leaves Hollywood's maternity shops empty handed, but with lots of ideas.

■ Due to one thing or another—the noon-day sun of the San Fernando Valley, maybe, or simply the fact that the baby was still six months off—the expectant couple did not look terribly expectant at the moment. They did not, for example, look anywhere near as expectant as their bulldog, who appeared ready to expire from sheer button-eyed anticipation at any moment. It was hard to know what he anticipated, but then, bulldogs are inscrutable that way.

Michael O'Shea, cast these days in the role of incipient pappy, wore denims, a baseball cap and a warmish look. He'd earned the last; an enormous tree-felling job was going on back in the stable-area of the O'Sheas' ranch, and O'Shea had helped fell a few. Virginia Mayo O'Shea was a lot cooler. She is disqualified from lumberjacking until after early November at least. She had on bright red pedal-pushers, their usual accoutrements, and she was not yet entitled to be called Fatso, O'Shea to the contrary.

"Fatso," said O'Shea, "should you sit out in the sun?"

"Certainly," said Miss Mayo. "Don't you start that now. You know," she said in another direction, "what surprises us is that there's so much interest in all this. Not that it's not flattering. But it seems so—"

"People do have babies," said O'Shea. "I have it on excellent authority. Some people after a year, some after five, some ten. We've been married six years. We refuse to look on it as a miracle."

"As a matter of fact—" began Miss Mayo.

"As a matter of fact," said O'Shea, "this one has (Continued on page 87)

Nobody wants to believe it. But everybody in Hollywood is worried about The Most Beautiful Girl In
The World . . .

IS LIZ LOSING HER BEAUTY?

by Susan Trent

■ At Hollywood sewing circles these days, a frequent subject under discussion is that of Liz Taylor's looks. The girls get together behind closed doors and pound the subject into the floor. "Have you seen Liz lately?" "Don't you think she's losing her looks?" "What do you suppose is happening to her?" It's all part of the girls' fun, the age-old feminine twist of jealousy where a beautiful woman is concerned. Much of it is cattiness and wishful thinking, despite the fact Liz is a well-liked girl. But the talk would never have started if there had been no basis for comment.

If it is true—and the cameramen who know are beginning to notice it—Liz had best look to her laurels among the other beauties of Hollywood.

There was a time, last May, when an accident on the set of Elephant Walk came near to causing her the loss of an eye. The blast of a wind machine lodged a tiny sliver of steel in her right eye, and the doctor removing it found it had penetrated 3/4". If it had gone 1/16" in the opposite direction, he said, it would have pierced the iris. It was an extremely painful injury, and less than a week later it became infected and Liz was taken to the hospital, where she remained for a week.

This was a near-miss that was beyond Liz' control, but the thing that people are talking about is not. She has a God-given gift of beauty, a beauty that was evident from the time she was a tiny child until she blossomed in adolescence into a strikingly lovely young woman. The combination of her pale skin and black-lashed, violet eyes has been enough to make men wish knighthood were once again in flower, that they could do daring deeds to win the heart and hand of such a maiden.

Now there is talk that the freshness of her appeal is beginning to fade. If so, it is the course of nature, for every girl has a beauty of her own, whether or not she looks like Elizabeth Taylor, during her teens and early twenties. The firmness and the brightness begin to disappear along with the years, (Continued on page 90)

Beauty is every woman's job

Not all women are born beautiful. But each and every female has an obligation to herself to make the most of her natural equipment. It takes hard work . . . but the results are worth it!

By TERRY HUNT

■ Bob Wagner took a long, lingering look at Terry Moore's delightful figure which at the moment was filling out a clinging bathing suit to the male viewpoint's utmost satisfaction. "Terry," he exclaimed, "I just don't believe it!"

"Just don't believe what?" Terry asked.

"Why, the story that you work out in a gym with barbells. Where are all the bulging muscles?"

Terry laughed. "You're behind times, boy," she replied. "It's true—I do work out with barbells. So do a lot of other girls these days. But we don't wind up with bulging muscles, and we're not trying to become lady weight lifters. We're just following the latest scientific methods to stay fit."

Terry Moore puts it simply by explaining that the science of beauty and health is keeping step with the progress being made in many other fields in this atomic age. As a veteran in the field of keeping glamor alive in Hollywood, I can report that great strides are being made in the profession of physical fitness, particularly in relation to beauty and mental health. Such educators as Dr. Laurence E. Morehouse, of the University of Southern California, Dr. Harvey Billig and Evelyn Loewendahl of Stanford University, and Eleanor Metheny, author of "Body Dynamics," have accomplished amazingly valuable research in this respect.

However, the purpose of this (Continued on page 86)

Gloria Gordon started off her exercises with this thigh, calf, and ankle exercise. Take position as illustrated, with ankles locked, under the weight. Bring feet up until the knees are locked, then return to first position.

An excellent conditioner for the arms, bust and back is this exercise. Take position as illustrated, then slowly pull bar down to chest. Next, return to original position, slowly. Watch your breathing, making sure you inhale as you let bar up, exhale as you bring bar down.

This exercise keeps the hips and thighs trim and supple. Lying as illustrated, on a heavy table, grip the sides of the table and kick scissor fashion with the knees stiff. Swing the legs for about 30 seconds. Do two sets, resting between for a minute.

CISES RECOMMENDED FOR KEEPING YOUR FIGURE SLIM. DO THEM AT HOME OR AT YOUR LOCAL GYM.

Barbell exercises aren't hard to do. Start off with this simple one: Place barbell on floor, then pick up, bring up to chest, as illustrated. Then raise it above the head, and lower to back of neck. Next, reverse the procedure, and finish by placing on floor. Be certain not to perform with a jerky movement. Repeat exercise six times, and increase every other day to a maximum of 12 times. This exercise is not to develop big muscles, but to develop the back, arms, bust. You'll be very pleased with the results.

For toning up hips, thighs and mid-section, take position as illustrated. Then move legs in bicycle fashion for about 30 seconds. Breathe at will. Begin with two sets a day. Increase one minute only after you can do the exercise without strain on midsection.

This bicycle exercise is excellent for the legs. Terry, whose physical education programs are used by the Army Air Forces, recently opened a new Health Club exclusively for women at 12446 Ventura Boulevard, Studio City, near Republic and-U-I studios in Cal.

Gloria finishes up her exercise regimen with a few minutes on the hip-reducing machine. There's no work to this one . . . just lean back and let the machine whittle away excess poundage. It's easy as pie.

THE PRESENT'S PLUS-PERFECT. THE FUTURE COULDN'T LOOK ROSIER. BUT DORIS AND MARTY

SENTIMENTAL JOURNEY

BY CARL SCHROEDER

MEMO: TO THE EDITOR OF MODERN SCREEN

"Dear Chuck: I hope this report will explain about that picture you wanted of Doris Day in the red bathing suit, and a few other things. . . .

There has been a lot of nonsense written about Doris Day, which comes from the fact that she has been interviewed over 600 times by well-meaning writers who could only be allowed about an hour during lunch time at the studio.

So, like you requested, Boss, I talked Doris and her husband, Marty Melcher, the astute young agent, into accompanying them on the last lap of their vacation, Here's a nifty hat that gives Doris' pony-tail the run-around. She and Marty spent hours in Del Monte's Cabbages and Kings shop.

"This'll shake my New Englander up," grins Mrs. Melcher. Marty's a conservative, Doris loves California's gay colors, keeps urging him to be more informal.

"Lend me a dime to look at the seals?" She got her dime. She focused in. Then swore a big, fat walrus winked at her.

The good old days were never like this. Doris gave an impromptu performance at California's historic first theater in Monterey.

Marty and Doris, who never go night-clubbing, made a big thing of dancing at the Del Monte Lodge. In Hollywood they prefer stay-at-home fun with Doris' son Terry.

Her feet may give out after a busy day—but never her appetite. Doris designed her smart evening dress with a jacket herself.

TOOK A JOURNEY INTO EACH OTHER'S PAST—AND FELL IN LOVE ALL OVER AGAIN EVERY STEP OF THE WAY.

along with our photographer, Mr. Bob Beerman.

"It is sort of a dirty trick," Marty said over the telephone, "but you have caught us so to speak just as we are going out the door, so you may as well come along. We are headed for Del Monte Lodge. If you can keep up with my new Olds, we're leaving in a half hour and we'll meet you at Blackwell's Corner for lunch."

"It's a date," I agreed, "and tell Doris to pack that sensational red bathing suit. The Boss wants to see how she fills it out."

Well, we barely made it. We picked up the Olds light green convertible just as it turned onto Sepulveda a couple miles behind—that Marty certainly wheels a car—until we got trapped by a big diesel truck. By the time we shook ourselves loose, there was no Olds in sight, so we hit out for Blackwell's Corner. When we pulled up, there was nothing but a gas station and a lunch counter. Some joker, that Marty. Anyway, we stopped for a beer and a hardboiled egg, and by the time we reached Del Monte Lodge, the Melchers had checked in and retired.

Next morning we went into the dining room ten minutes after it opened. Being a little put out, we pulled up chairs alongside Doris and Marty without a word. Doris looked up from behind a yard of breakfast menu and said to the waitress, "I'll have ham and wheatcakes—and could you put a couple of big-eyed fried eggs on top of the cakes?"

Marty gave us an accusing look. "Where were you guys? We were going to meet at Blackwell's Corner."

"A likely story," I snapped. "We followed your road-racing Olds until we lost you. I got a life-size picture of our movie star, here, stopping at that lunch counter."

"Is that so?" (Continued on next page)

Doris countered. "For one thing, we didn't take the Olds. I talked Marty into using the Cadillac. For another, I can prove we stopped at the Corner."

"Yeah?"

"Yeah—right above the counter there's a sign reading, 'If you prefer to put ashes and cigarette stubs in your cup, please tell the waitress—she'll serve your coffee in an ash tray.' Now, did we stop, or not?"

"You stopped," I agreed. I watched Doris polish off the wheatcakes and order a glass of milk. She had on a white sweater filled in the right places. She was also wearing a scrubbed and slightly sexy look, which is pretty good for anyone to achieve at seven-thirty in the morning. I was beginning to like the assignment.

So I said to Doris, "First off, how about climbing into the red bathing suit?"

She looked out through the huge plate glass window, across the 18th green, out over the blue Pacific. "Don't be ridiculous," she said, "the sun's not out. I'm not freezing to death for anybody."

"Okay," I suggested, "let's get out on the golf course for a few shots."

Marty put in his two-bits' worth. "Nix," he said. "Doris doesn't play golf, and she won't pose for any phony pictures about a sport she doesn't go in for."

There you get an idea how difficult it is to deal with some movie stars. "Okay, Doris," I countered, "Pebble Beach is the golfers' paradise, but you don't play golf. You tell us what you will do."

"That's a deal," she retorted. "Let's go."

We did, and I learned a lot of things in the next few hours—about this country we live in, and more particularly about Doris Day and her husband.

For one thing, Doris told me, "You know, we've had the time of our lives in the last few weeks. We've traveled 4,300 miles. I've met a lot of wonderful people and the best thing is I've learned to know my husband."

"Oh, I dunno—you've been married quite awhile and you seem reasonably well acquainted."

"I don't mean that," Doris said as we walked through the grounds of the Lodge toward the swank Del Monte shops. "I never quite got Marty's tastes—you know, always in the dark, quiet business suit. After all, we live in California, where you owe it to your surroundings to go a little overboard with the color and the cut. "SHE OUGHTA BE IN PICTURES!"

■ Things were going very well at the first press screening of an MGM picture called The Bad And The Beautiful. If you saw the movie, you'll remember it was all about Hollywood—and how a producer made the town click according to formula. All the familiar elements were there, all the familiar success stories. The rise of a writer, a director and a star. It ran like a collection of Cinderella stories.

In the back of the projection room on the Metro lot, the publicity man assigned to the screening leaned against the wall and felt good about the whole thing. He knew what was in the picture—and he knew how it was going to be received.

Then something went wrong. Not exactly wrong, maybe, but different from how it was supposed to go. A tall, dark-haired girl appeared on the screen and the audience began to get restless. Some of the reviewers took their programs out of their pockets and held them up to the light, to see who this girl was. Her name was Elaine Stewart.

The next morning the press agent was in the producer's office.

"It was the doggondest thing," he said. "The minute this kid showed up on the screen everyone sat up and took notice. There was a whispering murmur and a shuffling of programs you'd have to hear to believe."

"Hmmmmm," said the producer.

Now "Hmmmmm," in Hollywood can mean many things. But one thing it does mean is action. Good or bad action, maybe, but action. In this case it was good, because as soon as the producer was alone, he picked up his inter-com phone and called a meeting of his staff.

As soon as they had gathered in his office, he said, "We have a great report on this new girl, Elaine Stewart—and I have a hunch we have a winner. Let's get moving with her. The coaching, the dancing, the works. And let's put her into something quick. I want more reaction, fast."

That was several months ago, quite a few months ago. Today, the success of Elaine Stewart as a movie star is assured. Her name is up in lights on her own. The press and magazines have adopted her. She's at the point in the story where the glass slipper has been tried on and fits. It all began in a dark projection room, where the rustle of programs indicated interest. (Continued on page 76)

■ When we'll start riding space ships through the solar system, and the scientists get around to outfitting them with the inevitable jukebox, the first nickel in the slot will probably get you Gordon MacRae's voice. It will ring out confidently amid the cosmic rays and darting meteors just as if it belonged there. And as far as Gordon is concerned it does. They'll need song up there won't they? How are the acoustics around Mars and Jupiter?

It isn't that he considers himself the biggest name in popular music; others are heard more frequently perhaps. But that is only because they have sought to secure their positions in the one field. Not Gordon. Against a background of success as a movie, radio and recording artist, he spends little time contemplating where he is compared to the thought he gives about where he is going; in addition to the three pursuits already listed there is TV for him surely, concerts and multi-thousand-a-week night club engagements undoubtedly, opera very likely, and after that—well, that's where the space ships will fit in nicely.

That's why nobody worried about Gordon's plans when Warner Brothers decided to shut down for a few months pending a study and preparation period for 3D production. With other stars wondering about their next step Gordon was up to his baritone tonsils in projects that range from opening a Lake Tahoe night club with Peter Lind Hayes to studying opera at Milan, and from offering to sing at Ann Blyth's wedding to starting off on a nightclub tour.

Warm love scenes with Bob Wagner on sunny Floridian sands sent "engagement" rumors flying back to Hollywood.

IS TERRY MOORE HEADING FOR TROUBLE?

TERRY'S A PRESS AGENT'S DREAM THESE DAYS WITH HER CURVES AND HER FAMOUS BEAUX. BUT . . . IS SHE LIVING HER PUBLICITY UP JUST A BIT TOO MUCH?

■ From Florida, where the moon hangs low over the palm trees, and a press agent's thoughts turn, naturally, to love, came the news: "Terry Moore is going to marry Bob Wagner."

That news, flashed to Hollywood, hit the town like a bombshell. That town had learned to expect amazing things from Terry, but this was something! She had been out on only a couple of dates with Bob before they left for location in Florida. And now she was going to marry the boy?

It turned out the story was a phony. It was as much a bombshell to Terry and Bob as to Hollywood. Here's how it happened:

The press agent for the 12-Mile Reef company in Florida was looking around for ways to publicize the picture. It happened that Terry's divorce from Glenn Davis was to be final the next day. So he wired the three press services to that effect. Like a good press agent, he added that Terry was being linked romantically with Robert Wagner, her co-star in 12-Mile Reef.

Two of the press services sent the news out as it had been reported to them. The other burst out with: "Friends of Terry Moore and Robert Wagner said the pair will be married next week."

Nobody was able to find out how the erroneous story started. One clue was a line in the script. Bob had a line in which he said to Terry's parents, "We're married." Perhaps someone overheard it and misunderstood.

Or it might have been caused by Bob's jauntily routine with gals he knows. He'll say to them, "Hi, doll, why don't we get married?"

Whatever the cause, pandemonium broke loose. The story hit front pages everywhere. Bob's sister called him tearfully and said, "You might have waited until the folks got back from Hawaii." Terry's lawyer long-distanced: "For heaven's sake, don't get married until I send you the divorce papers to sign. It won't be legal!"

Terry and Bob spent most of their time telling people that they weren't getting married. They were, (Continued on page 69)

■ When I was 14 in Brooklyn, our grade school Alumni Association held a benefit auction. As president of the Association it was up to me to maintain order. Shortly after the auction began a half dozen tough kids of the neighborhood walked in and began heckling the proceedings. They paid no attention to me when I called to them to stop. My duty was clear. I walked down among them to enforce my orders. They showed no respect for the president at all. They gathered in a half circle and let me have it... good.

Although I was big for my age and weighed more than any of them, I did a poor job of defending myself. I didn't know the first thing about fighting. They didn't need six to lick me—any one of those kids could have done the job alone. While they clouted away and I kept ducking away from one blow right into another I kept telling myself bitterly, "This will be a lesson to me." It was.

The lesson wasn't just about the advisability of taking up boxing. The lesson also dealt with the fact that you can't play life too safe. That's exactly what I had done up to that time. My mother had always been over-protective about me and I had fallen into a pattern... almost unconsciously. I had never climbed a tree because I might fall, I had never been on a pair of roller skates because I might break a leg, I had never tangled with any kids because I might get hurt. Well, I was getting hurt in that auction, but the blows those guys were landing were doing more than just (Continued on page 78)

■ While escorting her sons to a studio party not long ago, Esther Williams was approached by a writer of movie scripts. "I want to write a picture for you that will make you happy," he said. "Let's get you out of a bathing suit for a change and give you a really dramatic part. Something that will make them sit up and take notice."

He followed with a tirade against her past pictures, referring frequently to the lukewarm reviews. Esther heard him out, smiling, and when he was finished she said, "But you don't understand. I like the kind of pictures I've been doing. Perhaps I want them better, but I want to continue with the same type of thing, including the water."

All of which goes to show that Esther Williams understands her own career a lot better than most people think. When, ten years ago, she first splashed onto the nation's screens, she became an overnight star. She has remained top box-office ever since, despite the fact her pictures have been ignored by award-giving organizations. With the exception of some really stunning water ballets, they have not been considered works of art. The flintier critics have reveled in bombasting her movies, and show people have latched onto the bandwagon of Esther Williams jokes. A reference to water in any sort of comedy script will inevitably draw Esther's name into the act. Tallulah Bankhead, talking about the picture Lifeboat in her first nightclub appearance, said it was during the making of that movie she first met Esther Williams. "She wasn't in the picture—she was just swimming by."

Esther has become the epitome of the mermaid and of the bathing beauty, and since the inception of her career, American households have switched from Weissmuller to Williams when referring to anything from a soggy state to a well-stacked form. She herself joins in the banter, and recently remarked that for her, life was one damp thing after another.

Some of the merriment has been barbed, such as the comment of the late Fanny Brice, "Wet she's a star—dry she ain't." This sums up the attitude of the critics, who lambast her "dry scenes" and who feel that Esther's continued submergings for the screen are eventually going to erode her entire career. They are growing tired, they say, of seeing Miss Williams inevitably dunked in a pool, as was Paulette Goddard in a bathtub.

The point is that Esther's fans are not tired of watching her swim, and according to reaction gathered from all over the country, would scream for a refund of their money if they saw their favorite in a film that did not include a tub, pond, lake, river or ocean. It has been established that movie goers expect Fred Astaire to dance in a movie; Bing Crosby to sing; Roy Rogers to ride; and Esther Williams to swim. It is a point that critics overlook.

To make her fans happy she must swim, and to make them happy, she must also be Esther Williams and nobody else. This is a fact which reviewers might well think over, in the event they wonder why, with mediocre films, Esther stays in the top ten on many polls. There are actors who are such fine thespians they can submerge their own personalities in each role they undertake, and while these people are highly regarded, they seldom attain the rush of popularity held by those who, regardless of their role, are always themselves on the screen. John Wayne is an example, Bette Davis another, Bing Crosby yet another. They (Continued on next page) may play Tom or Dick or Harriet, but they are themselves, and they are so strongly niched as personalities that you know before you see the picture what kind of a movie it will be. Esther, too, falls into this category.

Why does she consistently hold her position in the top ten? By academic standards she is not beautiful, yet hers is a pleasing face, with smiling hazel eyes and a wide, generous mouth. Her five feet and eight inches towers above the average girl, yet she moves with such easy grace that attention is called only to the fact that she possesses a strikingly lovely figure. Her personality has neither the atomic quality of a Hutton nor the dignity of a Garson; instead it projects a warm, rather simple sincerity. It is this personality that the fans like. They think of her as glamorous, because she is a movie star, but they also feel she would be easy to know and fun to know. They have come to know her as a person through the medium of movies, and they are perfectly content with the kind of movies that star Esther.

So is Esther. But she wasn't always. Five years ago she approached MGM executives in determination to end her movie career. "I want to have children. I want to stay home," she told them. "I'd rather have babies than put myself through this torture."

It was a decision made because of many things. First, she wanted children and the chance to be at home with them and with Ben. Possibly she would have foregone this point had she felt she was making any kind of contribution to films, but she was certain she was not. She found the career of a movie star, especially one which included months of rigorous rehearsals for her swimming numbers, an exhausting procedure without any foreseeable reward. Reviewers were panning her pictures, with the exception of throwing an occasional bone in the form of, "Naturally, the numbers are beautiful." How, said Esther, could they assume that hanging from helicopters and whipping down greased slides was "naturally" beautiful? These things had cost her long hours of back-breaking labor, yet critics tossed them off as a "natural" thing. She was tired, she said, and she wanted to go home and stay home.

MGM brass hats then ladled out to her the tonic that they keep in preparation for their disillusioned stars, and while it may be a much-used concoction, it is one that contains considerable truth. They pulled some statistics out of a desk drawer and pointed out to Esther that she had hit the top ten. This meant, they told her, that she had at last arrived, after an investment of a great deal of energy both on their part and on her own. She was now a commodity, and no longer belonged to herself. "People like your pictures," they said. "You have something to offer."

That was the clincher. Esther had been convinced she had nothing, and suddenly the whole outlook was changed. As one director kidded her, "You're just as good as most actresses in the business. If you weren't, you couldn't say those lines they give you."

FROM that point on, Esther settled down and decided to do the best possible. If she could improve the numbers or the scripts or her performances, so much the better. She had been thinking of her career as a brief and fluffy thing about which she would one day tell her grandchildren. Now she felt stimulated and enjoyed the work once more. "It was like a marriage," she says now. "All the mysticism and initial excitement had gone out of it and I settled down to do an exacting and enjoyable job."

She went on personal appearance tours, and attended script meetings, insisting on pictures that made people happy. She made contributions and objections, such as the time she balked at portraying a Tahitian girl in Pagan Love Song. She felt the studio had spent so much money in exploiting her as the All-American girl that to play a Tahitian, in her opinion, would be bad casting.

Since the time of the switch in her attitude Esther and MGM have enjoyed a pleasant, down-to-earth relationship, and if she was asked to do a picture she didn't like, she tried to find a better working arrangement for it, always with an eye to the box-office. It has resulted in her being one of the studio's most valued stars, because she works always with them. When people have tried to console her after reading a brickbat review, she says, "I'm not nervous about what the critics say, so don't you be nervous about it. If something inside me demanded dramatic roles I'd have fought for them. As it is, I only want to improve myself with each picture, and each picture along with me, so that people don't grow tired of me. People in town may think I'm frustrated because I haven't an Oscar, or lazy because I continue to make my own type of picture. I'm not lazy—I've never worked harder than I have in the last few years, concentrating to make everything right."

Esther makes an average of two-and-a-half pictures a year. Each requires two months of rehearsals, three months to shoot, and a month of publicity and retakes and dubbing. This results in the work overlapping, so that she has had free time only when pregnant. She is now expecting a third baby, and is luxuriating in the days spent at home with her two sons. "I'm like a hatband that's been stretched for years and then suddenly comes back to normal—and the tension is all gone."

A question that Esther doesn't answer, possibly because she doesn't know the answer, is why, if she is so enchanted with days at home, doesn't she give up her movie career entirely? The answer probably lies in her nature, which is one of extreme vitality. In school she was a straight-A student, Vice-President of the student body, head of the Athletic Association, she wrote plays for the football rallies and was in the middle of every club on the campus. It was as if she had tumbled onto a conveyor belt and couldn't get off, and it is fairly certain that whatever she tackled in the way of a career, Esther would have been on top. She possesses a drive that will never allow her to sit at home in the midst of her brood and grow sleepy and plump in a sedentary life.

Despite her current concentration with her career, there are many facets of it she dislikes. There are few women who, in the first months of pregnancy, would have the will to forget nausea in order to water ski for the cameras. And there are few women who wouldn't blush at the scrutiny given their figure because their career was built on its existence, or grow tired of the never-ending insistence that they look pretty every minute of every day, without let-up. Esther does these things because they are a necessary part of her career. By now she forces a smile when strangers ask her when she learned to swim. It is the question most asked, and has been asked well over 2,000 times. Publicity, says Esther, makes it difficult to hold on to things that matter. "Kim says something funny and bright, and Ben and I laugh about it, and before the week is up I give the anecdote to a writer who is struggling to gather his 11th story about me. Then I see it in print, and somehow the charm is all gone. It doesn't belong to me any more. It's the same way with pictures. Ben and I are asked to sit in front of the fire and look dreamy-eyed for a photographer, and we do. And then the next night, when we do the same thing only for ourselves, something is gone, from it, something we should have."

HER marriage to Ben, as any marriage in Hollywood, undergoes stress and strain far beyond that endured by the average couple. Fortunately, Ben has never been irritated by the superficial attitude of people that Esther is "the star" of the family. He has his fingers in several business ventures of his own, and in addition to them has the foresight and ability to advise Esther on the management of her own career. This in itself is a big business operation and Esther, who was never accustomed to handling a lot of money, is grateful that Ben is enough of a financier to see that her money is wisely invested.

From time to time they have suffered the usual Hollywood reports that their marriage is on the rocks, and through Ben, Esther has learned to ignore them. It used to be that he would come home from work and find her rattling a newspaper in anger. "Listen to this," she would storm, and begin reading him an item to the effect that the Gages were all through.

"What's for dinner?" Ben would say.

"How can you ask such a question? Don't you care what people are saying about us?"

"Look. These columnists have to make a living," he'd say. "Why don't you get off their backs?"

Esther realized this was the only attitude to adopt toward false rumors, yet every time they pop up, they begin weaving a web around the lives of the two people concerned. The last batch of rumors spread over town so rapidly that in one day the movie colony had been advised via its inimitable grapevine. That night Ben and Esther were due at a social wingding to which "everybody" had been invited. When they walked into the room they could feel the tension about them, a mass of minds seemingly working in the negative. It was almost as if those assembled expected some sort of a show and would be disappointed if they didn't get it. Wherever Esther goes she is photographed, but that night they were faced by a perpetual barrage of flashbulbs. "They all think," Esther whispered to Ben as they danced around the floor in flashes of blinding light, "That they're getting what will be captioned 'the last picture of Ben and Esther together." It is a happy fact that the strange rhythm of Hollywood does not irk Ben. "If it did," Esther says, "I'd go out of my head." He is the one who keeps her from worrying, but of course it's impossible to protect her from it entirely. She has said that with the new lease on her career five years ago she went at it with new vim and vigor. This is true, because it has been proven to her that she had a talent to offer, that fans liked her movies. But she still worried about her acting.

"I THOUGHT I was a rotten actress and that they could bury me any time they wanted to. Then two years ago I made Texas Carnival and Chuck Walters, the director, sat me down and talked to me like a Dutch uncle. He reminded me that every time anybody mentioned having seen one of my pictures I'd either change the subject or try to say the unkind thing for them. 'Just because you think you're not an actress, you're trying to prove it,' he told me. 'Take the chip off your shoulder and stop undermining yourself.'"

"He told me to start thinking about ways to take what I was and make myself better. I took his advice on that picture and then in Skirts Ahoy, for the first time, I could believe what I was doing. I'd been looking down on my scripts, and now I began to work with the writers, and from that time on I could feel my performances getting better. By the time I made Easy To Love—that was the first time I went every night to see the daily rushes after work—it's sort of like a classroom, you learn so much—I realized that the picture was too easy for me. Chuck said to me, 'Do you realize how far you've come from Texas Carnival?'"

It was this encouragement, a fairly recent development, that has given Esther a real go signal on her career. She is anxious now to improve each picture and to improve with each picture, and feels that her own maturity has outgrown the old style Esther Williams vehicle. She wants them to have more meaning and more solid feeling and less fluff, but she is wise enough to know that they must be in the same mold to keep her following. The same thing, only better each time. The next one will be Athena, and if Esther does what she hopes to do in this movie, audiences will begin to believe that Miss Williams can act as well dry as she can wet.

There is a definite reason behind all this new determination. Esther has seven more years to go on her current contract with MGM, and has had a clause written in that during the last five years she will be allowed 18 months off. This will be broken into three periods of six months each, and during each half-year she will star in her own aquacade. Ben is working toward this by getting his various business enterprises squared away so they will operate smoothly in his absence.

"I'll make pictures solidly for the next two years," says Esther, "and then we'll buy a big trailer or an old railway car and pack up the kids and the show, and go wherever people want to see us—France, England, Africa, it doesn't matter. In the meantime, I have to keep my name perking so that people will want to see the show. And then, for all the work and the worry, we'll have our own set-up."

As we said before, Esther Williams understands her own career quite well, and has no intention of winding up, as so many screen luminaries do, without a peso in her pocket. Years ago Joe Pasternak gave her a bit of advice. "If you want to be considered a great actress and win an Oscar," he said, "we can fix it up for you. You can be a floozy without makeup and we'll put you in a black satin gown and lean you against a lamp post. Maybe you can even be a little high. You'll go over great. The only trouble is, you'll be through in pictures."

Obviously, Esther hasn't forgotten a word he said. END

"Like, for instance...?" "Well, like any man's reluctance to discard his early environment—the things that built his character. Most people hate change, and so did Marty. Now he's beginning to like sports clothes, but he tempts my feminine tastes with just the right amount of conservatism. All of us live under certain restraints. When it comes to New Englanders like Marty, the proof of that is in their reluctance to go overboard in clothes—or conversation. But when it comes to other things—well, stand back and look out!"

"Meaning...?" "Meaning, in Marty's case, for instance, something like potato pancakes. You know, a lot of people grow up thinking about how great the pies were that Mama used to bake. But when they go home and get a taste of those pies, they realize that Mother wasn't a good cook at all. She was too busy to learn, raising a big family. They just thought she was a good cook, because they were hungry all the time. In the case of Marty's mother, when the family gathers at the old home, they feel so sorry for the absent members not being there to taste Minnie's potato pancakes that they send them wires of condolence."

"Outside of the potato pancakes, you like Marty's family, too?"

"Why not?" Doris Day asked. "Sure, I live in Hollywood, and I'm certain people must get a funny idea, sometimes, reading about all the so-called glamor. I am an actress, true, and proud of it, but I'm more of my home town of Cincinnati than Hollywood, and that's not trying to compare the respective merits of either place.

"I've heard it said that actors don't know that other people are alive. That isn't true. I love the movie business, and there are many wonderful people in it. Acting is not as tough, or as easy as people make it out to be, but the profession does consume a lot of your time. For instance, it's a crying shame that I had to go all this time without meeting people like Marty's brother, Harmon, and his wife. We just couldn't get away, that's all, until we visited them this year in Athens, New York. It's not a big place, but it has that wonderful home town atmosphere. You know, we drove up there, arriving in the early evening. After dinner, we went upstairs to talk. We were just sitting there when we heard voices. We looked out the window, and the big tree was loaded with children, peeking in. Outside, before the evening was over, there seemed to be hundreds of them. I went outside and made with a lot of autographs. There was no yelling and pushing and screaming. They were polite and well-behaved. They'd never seen a movie star before and simply wanted to say hello because they felt curious and friendly. I really felt humble."

All of a sudden, Doris stopped talking, like she'd felt she was saying too much, and began to shop. When Doris begins to shop her name might as well be Doris Oglethorpe of Double Dubuque, Iowa. In other words, like every other woman, she forgets where she is.

She tried on a white sports hat and bought it. She tried on a few other things and bought them. She progressed to the jewelry counter and looked at Marty with an inquiring look.

"No money," he said, solemnly.

Believe it or not, at that moment a large French poodle walked in, and gravely put his paws on the counter, gazing intently at all the baubles.

"Looka him," Doris said, "he's loaded."

We used up most of the morning trying to get our foot out of the door of those fascinating little shops—prices just as low as in Hollywood, too. Marty held back when Doris steered him into a place called Cabbages and Kings, Ltd., but a moment later he lost his head in miles of tweed yardage. He delved into the cloth like a thirsty man at cocktail time. Then he paused, and looked at Doris inquiringly.

"No money," she said, solemnly.

THEY went from there to a place called Pebble Beach Interiors, because their house is furnished in French Provincial. "We used to be Early Americans," Doris explained, "but every time we went somewhere to visit, our friends' homes were done in Early American. We felt like we'd never left home. French Provincial isn't as stuffy as it sounds. Very informal, depending on your selection." They looked at a magnificent chest of drawers—it must have been more than a hundred years old, and turned to photographer Beerman with a double inquiring look. "You're an expert at a lot of things," Doris said to Bob. "What do you think?"

"Never mind about the money," Bob replied carelessly. "It's only $750." Doris made a note of that.

At this point if my report moves a little too fast for complete details it is because Doris Day was not in a mood for stopping. She took off in a small whirlwind for the Del Monte Lodge Beach Club for her initial and somewhat furious tennis lesson from the popular professional, John Gardiner. John, ex-captain of the Penn State Teachers' College team, ex-football coach at Monterey High, found Doris a more than satisfactory pupil. "My specialty is teaching children," he said, "and Miss Day has every bit as swift a grasp of the fundamentals as a 12-year-old, which is about as high a compliment as I can pay. Not only that, but with all respect to the swell football players I've coached, if every member of my team had the coordination savvy she has we'd have won a couple of state championships."

John didn't really have to say it. Looking at Doris it was apparent that she isn't going to be a beginner very long. Marty, watching her swing at the tennis balls pitched into her, commented, "I play a little tennis myself, and I may be sorry I ever suggested this."

While Doris got busy sweeping the court off with a tennis ball clearing contraption Pro Gardiner had invented, I casually asked Marty, "What one of Doris' records have you liked the best?"

"Curious you should ask that," he replied. "My favorite is a platter that was a rare thing for Doris in that it didn't break any records selling. It was 'Something Wonderful,' from The King And I."

"Mine's 'Mr. Tap Toe.'"

"Well, everybody to his own taste," Marty replied, "but I suspect that anything I say to you is liable to find its way into print, so you might throw in a word for her album of By The Light Of The Silvery Moon—and her newest release, a real gone thing called 'The Purple Cow.' wrote it, and they won't care if you plug it."

Doris came up and broke into the conversation. "I'm going to start the yacht race. Let's get with it."

We did. There was some confusion at first. Some of the yachtsmen paid more attention to Doris than they did the starting line and had to jockey around again for position. Eighteen people and two dogs came up to say hello. Then Doris fired the starting pistol. To be frank about it, we never did find out who won. For all we know, they may be out there yet, because Doris announced that she was famished. She could use a big lunch.

"I could handle a hamburger," Marty stated.

"I was speaking of real food," Doris put in as Marty turned the Cadillac toward Carmel.

Happy to see that they didn't agree on everything, I asked, "Do you two always bicker like this?"

"We're human," Doris returned. "All humans bicker. They also sometimes have arguments. We have arguments. Marty, do you remember the time . . .?"

Comedian Sid Caesar was invited to a party where the then Gen. Dwight Eisenhower was a guest. Caesar did his impersonation of a Russian soldier, and later Eisenhower congratulated him: "How did you ever learn such perfect Russian?"

Caesar confessed: "Sir, I don't understand a word of it. It's just double talk."

Eisenhower laughed: "Well, you certainly had me fooled!"

Marty remembered, but he couldn't recall what started the small beef. The first thing they knew the trivial matter was on the verge of becoming important. So, as usually happens in any normal family, one or the other began to laugh. This time it was Marty. He said, "If we can't see it my way, I'm going to pack up and leave."

Doris retorted, "Go ahead, see if I care." But their son, 11-year-old Terry didn't see her grin. He quietly went upstairs and was back down again in a couple of minutes, carrying his Erector set case.

"If Marty goes, I go too," he declared loyally.

In the laughter that followed, Terry knew his mother and dad were kidding. When he went out to play, he left his Erector set behind. Doris looked into it and pulled out two pairs of blue jeans. She looked at Marty through a vague little mist in her eyes. He put one big arm around her. "Personally," he said, "I think the lad is getting careless. If we were really going to leave he should have at least packed his razor and a few blades."

YES, Mr. and Mrs. Melcher bicker sometimes, but they have a graceful way of giving in to each other. Take the matter of the hamburgers. Marty found us a place to get them, but there was a line of citizens waiting, and no place to sit down. Doris asked Marty if he'd ever had a Mexican hamburger. He couldn't say that he had, so we crossed the street to Carmel's favorite Mexican restaurant. Here, Marty learned that Doris' idea of a Mexican hamburger is a tacos. For the uninitiated, a tacos is a pie-shaped piece of crust with beef nestled in a nest of shredded lettuce and red hot sauce poured in the open end. If you've never had one the reaction can be like swallowing the hot end of a cigar. Marty complained somewhat bitterly. Then he ordered two more and downed them with relish.

"Just like a man," Doris observed.

"Afraid to try anything new, and then he goes overboard. Tonight he'll accuse me of promoting him a tummy ache, and tomorrow he'll want to come back to the same place."

As we left the Mexican restaurant, the sun burst out through the dissipating fog. Marty suggested we take a tour of the fabulous 17-Mile Drive along the coast. "All right, you tourists," Doris announced, "here's something we've never seen before." Marty stopped the car near a sign which indicated that a ship called the John B. Stetson had been wrecked there, running aground on the rocks on the wild night of September 4, 1934. Doris clambered on a huge rock, struck an oratorical pose. "Here," she declared, "is the finest meeting place of land and water in existence."

"Hey, Doris," I suggested, "you ought to be a writer."

"Not me. It was Robert Louis Stevenson who said that. I've been reading the brochure." She pointed toward a monstrous rock jutting into the ocean. "That," she said, "is Point Joe, where some of the most disastrous shipwrecks in the world have taken place. What happens is that ship captains on stormy nights mistake it for the entrance to Monterey. A lot of good men have gone to their deaths here."

Our next stop was at a small point looking toward Seal and Bird Rocks a half-mile out into the ocean. Doris borrowed a couple of dimes from Marty, and they looked through the powerful glasses.

"Well, what do you know!" Marty exclaimed, gazing at a couple of pompous, heavily moustached seals swaggering across the rocks. "Now I know where some Hollywood executives take their vacations!"

"Look, Marty," Doris interrupted, "there's us!"

Marty swung his glass around to a close-up of Mr. and Mrs. Seal lazily and affectionately nuzzling each other. Suddenly Mrs. Seal rar'd back and took a healthy, ferocious nip at her spouse. "Uh-uh," Marty laughed, "that's us all right."

Before Mrs. M. could answer the sun ducked under a cloud. Then the fog rolled in. Doris was both sleepy and hungry at the same time, so we all went back to the Del Monte Lodge. I knew how you felt about getting that picture of Doris in the red bathing suit, but we still had tomorrow. Besides, after dinner that night, we picked up some pictures of Doris and Marty dancing together. Marty said that it had been almost two years since any photographer caught them dancing. Beerman promptly asked for a shot of them dancing and kissing at the same time. "No chance," Marty retorted. "We'll leave that for the young couples who are happy today and divorced tomorrow."

You got to respect an honest attitude like that. So, with the sound of the roaring surf in our ears and the moon rising over a young couple spooning under the Monterey cypress trees we took leave of the merry Melchers until the next day, which happened to be—

"SUNDAY? Work on Sunday?" At breakfast, Doris wasn't so sure.

"Now, about that red bathing suit," Bob Beerman began.

"That's definitely out on Sunday," Doris jibed, "but I'm all for some more sightseeing. I want to see that old theater in Monterey and go to Fisherman's Wharf—and you can tag along for pictures, if you can get all you want before it's time for Marty and me to go to church."

Our first stop was the little theater, perched on a Monterey hillside. Doris read the inscription on the door with as much feeling as she put into her lines in her new Warner picture, Calamity Jane.

"Many a miner passed through this door,
Who swore he'd never come in any more.
'Twas here they eased him of nuggets of gold,
For this was the place the booze was sold.
One drink was enough to make him want more;
And pretty damsoon he was flat on the floor.
On sobering up he would always swear off,
Then come back the next day for a drink for his cough."

Inside the theater the charming custodian, a Mrs. Stewart, served as our guide. She took Doris up on the tiny stage which is almost exactly like it was when an adventuresome ex-sailor named Jack Swan built it better than 100 years ago. Plays are still given here three times a week. "Gee," Doris said, "I'd like to give a performance here, sometime!"

"Why not now?" we encouraged.

So Doris sang some old songs and the long empty benches seemed to be suddenly filled with the ghosts of early Californians who had cheered their favorites in this tiny little place. Marty, who had been in one of the side rooms, rummaging around in the ancient wardrobes, came out from the wings, first in a policeman's helmet, then in a stovepipe hat. "I always knew the ham would come out in me some day," he said.

It's a little difficult to put it clearly, but these two people have a great reverence for the historic old places they've visited all over the country on their sentimental journey even though they clown a little.

Afterwards we roamed through the streets of Old Monterey, stopping by General José Castro's headquarters, the House of the Four Winds, so named for its weather vane, and other storied buildings. Then we headed for the pier where Marty disappeared to prow around the salmon boats and ask the old salts how fishing was. Doris poked into the dozens of little curio shops and cafes, autographed pictures for soldiers. We lost her in the crowd. Ten minutes later, we found her, leaning over the rail of a pier extension, gazing at a sea lion circling around in the back of the restaurants waiting for a handout. She seemed lost in her own thoughts.

"Sea lions lead a very happy life, I am convinced," she said.

"I know," I replied, "you're hungry again."

"However in the world did you know?"

So we rounded up Marty, located a spot for a steak sandwich, and the last we saw of Doris and her spouse, they were headed for church services in Carmel. (Doris is a Christian Scientist.)

Next morning, Doris and Marty planned to be up at six-thirty to leave for the last leg of their vacation in San Francisco. Photographer Beerman and I were up earlier, packed and ready for the return trip to Hollywood.

"Come on, Bob," I urged, "we got to get back early—"

"Wait a minute," Bob said. He went over to a house phone in the lobby of the Lodge. I heard him ask for Doris. There was a silence, and then he hung up.

"What was that for?" I asked.

"Oh," Bob replied, "I just thought I'd take one more try at getting Doris to pose for me in that red bathing suit."

"What happened?"

"Well, I got Marty on the phone—and he said Doris would be simply delighted to climb into a red bathing suit at six-thirty in the morning. The only trouble was that she was sitting in a red bathtub and said for me to go take a running jump in the Pacific!"

(Continued from page 50) The excitement and activity of the MODERN SCREEN Hollywood fall fashion luncheon party began the minute the stars stepped from their limousines onto the vast Putnam estate. Anne Francis (Mrs. Bam Price), Barbara Rush (Mrs. Jeff Hunter) holding the arms of their handsome husbands, Greer Garson, Louis Calhern, Shelley Winters, Jean Hagen were the first to arrive. The members of the M. S. Fashion Board were seated close to the ramp where the models paraded the fashions. Shortly after luncheon was served by the Brown Derby waiters, the music played the introduction to the event and the show was underway. The merchandise shown included—suits, junior dresses, coats, sportswear, casual shoes, hosiery and jewelry—flown to Hollywood from all over the country. The smartly styled junior dresses—a size, not an age, were shown in groups and the garments from the groups were viewed, approved and voted. Dresses in the new miracle fibers woven to give the smart jersey-look, as well as ever-popular 100% wool jersey, won the unanimous vote of the Board. Wool suits, separates, coats and skirts in classic styles also won top honors. Sweaters in wool and new washable Orlon came through with flying colors, too. Casual shoes, flattering to the legs and smart with classic togs, were shown and approved. The nylon hosiery shown was a display within itself. The stars gave the hosiery the acid test—for construction, sheer beauty and for new fall costume colors. Seamfree hosiery was a favorite style for sports clothes; full-fashioned, of course, won the vote for daytime town clothes; and sandal foot, full-fashioned or seamfree, for evening costumes.

The gals—Jeanne Crain, Mona Freeman and Barbara Ruick—were the fashion experts on the Board and gave the boys—Barry Sullivan, Jeff Hunter, Bob Horton and Keenan Wynn—helpful hints, and the woman's viewpoint! But to the gals' surprise the boys were wonderful judges because when the votes were compared and counted the boys had selected the same fashions and accessories as the gals. The guest stars on the sidelines were very helpful as they applauded and voiced Oohs and Ahs while the fashions were shown. After the fashions and accessories had been selected, some of the stars posed in the winning fashions for the M. S. fashion pages. Then the stars on the Board as well as the guests drew numbers for the door prizes. American Beauty compacts, Crosley radios, Paper-Mate pens, Sherwood lighters, Coty's famous "Emeraude" Toilet Water, Waltham watches, boxes of hosiery and, last but not least, Samsonite luggage were among the coveted gifts. Mona Freeman was delighted to win a two-piece set of Samsonite luggage, and thought it a wonderful start toward a complete set—adding a piece in the same pattern and color at any time (page Santa, please).

A spectacular swimming exhibit was given by guest, June Taylor, American Amateur champion of Solo Synchronized Swimming for 1951-53. June's dramatic swimming performances with music in her red devil's costume and, in her sequin, pearl and rhinestone one took the star's breath away—surely a glamor finale!

he never said "can't"

(Continued from page 46) compression egos it is just getting around to realize what makes Gordon zing as well as sing. Everyone who knows him has a different way of putting it, but what they put ends up the same picture—that of a fellow who is so sure of himself that his dreams have trouble catching up with the actual facts of his accomplishments.

Take Bing Crosby. The first time he was out with Gordon he gave forth with an impressed, "H'm!"—and Gordon wasn't even singing at the time, just playing golf. Invited out a few years ago to the links by Bing, who wanted a look-see at the new rival he had been hearing so much about, Gordon was both pleased and thrilled with the meeting. But he wasn't abashed any. He got himself a birdie on the first hole, a par on the second and a hole-in-one on the third. That's when Bing delivered his opinion. "Nothing around here is going to stop this boy," he said, and repeated it to his friends in a number of variations.

"In the first place," as Gordon says, "I'm not shy by any means. My father taught me to make friends—it's an old family tradition. So why hang back with anyone you meet, no matter who they are? And in the second place I've known for a long time what I wanted to be; wouldn't I be a fake walking around, looking and talking humble, as if I actually felt I didn't deserve it all? There is something unhealthy in that kind of self-deprecation."

THEN there is the observation of a studio talent head, made just the other day. "The way Gordon handles his life and ambitions reminds me of an applesauce peddler selling his fruit at a dead run," he said. "He bangs and bounces the cart along so that half the time his apples are in mid-air. He makes sudden stops, swerves and twists in sudden changes of direction, but never does the cart tip over and never do you feel he doesn't know where he is going. And . . . he sells a lot of apples that way."

"Well, where is he going?" the studio executive was asked.

"Up!" came the succinct reply. "He's so sure of that that he expects even bad breaks to turn out well—and I'm a son-of-a-gun but they always do."

The studio man could have been thinking of a little mix-up Gordon went through recently involving his radio program, The Railroad Hour, on which he has starred for the last five years. His sponsors decided they would like to duplicate the program over television and set about making a film of the show. Naturally they wanted Gordon as their star but his movie contract with Warner Brothers forbade him any participation in TV presentations.

"Well, how would you feel if we used another singer?" the sponsor's representative asked.

"Go ahead," replied Gordon, and he okayed the project without reservation.

No sooner had word of this spread than his friends came around with shocked expressions. "It's a dirty shame that you can't star on the TV version of your show," they commiserated. "Especially since you were the original star!"

"Don't worry," Gordon replied to all of them. "It will work out."

It did. The films were made. The sponsors studied them and at the same time studied some surveys assaying the probable cost of TV presentation against possible benefits. The recommendation of the survey experts was unanimous on the point that best results would not be obtainable for a period of two years yet.

The railroad people decided to follow this recommendation and hold-off from TV for that period.

"Two years," commented Gordon's wife, Sheila. "Why that's exactly when your contract with Warner Brothers ends. You'll be able to accept then."

"That's right," said Gordon—and didn't even look surprised. If a fellow is going places things have to straighten themselves out some way, don't they?

As a matter of fact Gordon won't have to wait that two years to go on TV shows. Just the other day his studio announced a sudden reversal of policy; certain of its stars would be permitted to make video appearances. Gordon, of course, is one of these.

"What is it with you, luck or what?" he was asked when this became known.

"What's the difference?" asked Gordon. "Look, I'd be just as satisfied if I didn't get into TV for two years, or for ten more years as far as that matters. There will be TV in 1963 as there is '53. I've got lots to do. There's a whole world of opera I'd like to explore. I'm a half-baked artist—I know a little, but I want to get done on both sides and know a lot more."

"If you start studying opera you may get out of the public eye," he was told. "Would that be wise?"

"It's always wise for a singer to round out his talent," came Gordon's reply. "Dorothy Kirsten, Nadine Connor, Rise Stevens guest-shot on my program and we sang numbers from the light and popular repertoire. Now I'd like to reverse the process, add another dimension to myself and sing in their field. I'd be a 3D performer then."

A gal reader who wanted a date with Robert Taylor explained: "Not for the usual reason but because I'm writing a book." She P.S.ed: "The book I'm writing is my diary."

Earl Wilson
N. Y. Post

There was the problem of his recording affiliation. For some years he had sung for the Capitol Record label without achieving a real hit number. "Move to another outfit," he was advised steadily. Then his contract with Capitol ran out. Now he was in a position to change and his friends fully expected him to. To their surprise Gordon signed right back with Capitol again.

"What's the idea?" they asked.

"Oh, I don't see why I should walk out on them," he replied. "I've been with Capitol for five years and I think that rates a little loyalty between people, don't you?"

No, they didn't. They told him he was crazy. Whereupon he made a record for Capitol entitled "Congratulations To Someone," backed up on the other side of the platter by a song called, "How Do You Speak To An Angel?" It caught on with record buyers and sold like 79-cent nylons in a bargain basement.

"Nothing happens in a man's life that doesn't help him . . . if he'll only look at it that way," Gordon has said. "When I came out of the service my friends felt sorry for me. They said that while I was in the Army singers like Como, Sinatra and Dick Haymes, who didn't have to serve, were establishing themselves. Now I would have to start from the bottom again. But what they overlooked was that my four years as a soldier had given me a maturity, a confidence in myself that would more than make up for the time I had lost. And it did. I not only knew what I could do but I could convince others that I could do it. For instance, I didn't have to worry about being nervous and tongue-tied when I talked to producers; talking to colonels is far more fearsome."

As for talking to colonels, Gordon did a lot of other talking in the Army; from 1942 to 1945 he was a bombardier instructor in the Air Force at Ellington Field, Texas. All through the war he had asked for overseas duty but because of his fine record was considered much more valuable teaching combat to others than engaging in it himself.

Only bombardiers were to remain at Ellington Field, Gordon was told. Gordon immediately got the idea of requesting reassignment to navigation. His fellow officers laughed at the idea and told him that gag had been tried before and never with success.

"I'll ask anyway," Gordon replied, adding, with his usual confidence, "Maybe I'll be the first one to succeed."

He was. It seems that a study of his record at air force headquarters had revealed the fact that Gordon should have been a navigator in the first place!

His friends had hardly gotten around to congratulating him on the successful culmination of this piece of strategy when they were given reason to repeat the whole performance. What Gordon really wanted now came through—his discharge.

When he arrived in Hollywood he questioned every step of the process of becoming a star, especially the one by which agents cool off ambitious clients by stating that they are not yet ready for big things. Such cold water just sizzled and turned into steam when it hit him. It still does when anyone tries to curb his ideas or questions his potentialities.

"Why if I accepted all that people tell me I'd still be singing with an orchestra and sleeping in busses when we made overnight jumps," he declares. "For that matter I probably wouldn't even be married. Sheila said yes to me when I wired a proposal from Cleveland where I was singing with Horace Heidt. She flew west from New York but when we applied for our marriage license the clerk said we must establish a ten-day residence in the city. I argued that I never stayed anywhere more than a week when on tour. A friend said, 'Look, Gordie, you can't argue with city hall.' He advised me to give up the idea of marriage until the tour was over. I argued anyway. The clerk called in her superiors for consultation. All kinds of statutes and special dispensations were looked up in a lot of big books . . . and when it was all over we got our licenses!"

Gordie raised an emphatic finger. "You see . . . you can argue with city hall," he said. "If you're going to get places in this world you have to argue with city hall, whether city hall is a producer or a band leader or a TV big shot, all during your career. Nobody hands you that extra dollar, that better job, that bigger chance. You have to hand it to yourself!"

WHEN Gordon made this last statement he was just finishing off a plate of ham and eggs for his luncheon at the Warner Brothers commissary. He looked pleased with his meal. "Very good ham and eggs," he pronounced. "Almost as good as if I cooked them myself."

"You mean you can cook, too?" someone else at the table asked.

Gordon leaned close. "Cook?" he repeated. "Listen, when I was seven years old back in Syracuse I used to get up some mornings and cook the family breakfast."

"Why?" he was asked.

Gordon waved that question aside as improper and substituted a better one. "Why not?" he came back. And that's the way he feels about anything he wants to do. Why not? END is terry moore heading for trouble?

The "engagement" fiasco apparently was no fault of Terry's. But it adds another chapter to her blossoming career in the public prints. This career has proven stimulating to her film fortunes and it may continue to do so. But it might also spell trouble for Terry.

Terry Moore shows signs of becoming a top and exciting star in the Hollywood firmament. Few young players have evoked as much attention in the film columns in the past year and a half. And few actresses can boast of an Academy nomination at the tender age of 23.

But a view of Terry's career also shows danger signals, which she might do well to study. There are indications here and there that could blow up into serious personal and career problems some day.

TERRY was the quiet, home-type of girl during her early film career. She started in Maryland when she was 11, and appeared as Ingrid Bergman as a girl in Gaslight. She was Helen Koford then.

Several years later, she landed a contract at Eagle-Lion as Jan Ford. Columbia, which had her for a previous picture, rediscovered her for the important role in The Return Of October. The studio took over her contract and again changed her name, since she was appearing opposite Glenn Ford.

She was a wholesome, ambitious girl, but thoroughly unsophisticated. When she was making Mighty Joe Young, she appeared so naive that hair-dressers had to take her aside and give her some blunt facts on how life is lived in the film business.

Terry enjoyed five profitable years at Columbia. But although she had gained good experience, she was hardly distinguishable from a dozen other young actresses. When her contract came to option time, she wasn't renewed.

"You seldom get a second contract at Columbia unless you're a Rita Hayworth," an executive explains. "Terry was earning about $1,000 a week. That meant she was too expensive for the producers of smaller pictures, and she didn't have enough draw for the bigger producers."

Being an alert kind of a girl, she started looking around. She heard about the role of the young girl in Come Back, Little Sheba. It sounded like a natural for her. Armed with the sexiest photos she could find of herself, she marched into Hal Wallis Productions and did a selling job on herself. Eighty-seven other girls were considered, including Marilyn Monroe. Terry landed the part.

She was determined to escape the "girl next door" kind of typing that had bogged down her career. She told the publicity chiefs bluntly; "Let's make this the sexiest publicity campaign on record. Let's out-Monroe Monroe."

The publicists were happy to cooperate. The basic story of Sheba concerned a middle-aged couple. That wasn't very salable from an exploitation standpoint. A livelier gimmick was needed. Terry nominated herself and was promptly elected.

Terry pitched in with amazing vigor. She told one reporter that the studio wanted her to display a quiet kind of sex in her role.

"They've done everything they can to make me look less sexy," she commented. "I started out wearing sweaters in the picture, but the director, Danny Mann, wouldn't let me wear them.

"I have to wear blouses, and my bra is even strapped down to lessen the curve. My hair style couldn't be simpler, and I'm not allowed much makeup.

"Because I play a college girl, I can't do obviously sexy things like casting sly glances or using a sultry voice. The director told me to think sexily. The only way I can get across the idea is with my eyes."

Terry, as millions of movie-goers can attest got it across!

The same kind of change—from tender rosebud to full-blown rose—carried over from Terry's professional life to Terry's personal life.

Nobody knew much about Terry's romances until Glenn Davis came along. It's possible that she didn't have any. Her dates consisted largely of childhood chums who lived near her Glendale home. School proms, ice cream sodas and that sort of thing. Her only dates with Hollywood personalities were at beach parties and other events staged strictly for movie magazine layouts.

But Davis changed all that. He may not have stayed in her life very long, but he certainly caused some changes.

As everyone knows, Davis had been thrown over by Liz Taylor and was nursing a six-foot torch. If anyone was ready for a rebound marriage, he was.

He was infatuated when he first saw Terry. She seemed to him the wholesome, outdoor type of girl with the same kind of California upbringing he had. There was none of that indoor sophistication he had grown to dislike ever since Liz gave him his gold football back.

Terry and Glenn had a couple of dates together, then she was called to Chicago for a City of Hope benefit. She asked if he could come along, and the benefit sponsors were happy to have him appear. Shortly afterward, he was slated to tour Hawaii with a basketball exhibition. He invited Terry and her mother to take the trip as his guests.

An engagement was inevitable. Anyone who has been on a boat trip knows how the heart grows fond under the moonlight on shipboard. Love, they thought, found Glenn and Terry, even though his future mother-in-law was along on the trip.

Terry fell hard. Serious relations with the opposite sex were a fairly new matter to her. She had led a sheltered girlhood and was too wrapped up in her work to have much time for boys. Now the famous all-American football star, with the body of an Adonis, was saying that he loved her. No wonder she lost her heart. What girl, Liz Taylor excluded, wouldn't?

The wedding was a highlight of the Glendale social season. The all-American boy and the beautiful movie star went off smiling in a shower of rice. The smiles didn't last long. Terry and Glenn separated two months and 25 days after the wedding.

What broke up the marriage?

Let's look at the evidence. When she applied for divorce on April 15, 1952, Terry complained that Davis kept her in "a constant state of turmoil."

"He would go around asking my friends if they thought I could really act," she told Superior Judge Louis H. Burke.

"When people complimented me and told him how well I was doing as an actress, he would say they were all a bunch of frauds and said things like that to flatter me."

She added that once he drove her to tears by driving her and some friends at the speed of 105 mph. "I cried and cried and begged him to slow down, but he just laughed and said it was all very funny," she said.

Of course, the evidence needed for a divorce under California law seldom tells the whole story of a marital breakup. Friends report that he wanted her to give up her career and live with him in Lubbock, Tex. Being a talented and ambitious actress, she would naturally revolt at this.

"Terry found out that Glenn was just like a movie star," an intimate reports. "He had been in the limelight even before she had, and he enjoyed it. There just wasn't room enough for two stars in one family."

THEN came a new kind of legend.

Hollywood buzzed with the report that a fabulous film tycoon had come between Terry and Glenn. Adding fuel to the report was the wildfire rumor that the athlete had beaten him up.

After the Davis episode in her life was finally over, Terry began to see her millionaire suitor more and more.

Once she was entertaining some family friends in her hotel suite during a personal appearance in New York. A dignified stranger appeared at the door bearing a lovely mink coat.

"Mr. So-and-So sent this," he announced. Then he tipped his hat and left.

A shocked silence followed. Terry hastily explained that the tycoon had taken her to the airport in Los Angeles. She had left her mink coat in his car, and he dispatched it across the continent by special messenger on the next plane.

"Hmm," said the old friends politely. But it was an awkward moment.

The tycoon didn't particularly approve of Terry's all-out sex campaign—though he'd never noticed her till she embarked on it. He actually put the kibosh on one press agent's stunt. Terry'd been all set to demonstrate that a girl could be dressed—more or less—in one handkerchief, if that handkerchief were artfully draped, but the tycoon said it "wasn't dignified." Regrettably, Miss Moore declined to pose.

That was about the only curb she placed on herself, however. In Europe, to make Man On A Tightrope, she explained to reporters that playing a whip-cracking circus queen had added an inch and three-quarters to her bust.

"The movement develops your pectoral muscles. It's not a wrist or arm movement, but with those pectorals—"

Home again from foreign shores, the new Terry Moore continued to operate. "I've got a terrific body, why not promote it?" she asked columnist Sheila Graham. She confided to someone else, "It's not what you've got, it's the way that you sell it." She and the tycoon seemed to be washed up by then, so Terry and Nicky Hilton began night-clubbing. One-time fans talked snidely. "She's going in for Liz Taylor's cast-offs."

She became the favorite of a half-dozen young oilmen from Texas who would fly to Hollywood in their private planes just to have a date with her. Before her Florida location, she was dating heavily with attorney Greg Bautzer, who usually squired more mature stars like Jane Wyman, Joan Crawford and Ginger Rogers. Another favorite boyfriend was Al Besalink, the playboy-golf champion.

Then came Bob Wagner. They hadn't met until they started wardrobe fittings for 12-Mile Reef. They dated for the Academy awards and the Romanoff's party afterward. They saw a lot of each other in Florida, what with water skiing, dancing and other pastimes. They liked each other's company, but marriage was the farthest thing from their minds. Bob has said repeatedly that he isn't ready for marriage.

All these affairs could react negatively on Terry's career. If she continues to play the field with such vigor, she could hit the same kind of reaction that Liz Taylor faced after her two engagements and her short marriage to Hilton.

ANOTHER danger signal for Terry Moore is the kind of publicity she has been getting since Come Back, Little Sheba. It came about as a normal reaction to her awakening to the facts of life in Hollywood.

She posed for some of the most sizzling art to come out of the studios. She pitched in enthusiastically on the sweater layout to end all sweater layouts. She posed in eight kinds of woolen garb, illustrating degrees of sexiness that can be achieved. Her mother, who makes much of her wardrobe, fashioned the sweaters for her.

She sponsored quotes of this quality: "Men always amaze me. I get to like a man and I think he's nothing but a good friend. I'd like to keep it that way, but suddenly I find out that he wants to get serious."

"That happened with a man I know, a business executive. I thought he was a very good friend and nothing else. Then I start to get all kinds of telegrams and things from him, asking for dates. He already has a wife!"

This line of publicity is splendid for attracting attention and establishing a personality. Certainly Terry has progressed farther in the past year than she did in all the rest of her Hollywood career. But no Hollywood career has been successfully sustained on sex alone. Somewhere along the line, ability and talent have to prove themselves. Although Terry nabbed an Oscar nomination, she has yet to make a real dent as an actress.

Also, there is a point when the sexy buildup can be a deterrent rather than a stimulant. Marilyn Monroe found that out. She zoomed to the top as a brilliant new name after one of the most effective publicity campaigns in Hollywood history. But then things began to get out of hand. The sexy routine was overdone, and the result was bad for her and her pictures. The climax came with the now famed attack by Joan Crawford. After that, Marilyn modified her tune.

Terry faces an added hazard. Since her ascent to fame, Marilyn's has produced little of a sensational nature; she has concentrated on a guy named Joe. But Terry has played a wide and exciting field in the romantic game. This reputation, plus her sexy publicity, could make for a bad impression on the movie fans.

TERRY Moore is a vital, interesting and likable girl. That's one of her main troubles—she wants to be liked.

"She wants to be all things to all people," said one of her closest observers. "She tries to be the Laughing Girl, The Serious Student, The Outdoor Girl, The Indoor Girl, according to the likes of the person she is with. She wants to please, but the trouble is you can't please everybody."

Terry tries to please the person she is with at the moment. But that sometimes means hurting another person who is not present. Take a recent happening.

A public relations counselor undertook to advise her on her publicity. The young fellow's arguments sounded logical, and she wanted to please him.

A few days later, the man who directed publicity for Come Back, Little Sheba received a letter from Terry. It was a sharply worded statement that indicated she was displeased with the publicity on the Sheba campaign. Hereafter, she wrote, all her publicity would have to be cleared through the young man who had counseled her.

Needless to say, the Sheba press agent blew his top. Hadn't the Sheba campaign resulted in an Academy nomination for Terry? He called her home immediately.

Her mother answered. "Terry isn't here," she said.

"Just tell her I got her letter," was the reply. "Tell her there will be no need to clear any publicity. There won't be any. I'm clearing out the files on her and destroying all the photos."

A few weeks later, Edith Head, the designer, called the Sheba publicist. "Terry Moore is here," she said. "She wants to borrow a dress from the picture to wear to a premiere. It's just a formality, but I had to get your okay."

"The answer is no." Two minutes later, Terry was in his office, sobbing that she had never seen the letter he received. But press agents, like elephants, never forget. She didn't get the dress.

On another occasion, she was on a personal appearance in San Francisco. Ardent Nicky Hilton had flown up to rendezvous with her. She pledged the publicist accompanying her to secrecy. "I don't want it out that he's up here seeing me," she said.

An hour later, the publicist overheard her on the phone. She was telling Louella Parsons all about how Hilton had come to San Francisco to see her. It was the same old story of Terry wanting to please.

You can't always do that in Hollywood. The town is full of people who live off movie stars. They will use the stars to their own advantages, and that means hurting someone else, almost inevitably.

Terry can't please everybody, and she will have to learn who are her real friends and brush off the others. There is no malice in her makeup. The petty things she might do are usually the result of someone else's connivance.

Terry has all the elements for a sturdy success in pictures. She has a pretty face, a sexy build, lots of vitality and an eagerness to learn more about acting. She has worked hard to get where she is, and she can go higher—if she will heed the danger signals.

The next day Bing lost his third round match and was put out of the tournament. "Even Lindsay could do better," he cracked. Only son Lindsay had gone over to England to watch the Coronation of Queen Elizabeth from the window of the Alan Ladd's hotel suite.

BING's announcement concerning his departure from the motion picture field doesn't mean that he's giving up show business. Entertaining is in his blood. He likes to sing. He loves to make people happy. But he no longer sees any sense in becoming a slave to time. This is why the advertising agencies and the various cigarette sponsors are finding it impossible to pin him down to accepting any of a half-dozen different television offers, and why he will not put his name to any motion picture contract which calls for him to make a certain number of films a year. "The way he feels now," a writer friend of his recently explained, "Bing wants to taper off, maybe do guest shots and his recordings and nothing else. Once he makes a definite commitment such as a radio show, then he's tied down. For example, on this recent junket to Europe, he was recording half-a-dozen radio shows.

"He's a man who has never liked to work, and he's spent the last 25 years doing exactly that. He doesn't regret any of his accomplishments. He's glad he's done all the things he's done. But if it weren't for Dixie and the boys, if it weren't for his brother Everett constantly making deals for him, Bing would have been just as happy as a part-time crooner on some two-bit radio show.

"I know this sounds kind of screwy because this guy is loaded with a hefty bank account, but he's never been ambitious. Even as a young guy he realized that money didn't necessarily mean happiness."

Strangely enough, no one in show business seems to take Bing's retirement plans seriously although the man has a long record of saying exactly what he means.

In fact, one week after the crooner said his days in films were limited and that he just wanted to relax, play golf and take it easy, a representative of the Ford Motor Company rang him up in Paris.

"Look, Mr. Crosby," he explained. "The Ford Motor Company is having a two-hour television show on two different networks. Part of our 50th anniversary celebration. We want you to appear on the program. How about it?"

"I don't mind," Bing said, "except that I'm here and you fellas are there, 3,000 miles away."

"Don't worry about that," the Ford man said. "We'll hop a plane and photograph you in Paris." Whereupon Mr. Wicliffe Crider, a vice president of Kenyon & Eckhardt, the advertising agency that controls the Ford account, caught a plane to France on a Friday.

A day later Bing, and a friend of his who plays the guitar, turned up in a local Parisian studio where the Groaner was asked what he'd like to do on the show.

"Let me see," he said. "Over the years I've sung a lot of tunes. The one that's done the most for me is White Christmas. That's the one I want to sing. Besides," he added, "with all the Paris distractions of the Louvre and other art works, who can learn new material?"

Bing also asked if Bob Hope had been signed for the Ford TV show. When told that Hope wasn't appearing, the Groaner cocked his left eyebrow in feigned surprise. "Impossible," he cracked. "Hope's on everything else. And speaking of old ski-nose, you know something? I've been eating so much pressed duck in these French gastronomic parlors that I'm starting to walk like him."

It took a little less than an hour, and the advertising man had his Crosby telefilm. He winged back to the States that same night, and 48 hours later, Bing, living it up along the Champs Elysées, was being seen and heard on more than 50,000,000 television sets throughout the U. S.

THE people who caught Crosby on that particular television program remarked that he looked very much like the gay, carefree, insouciant Groaner of old, but the truth is that ever since Dixie's death her widower has been going around with a heavy heart.

It's no secret that one of the reasons Bing and his son Lindsay went to Europe this past Spring was to get away from familiar surroundings, an environment which would arouse old memories of Dixie.

But a man can't run away from himself, and it's in Bing's heart and mind that he carries the most poignant memories of the little woman who married him in adversity, inspired him to success, and blessed him with four boys on the way up.

In Europe, for example, whenever he was interviewed, he somehow always managed to say in one way or another, "Dixie has left a very big void in our house." And then a veil of sadness would pass over his eyes, and he would take out his pipe and fill it with tobacco and say something casual like, "I've always smoked a lot, but my voice has never been bothered by the vice." And then the newsmen would ask more questions, take the interrogation away from Dixie and center it on his European trek.

"How do you like Paris, Monsieur Bing?" And Monsieur Bing would say, "I give it the regular tourist bit. I like to wander around the Bois de Boulogne and the Like most husbands, this father of four used to nod and say, "Okay, Dixie, I'll see to it that they toe the line." But the job usually reverted to Dixie and she had her hands full, because whenever she'd approach Gary and say, "How can you possibly wear a green shirt with blue trousers?" Gary would say, "That's nothing. Did you see Pop this morning?"

Dixie would explain that Bing was color blind and that the boys were never to follow their father's example in dressing, but this filial tendency of theirs was something she never succeeded in overcoming.

Before Dixie passed away, before, in fact, she submitted to the operation which revealed her incurable illness, she sensed that she might not be around very much longer, and she and Bing had a long talk on what they wanted for their sons.

DIXIE pointed out that in many ways a celebrated father is a handicap to sons. Sometimes they feel that they can't hope to equal the old man in achievement so they never try. Dixie also knew that there was a tendency for the boys to slide through on their father's reputation. She was afraid that the boys wouldn't do well in school because they had no incentive. She and Bing had set up large trust funds for each of them. Why would they study and make something of themselves? Basically it would come down to character, to breeding, to training, to the thoughts and ideals and objectives she and Bing had imbued in them.

If the boys turned out well, then she and Bing had made a success of their marriage. If the boys didn't, then she and Bing had failed. On that they agreed.

Now that Dixie has passed on, and Bing must shoulder the full load, he is determined to see that his sons develop into men of character. "They've got to have a goal in life," he says, "a philosophy. They've got to know where they're heading, and they've got to make their own way. And until each of them is 21, I'm going to keep right on their tails seeing that they stay in line."

Bing promised his Dixie that he'd look after their sons, and if that calls for abandoning his motion picture career in order to get more overseeing time—well, that's nothing.

Two decades ago, a bright young actress at the pinnacle of success abandoned her career for husband and children. Dixie Lee Crosby abandoned it permanently for what she felt was a woman's real work in life.

In Bing's mind, he's merely finishing the job they started together. He hopes to get the time to finish it well.

Champs, and every once in a while, Claude Dauphin comes along with me. He's a great guide, shows me all the sights. And a very fine actor, too."

"And can you speak French very well, Monsieur Bing?"

And Crosby would grin and explain that, "I've been to France four times and some of the phrases are very difficult, but I've managed to learn one, and I use it quite a bit. I know how to say, 'Go away, you're bothering me.'"

But eventually the talk would get down to the youngest Crosby, Lindsay, and how he liked Europe; and then everyone would quickly realize that Bing was playing both mother and father to his son and in fact, would have to look after his four offspring without the help of Dixie, who had done the lion's share of raising them.

THERE is little doubt that Bing wants to spend more time supervising the educational progress of his boys than in furthering his own career.

This is probably the motivating reason behind the projected abandonment of his motion pictures. Of late he's tried to do no more than two films a year.

While his boys were small he had so much to do, what with pictures, road trips, recordings, radio programs and all of his many business interests, that he didn't see too much of them.

Last year when Dixie was ill he supervised the boys rather closely, but not so closely that Gary, the oldest, wasn't on the verge of "busting out" at Stanford.

"I made a mistake with Gary," Bing told me a little while ago. "I gave him a car as a graduation gift when he got out of prep school. He took it up to Stanford, and I don't think he cracked a book. Dixie wrote him a strong letter—that's putting it mildly—and told him that if he failed in his studies we'd see to it that he went right into the Army. Well, he didn't fail."

Of course, Bing has always made it a point to spend at least one month every summer with his gang up at the Crosby ranch in Elko, Nevada. And he's always seen to it that his boys work diligently for their salaries. In fact he's been so intent on not spoiling them that occasionally a friend will tell him that he acts more like a Prussian drill master than a loving father.

Bing admits that friends of his offspring frequently regard him as a two-headed monster but he also recalls Dixie's recurrent criticism of his behavior as a father, "Bing, you're too easy on the boys."

It was also Dixie's contention that her husband overlooked his sons on their table manners and their general social decorum.

why doesn't he marry the girl?

(Continued from page 29) and straight to the point, and while he admits the warmth and affection he feels for Ursula, and she undoubtedly feels for him, he is nevertheless afraid to broach the subject of marriage, because in his own heart and in his own mind, he's afraid to take the fateful step. And not without good reason.

He's been burned once. In 1939, after a tempestuous and highly-publicized courtship, he married a charming, levelheaded actress, Barbara Stanwyck, who was five years older than he. Now Bob knows much about the transiency of his own affections. And he simply doesn't want another marriage that won't last.

All Hollywood, however, insists that the ceremony is as inevitable as the rising of the sun, and moreover, and this is most unusual, everyone prophesies that a Taylor-Thiess marriage would be lasting and certainly the best thing in the world for these two people. Separated, they are lonely and miserable, while together, they are vivacious and happy.

LATE in May, for example, before Knights Of The Round Table got under way, Bob flew into London for a little pre-production work. Excitement was riding the crest in England—it was just before the Coronation—and there was much to do and much to see in the old city. Only Bob was homesick for his Ursula.

Being a man of action he picked up the phone in the Savoy Hotel and called his pilot, Ralph Couser, back in California. "Things are awfully dull for me," he said. "How about you flying mother and Ursula to Beatrice?" (Beatrice is a picturesque city of 12,000 in Nebraska where Bob was raised.) Couser said, "Sure. What are you going to do?"

"I'm going to catch a plane out of here," Bob said, "and you can pick me up in Chicago."

Bob Taylor has owned a twin-engine Beechcraft for many years, one of the few luxuries he indulges in; and not long after he hung up on the transatlantic phone, his mother, his girlfriend, and his pilot were heading for Nebraska.

Bob, in turn, took off from London, landed in New York, then went on to Chicago where Ralph and Ursula picked him up, taking him eventually to Beatrice.

Bob and Ursula had only three days together in Beatrice, but you can be awfully happy in three days.

"We just drove around," Ursula says. "Bob showed me where he had lived and played as a little boy. He pointed out the Methodist Church where his parents used to sing. Just sight-seeing things like that."

Whether Bob and Ursula arrived at any agreement in Nebraska concerning their future, neither is saying—except that in all their conversations they have scrupulously avoided any discussion of marriage. It's as if the topic were tabu, as if it would destroy the climate of their relationship.

"We have both been married," Ursula says. "We know what the experience is. And we have absolutely no plans, either with each other or anyone else."

Yet when Bob kissed Ursula goodbye in Nebraska, reports spread like a prairie fire that the German-born actress would meet him in Europe later this year and perhaps even honeymoon abroad.

THERE is no doubt but that in her heart, Ursula Thiess hopes this will happen, although she is much too tactful to give voice to her hopes.

Ever since she first met Bob over a year ago—it was at a party thrown by her agent, Harry Friedman—she has refused to date any other man. She regards Taylor as the one perfect gentleman, and like most girls of Germanic background, she doesn't consider herself to be his equal.

All she wants to do is to cook for him, to clean for him, to serve him and make him happy, because her greatest joy in life is giving of herself.

If Bob Taylor asked her to give up her acting career, she would do it in a minute. She has none of the aggressive spirit, none of the overwhelming ambition, none of the force which drives Barbara Stanwyck on to endless work.

As Bob's mother, a very discerning and intelligent woman, says, "I like Ursula. She's a lady. No drinking, no carousing around. She never complains. She lives alone in that little one-room apartment on Wilshire Boulevard, and I like to see her occasionally. I'm not a match-maker, and I know absolutely nothing about how Bob and Ursula feel toward each other. I do know, however, that Bob is entitled to any happiness he can get. He has always been a good son, and he has always lived a clean and upstanding life. He's a sincere man and he always expected his marriage to be as happy as mine and his father's. As he's grown older, I'm afraid he has grown a little disillusioned. But I'm glad he has Ursula for a friend."

No matter what she may or may not say, Ursula wonders how Bob will be affected when this September he meets her children for the first time. Ursula hopes to go back to Hamburg this Fall and to collect her daughter and son, Manuela 9 and Michael 7, and to introduce them to Taylor somewhere on the continent.

Bob likes children. He always has, but whether he would marry the mother of two offspring, whether this would have any effect upon his marital outlook—these are the things no one knows.

Bob is 41, although he looks much younger, and perhaps a ready-made family would be perfect for him—many of his friends think so—but he himself doesn't know his own feelings. It is quite a responsibility to make a home for a woman and two children. Jimmy Stewart pulled it off very neatly and then added twins to the family package. But whether Bob Taylor will see his way clear to assume the same burden depends entirely on how much he wants Ursula Thiess as a wife.

Not many people know it, but Taylor has never reached the financial brackets of, say, a Clark Gable or a Spencer Tracy. He started out at Metro in 1934 for very little money and after 15 years reached a $3,500-per-week salary. When he was divorced from Stanwyck, Barbara not only got their home which she promptly re-sold for $146,000 but she also insisted upon a little clause in the financial settlement which calls for her to receive 15% of Taylor's gross earnings until her remarriage. The basic truth is that Barbara Stanwyck has earned much more money in her career than Taylor has, but Taylor has never uttered a single word about that financial settlement.

The point, however, is that financially he may not feel himself able to take on Ursula and her children. He bought his mother a lovely home many years ago. He sleeps in the servants quarters and hangs his clothes in a kitchen alcove; and he pays all the bills plus upkeep of his plane and salary for his pilot, and what with taxes, he doesn't have very much left at the end of a year.

Unlike other actors who have gone abroad for 18 months to escape Federal income levies, Bob has never even suggested that to his studio although it would have been extremely simple for him to have stayed on in Europe after he finished Quo Vadis.

Ursula Thiess, of course, earns a weekly salary from RKO although she has yet to make a film there, but it is a relatively small salary, and I'm sure she would abandon it if Taylor could ever get around to proposing marriage.

WHEN they're together in Hollywood Bob and Ursula like best to meet at her apartment where the actress prepares delicious home-cooked meals. "We like being at home, like to talk to each other. I like to cook, and somebody already told me here in America—that is the best way to a man's heart. It is nice to talk to Bob. When he is away, I am extremely lonely, unhappy. I have a few friends, but right now they are in Europe; and when people talk to me, reporters—well, I am extremely horrified. I read only recently about such terrible stories concerning me and Barbara Stanwyck and Bob. How you call it, a triangle? It was ridiculous. I have never known Bob when he was married.

"I know it is part of being an actress, this publicity, but with me it is a little different. I am the mother of children. I hope to bring them over to this country shortly, and I have a kind of responsibility as a mother. There are schools, and children can be very brutal, and one must always think of these things.

"When Bob and I are together, we talk of many things. It so happens that we are not people who go very much to night clubs or previews. We enjoy talking. We are friends. I cannot say what will come of our friendship. Reporters can make up stories. They can say things that hurt us, but they are not true."

Two years ago the girl who speaks thus could speak no English at all. At the time she was 25 and had arrived in this country, fresh from Hamburg, on the heels of a lucky break.

A photographer had shot some photos of her in Germany and had sent them in to Life. Howard Hughes had seen them and ordered RKO executives to cable an offer.

When Ursula received this first wire she was convinced it was a gag and ignored it. The second wire, however, seemed genuine, and a month after she received it, she was in Hollywood, studying English under the aegis of drama coach Florence Enright.

URSULA Thiess was born Ursula Schmitthuth in Hamburg, Germany, 27 years ago. Her father was an importer of sorts, and when the war broke out in Europe, his business went to pot. An only child, Ursula was married at 18 to film director George Thiess. They had two children.

Luckily, the family managed to survive the allied bombings and the general devastation of the conflict. The Thiess marriage was not that lucky. It was dissolved in 1947 with Ursula and the two children going home to live with her mother.

Faced with the necessity of earning a living, the tall, beautiful German girl became a photographer's model earning very little money, just managing to keep body and soul together.

Then came the lucky break of the Life photographs and the RKO contract. In four months, a ridiculously short time, Ursula learned English and learned it so well that she was ready to accept major speaking parts.

Florence Enright says, "I've had bright pupils before, but Ursula was one of the best. She showed great industry. She worked hard."

A few days after Ursula was pronounced "ready to work," an independent production outfit called The Film Group checked in at RKO and asked for an actress who might play the lead in Monsoon, a Technicolor film to be shot in India.

RKO said, "How about trying Ursula Thiess? She has a face like an angel and a body like a goddess."

The boys from Film Group took a fast gander. Liking what they saw, they put Ursula aboard a plane to India. Three months later the film was finished and Ursula en route to Hollywood, stopped off in Hamburg to see her family. It was a joyful reunion, of course, and Ursula told them all about America and India and Hollywood; and she promised to do her best about bringing her children to California, a very difficult process since Ursula herself has only a visitor's visa and unless it is extended, she may be deported from the country.

After Monsoon and back in Hollywood, the German beauty with the grey-green eyes worked hard and long on her dramatics. At her agent's party one night she met Bob Taylor. It was an informal introduction, "Miss Thiess, may I present Bob Taylor."

Taylor is one man who uses the slow approach. No fast line. No aimless chatter. He is handsome, debonair, and socially at ease, but he never tries to impress.

He let a few days go by, and then he phoned Ursula. He asked her out to dinner. She suggested dinner at her apartment. That's how it began, and it's grown bigger and better since that beginning.

At the moment, Bob Taylor is the hardest working actor in motion pictures, seven grade A films in two years and three more coming up. And as one friend has said, "This guy has been so busy he's scarcely had time to read his mail. No kidding. Besides, by nature he's sort of a lone wolf. Likes to hunt and fish. Maybe concentrate on one dame. The kind of schedule he's had this year, it's lucky he could even manage a coffee-date."

Ursula Thiess has never gone hunting or fishing with Taylor, and I once asked Bob why. It seems that years ago he tried taking Barbara Stanwyck along with him on these jaunts. She didn't particularly like them, and now he's convinced that all women feel the same way about his outdoor activities.

WHAT he doesn't know is that Ursula Thiess is one woman who would follow him to the ends of the earth at the mere beckoning of his index finger. When he does realize that fact, he'll probably marry the girl, because he is basically a man who loves a home and wants a woman to cherish.

In Hollywood today they are giving even money on a Taylor-Thiess marriage—either late this year or early next or "just as soon as this guy gets enough time off to realize what a beautiful babe he is holding in his heart."

"she oughta be in pictures"

(Continued from page 45) but from that point on the public—the only true Prince Charming in show business—took over and made the story of Elaine Stewart come true. The public, then, ought to know about her. Here is her story.

It all began, of course, before Elaine was born. A young girl, of Spanish ancestry, decided to abandon Europe and start her life in America. She was 18. A young man, of German descent, made up his mind to the same thing at the same time. He was also 18. On a murky day, early in the century, they boarded the same boat in Holland and set sail through an early morning fog for the new land. An hour after sailing time they met at the rail of the ship, and together watched the bulky final outline of the European coast slip into the distance. Then they turned and looked at each other.

Love at first sight is an expression that has been kicked around a good deal by the fiction writers, but the meeting of Ulrich and Hedwig was pretty close to it, at least as far as Elaine's dad was concerned. Within two days he was trying to get the captain of the ship to marry them, and making a great to-do about the matter. The captain, however, would have none of it, and Hedwig, a sensible girl, had minor objections, among which were the simple facts that Ulrich was a smart 18, had no money, was going to a strange land, didn't know the language and had absolutely no prospects.

It was five years later, after a long-distance romance between Chicago, where Hedwig settled, and New York, where Ulrich had gotten a start, that they finally married. And after a couple of years of nothing happening in Manhattan, the Steinbergs moved across the river to Montclair, New Jersey, and settled down for life.

ELAINE STEWART (then Steinberg) was born in Montclair, the eldest of four children. Her father by that time was a policeman and the family, although not in dire circumstances, didn't find it too easy to get along in a wealthy community on an honest cop's take-home pay. So Elaine was no pampered darling, and at a very early age, particularly after the other kids came along, learned the rudiments of cookery and house cleaning and the chores a girl in a poor family has to apply herself to instead of play.

But she was a dreamer. Mornings, as she walked to school, she'd vision a future that didn't seem probable. At first it was just pretty clothes and leisure and all the money she could spend. And then, under the spell of movie magazines, there came the dream of being a famous actress—but this was the most improbable of all, because even though she knew the Cinderella story had happened really, she couldn't picture it happening to her, or anybody in remote Montclair for that matter.

But the impulse to get closer to her dream was strong and when she was 13 years old it was decided she ought to get a job after school to help bolster the family income, she headed right for a movie theater and went to work as an usherette.

As Elaine herself remembers, she was not a particularly pretty girl, although others say she was. It was too early for her desire to be an actress to be called an ambition; it was still only a dream. But standing in the dark at the top of an aisle, watching the handsome shadows flit across the screen and listening to their voices she felt very close to them, almost part of the life they lived. She found herself patterning her dress, in a modest way, after the stars she saw and inadvertently mimicked them. And, unlike most kids who have to work after school, she could hardly wait to get to her job each afternoon. It was better than classes.

There were times she almost lost her job. Some pictures more than others affected her like a drug. One of them was The Postman Always Rings Twice, an MGM picture incidentally. She was so taken with the loveliness and artistry of Lana Turner in this one that she staggered through the run of the show in a heady fog of confusion, often trying to seat several people in one seat—and not hearing a word that was spoken, except on the screen. It was about that time that the manager decided she'd be better off in the air, and he transferred her to the box-office, where she spent the next couple of years selling magic through a small round hole in a plate glass window.

Elaine was not a particularly popular girl in high school, something that would be hard to understand without her own explanation.

"We didn't have very much money," she said, "and most of the kids who went to school with me came from pretty well-off families. My wardrobe consisted of one skirt and one blouse—and I was always ashamed to go to parties and things like the other kids. Consequently, I didn't go out much, didn't mix with the other girls much, either."

NECESSITY finally took her away from the cinema. She was about 18 and the time had come to either marry or get into a line of work that offered a better future than a girl would find in a movie theater. She wasn't interested in any special boy, so she left her box-office and went to work as a secretary-nurse to a doctor. For a whole year she thought she had found her niche in life.

It might have been about this point in her life that Elaine finally took a good look in a mirror. She liked what she saw. Then she looked at some of the fashion magazines and decided, too, that most of the girls she saw on the covers and in the ads had nothing more to offer than she had. So, without any knowledge of how to go about it, she started for New York one morning to become a model.

The modeling business in New York is almost as difficult to break into as the movies, but Elaine didn't know that. She had read somewhere that a man named Harry Conover was big in this line, so she took a subway to his Vanderbilt Avenue headquarters and presented herself to his secretary.

Now getting to see Harry Conover personally without an appointment, and generally a letter of introduction, is almost as easy as paying a casual call on the mayor. It just isn't done that way. The secretary was rather astonished that anyone would try, and for that reason she brushed away many of the objections and after a few hours ushered Elaine into the presence of the big man.

Harry Conover's first impression is worth noting. "Never," he said, "have I seen such a get-up. Elaine was dressed as she thought a model ought to dress—and it was startling to say the least. She wasn't wearing an outfit, but a costume—all wrong. She was wearing as much make-up as the average clown. But I could see she had beauty beneath it all, and, more important, poise and class."

As Elaine remembers it, Conover stood behind his desk for a few minutes and stared at her pop-eyed. He asked her a few questions and then came around and gave her some advice.

"Get rid of those clothes," he said. "Get a simple black dress with nothing on it.

Then wash off all that goo and come back here next week. We'll see."

On the appointed day, Elaine showed up at Conover's office a different girl. She was wearing a black number as simple as they sold at Macy's and just a trace of lipstick on her face. And her hair was pulled back tight from her forehead. No jewels. This time Conover liked what he saw and got out an application blank. Elaine Stewart was a model.

WITHIN a few months Elaine was one of the hardest working models in New York. She still lived in Montclair, but she came to New York every morning and made the rounds of the photographers when Conover had no assignment for her.

"One of the reasons I got so many jobs," she said, "was that I worked when it was raining. In fact I'd look forward to rainy days. In bad weather most of the models stayed home, unless they had to go out, so I'd trot around to the photographers and advertising agencies and pick up the work that came in all of a sudden."

She is photogenically almost perfect, so Elaine's face soon began to appear on the covers of magazines—and pretty soon she didn't have to look for jobs any more, they came looking for her. She thought for awhile that this was the life she'd live, that she would always have a good income, and the work was pleasant, so why try for anything more. Hollywood was still a dream, still not an ambition.

If it hadn't been that models began working in television Elaine might never have even considered the dramatic arts. But after appearing on a few shows, just to show her face and figure, she decided she'd better learn a little about theatrical deportment. She began to study and the next thing she knew she was acting. It was just as simple as that.

Hal Wallis was the first producer to believe that Elaine Stewart might have something for pictures. He had seen her on a TV show and arranged to have her come to see him in his office. Wallis is a canny man, noted for his discovery of unknown talent, and he liked the presence Elaine had. So, without a test, and knowing full well she had no theatrical background, he signed her to a contract and sent her to California to appear with Dean Martin and Jerry Lewis in Sailor Beware.

They may be the greatest comics in the movies, but Martin and Lewis are the toughest actors in show business to debut with, no matter how beautiful you are. The only supporting player who ever got any notice with them was a chimpanzee. Elaine was good in their picture but lost in the mad, mad shuffle. And when her option time came around she was dropped automatically, because they had nothing for her to do. Elaine might have gone back to New York, but she met an agent named Johnny Darrow.

Darrow is the kind of man who doesn't believe anybody ever got anywhere giving up, so he took Elaine in hand and escorted her to the studios where he wore out carpets in front of executive desks telling big shots how wonderful his client was. The result was twofold: Elaine got a job at MGM, and found herself the possessor of a driving ambition to be a movie star.

ELAINE made five pictures at MGM and very few people knew she was on the lot. True, her parts were small, but they were the type known in Hollywood as build up roles. Elaine was a happy girl. She was studying and learning fast and every time she walked away from in front of a camera she knew something she hadn't known before.

It all came across at once in The Bad And The Beautiful, in which she played,

NOW... a wonder treatment for 4 "Young Skin" problems

Are these "young skin" problems spoiling your looks?

Skin oily—yet flaky?
Pores beginning to "spread"?
Blackheads popping out?

Such an unkind but common trick of nature! Suddenly, the oil glands start over-working. At the same time, skin grows sluggish—can't throw off the everyday accumulation of dead skin cells. This mixture of oil and dry skin cells begins to build a "choking" layer over the pore openings. Now—enlarged pores, even blackheads are on the way. Your skin needs help quickly.

A 1-Minute Treatment by Pond's now brings you new help for these four common "young skin" problems—over-oiliness, sluggishness, enlarged pores, and blockheads.

Just cover face, except eyes, with a snowy-white, greaseless 1-Minute Mask of Pond's Vanishing Cream. Its "keratolytic" action loosens, dissolves off stubborn, dead skin cells. Frees the tiny skin gland openings to function normally. Now—after 60 seconds—tissue off clean. See how tingling-fresh and completely un-greasy your skin looks! How smooth it feels.

Get a jar of Pond's Vanishing Cream today—give yourself your first 1-Minute Mask tonight. You'll see encouraging results right away.

"Young skin" doesn't like heavy make-up! A sheer touch of greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream makes a fresh, un-shiny powder base.

oddly enough, the girl who walked into a big studio and took away the star's beau. That was just the story she had dreamed when she was an usher at the Bellevue Theatre in Montclair, and Lana Turner was the star she dreamed it about.

You may have noticed in the past few months that Elaine has been getting a lot of publicity as a new sex queen of the movies. MGM is really not responsible for this, because the heads of that studio feel that a girl must have more than just a beautiful face and body to cut the mustard at the box-office. It has been spontaneous — and it has Elaine worried.

"Obvious sex," she said, "is bad. I know. I was an usherette and I knew what the customers thought of it. Selling sex like fish is not only bad taste but the worst possible approach to success an actress can take. There are so many other emotions in life that people like to see on the screen. I don't want to be a sex star."

ASKED what she thought a star should sell, Elaine said: "I think you might call it glamor. Marlene Dietrich has it — and more than likely always will. She has it even though she's a grandmother. Lana Turner has it. She's never been obvious in her screen portrayals. It's her talent — and her glamor — that have kept her a star for years. I hope to be like her."

Another quality Elaine Stewart believes a star must have is gentility.

"I know movie-goers as they are in a small town," she said. "They're family people — and they like gentleness in the characters they see on the screen. If there is something you might call passion in a character on the screen it has to come from within them. It can't be tossed out into the front row. Most of the youngsters I know who go to the movies want to be like the stars they see — so they have to admire them. You can't really admire a girl if she's just plain wanton."

Elaine Stewart today lives just about that kind of a life. She is, off-screen, a quite simple person. She dresses in good but simple taste. She lives simply, in a small apartment she shares with another girl who works at the studio. Her private life is very much the same as it has been all her life. She has no steady beau, and goes out only a couple of nights a week — and then to places that are not too fancy, but gathering places for the ordinary people of Hollywood.

Like it has always been, Elaine's biggest drive is earning a living. She has not forgotten the struggle the Steinberg family had when she was a little girl — and she doesn't intend to. She wants to make enough money to see that her dad and mother, the lovers of the immigrant boat, are comfortable in their declining years. She wants to see that her brother becomes an engineer who can build the bridges he dreams about now. She is fanatical about her family and carries a wallet full of pictures of them, which she shows to anyone who will look at them.

She may not be a top star yet, but MGM predicts without reservation that she will be. To assist this prediction the studio sends her out on the road to attend premieres of her pictures, and to show her to exhibitors about the land. One of these trips recently took her back to Montclair — and led to a citizen of that town making the understatement of the year.

Elaine's return to Montclair was a big event. Naturally there was a police escort; papa's a police sergeant now. And there were parties and receptions and personal appearances galore. But Elaine did manage to get a few free moments and at these times toured the city alone, looking in on the places she knew as a girl.

She's changed considerably since her high school days. Quite considerably. So it is not odd that a young man, standing on a Montclair street with a bunch of cronies, saw her coming out of a store and gave the longest whistle of appreciation he'd ever gotten out.

"Wow!" he said. "Who's the redhead?"

"That," said one of his pals, "is Elaine Steinberg. She used to live here a few years ago. She went to school with us."

"No kidding," said the whistler, who had not apparently seen the parades. "She ought to be in the movies!"

Well, old boy, she is. But good! END don't play it safe!

On my chest today are still faint scars attesting to the resolution I made that afternoon. Because I went out and did climb a tree. Going up wasn't bad but coming down I got panicky and hugged the trunk so tightly that I nearly cut a groove in the rough bark, or rather, it was the other way around and I got grooved. There is a floor in a New York skating rink that must be permanently weakened because I did get on skates and I did fall — repeatedly. And there are fellows around my old neighborhood who can recall, if they want to, that eventually I wasn't such a sucker for a left hook; at least I did learn how to hook back.

But there is more to it than that. Checking the route I took to get where I am today I can recall a lot of safe "stations" I reached on the journey and I remember how strong the temptation was each time to stay "put" and not take any chances on what might be further down the line. I see an office in New York where I might still be sitting, hunched over an art desk, my yearning for an acting career probably long stifled. I see a store, a lot of stores, where I might still be clerking. I see, too, a restaurant where I might be serving up hamburgers and coffee (or maybe by now I would have worked up to de luxe dinners with choice of soup or salad).

I REMEMBER half a hundred times where I might have wriggled into a secure little niche and lived a secure little life. The urge to do it was strong; I was brought up to think this way. But my lesson was a strong one and I didn't. My lesson was that if all there is to living is the process of preserving one's self that's the way to do it — "hole up" somewhere where you won't get harmed, like a piece of moss satisfied with the sustenance it gets clinging to a stone. And the rest of my lesson was that being alive means more than this; being alive means developing as well as growing, using what you are to become what you can be.

My mother's constant solicitude for me probably stemmed in good part from the fact that I was not only her only child but all she had to show for a broken marriage. She tried to guard me from a life that had shown her very rough corners and she thought she could anticipate trouble for me by doing my thinking and even trying to guide my emotional reactions. Some of the ordinary phases of a boy's development, that are taken casually by most parents, or at least accepted philosophically, tended to cause crises in our household. When I was about 11 years old and, in mother's opinion, ready to know all about the bees and the flowers, she was in a deep quandary on how to import the proper knowledge. Like many mothers in such cases she turned the whole job over to someone else—in this case, an uncle of mine.

He called me out to the sun porch one afternoon for a private "talk" in which not a word was said; he just handed me a 900 page book on eugenics which had been laying on a shelf in the house for years. What he and mother didn't know was that I was exactly 900 pages ahead of them—I had already read the book in secret early morning sessions. I don't know how much good I got out of it morally, but toting that big volume around certainly helped develop my muscles physically.

From earliest memory I had always wanted to be an actor and from a time just about as early there didn't seem to be anything definite I could do about it. Yet, I know now, that the reason I pushed for class presidency several times, and won several times, was to satisfy instinctive yearnings to "perform." Getting on my feet to make a speech to my classmates was the closest I could come to getting on a stage and portraying a role. Just the same, when I graduated from Erasmus Hall High School in Brooklyn it was to take art training rather than enter a school for drama. My mother, while not opposed to my ideas about acting, couldn't get herself to think of the stage in terms of a definite future for me. "You'll be getting a steady salary sooner as an artist than as an actor," she said. She was quite right. The salaries I eventually got in my early acting days were not steady and, in fact, were no salaries; they were "handouts."

AFTER several years as an art student I got a job doing advertising layout work in New York. My salary was $18 a week and in return for this I not only did my own work but found time to assist the fellow at the next desk who seemed always to have tough going with his assignments. One day he showed me his paycheck; he was getting $35 a week! "You're a little underpaid," he advised. "See what you can do for yourself."

I confronted the boss with my request for a raise and he finally agreed to up me to $25 a week. But my next check remained the same and when I complained he told me that all raises had to be approved by the home office in Chicago, a process which might take weeks or even months. I felt exactly as I did the day the six kids clobbered me at the auction. "Cancel my application for the raise," I told the boss.

"Oh, fine!" he said, approvingly. "Also cancel me," I went on. "I'm quitting."

I had decided to seek new vistas, but those I found were not new enough. Returning to the art institute I was given a berth as an assistant instructor with free additional training as my only payment. For spending money I reverted to a childhood pursuit—gathering up pop bottles and turning them in at the market for cash.

I wasn't a very happy boy in those days; not because I was short of money, but because I was short of a satisfying prospect in life. It took a little time for me to figure things out but after a bit I decided that I needed a little love—and what I loved was the stage. One evening a pupil of mine took me to the Lyceum theater where the Feagin School of Dramatic Art was staging a play . . . and the marriage was made. The next day I walked into the school and announced that I was willing to do any kind of work for any length of time if only they would teach me acting. It was a bargain, the best I have ever made. I had lots to do but they paid off with a scholarship that made me feel rich.

It only takes a few words to tell all about this but actually this started off a period of years in my life when I earned only pitiful pennies, at a time when jobs were plentiful and wages good—and yet I envied no man. The truth was that I was buying the kind of work I wanted, stage work, with the salaries I might have had doing other things. And I was happy to do it.

When I was invited, about this time, to take a job as assistant stage manager at the Millpond Playhouse in Roslyn, Long Island, at $10 a week plus room and board, I didn't hesitate a moment. And though I had quit one job because they were slow giving me a raise to $25 a week, I saw nothing inconsistent in the fact that I stuck on at the playhouse when my ten dollars was cut to five dollars a week, and even when the five failed to show up for weeks at a time! With each dime I didn't get, my option on a fine future was stronger, or at least that's the way I felt. I wasn't living a safe and sane life, there were nights in the playhouse when we had to go scrounging around for wood or coal to keep from being frozen to death, but it was a very hopeful one! Why I actually played lead roles at the playhouse! No fat salary check, no fine clothes, sporty car or comfortable apartment, could give me the same thrill.

Ten dollars a week. It stayed as my top salary for a long time . . . when I got it. It was exactly my salary when I left the playhouse with a buddy of mine, Bill Bryan, to open up a new summer theater in Marengo, Illinois. We started from scratch, yet I never had a bitter moment. On the contrary I was bathed in a prospect of happiness. The season we put on was a successful one and I look back at each day I spent there (it is known as The Shady Lane Playhouse and one of the best known in the country) as a bright page in my life.

Just about this time, as the movie scripts I have it, came the war. I had returned to New York from Marengo, and was crossing Seventh Avenue one afternoon, when I saw Bill Bryan walking towards me from the other side.

"Where you been?" I called.

"I just enlisted with the cavalry," he yelled back, as we neared each other. "Why don't you join the same outfit?"

"But I wanted to get into the air corps," I returned.

"Oh, let's stick together," he urged.

Just as we met in the middle of the street I made my decision. "Okay!" I said.

If a writer ever gave me such a scene to play in a picture I'd tell him he was crazy—but that's exactly how it happened. In no time at all we were both stationed at Ft. Riley, Kansas, and I was getting my basic training in riding which, the way the Army does it, begins with learning how to use a shovel.

Nevertheless I got so emotionally involved with horses that when the army decided to motorize the cavalry I resented it as bitterly, I think, as any of the regular old army wranglers we had for sergeants. In fact I applied for officers' training in anti-aircraft and, making still another switch later on, wound up my four years of service as a lieutenant in the infantry. At that time I found myself with more money than I had ever had before in my life, almost $3,000 in cash or due me in terminal pay. It felt good. There was a strong temptation to get a job, try and save more money, and build myself up financially. "You're not a kid any more," my friends told me. "You've got a chance to be a solid citizen now."

They might have been right. But even if I wasn't a kid I still had the same dreams. I decided to bet every penny of my money on myself as an actor. I went to Hollywood, bought a thousand dollars worth of clothes, and started to find a job in radio or movies. In five months my money was gone and producers knew me only as another name on a long list of hopeful actors which they rarely bothered to check.

"Now will you come home?" my mother wrote.

I didn't. I applied for a job as counter-man in the White Tower hamburger stands. And almost at the same time I got my first radio job—a few lines to say on a local 15-minute show that brought me a total of $14 in take-home pay. But I must have given the show at least 14 dollars worth of acting because I was called back to do it again next week. It was all the encouragement I needed.

I started knocking on doors like crazy. A few more small jobs came my way. Then, one day, upon learning that a radio producer was looking for someone to play an important part in his show of the coming week, I decided to declare myself a contender. I approached the situation somewhat haltingly, I guess, and soon found myself on the receiving end of a brush-off. As I turned to leave, I planted a firm foot and asked to read for the part right then and there. The reaction to this was skeptical but agreeable. So I read.

Well, I'd like to report that I got the part. I didn't. But I impressed the producer sufficiently for him to give me another part on the same show.

And from that time on I started to click in radio. Soon, with shows like "Michael Shayne, Detective" and "Our Miss Brooks" to my credit I began to get attention from the movie studios . . . but not the kind of attention I wanted. It was apparent soon that I could get into pictures but only in small "mug" parts.

"You don't think you're a leading man type, do you?" asked one producer incredulously.

I nodded. It wasn't a matter of vanity. I have never considered myself a pretty boy. But from my experience on the stage I knew that an audience doesn't consider handsomeness to be the most important requisite of a character in whom it can interest itself. The drama of life, which makes the best kind of drama on stage, happens to all sorts of fellows, including those who wouldn't be selected to pose for collar ads.

But the producer laughed. He mentioned a former gorilla-visaged wrestler, now turned actor, as the sort of character he compared me to. "If he refuses to do a job for us we'll call you," he said.

I wanted to get into the movies and had I been willing to accept parts like this I could have gotten started much sooner . . . but I was still determined not to play scared about my career. I waited and I kept trying out for the kind of part I wanted. One day it would come along and I was willing to gamble. One day it did.

When Universal-International decided I was just the man they wanted to play the group leader in Sword In The Desert, I knew I had been right all the time . . . not playing my dreams safe.

"This is a story of a group of fighters fighting for their people," the producer at Universal-International told me. "They have no place in the world and they want to make one for themselves no matter what the risk. Do you think you can understand the part?"

Understand it? I think so!

how we fell in love

(Continued from page 30) They said nothing about this because they are people who bear rather than share their problems. But both of them, without seeking it, were ripe and ready for the exciting companionship they once had found but could find no longer in their own marriages.

No one ever knows the truth about any marriage except the participants, and in many cases even the principals are afraid to acknowledge the diminution in mutual respect and affection. It is common practice to judge the success of a marriage by the exterior trappings—big house, big car, big career. And with that standard of measurement the Janie Powell-Geary Steffen entente was a huge success. But was it a big success in Janie's heart?

Geary was the first love in her somewhat sheltered, inexperienced life, the life of an unsophisticated 18-year-old girl. Despite the fact that she is Protestant and he is Catholic, despite the fact that she is in show business and he is not, despite the fact that there are great differences in their temperaments, backgrounds, and outlooks, Janie and Geary were married. And it was only after marriage that Janie matured into full womanhood and could appraise men with a realistic eye.

It is safe to say that had Jane Powell met Gene Nelson before she met Geary Steffen, she never would have married Geary in the first place.

Only she didn't meet Gene until three and a half years ago, and the meeting was most perfunctory. "I was down at the beach with Miriam," Nelson recalls, "and Jane was there with Geary. I'd known Geary for some time, had seen him around the skating rinks, places like that. He introduced us to Janie. We said hello and then, as I remember, went back home. I used to ice-skate in the Sonja Henie troupe and so did Geary. Only he came a few years after I left."

Once in a great while there is an instantaneous rapport between two people, a spontaneous combustion of sorts, but between Janie and Gene on this meeting-at-the-beach occasion, there was nothing like that.

Jane and Geary went on to have some children, and Gene went on to become a big dancing star at Warner Brothers. The Nelsons and the Steffens rarely ran into each other.

Early this year, however, a small, talented, lyric writer named Sammy Cahn was working as a Warner's producer. Sammy had written some lyrics for Janie at Metro, and when he was putting together Three Sailors And A Girl, he quite naturally remembered the cute little star and sought to borrow her from the Culver City lot.

Having nothing scheduled for Janie, MGM was happy to loan her out for $75,000. When Gene Nelson heard that Jane Powell was coming to Warner's, a broad grin filled his face. "It's always exciting to have a new partner. When Janie reported to the studio, I was one happy guy. It was the feeling of newness. Nothing else."

As anyone who has ever worked at Warner's will tell you, Gene Nelson is the friendliest actor on the lot, also the kindest. It's in the nature of the man to help people.

With Janie he was his usual bouncing, effervescent self, joking, kidding, showing her around, taking lunch with her, walking across the street to a restaurant called The Smokehouse.

As one publicity man said during the course of the production, "You'd think Nelson and Powell were brother and sister. They're the happiest. Real crazy!"

EVERY married woman, consciously or sub-consciously compares every man she meets with her husband. And similarly every married man compares the girls he encounters with his wife.

Jane and Gene did exactly that, and gradually, almost imperceptibly they looked forward to seeing each other. They were glad to leave home and get to work. In a business where many leading women cannot abide their opposites, the Nelson-Powell relationship offered a refreshing contrast. "The truth," one chorus girl told me a few months ago, "is that when Janie Powell and Gene Nelson dance, they look as if they were blown together."

There is no doubt but what friendly propinquity engenders affection, especially if both parties are basically unhappy at home; and it wasn't very long before Jane and Gene became fast friends.

"It was the darndest thing," Nelson recently explained to a friend. "We'd be having a cup of coffee and I'd catch myself looking at Jane in the strangest way. Not with my eyes but my heart. I remember giving myself a little pep-talk. 'You're a grown-up boy. Stop mooning over this kid.'"

But there is a strange, nameless chemistry in sexual attraction, and each time Jane and Gene would glance at each other or drop a word, they would smile, their blue eyes would twinkle, and their hearts would beat just a little bit faster.

But everything was under control. Had anyone at that point approached either of these two players and said, "Look, I think you two kids are falling in love," the interloper would have been laughed off the lot. For insofar as they were concerned, Jane and Gene were maintaining the fiction of their individual idyllic marriages. They were a pair of respectably married stars who were having one great time making a film together. They worked hard, and they played hard, and whenever there were a few spare minutes between takes, they could be found sitting on the steps of each other's dressing room, gabbing and joking and discussing their next sequence together.

"When we saw each other," Gene says honestly, "for me it was like riding on clouds."

It wasn't that way for Gene Nelson at home. After 11 years of marriage to Miriam, a marriage hampered by one separation and blessed by the arrival of one son, Gene's relationship with his wife had deteriorated into an arrangement of mutual tolerance.

Certainly, it was no fault of Miriam's, for here is a young woman of beauty, intelligence, and understanding, a woman who had stood by her man when he had no money, no job, only hope.

Here is a woman who gave up her own professional dancing career when Gene was lucky enough to get a movie contract, a wife who had filled in as secretary, companion, cook, mother, and jack-of-all-trades, a wife who, after giving her man one son, suffered a near-tragic miscarriage last year.

MIRIAM had done everything to make Gene happy, and he, in turn, had worked his head and feet off to give her and Chris all the comforts and security to which he felt them entitled. Only somewhere along the line, the love they had once felt for each other had cooled. They had tried to fire it up again, to make it blaze with zest and passion, but something inexplicable had been lost. And it was no one's fault. (Continued on next page)

But a man has his work, and Gene has always been happy at dancing, and, with Jane Powell beside him, no one ever imagined that he was not the most well-adjusted actor on the lot. But during the filming of Three Sailors And A Girl, the terrible soul struggle that was to alter his life began to make itself known.

"One afternoon," he recalls, "after Janie and I had been working together for many weeks, we were taking lunch or something. I didn't want to say it, didn't want to louse it all up by getting serious, but sometimes you feel all choked up and you've just got to say what's in your heart and mind, and I tried to pass it off as a gag, and I said very lightly, 'Janie, something's happening between us.' And she smiled and said softly, 'I know it, Gene.'"

That evening after work, Gene and Janie had a drink together, and while neither of them would discuss their individual marriages, it became apparent to both of them that there was some inadequacy, some mis-mating along the line—because if these two people were idyllically married to another man and another woman, or if even one of the marriages was so ecstatically happy, what were the two of them doing there in a restaurant? Each should have been terribly anxious to get home.

This realization, of course, went unspoken. All Jane and Gene knew was that they liked spending time together. Both were very much afraid of delving any deeper.

It was Gene who made the first break, and it came not long after Janie's birthday party. Gene had been asked along with his wife, and Marsh and Barbara Thompson and Earl Brent, Janie's arranger, and Andy and Della Russell. It was on the night of April 1st, Janie's 24th birthday when Gene realized that he was very much in love with Janie. That at least is what he named his desire, the desire to see her all the time, to be near her, to work with her, to hear her voice.

Gene Nelson is an honorable man, and what he felt he kept to himself, hoping that somehow the tug at his heart would fade, go away, disappear. But it didn't. The more he worked with Janie, the greater the heartache, because he felt that under the circumstances nothing could or would come of what was probably a one-sided friendship. He was just a poor sucker who had gone overboard for a very wonderful, unattainable girl, a girl he was always sure he would love and respect if only from a distance.

Now when a man feels as Gene Nelson felt, his wife can read him easily. One evening after returning from the studio, the dancer was so obviously perplexed by his dilemma that Miriam edged up to him and said, "What's wrong?"

It was a fearful decision to make, but Gene made it. "I'd sooner cut off my right arm," he said, "than hurt you, but there's no sense, Miriam, in our living a lie. I've fallen in love with somebody else, and I want you to know the truth."

THEY talked until three in the morning.

Was it just an infatuation? Had he ever told Jane that he loved her? No, he hadn't. Well, maybe it would all pass. Maybe it was just a one-picture romance? Here was a husband hopelessly bedeviled and a wife trying to preserve a marriage which she knew in her heart might not be worth the fight for preservation. But where children are concerned, no rash decisions must ever be made. Then again, a woman's whole life is her marriage and to see one being dissolved after 11 years of effort and heartache is a confession of failure and love lost. No one must easily relinquish what was fought for so dearly.

Under the circumstances, Miriam Nelson was superb. "I'm going to Las Vegas for a week or two," she said. "That'll give you time to think things out. Maybe this is an infatuation, a quick thing. Maybe you'll get it out of your system."

Miriam took off for Vegas, and the Nelson family friends descended upon Gene. "Are you crazy?" one demanded. "Is it true that you've asked Miriam for a divorce?" . . . "What sort of idiot are you, anyway?" . . . "Don't be a jerk, Gene. No one gets divorced after ten, eleven years." . . . "Think of your son, little Chris." . . . "Suppose you are unhappy. Who says you have to be happy all the time?"

They went to work on Gene, and they did a fine job on him. They got him so muddled he couldn't find his way home nights. They advised him when working with Jane Powell to say nothing more than, "Good morning," and, "See you at work tomorrow." They insisted that he give his marriage another try.

Gene finally agreed. He rang up Miriam in Vegas and said, "Please, Miriam. Come home, and we'll see if it gets any better."

Miriam came home the next evening, and Gene the next day began treating Janie Powell as if she were a leper. Janie couldn't understand the quick change. "We don't have to be friends," she told him on the set—and there was an unspeakable hurt in her tone, "but let's not be enemies."

Gene tried staying away from Janie. "As the Lord is my Witness," he says, "I tried to make every scene strictly business. But it killed me. It just did. By trying to kill off the love I felt for Jane I wasn't building up any more love for Miriam. It was just useless. It didn't work. I knew in my heart that I was completely gone on Janie."

As for Jane, she knew she had fallen in love with Gene. They had never more than held hands, but what she felt for him was more intense than anything she had ever felt for Geary.

The weekend the film was finished, Jane decided to go down to Palm Springs with Geary and to ask him for a divorce. She knew what such a request would cost her—friends, family, criticism, tears, legal hassels, but, like Gene, she saw no point in living a lie. Why be unhappy with one man for the rest of your life when you could live in joy with another?

She had been a good wife under many trying circumstances, none of which had ever been publicized. Geary had been a good husband, but she had fallen out of love with him. She wanted her freedom, and she knew the price would be heartache, but for love no price is too high.

Jane Powell had not set out to fall in love. It had just happened—the timing, the circumstances, the personalities. Call it destiny if you will. They had all jelled together, and she and Gene had fallen in love.

As best she could, and it was extremely difficult, Janie explained things to her husband and asked for a divorce. Geary reacted just as Miriam Nelson had reacted. Shock, hurt, anger, vituperation—each had its inning.

Geary also suggested the possibility that what Janie felt for Gene was not true love, just a mercurial and quixotic attraction. The talk was heated and long involved. Every man must fight for his happiness, and Geary had much to fight for, but when a man is faced by a woman who no longer wants him, there is only one move to make, to withdraw with graciousness and understanding; and this calls for insight, tolerance, and tremendous character, three qualities Geary Steffen fortunately possesses.

Geary, however, did not step aside and say, "O.K., since Gene is getting his freedom, I'll give you yours, and you two kids can fly to Nevada, get married, and live happily ever after."

What he said in substance was this: "I think this is just an infatuation, that in time you'll get over it. You're going out on a personal appearance tour for six weeks. You take those six weeks and think everything over. Weigh everything carefully. If after six weeks you still want a divorce—well, we'll talk it over again." A trial separation.

Jane drove back to Hollywood alone that night, and driving, she made her decision. She had a right to a life of her own, a life of love. She saw no point in spending another 30 or 40 years with a man, however kind, admirable and upstanding, she no longer tempestuously loved.

That night she called Gene Nelson. They spoke for hours. Gene knew what a searing experience Janie had undergone. He'd done the very same thing himself with Miriam. Janie had two children to consider. Undoubtedly she would demand custody of them both. Her parents had been divorced, and she knew what life was like for children under such circumstances.

Gene knew that friends would "get to" Janie just as they had gotten to him, that they would advise a period of watchful waiting, cooling off. They would point up how much Janie had to lose, how millions of youngsters looked to her and Geary as the symbol of happy young marriage. He knew that Janie, in the final analysis, would have to erect her own bulwark, her own protection against the barrage of persuasion urging her to return to Geary Steffen.

THEY spoke and Gene then went off on a personal appearance tour of his own. He played Toronto. Strangely enough, Paul Small, Janie Powell's agent, had booked his charge into Toronto months previously. It was pure accident, not design, that Janie Powell followed Gene into Toronto.

Before leaving Hollywood, however, Jane said definitely, "I'll file for divorce when I get back—unless there's a reconciliation." She knew there was no chance for one.

Once Janie and Gene met in Toronto, they mapped out nebulous plans for their future. Gene was flying back to the Coast to effect a financial settlement for Miriam and Chris. Janie was scheduled to play Las Vegas late in May and early in June.

In May, Geary Steffen journeyed to Vegas, but there was no reconciliation announcement and he left a few days later for a fishing trip off the lower California coast.

Gene Nelson then flew into Las Vegas. He was separated from Miriam, and Janie was separated from Geary, and he saw nothing wrong in seeking out the company of the girl he loved. Once again, however, well-intentioned friends insisted that he and Jane refrain from seeing each other until she had made her divorce announcement official.

When Janie returned from Las Vegas, that's exactly what happened. The die was cast. Janie told her lawyer that she wanted a six-week divorce. Gene Nelson told his lawyer the same thing. The other two parties involved, Geary and Miriam, seemed to favor a California divorce which takes one year before it becomes final.

cussing all the various angles necessary for complete agreement; and luckily all four parties involved are people of stature and intelligence and good will. As one reporter recently commented, "There's not a bad bone in those four bodies."

Of course, Miriam Nelson and Geary Steffen are hurt. To be wanted no longer is a thrust which strikes deeply at one's vanity, but the human equation being what it is, who can possibly explain why people fall in and out of love. Undoubtedly there are reasons, psychological reasons profoundly imbedded in the lives and backgrounds of these people, but as Miriam Nelson herself says, "What caused all this is something far greater than I can explain. We're just praying that eventually it works out for the good of all."

Naturally in all such cases, the columnists look for "a fall guy." In this particular instance they have made Gene Nelson "the heavy" which isn't very fair.

NELSON didn't want to fall in love with Jane Powell. He realized that she was cute, peppy, frank, beautiful, witty, the possessor of charm, humor, and great talent. He never made any overt moves, never muttered one "fast" line, never attempted "a pass" of any kind.

"It's almost impossible," he's said, "to explain how we fell in love . . . or at least how I fell in love. We started out being friends and then Janie's friendship seemed to become an indispensable part of my life. Unless I saw her or talked to her I felt miserable. . . . Sometimes things like this happen, not only in show business but in every business, every walk of life. It just gets played up bigger when you're in the movies. I feel that no matter what business a person is in, he's entitled to live his life as an individual, if he can.

"I've looked into my heart. I've searched my mind, and I'm trying to do what's right. We're all trying to do what's right."

It is a tribute to all the parties connected in this case that everything has been honest and aboveboard. There have been no secret meetings, no midnight rendezvous, no recriminations or name-calling. Everyone has behaved sensibly and as an adult, and, in times of a crisis, such behavior is extremely rare, especially in Hollywood.

Gene Nelson and Jane Powell hope to get married as soon as their divorces become final. This will be in six weeks or one year, depending on the state in which the divorces are obtained.

MANY years ago the movie colony was rocked by a similar marital earthquake when Laurence Olivier, while making a film with her, fell incredibly in love with Vivien Leigh, then the mother of a darling 5-year-old daughter, Suzanne, and the wife of Herbert Leigh Holman, a London barrister.

Realistic and intelligent people, they worked and solved their own problems; and in August 1940 when their respective divorces became final, Laurence and Vivien were married.

Today in sickness and in health, on-stage and off-stage, theirs is one of the most memorable and moving love affairs the world has ever witnessed.

With all the fervor it possesses Hollywood hopes the same for Jane Powell and Gene Nelson, two fine kids who are courageously obeying the dictates of their hearts lest they have no hearts left to obey. END

hollywood muddle

Of her smiling, versatile, hypochondriacal Donald, she said, "He would go out with the fellows almost every night, and if I said anything, he wouldn't speak to me for days. . . ."

"When friends would come over on Sunday, he would excuse himself for a few minutes and go out and play golf. . . . He would go down to the corner for a newspaper and then three hours later he would come home. That happened often. . . . He went to the fights three nights a week and played cards the other nights."

Nancy O'Hanlon agreed that such treatment had turned Gwen into a nervous wreck and added that Don never "seemed to want to go out socially. He'd say he was too tired and had to work tomorrow and then he'd disappear."

Judge Emme who has never worked in pictures, listened to the testimony and then awarded Gwen an uncontested decree of divorce. He also approved a property settlement agreement under which Gwen gets custody of the couple's daughter Donna, 6, and $150 a month for the child's support. In addition, she received 20% of the first $100,000 of O'Connor's adjusted gross income, 10% of the second $100,000 and 5% of everything else.

Last year Donald was good for approximately $225,000, and this year he should hit the $300,000 mark.

FURTHER provisions of the settlement gave Gwen the family Cadillac, Don the Jaguar, Gwen the family home in Van Nuys, and Don custody of "O'Flynn," a shaggy Irish wolfhound who in Gwen's words, "Is as big as a horse—or well, maybe a Shetland pony. Anyway, he eats like a horse. Costs $24 a month to feed him."

It was a very amicable divorce. No dirty linen was washed in public. None of the basic reasons for the marital failure were disclosed, and 24 hours after the decree was entered in the record, Gwen, on the arm of Dan Dailey, ambled into a Hollywood night club by way of celebration.

It so happened that Donald O'Connor was sitting in the same club. As soon as Dailey caught sight of the little guy, he stopped dead in his tracks whereupon the headwaiter approached and tactfully whispered, "Mrs. O'Connor, your husband—that is, your ex-husband is here tonight. Just thought you might like to know."

Gwen said, "Thanks," and then to Dan, "let's blow it, it might be a little embarrassing to all of us."

Dailey agreed, and the pair left. As they did another girl who had dated Dan a few years ago, was entering the Mocambo with her escort. Nodding at Gwen, she said, "That's Donald O'Connor's ex-wife. I can't figure her. Compared to Dailey, Donald's an angel."

Many people in Hollywood fail to understand Gwen's switch from Donald O'Connor to Dan Dailey—unless, of course, Dan and Gwen have precipitously fallen in love. This, they both deny.

"Look," Gwen says, "I've known Dan for a long time. He's perfectly swell. We like seeing each other because we like to do the same things, listen to music, go to the movies, watch TV, hang around in old clothes. We both like horses and right now Dan is teaching me to jump."

"My divorce doesn't become final for a year; so I'm not thinking about marriage—marriage to anyone. The reason I'm not playing the field is that I'm very happy going around with Dan. As for Donald, he's the greatest. Make no doubt about that—the greatest guy you'll ever meet. It's just that we couldn't get along. We fought all the time—about such silly things.

"As a matter of fact, it seems to me we fought even when we were going together. We just had a different outlook about everything. He likes golf, I like tennis. He likes cards. I don't. Things like that.

"We were married very young, and maybe that's what was wrong."

BUT Gwen and Donald are both intelligent people, and they tried many times to save their marriage. They even went to psychiatrists and both, in fact, are still undergoing psychoanalysis.

For a while, friends thought that different religious beliefs might have wrecked the marriage. Donald is a Catholic and Gwen is Science of Mind, but Gwen says, "That had nothing to do with it—or maybe it did. Anyway, Donna is being raised as a Catholic, and if you know anything about Science of Mind you know that when you come of age, you'll think properly of the important things. Religion had nothing to do with it, and neither did career.

"I keep reading about how I wanted a career. That's not true. I'm not even ambitious. It's just that well—I guess you'd call it mis-mated from the beginning."

"About Gwen and Dan Dailey, that's a funny bit, because the O'Connors knew the Daileys way back when, before Dan and Liz Dailey were divorced. Whether it's a question of one understanding the other I don't know, but Gwen and Dan have been seeing an awful lot of each other. Something may come of it, but I doubt it. Dailey has no staying power. Besides, my own belief is that he still is very much in love with Liz."

Liz Hofert, of course, is Dailey's second wife and the mother of his son. A tall, blonde beauty who was raised in Los Angeles, she, too, made the mistake of marrying very early. Her parents were none too pleased with her selection of Dan for a husband, but it was during the war, and they went along with her selection; and in the end, Liz knew she had chosen incorrectly.

She still sees a great deal of Dan, however—they both love to ride; and, of course, they have a child in common. Even though Liz has been consistently coupled with Bob Neal, a personable and very wealthy young man from Houston, Texas, every week or so there is prominently mentioned in the press the possibility of Dan's re-marrying Liz.

DAILEY, who is the key to this Hollywood muddle, claims to have found himself, to have everything under control, to know the score, to be masterminding his destiny. A few years ago he was mentally disturbed and, with great wisdom, checked in at the Menninger Clinic in Kansas for psychiatric help.

He was taught about psychotherapy, milieu therapy, working with his hands to divert his mental obsessions; and there is no doubt that he is a tremendously improved person. And yet he lives alone in a five-room apartment next to Bob Wagner's; he has few male friends, chaotic periods of melancholia, and the unerring faculty of lousing himself up with women.

A few months ago, for example, before he started dating Gwen O'Connor and seeing a good deal of his ex-wife, he was supposedly scheduled to marry Beetsy Wynn, the wife of Keenan Wynn just as soon as she could obtain a Mexican divorce.

Just how, where, and why he started going with Keenan Wynn's wife is one of those Hollywood mysteries into which one must not delve too deeply. Apparently, he met her at the Del Mar Horse Show last June—Beetsy is another horse enthusiast—and these two took it up from there. It developed into a sizzling romance with serious overtones, because by Christmas Beetsy had obtained Keenan's okay for a Mexican divorce and had announced her impending marriage to Dan Dailey.

But after obtaining the divorce there was no marriage.

It was an awful mess, especially embarrassing to Beetsy; for here was a girl who had given up one husband with the stated intention of getting another—except that at the last minute her intended had flown the coop.

Poor Beetsy. She had to eat humble pie. "Dan and I have decided," she was forced to announce, "that our proposed marriage would not work out. All plans are off." After that she got terribly sick. But Dan rode the crisis like the stalwart he is. He didn't let it get him. He went right on making motion pictures, playing his records, exercising his horses.

As any horse-player knows, there are two outstanding criteria for judging horse flesh: blood-lines and past performance.

On that basis, friends predict that Gwen O'Connor is going to wind up behind the eight ball if she continues to spend too much of her time with Dailey.

Not that Dan isn't the most charming, thoughtful, witty, and well-bred gentleman—even when he was in burlesque the chorus girls used to say he had class—it's just that he's determined to escape marriage "Until I find a girl with whom I can live my own life." It's just that girls fall in love with Dan, and he doesn't fall in love with them. He likes their company, but he lives in a private world all of his own, a world he is constitutionally incapable of sharing.

Any marriage to be successful must feature compromise and self-sacrifice, an equal amount of give and take by both parties. What Dan is looking for is some mythical woman who will slavishly make his interests her interests, who will submerge her personality to his, who will go along with his horses, cups, drums, records, water-skis, and woodwork.

Just how much he is willing to go along with the girl's interests he isn't saying.

What Dan hasn't yet learned is that a marriage based solely on a man's terms is no marriage at all.

Unfortunately, there are many girls who will accept marriage on any terms. It is said in Hollywood, for example, that if Dan Dailey asked her, Liz Hofert would re-marry him in a minute. Having been married to Dan in his most unstable years, however, Liz is not going to be burned again. She loves spending time with her ex-husband, because he is a most entertaining and amusing man, and there aren't many like him in town—but that's as far as it goes, which suits Dailey to perfection.

In fact he finds himself in an envied position. He doesn't want to get married; and he has two gorgeous females, Gwen who can't even think of marriage for at least a year, and Liz who having had him as a steady diet, will now take him only in short doses.

As for Donald O'Connor, the fourth party in this quadrangle—friends say that he is really the happiest of them all. He has a dog, a house, a Jaguar, and a psychiatrist.

No sweetheart—not yet, anyway. END

plain some honest facts in the most simple terms. For instance, the story about Terry Moore and the barbell training: it may seem startling, but it is true that a considerable number of Hollywood career girls are now working regularly with the barbell system.
They consider it very important not only in the development of perfect bodies, but in the matter of facial beauty as well. They could, of course, concentrate in such a manner as to become tremendously strong and be able to toss their gentlemen friends around at will. That isn't their goal, for any girl wants to retain and improve her feminine appeal. She can't do that with muscles.

Unfortunately, an unreasoning prejudice has grown up about dumbbell and barbell work, which is to the effect that they are employed purely as strength builders.
Nothing could be more wrong. Of course, you will hear people say, "If you begin lifting barbells and weights, you'll soon become muscle bound." Or, "Once you start that sort of exercise you'll build up muscles where they shouldn't be, and when those muscles sag you'll be worse off than you were in the beginning." Such statements, you may be sure, are made largely by those who are too lazy to take care of their physical well being. Anyone who has never tried a resistance exercise is prone to scoff at it.

The truth is that this type of exercise can make any girl look better in her bra or bathing suit and can develop portions of the body which need filling in or smoothing out. Take the matter of legs, for instance. In an earlier day any girl who became a ballet or acrobatic dancer simply accepted the fact that as the years went by her legs would turn ugly as the result of bulging calves turned soft and strong ankles turned thick. Today, these growing faults are prevented through scientific resistant exercise. The supple figures of movie celebrities like Vera-Allen and Mitzi
Gaynor are absolute proof of this assertion.
They work out regularly and have the time of their lives doing it.

To further substantiate my points, how often have you heard people exclaim, after watching the "I Love Lucy" show, "How does she do it? Why, she's beautiful. And what an exquisite figure! Lucille Ball was a star in pictures 15 years ago, yet she looks lovelier than ever. I guess she's just one of those people who will photograph young when she's 50!" All of this is true, but a more significant truth is that Lucille Ball began taking care of her beauty when many a glamor girl who has since been forgotten was busy squandering her charm.

LUCILLE Ball is absolute proof of the fact that you can establish your own
"beauty bank" by making regular deposits while you are young. Then as you grow into your 20's and 30's, you can go on making deposits and you can "draw" on your savings the rest of your life. For example, Lucy regained her figure very quickly after the birth of her baby. Her early physical "savings" helped her through this period.
On the other hand, Shelley Winters recently came to my Health Club shortly after her motherhood experience. She had never taken a regular course of physical exercises. Yet, she had the characteristic which is a basic factor in her success. She can work and concentrate. She has slimmed down beautifully and never looked better in her life.

Increasingly apparent to doctors and people in every walk of life is the fact that physical education is not merely an overall strength builder. Research has now established what we in our profession have long known—that almost any portion of the body may be completely changed if a girl will cooperate. For instance, some years back Paulette Goddard's hips and thighs were growing heavy. Instead of saying to herself, "Well, that's just the way I'm built," she went to work with me. By persistent exercise her legs became so slim and supple that she won considerable fame by wearing scanty costumes in musical pictures. I didn't do this for her. She did it for herself.

Then, there is Betty Grable and Barbara Stanwyck, both of whom are so attractive that they could well win a nomination for a Perpetual Beauty Oscar. Their figures didn't grow old while their faces remained young. Both Betty and Barbara draw wolf whistles when they cross a studio lot. Neither of them maintained their over all beauty through the application of overnight miracles.

Unfortunately, in this age of perfection and specialization, the larger percentage of young people begin at an early age to turn into "sitters" instead of "doers." This is because vast numbers of Americans thrill to the excitement of a professional sports event. Following the very active sports life of their high school days, only a small number carry on with regular sports activities as they reach their 20's. Undoubtedly, the heavily increasing population has led us to a concentration of apartment house life. Thousands of young women no longer enjoy gardening. They don't play golf because golf courses are disappearing, and therefore have become expensive. Tennis courts are no longer several to the square mile. Swimming pools are the toys of the successful folk who spend more time sitting at the water's edge than in the enjoyment of one of the finest body conditioning exercises. Places to ride horseback, to hike, hunt and fish are yearly becoming more remote.

THIS means that today's young lady must find an absolutely sure way to add lustre to her beauty. Miracles of modern makeup cannot do the job alone. It is a sad fact that our mirrors usually reflect only what we want to see. A girl can make up very carefully, look at herself and be pleased at the result. She fails to think how much more attractive she could be if her face reflected a basic glow of perfect health. Frequently mothers and dads seem boring with their warnings about "Burning the candle." The daughter afterwards makes a casual self inspection, and after a quick glance the daughter says to herself,
"Oh, I'm not slipping, really." Or, "I've been on the merry-go-round recently. I'll be as good as new after a couple of nights' sleep." What a mistake!

Psychiatrists will tell you that their increasing number of young patients come largely from those who cannot face the truth about themselves. More than one has said to me: "If young women from their teens on will form constant patterns of proper physical exercise, they will remain attractive and youthful far beyond what has come to be normal expectation. With the happy viewpoint that results from physical well being, they will not wind up a few years hence with nervous ailments, and they will have a far greater chance to make a success of their careers and marriages."

You may be surprised to know that psychiatrists, doctors, lawyers and priests are regular clients at not only Terry Hunt's but other health institutions. Not long ago one of my priest friends said to me, "Terry, you may be interested to know that the young people who are most spiritually happy in my parish are those who lead active physical lives in some sort of sport.
Their minds are always the most receptive to the truth. On the other hand, almost always, the young ladies who view their beauty as a special gift are those who eventually fail in marriage. It's hard to make them realize that beauty is not heaven sent."

Now I know that some readers of MODERN SCREEN at this moment may be smiling sardonically and saying, "Oh, this Terry Hunt—get him—giving off with a lot of clever arguments which are, after all, just words. I'm not going to rush out and buy a set of dumbbells complete with instructions just on his say-so that it will make me live happily ever after. If he's such an expert, why doesn't he say something concrete?"

All right, I will. If this article has made no real sense to you at this point, you are either neurotic or lazy. Worse, you may be both!

I challenge you to take this simple test, if you are between the ages of 16 and 35. Just answer the following questions truthfully:

1. Have you had a physical checkup this year?
2. Do you engage in some sport at least twice a week?
3. Do you sleep at least eight hours every night?
4. Do you take some form of routine physical exercise (not counting housework) for 15 minutes every day?
5. Do you participate at least once a week in a purely mental game, such as bridge, canasta, chess or checkers?
6. Do you have a good appetite?
7. Do you seldom worry?
8. Can you gain or lose weight successfully?
9. Are you known for your good disposition?
10. Do you attend some church regularly?

At this point you should have guessed that if all ten questions were answered with an immediate yes, you have very little to worry about when it comes to all around beauty and happiness, other than your own good taste in clothes and a small amount of luck in finding the right man or the best job.

Let's examine the necessity for the yes to each question. Without a doctor's physical checkup, you leave yourself open to the damaging effects of some ailment beyond your control—an illness that might be checked through early detection. Item number two: the necessity for some physical sport which provides fairly strenuous exercise, whether it be bowling or long walks, should be obvious, but because it is obvious, people are too often careless. Just as careless as they are when they sit up too late at night, whether in a beer parlor or in front of a television set. Anyone who declares that she can "get along" on five or six hours of sleep every night is running headlong toward an early old age.

Still facing the truth—fairly strong exercise twice a week is something one must be conditioned to. That's where the 15 minutes a day comes in. Equally as necessary is the "mental exercise," by which I mean not just reading, but something that keeps your mind on its toes, even if it's only a crossword puzzle.

If you can answer the first five questions in the affirmative, then I have good news for you. It is almost impossible not to give a yes answer to the last five. Why? That's elementary. Your good appetite, lack of worry, will to gain or reduce your weight and maintain a happy disposition always are all the natural result of performing the first five points.

That brings us to the important tenth question. Having been able to answer yes to all nine questions honestly means that you are a normal, healthy and happy individual. Being so you will certainly have already realized that you can control your own physical well being, perhaps even in the face of a serious handicap. Once having achieved that, you then know that the complete fulfillment of the meaning of your life as an individual can be found only through participation with your friends and loved ones in things spiritual. Thus, to make a beginning, all you need do is answer the first or the tenth question with a truthful yes. If you are intelligent and honest with yourself, you can begin at either end of the test and achieve the same result.

I KNOW I have sounded "preachy." I intended to. There is no quick cure that will make you happy with your facial or bodily appearance. Not all of you will be able to take exactly the same exercises as illustrated by the attractive young actress, Gloria Gordon, who posed for the photographs accompanying this article. Some of you, however, can locate an inexpensive, well supervised gym in your own neighborhood. Those who can't certainly can carry on with the simple exercises you learned in your gym classes at school, being careful to start slowly and stop before you are tired.

Here, I cannot resist this final warning: unless you are prepared to follow this simple program for one entire year in order to make it a lasting habit, a lot of you are going to "fall off the wagon" of this valuable health and beauty program.

And every time you do, it will be a doggone tough job to climb back on! END great day coming!

(Continued from page 35) been hard to convince it's really going to happen, which is the only thing that would put it in the miracle class as far as we're concerned. For a long time, she'd keep asking me, "Are you sure the doctors couldn't be mistaken, you're positive everything's going to be all right?" She's had it mixed up with a studio option, that they drop or pick up. Now she's convinced. We're sure, all right."

"And it's so nice that other people care," said Miss Mayo. "But you get a little embarrassed—"

"We've gone through some pretty misty-eyed sessions," said O'Shea. "Motherhood pelted with the biggest capital 'M' you've ever saw or heard. Well, that's all right. But we want to take it in our stride, too." He waved a hand at the stable area. "You think motherhood isn't out there? The mares have their foals, nowhere guys at first, and then you watch them grow into independence. Well and good. See that little Mexican, one of the laborers? He has ten children."

O'Shea breathed deeply. "Don't let me talk myself out on a limb," he said. "We would prefer a baby, shall we say? So it's ours, so we'll love it. But I don't know, sometimes I think little boys get a lot of propaganda they don't entirely deserve. As a retired monster myself, I could almost swear to it. Little girls are wonderful. And well-behaved. And you know, like when they're all scrubbed and togged out, which is a speech I usually do to a violin accompaniment. Little boys? Well, a couple of friends of ours have a little boy who's been brought up sort of, you know—progressive? No restrictions, the idea is, because then he'll be frustrated. No welts on the backside if he decides to set fire to the cat. Now, he's a nice kid but sometimes he hides it well. The other day I was over at the house and he was punching his mother. Luckily, the kid's no Marciano but he was trying. Well, the parents believe he should express himself, and when he gets out of control, they figure they're to blame, which maybe they are but not for the reasons they think. So here the kid is tagging his mother with straight lefts and right hooks and after a while she figures it's time to go back to her corner and let her seconds work her over, so she says to Junior, 'Why don't you go punch the bag for a while and pretend it's Mommy?' And the kid says, 'Naah, I'd rather hit you and pretend you're a punching bag.' All right, so maybe the kid has been reading Joe Miller, but that's not the point. No son of the O'Sheas will get by with that kind of thing. And no daughter of the O'Sheas would try it. No, frankly, I'm crazy about little girls. But let's not make it into an issue."

"They're less of a problem in other ways, too," said Miss Mayo. "Once in a while I get frightened about youngsters today, and the boys are worse. Gang fights, dope—it's unbelievable. I wish I knew what the matter was."

"I wish I knew," said O'Shea. "But we sort of hope all that's shaken out by the time our son's old enough to know or care. Anyway, we're going to make provision against it. Listen to that now, I'm talking about a son, and we don't even know. Why will people always do that?"

THE "provision" became evident as time went on and the sun grew hotter and Miss Mayo more relaxed and the bulldog more mysteriously frantic. The symposium was taking place in the O'Shea patio, flanked by three sides of the ranch house. The house is handsome and comfortable and stands on considerable space, but there is some doubt as to whether it will accommodate the new O'Shea as well as those currently resident. The planning on this detail is extensive but still nebulous. The O'Shea ranch features among other props a pair of the longest horns a long-horn steer ever parted with; a lady cook who insults O'Shea with impunity and whose talents with a ladle are astonishing, and two very large paintings of Miss Mayo, one portrait and the other as Diana the Huntress. She looks wonderful in both.

"We could build on the east wing," said Miss Mayo, "but it adjoins my dressing-room, and might not work out. The west wing's mostly kitchen."

"Or right behind here," said O'Shea. "Enclose the patio entirely. But the thing they do usually in this problem, honey, is build up."

"Up?"

"Right on the roof. The house'll support it all right. Whole nursery, complete with nurse. Of course, we've thought about moving. But to get a place the size we want, we'd have to go over to Beverly Hills or some place like that, spend $90,000 or $100,000, and we haven't got that kind of money. Besides, we could never get out of this what we put into it. I think we stay."

It sounded logical. So what about the child's name?

The O'Sheas regarded each other with mild surprise.

"We don't know," she said.

"Haven't thought much about it," said O'Shea. "I just know it'll be simple, John or Mary, Virginia or, maybe, Michael. It won't be Beauregard or Consuelo or one of those professional Irish handles like Kevin or Sean, God save the Irish just the same. Fatso's name is Jones, you know."

"Virginia Jones," said Virginia Mayo. "Of St. Louis."

As one of the Jones girls from St. Louis, Virginia always wanted to be a film actress, whereas Mr. O'Shea never doubted that show business was his forte. In other respects, however, they complement one another from opposite borders of the psyche. Miss Mayo's early life was relatively cloistered, and however sporty the parts she occasionally has played, she is a decorous, withdrawn woman.

While her leading man, M. O'S., was battling around the country in various phases of entertainment and stealing a long lead on Miss Mayo as far as picture fame went, Miss Mayo began her thesping in vaudeville, shortly after graduation from high school in St. Louis. The top man of the act was one Andy Mayo, whose last name Virginia preempted. That's how that happened. And by and by, the act became a feature of an Eddie Cantor show called Banjo Eyes, which meant Broadway. Which led to Billy Rose.

Billy Rose was and is an impresario who saw Miss Mayo with Cantor, be-thought himself of how nice she'd look in his night club, the Diamond Horseshoe, and persuaded her to stop around. Which led to Samuel Goldwyn.

Samuel Goldwyn knew Billy Rose, just as Billy Rose knew Eddie Cantor. Samuel Goldwyn went to the Diamond Horseshoe one night. He said to Miss Mayo: "Would you like to work in pictures?" Miss Mayo said, covering the subject in her usual verbose style: "Yes." Which led to Hollywood.

She appeared for Mr. Goldwyn in four pictures opposite Danny Kaye, then as the grasping wife of Dana Andrews in the much-honored The Best Years Of Our Lives. She thus became a film star and met other film stars. Which led to Michael O'Shea.

Which led to marriage on July 5, 1947.

Miss Mayo doesn't expect to be working any more until the baby comes—"unless they can cast me in a wheelchair"—but her backlog is in good shape, including South Sea Woman with Warners and Devil's Canyon with RKO. That won't make much difference. The master of the house is richly rewarded for his own acting chores whenever he tears himself away from manual duties.

O'Shea resumed the thread, or a vagrant end of the thread. "I'll tell you this," he said. "The O'Shea progeny, boy or girl, will understand the reasons for the orders his parents give him, and there I go on that 'him' again. Okay, pretend it's a boy. If we tell him to do something and he wants to know why, he's going to know. Or whatever question he has in mind. I'm stacking up a whole encyclopedia just so I'll be right, and we'll look things up together. We're going to be friends, all of us. I think it's a big item."

"And a religious background," said Miss Mayo.

"A religious background," agreed O'Shea. "Very definitely. Don't get us wrong. What the child wants to be when he grows up, he's going to be. I mean, he'll make his own choice. Of course we don't intend to steer him. If he wants to go into pictures—"

"If he has a talent for it," said Miss Mayo.

"If he has a talent for it and wants to go into pictures, then that's it. Doctor, lawyer, merchant, ball player, it's up to him. But in the—the formative years, we're going to be sure he's bred with a background of religious decency and faith. That goes back to what we were talking about, this delinquency pitch. We think that with the right fundamentals, he'll beat that. That's the most important. Maybe—maybe after that, or in spite of that, maybe there's nothing you can do, maybe he'll be wild just the same, what they call a bad boy. With this one for a mother, I don't see how it could happen, but they tell me it happens. But we'll have done all we could."

WHAT of the rather delicate problem of getting him used to the circumstances that his parents will on the whole be pronouncedly more celebrated than the parents of the children with whom he will associate?

"We're not worried about it," said Miss Mayo.

"No problem," said O'Shea. "We just tell him some people work in factories, some in offices, some this, some that. We happen to work in pictures. Factories of our own. We tell him we're lucky, and it's the truth. When he's old enough to know what gimmick means, we tell him we've got that, too. But it doesn't affect him. He's an individual in his own right, with his own responsibilities. He's got to do it."

The bulldog jumped up on Miss Mayo's lap and flattened its pug-nose against her straight one in wholehearted delirium. O'Shea told it to desist at the same time Miss Mayo told it to stay where it was. The bulldog screwed its head around in schizophrenic bewilderment and compromised by climbing down and giving O'Shea a dirty look.

"You can see I've got an iron hand," he said. "First time he's obeyed in six weeks."

"Why don't you write about bulldogs?" asked Miss Mayo. "Everyone should write about bulldogs." The dog was moved by the accolade. It got back up again and licked her face. "All right then, stay there," said O'Shea. It did.

And how did the O'Sheas feel about secondary education, proceeding on the theory the child would be a son?

O'Shea had thought about this one, and delivered his verdict firmly and at some length, while Miss Mayo bent on him markedly tender and sympathetic attention.

"Oh, yes," said O'Shea, "he's going to college. Somewhere out here. I'm not sold on the Harvard-Yale-Princeton-or-dropped-dead tradition. I want him to know animal husbandry, things like that, along with the rest. Not that they don't have that in the East, but we'd want him somewhere near us, I imagine. But there's another reason he's going. Let me put it the best I can."

O'Shea stopped, took off his baseball cap, rubbed his hair, put the cap on again, turned to Miss Mayo with half-lifted shoulders, then studied the toes of his shoes. For him, it was a long, long pause.

FINALLY he said: "He's going to have what I didn't have, and I don't mean only education. I mean friends. Roots and background. Maybe you don't understand that. But I do. People like Virginia and me, we know. Try this on for size: I only went as far as the fifth grade in school. All right, that was okay in some ways. I've taught myself a lot, and naturally there've been compensations. I'm a show-business guy and I know it. But do you know, I haven't got a single friend, not a friend in the world, that I can sit down with and say, 'Remember the time—?' Not one, can you imagine that? I had two pals when I was a kid. One's a priest now, a long way from here, and the other's in Sing Sing for life. With my son, if I have a son, it's not going to be like that. He won't be alone."

O'Shea coughed slightly and shifted position. "Don't make it sound tearful," he said. "It ill becomes me. But put it down as fact. Try it another way. People like, uh, interviewers, ask us, who do we entertain? Well—we don't entertain anybody! We haven't got any friends. Have you got any friends, Virginia?"

"One."

"You see? One friend. That's not kidding. Acquaintances, sure. We've got thousands of acquaintances. But no friends. Because no roots. That's how show business is. In your business, too, maybe. You know everybody and you don't know anybody. A lot of very big wheels around here would tell you the same, once they had a couple of drinks. But this one of ours, he'll have friends from school, he'll go back to reunions, he'll play Remember-the-Time till it comes out of his ears. That must be a helluva rich part of life, that remember-the-time deal. And he's going to have it.

"You know, they say around here I'm a social sort of guy, only that's not the word I want. What is it? Greg-something. Gregarious. Sure. I travel with the Hollywood Stars, I go over to the ball park near here, and at my age I shouldn't be bending down for grounders, but it's the companionship. I'm making up for what I never had. I live it up now. But my child is going to live it up before, after and between time. He's not going to have that fringe feeling. He or she.

"Like the other night, honey, I don't know if I told you, I was in The Club over in Beverly Hills, you know the one. They just call it The Club, and all these wheels belong to it, you know, like doctors and lawyers, very substantial people. Well, this guy I was with, he's a wheel, and he wanted me to meet some friends, and of course I did. And you know the routine, the lawyer would say to the doctor: 'You still killing your patients?' And the doctor, you know: 'Don't believe anything this shyster tells you!' and all that. In our business, we might call it a little corny, but it's the kind of corn I'd give my eye-teeth to be a part of. Little O'Shea, he'll have it. Then we went over to meet the wives of the same men, and they were just as close, you know. Intimate. Casual. It was real warm. To tell the truth, you feel a little chilly being on the outside of it anyway when you've been out as long as I have. You're never quite there, you know what I mean? Not that they try to make you feel that way. They can't help it. They've closed ranks long ago. That's what I'm trying to say. These people, they're all Los Angeles people. They grew up together, went to school together, I don't know, got sort of stabilized together, if you follow me. Very stable bunch. They've got a lot to remember. What I've got to remember, I'd rather not. And even if I wanted to, I've got nobody to remember it with. But little O'Shea, he's going to be lousy with all that. He's going to have it if his old man has to drag him into the registrar's office by his heels. Isn't that the way you think about it, Sugar?"

"Oh, yes," said Miss Mayo, packing quite a good deal into it.

"That's why college," said O'Shea. "Among other things. But principally, that's why."

"You've forgotten your daughter," said Miss Mayo.

"Not for a moment," said O'Shea. "It's just that I'd know more about a son, having been one once myself. This one here, she'll do more of the talking about the daughter."

"Oh, the same religious background," said Miss Mayo. "And then, everything we can do for her. Very good schools, nice associates—we hope."

"A certain kind of background," said O'Shea, "can make you into a certain kind of snob, and it's not always the background you think. Mine's done it for me, but I insist it's a healthy snobbery if it makes me particular about the way my children are raised. I can't fool myself that when they reach a certain age, they're Competition's Wonderful!

It's one reason we all have so many of the good things that make life worth living!

Johnny couldn't tell you whether Mary's friendlier smile, or her name on the sign, made him choose her lemonade. But he's glad he did! Because let's face it—we all like to have somebody try extra hard to win our good will.

In fact, when so many brand manufacturers compete for your favor, as they do every day in this land of ours—it makes you feel pretty wonderful, doesn't it?

Their keen competition is the chief reason we can all choose today from the biggest line-up of top-quality brands of merchandise ever offered to a purchaser anywhere in the world! It explains why makers of brand-name products never stop trying to improve their brands to increase our satisfaction. And why they keep us up-to-date about them in magazines like this.

going to meet people that aren't the best for them. But by then, they should have the perspective to see it. That way, at least, we'll provide every advantage we can. Not just the schooling but an outdoor, ranch life, the kind we lead, and a general knowledge of what it takes, and knowing what's right and what's wrong. Then we cross our fingers."

O'SHEA went to answer the phone. When he came back, he had resumed the mental toughness with which he habitually cloaks himself and which reveals with a large amount of charm the native intelligence with which he and Miss Mayo deal with life.

"Do you," he asked, "see any spiritual radiations around Fatso here? Of course, it's early in the game."

Miss Mayo, it had to be admitted, looked no more spiritual than usual. She looks a trifle spiritual whether enceinte or not. Miss Mayo laughed encouragingly.

"This—this matter," said O'Shea, "has been approached on a level we don't feel quite up to. I said that before, didn't I? It's gratifying in a way, but we have an idea we're not any different from other parents. Prospective, I mean. To put it delicately, the same modus operandi prevails, and our baby is going to look like a baby, not that that's bad. But some of the dialogue that's gone on on the subject, to me it's been not un-nauseating. Maybe the casting office slipped up when it put me in a father bit. But I'm going to be rehearsing hard." He went through the business with the cap again. "One woman wanted to know if I'd belt the kid around if he got out of line. That would look nice, wouldn't it? Belting an infant. How much of a character am I supposed to be? The kid will learn by experience. He, she, it—do you speak of your kid as an 'it'—won't be coddled, but I can't see myself taking to the bullwhip. And Fatso here can't even lift a bullwhip. I think it'll be nice if he respects his old man, not for my sake but because I wouldn't be so helpful as a parent if he didn't. He's going to respect Fatso anyway, because who could help it? I like the idea of ranch life for him, and learning naturally about what comes naturally, and I think all in easy stages, so we don't have progressives on our hands, giving Fatso the old one-two because the punching bag hurts their hands. I think we give her—let's make it 'her' for a change—a certain amount of rein, but not too much or too little, and we'll have to recognize how much that means when the time comes."

"Mike," said Miss Mayo.

"What?" said O'Shea.

"Lunch," said Miss Mayo.

"So soon?" said O'Shea. "I'd hardly got my first wind."

is liz losing her beauty?

(Continued from page 36) and the only women who keep their beauty are those who do something about it. There can be no physical loveliness without a depth of soul, a dash of spirit, and a lively mind.

Liz has these things, but if she does not put them to full use the natural consequence will be the way of all flesh. Since her childhood there have been evidences of an unusual sensitivity. Her mother tells of the times when she was ill and the small Elizabeth would steal softly into her mother's bedroom and lay on the pillow a single rose which she had picked from the garden. When, at 12 years of age, she became known to American movie audiences through her role in National Velvet, people noticed the unusual quality of the child. She was, they said, an 'old soul.' Her memorable scene in the attic with Anne Revere convinced the more discerning audiences that there was something not quite worldly about the girl. In the ensuing publicity they read about Elizabeth's love of animals, how she could tame any wild thing and how, when making the picture, she had insisted on doing a dangerous scene which many stunt men would turn down. King Charles, a horse which stood 17 hands high and whose temperament was such that all hands on the set gave him a wide berth, was supposed to come thundering down a narrow road. The script called for Elizabeth to stand in his path and stop his blind stampede. Naturally, her mother objected to her doing the scene, and the director was trying to find a double who would dare the act when Elizabeth approached him and pleaded that he let her do it. The horse had been unmanageable unless Elizabeth was near him, and she was so certain that he would stop for her that the executives finally agreed. The scene was set up and emergency medical aid summoned, and everyone on the back lot held his breath. The stallion was given a whack on the hind quarters that sent him tearing down the road, mane flying and hooves pounding. The small figure of Elizabeth moved out into his path and held her ground, her arms stretched wide.

Mrs. Taylor, on the sidelines, almost fainted, and the cameramen got ready to jump. King Charles continued his charge until within a few feet of Elizabeth, and then he slid to a stop and walked a few steps to gently nuzzle her shoulder.

No one who watched this incident came away without the conviction that this youngster had the courage of a commando and a strange, St. Francis-like power over animals. It certainly proved that she had a depth people did not understand, and inasmuch as such a quality seldom leaves a human being, it can be assumed that the Elizabeth Taylor of today is still blessed with it.

It proved, too, that she has spirit, yet currently she shows little of it. It is possible that the pressures of her movie career, at their height during her formative adolescent years, have taken the starch out of Liz. It is also highly probable that the heartbreak of her tragic marriage to Nicky Hilton further removed her gumption. At any rate, she spends her life today in idyllic bliss on her hilltop with second husband Michael Wilding. They seldom leave the house, a natural circumstance considering the existence of their baby, yet it seems unusual that Liz can't be pried off the hilltop for anything except emergencies or studio orders.

The fact proves her present happiness in her role as Mrs. Michael Wilding and mother of the small Mike, but on the other hand this type of sleek contentment can lead to laziness in all things. At 21, Liz is settled in the sedentary life of a middle-aged matron, an existence that makes for great peace of mind, but one without stimulation to lend sparkle to the eye or to the conversation.

If she doesn't care about her movie career, this standstill life is highly commendable. It is obviously the kind of life that Liz loves, and with it she finds complete contentment. But if she does care, she should remember that her face is her fortune. Without stimulation, both physical and mental, a face can become vapid and empty. Too many women have lived up their youth, taking it and its loveliness for granted.

Is Liz interested in acting? She seems now to care nothing about anything except her husband and child. This air of not caring is one of the things that has made her well-liked, for she seems as devoid of temperament as an old shoe. "There are a lot of nice things about Liz," says one of her closest friends, "but the nicest is the fact that she never gets upset about anything. Or at least, if she does, she doesn't force her unhappiness on her friends. I've never seen her lose her temper or get ruffled—it seems as though she's devoid of nerves. Even when she was having all that trouble with Nicky, she was still as slow moving and quiet spoken as ever. She's one of the easiest people to get along with that I know."

"Lackadaisical Liz," some have called her. They do it in a friendly way, a comradely sort of ribbing, but herein lies a serious danger to her career. Liz is listless about it, or at least appears to be. She has given what may well be termed inspired performances in only a handful of movies . . . National Velvet (in fact everything she did as a child), then years afterward, in A Place In The Sun, and rumor has it that in Elephant Walk, her latest, she is once more acceptable as an actress of worth. In the rest of them, Liz has moved through her scenes in a seemingly careless, even bored fashion. It is notable that the last two mentioned pictures are the only two made away from MGM, her home lot. Paramount has made both of them, and in both movies Liz has had the advantage of top-notch direction. George Stevens did A Place In The Sun and William Dieterle Elephant Walk, and it is common knowledge that she needs a good director. As one of her past directors says, "Sometimes it's like pulling teeth to get a performance out of Elizabeth. The thing that makes up for the director's work is that when he does get a fine scene from her, it is something so good that he can add it to his collection of things to boast about. I know Liz has it—a really great sensitivity—it's there somewhere, but just buried so deep that it takes work to bring it out."

This devil-may-care attitude is quite likely to trip up her career one of these days. Some say it's laziness, pure and simple, that anybody who can sit at home day after day and care about nothing except her baby and her husband is headed straight for seed. The accusation of laziness is pure speculation, but some facts would appear to bear it out. When Liz was pregnant, for example, she gained 40 pounds, despite cautioning from her doctor. And following the baby's birth Liz refused to pay any attention to her figure. It was three months before Michael Howard Wilding was photographed with his mother, and although the studio excused the delay with the reason that Liz was not yet feeling up to snuff, those who saw Liz suspected that it was because of her weight.

AFTER setting up an interview with Liz a few weeks after she had come home from the hospital, Hedda Hopper drove up the hill, opened the door, took one look at Liz and gasped, "You're fat!"

Hedda has been criticized for her frankness many times, but in this instance at least, it can be assumed that she was handing out advice that was well worthwhile. It stemmed from her own knowledge of the theater, for she knows as well as anyone, and perhaps better, that an actress cannot afford to let herself go. The camera tells all, and Hedda knows it, and also knows from experience that a new mother must get on with the chore of exercises no matter how distasteful they may be to her.

To the average girl, a thunderbolt such as Hedda's candid reaction would have been enough to send her flying into her exercises. But not Liz. The advice went unheeded for several weeks, and the extra poundage was eventually shed through diet and massage rather than exercise. It would point up the fact that while Liz may not be literally lazy, she certainly is not overly-ambitious.

Her quiet acceptance of her tremendous popularity and the workaday world necessary to attain and keep it have made some people think that Liz is a tractable young creature who is content to let others do her planning for her, a girl who does not bother to think very much for herself.

MICHAEL Wilding first met her when she was in England making The Conspirators. She was 16 at the time, and he remembers remarking to himself that "they must grow up very quickly in America." Later, after her divorce from Hilton, he saw her once again, this time on her home ground. He felt an immediate attraction, this time pulling himself up short by recalling her age, and his. Yet when he telephoned her and accepted an invitation to visit her, he realized on coming to know her that she was a full blown woman, mentally as well as physically.

What did Mike Wilding think of Liz? A man of his charm and wit cannot be an ingenue where women are concerned, and so it is probable that he is a man selective enough that he does not succumb to mere beauty with nothing to back it up. P-knew she was beautiful—a man with half an eye can see that in a split second—but a man of Wilding's caliber requires more than physical attraction to make him pop the question. It is therefore illogical to assume that Liz hasn't much between her ears. She grew up in the midst of a well-educated, well-bred family, for the most part in the company of adults. Her parents and their friends were erudite people associated with literature and painting, and Liz traveled not only among them, but through the world, having crossed the Atlantic more than 30 times.

Those who know the Wildings well report that when Liz is with her husband her conversation is sharp as a tack, that far from being dull, she sparkles like a diamond before a fire. It's all there, as the director has said—the sensitivity, the wit, the spirit and sparkle. The only thing wrong is that lately Liz shows little inclination to light up for anyone but her husband.

A friend recently said, "Liz is so well adjusted to her marriage that she is forgetting her career. She has never really wanted to be a glamor girl. I think she often has really resented the glances men have given her. But if she wants the career, I wish she'd pay more attention to it and to herself. Without that face, well, to tell the truth, in a crowd I don't think she would be noticed very much. Her looks are so outstanding that they're the only thing you think of until you get to know her better and learn what a nice person she is."

HOLLYWOOD's cameramen have noticed that Liz is not quite as photogenic as she used to be and this, to any star, is a danger signal. We do not mean to criticize, only to caution, to send up a small signal flare to Liz, whose beauty is far above that of the average movie star. It is something that would be sorely missed by all of us, and we wish she would wake up and start caring, before things drift to the point where she must work at that beauty. If that ever happened, it wouldn't be the same.

Families like this—more than three million of them—like new white Ipana better than any other tooth paste.

Important—especially if you can't brush after every meal!

NEW IPANA® DESTROYS DECAY AND BAD-BREATH BACTERIA

Even one brushing can stop bad breath all day!*
Every brushing fights tooth decay!

Dentists advise brushing teeth after every meal... to remove food particles on which bad-breath and decay bacteria thrive. But when this is inconvenient, you still get wonderful results with new white Ipana.

Even one brushing with new Ipana removes most of the harmful bacteria from your mouth.

*When you use new Ipana in the morning, your breath will stay fresh and clean for up to 9 hours. Even after smoking... and eating anything you please except foods like onions and garlic. Laboratory tests proved it.

And when you brush your teeth regularly after meals with new Ipana, you effectively fight tooth decay. That means less pain and trouble, less risk of losing your teeth.

What's more, brushing your teeth with new Ipana from gum margins toward biting edges helps remove irritants that can lead to gum troubles.

Ipana also brings you a new minty flavor. Thousands of families who tried it liked it 2 to 1 for taste.

We're sure you and your children will like it, too. Why not try a tube today? Look for the yellow-and-red striped Ipana carton wherever fine drug products are sold.

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD

I, ROSEMARY, TAKE THEE, JOSÉ . . . LOUELLA'S PARTY REVEALS LATEST LOVES,

THE phone by my bed rang at six o'clock in the morning. I had forgotten to disconnect it for, as a rule, I don't care to talk to anyone at this time of the day.

The long distance operator said, "Dallas, Texas, calling," and I couldn't have cared less until the hoppiest voice I have heard in a long time came bounding over the telephone wires:

"Louella, it's Rosemary! José and I are leaving in just a few minutes to be married in a little town in Oklahoma about a four hours' drive from here.

"I promised you the story before I left Hollywood and that you would be the first to know of our wedding plans. I know it's early in the morning, honey, and I hate to disturb you at this hour, but I'm keeping my promise to you."

Disturb me????????? I could stand to be disturbed like this for the rest of my life because, as you've guessed by now, my happy and excited caller was Rosemary Clooney telling me about her and José Ferrer's elopement plans.

I love this little blonde singer almost as much as though she were one of my own family. I've always found her to be so honest and so sincere. And, perhaps more than anyone else, I know how deeply she has been in love with José for so long.

There were many heartbreaking moments when they didn't know whether or not they could be married. José's wife, Phyllis Hill, did not seem to be in a hurry to get a divorce. But after waiting for months, she suddenly filed for divorce.

I knew when Rosemary planned out the following day for Dallas to join Ferrer who was playing in The Taming Of The Shrew there, that wedding plans were afoot.

I broadcast my "hunch" on my radio show. "Ever since you broadcast that we probably would be married immediately," Rosemary laughed over the phone, "we have been haunted and trailed by Texas reporters. They've been thicker than flies in the hotel lobby."

Suddenly, Rosemary's voice was serious and very sweet.

"I'm the happiest girl in the world, darling, and so very much in love."

And, may you always be that way, Rosemary. You are a wonderful girl and you deserve your happiness.

JOAN CRAWFORD and Michael Wilding were in the middle of rehearsing a love scene for Torch Song when Liz Taylor arrived on the set. Joan spotted Liz and froze. Biting her underlip in exasperation, she said under her breath, "Oh, reaaaally."

"Oh, reaaaally what?????" said Mike who turned his back and walked over to kiss his wife.

There's no love being lost between Joan and Wilding on this picture. If they weren't such good actors, the love scenes would look like they had just come out of the deep freeze.

The trouble apparently started when Mike was quoted as saying this was the first picture he had ever made with his back turned to the camera.

He also said he was consulting "my wife about how to play the love scenes with Miss Crawford."

So far, Joan has said very little (except under her breath)—but oh, my—they need no cool air conditioning on this set!

As I've told you before in this department, I love to give parties and few of my guests ever have any more fun than I do at my own shindigs.

This year, my assistant, Dorothy Monners, and I decided to co-charess a party in honor of Dorothy's husband, John Haskell, and song writer Jimmy McHugh who celebrated their respective birthdays within a week of each other.

So we covered my garden with a blue and white tent canopy with cellophane "walls" so that the flowers showed through, covered the tables with pink cloths lighted by candles and invited our friends to wish the boys "Happy birthday."

Donald O'Connor came with—of course—Marilyn Erskine, with whom he is so smitten (as I write this) that he is dating no other girl.

Marilyn is the girl who plays Ida Cantor in The Eddie Cantor Story opposite Keefe Brasselle. She is no beauty but she's cute and pert and evidently is as smitten with Don as he is with her.

I'm not sure how Emily Post would feel about it, but Marilyn spent more time sitting on Don's lap than she did sitting in her chair at dinner.

June Allyson, with a cute new haircut along the straight lines, saw the young lovers and sighed up at her fella, Dick Powell, "Ain't love grand?" Dick agreed that it was—and is.

NEWS

FASHIONS, AND TALENTS . . .

The highlight of the evening was the "floor show" emceed by none other than Janie Wyman who has never been prettier or more amusing in her life.

George Jessel, himself, has nothing on Missy Wyman when it comes to introducing talent and keeping the ball rolling.

Wonderful musical comedy star, Dolores Grey, who was in Los Angeles with Carnival in Flanders, brought down the house, or should I say, the tent?

Freddie Karger's music accompanied all the talent, including a couple of numbers sung by his bride, Janie.

George Burns did his old vaudeville routine, hilariously funny, and no one laughed harder than Gracie Allen who admits that her husband can break up her composure if he says nothing funnier than "Good morning."

Dorothy Lamour sang Jimmy McHugh's "I Can't Give You Anything But Love, Baby" with a lot of vim—and Ginny Simms also gave with some wonderful numbers.

Such Hollywood producers as William Goetz, Joseph Schenck, Darryl Zanuck and Miller Rocknol had a time for themselves sitting back and enjoying the talent without having to do any of the cutting or bcsing.

As for the fashion tips—most of the girls wore summer cottons, off the shoulder, with organdy or loosely knitted stoles.

ONE of the saddest things that has ever happened in connection with my radio show was having to "erase" the little talk Janet Leigh and I had recorded on tape about her happiness over her expected baby.

Janet had been so happy when she told

Glomorous extrovert Rito Hoyworth "withers without love" but friends were shocked to learn that her latest amour, impulsive Dick Hoymes, may find himself deported to his native Argentina as a result of romancing with Rito.

Jane Powell and Gene Nelson are still seen together, but seem to have little to talk about. Is the finality of Jane's divorce from Georgy Steffen disturbing her? Or is her new romance cooling off?

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

Continued

me that she and Tony Curtis were expecting the stork. She said, "It seems so early to make the announcement—but Tony and I are so delighted we just had to tell the world."

The day the show was to go on the air, a depressed Janet called me from the hospital.

"We've lost our baby. I've just called Tony in Honolulu (he was on location there) and broken the sad news to him, myself. I just can't tell you how disappointed we are, Miss Parsons."

Janet didn't have to tell me. The hurt and unhappiness was all in her voice.

WHAT is it with Rita Hayworth?? Every time she falls in love she behaves as though she owned the Cook Tours the way she chases around with her "heart" of the moment.

Columbia studio is fit to be tied because (as this is written) Rita is incognito in a small town in Pennsylvania hiding out while Dick Haymes fulfills a business engagement in New York.

Just before they went east, Dick followed Rita to Honolulu where she was making location scenes for Miss Sadie Thompson.

Remember when Rita and Aly Khan were courting and they seemed to be traveling half around the world and back together before they were finally married at Aly's estate, L'Horizon, in Cannes?

I sometimes think there must be something of the mystery writer in Rita's make-up.

You never saw such a "production" after she made up her mind to go East while Dick was there. She bought a ticket on the Santa Fe straight into New York city.

Then, apparently, she "disappeared" from the scene. Actually, she got off the train in Ossining, New York, and hid out.

Meanwhile, in Hollywood, Dick was going through some contortions of his own. He, too, boarded a train, got off at the first stop, doubled back to Los Angeles and caught the first plane to New York!

Such carrying-on!

What worries Rita's bosses and the men who handle her publicity is that with all her world-wide tours with Aly Khan, she eventually married him.

With Dick Haymes this won't be possible for a long time. He is still legally the husband of Nora Eddington Flynn Haymes.

JOHNNY GRANT, the disc jockey who has made two entertainment jaunts to Korea, Shelley Winters laughs with Mr. and Mrs. Stewart Granger, doesn't seem depressed by Vittorio's absence. Maybe she's getting used to it!

tells me:

"Doris Day is five-to-one the favorite pin-up girl of our soldiers in Korea. In fact, they'll trade a dozen pictures of other Hollywood stars to get just one of Doris."

Recently, Johnny interviewed her on his show and told her this: "Doris, how can you keep from going to Korea to entertain these kids who are so crazy about you?"

Her answer was, "I'm afraid to fly."

Well, then, Doris, how about motoring or training to some of the nearest camps or hospitals?

THE most exasperated wife in Hollywood is Mrs. Jeff Chandler. Won't even talk to him on the phone.

I hear one of the big troubles between them is that Marge "can't stand" Jeff's new personality now that he's trying to be a singer and a nightclub entertainer plus developing a corny brand of comedy a la Jerry Lewis.

Before it was generally known that Jeff had moved out of their home, someone called the house and asked if Jeff was there.

"No," Marge is reported to have retorted. "Cochise Lewis has moved out!!!"

MAYBE it's love and maybe they are very happy, but Jane Powell and Gene Nelson seem to have nothing to say to each other when they dine in public. They just sit at the table silently eating.

The other evening Jane wasn't even eating. A wisdom tooth was giving her a lot of pain.

An interested eavesdropper at an adjoining table reports that their entire conversation all evening was when Gene said to his girl friend:

"Can't you order something you can just gum???"

NOT since the late Susan Peters was crippled by a gun wound on a hunting trip, struck down in the bloom of her career, has Hollywood's heart ached more than it has over lovely little Suzan Ball.

She has a very serious bone condition in her leg which may leave her crippled and end her career.

Yet, in the face of all this tragedy, Suzan has won everyone's respect with her cheerfulness and courage.

Instead of giving up and considering herself a martyr, Suzan goes to parties on her crutches, attends concerts and keeps herself "posted on the events of this wonderful world of ours."

Even when it looked for a while as though Suzan's leg would have to be amputated, this fine little girl kept her chin up and won the love and admiration of complete strangers as well as her many friends.

ANOTHER wonderful girl who is having a rough going and doesn't deserve it is former child star Jane Withers Moss.

She has been ill with muscular pains and anemia which looked for a time like partial paralysis. But her doctors now feel that Jane's serious illness has been brought on by emotional upset over the breakup of her marriage to wealthy Bill Moss. The sad part is that they have three lovely children.

PERSONAL Opinions: Lori Nelson's face was voted the most perfect to photograph by west coast photographers. Above Elizabeth Taylor's, Eleanor Parker's or Audrey Hepburn's, boys???????

Can't understand why Marge and Gower Champion failed to hit the top popularity polls as movie stars. They are so adorable. Could be that husband and wife teams don't have the necessary sex appeal to set the teen-agers squealing. . . .

Coollest and most original summer fad—Ginger Rogers' softly woven straw skirts in all the pastel colors. . . .

Amusing the way Cleo Moore can't believe she's really launched on a successful career and keeps on buying canned groceries and staples against that proverbial "old rainy day" when the larder is bare again. . . .

Terry Moore does a lot of table hopping, oftentimes to the annoyance of her escorts. . . .

It could happen only in Hollywood that the billboards have swimming pools! I'm not kidding. Right where Sunset Boulevard turns into Beverly Hills is a huge sign for the Sahara Hotel in Las Vegas and built right into it is a real swimming pool. Red Skelton tied up traffic for miles when he jumped in with his clothes on. Oh, Hollywood, my Hollywood!

FOCUSING on Robert Wagner: His hair is clipped so short for the Dutch boy wig he wears for Prince Valiant that he says his crew cut has a crew cut! . . . He can't look at anything made of steel without remembering how disappointed his father was that he didn't follow in his footsteps in the steel business. . . . He has the patience of Job and doesn't even mind being kept waiting for his "dates" to fuss with their hair or faces. . . . Unavoidably, I kept him waiting an hour on a recent interview and instead of being surly about it he said he was sorry I had had so much trouble all day. . . . He's six feet tall or a little over but doesn't look it because he does not always stand up straight. . . . He says this is due to dating and dancing with girls considerably shorter than himself. So I guess this means he likes 'em petite. . . . He's proud of the fact that he used to caddy for such stars as Clark Gable, Randy Scott, Fred Astaire and John Hodiak. . . . Women wearing pink always catch his eye. He approves of make-up, particularly lipstick on gals, but hates eyelash "goop" put on with a shovel. . . . He considers himself quite mature for his 23 years, is sure he acts and thinks older. . . . When he marries he wants to be able to afford many luxuries for his bride, fur coats, diamonds, sporty cars—the works. . . . For a boy so young he has a great deal of gentleness and kindness so perhaps he's right about his "maturity" . . . He has a secret ambition to be a good chef and surprise his friends with the fancy dishes he concocts. This ambition may be deferred on account of he can't understand a cook book!

THE Letter Box: Evelyn Tierney (says she no relation to Gene) writes from New York that she doesn't approve of her namesake's romance with Aly Khan. "She's my favorite screen star but how can she fail to realize that the outcome of her fling with the Prince will merely be a duplication of Rita Hayworth's experience?"

Joseph Weir, Buffalo, gives three cheers that Guy Madison's career is in high again. "I've been a fan of his ever since his first movie for David Selznick, Since You Went Away. He's a fine actor and a fine man and I rejoice that Warners have big plans for him. Wish his private life were as happy."

"You never mention James Mason," writes Mrs. Leonard Fierfonte of Brooklyn. "Is this accidental or on purpose, Louella?" On purpose, ma'am—on purpose.

That's all for now. See you next month.

SPECIAL TO MODERN SCREEN:

hollywood report

by Mike Connolly

famous columnist for
The Hollywood Reporter

WHO'S MAD AT WHOM:

Guy Madison and Rory Calhoun aren't as friendly as they used to be. Now that Guy has suddenly become a big star, thanks to his success in Charge At Feather River, the boys hardly ever see each other. . . . Very few of Rosemary Clooney's co-workers at Paramount approve of her marriage to José Ferrer. And the studio itself has never approved of the match. Even so, I saw her at the Stalag 17 premiere, accompanied by her brother, Nick, only a few days after the wedding, and said, "Congratulations, Rosie." She flashed that wonderful smile—and kissed me! How can anybody stay mad at a gal like that? . . . Diana Lynn filed for divorce from John Lindsay and sailed for England, whereupon John Lindsay started dating Liz Scott—and the day after their very first date I ran into Liz outside her home on the residential end of Hollywood Boulevard. She was wringing her hands. "I couldn't sleep after John took me home from Ciro's early this morning," she moaned. "The police were swarming all over the place last night—because my next-door neighbor committed suicide—and I certainly can't sleep now that I know what happened!" . . . And whaddya know—the very next night John was out again—at LaRue with Myrna Dell!

Paget

Lana Turner has been complaining to friends that Lex Barker is too possessive. . . . Debra Paget phoned me, crying because I had printed that remark she made to me—that she had finally been kissed, and that the boy who kissed her also gave her a five-carat diamond ring. It seems that other columnists had interpreted this to mean that a studio boss had given her the ring. The boss told Debra to straighten the press out, and here was Debra explaining to me: "I fibbed. The ring belongs to my mother!" . . . Aly Khan was freed from his first wife while traveling around Europe with Rita Hayworth. Now he has been freed from Rita while traveling around Europe with Gene Tierney. . . . Sharman Douglas and Pete Lawford, a Honolulu twosome a month or so ago, don't even yoo-hoo now. . . . I've got a feeling that unless Vittorio Gassman keeps those home fires burning more frequently, Shelley ain't gonna throw on any more logs! . . . Speaking of money and Rita Hayworth, don't be surprised if the Princess puts up the backing for Dick Haymes to make a settlement with Nora Flynn Haymes, after which pals expect Rita and Dick to wed.

HOLLYWOOD HEARTBEATS:

Freeman and Damone

Sunset Boulevard sight: Janie Powell and Gene Nelson following each other down the Sunset Strip, lovingly touching bumpers. . . . It's whispered around Hollywood that Audrey Hepburn and Greg Peck have been playing some of their scenes from Roman Holiday off-screen. . . . Rock Hudson has been helping Betty Abbott paint her new bedroom, and greater love hath no man than to pick up a paintbrush when he could be sunning himself on the Santa Monica sands. . . . Twosomes: Vic Damone and Pier Angeli, Vic Damone and Mona Freeman. . . . And then Mona started dating Lew Ayres. . . . Upon which Kirk Douglas, supposedly Pier's one-and-only, started going out with Geraldine Brooks in Rome. Did you know that Kirk and, Gerry were once very serious? Alexis Smith and Craig Stevens are dating a lot again.

Marilyn Erskine told me all about her dates with Donald O'Connor: "Going out with Don is what you call happy times—no pressure—no nothin'—just fun—I like it!" . . . For a girl in love, Jeff Donnell looked very unhappy for a spell, there. Could be because Aldo Ray wasn't—for a spell. Shirley Temple (Continued on page 21)

FROM THE MOVIES RECORD OF THE MONTH

JULIUS CAESAR—sound track album (MGM). In the old days it was "No, I didn't see the picture, but I read the book." Nowadays, if you miss a movie, you can just say "No, I didn't see the picture, but I heard the record." And this record is a perfect example of how much such a statement can mean.

It's a 12-inch LP running almost half the entire length of the picture. So well has it been edited that none of the overall dramatic impact has been lost.

John Houseman, the producer, personally edited the disc; he also acts as narrator in a few spots where the action needs to be linked together.

The result is an impressive production, with the famous "Friends, Romans, countrymen" speech of Mark Antony (Marlon Brando) as a special highlight. All the principals are heard—James Mason, John Gielgud, Louis Calhern, Edmond O'Brien. The appearances of Deborah Kerr and Greer Garson are brief but effective; the musical tracks, written and conducted by Miklos Rozsa, aid the record as they did the film.

GENTLEMEN PREFER BLONDES—When Love Goes Wrong by Margaret Whiting and Jimmy Wakely* (Capitol).

JOURNEY TO SOUTH AMERICA—Gaviotta (A Peruvian Waltz) by Percy Faith* (Columbia).

LIMELIGHT—Eternally (Terry's Theme) by Dinah Shore (Victor); Jean Campbell (Coral).

Too bad they had to fit this pretty melody with such trite, unoriginal lyrics. Even Dinah can't make them sound like much.

MELBA—The Melba Waltz (Dream Time) by Jeff Morley (Okeh).

THE MOON IS BLUE—title song by Ralph Marterie* (Mercury).

THOSE REDHEADS FROM SEATTLE—I Guess It Was You All The Time by Ray Anthony* (Capitol). Baby, Baby, Baby by Tommy Edwards* (MGM).

POPULAR

TERESA BREWER-DON CORNELL—*The Glad Song (Coral).

Teamed together for the first time in almost a year, Terry and Don are at their best in this one and the coupling, What Happened To The Music?

FRANKIE LAINE—*Hey, Joe (Columbia).

Carl Smith was the first to record this, but with Frankie's version it's become a hit in both the popular and the hillbilly music worlds. Other side is an Irving Berlin song, Sittin' In The Sun.

FRANK SINATRA—*I've Got The World On A String (Capitol).

Maybe Frankie's switch to the Capital label has brought the long-awaited change in his luck on records. As we went to press, this one looked promising.

Which is more likely to succeed?

Or to put it more romantically, who will be first to marry? Will it be Enid with her blonde beauty, radiant personality and quick wit? Or Jane, with her shy, retiring ways? You would guess Enid, of course. But you would be wrong. Jane will get to the altar long before Enid, because Jane has something that Enid has not . . . a breath that is always agreeable and sweet. She keeps it that way with Listerine Antiseptic, the extra-careful precaution against halitosis (bad breath). Clever Jane! Stupid Enid!

Listerine Antiseptic not only stops halitosis (bad breath) instantly . . . it usually keeps it stopped for hours on end. This superior deodorant effect is due to Listerine's ability to kill germs.

No chlorophyll kills odor bacteria like this . . . instantly

Germs are by far the most common cause of halitosis. Because they start the fermentation of proteins that are always present in your mouth. In fact, research shows that your breath stays sweeter longer depending upon the degree to which you reduce germs in your mouth. Listerine instantly kills these germs by millions, including bacteria that cause fermentation. Brushing your teeth doesn't give you any such antiseptic protection. Chlorophyll or chewing gums do not kill germs: Listerine does.

Clinically proved four times better than tooth paste

No wonder that in recent clinical tests Listerine Antiseptic averaged four times better in reducing breath odors than the two leading tooth pastes, as well as the three leading chlorophyll products, it was tested against.

That's why we say, if you're really serious about your breath, no matter what else you may use, use an antiseptic. Kill those odor bacteria with Listerine—the most widely used antiseptic in the world. Rinse with it night and morning, and before any date where you want to be at your best.

PICTURE OF THE MONTH

FROM HERE TO ETERNITY Adapted from the best-seller by James Jones, From Here To Eternity is a brilliant movie. Its focus is that part of the Army composed of enlisted men, professional soldiers, stationed at Schofield Barracks, Honolulu, the summer of 1941. But the passions and principles (or lack of them) which rule their lives mirror our times. There's Prewitt (Montgomery Clift) the uncompromising idealist who gets "the treatment" because, having once blinded a man while sparring, he refuses to join the boxing team. There's Sergeant Warden (Burt Lancaster) the realist who can adapt himself to any situation because he knows how to yield, and despite his contempt for the pompous fraud of a Captain (Philip Ober) serves him well. There's Maggio (Frank Sinatra) the uncontrolled, pathetically funny little man who gets into trouble and is broken by the sadistic Sergeant "Fatso" (Ernest Borgnine) in charge of the stockade. Then there's Karen (Deborah Kerr) the Captain's wife, a lost, bitter woman who finds love for the first time with Warden, but that love is doomed. And there's Lorene (Donna Reed) Prew's girl, a prostitute saving her money for a "proper" life back home. From Here To Eternity unites these poignantly drawn portraits of desperate people in a drama you won't forget.—Col.

GENTLEMEN PREFER BLONDES It has Marilyn Monroe and Jane Russell—what more does it need? Technicolor? It's got that, too. And Marilyn walks, which is even better than her singing. The theme of this movie, like the Broadway play before it, is "diamonds are a girl's best friend." Marilyn has plenty of friends. She's also engaged. Her fiancé (Tommy Noonan) is made of money, only his father (Taylor Holmes) made it and is not about to be taken in by this goldigger. That's why the marriage is postponed. Marilyn insists on going to "Europe, France," and takes Jane with her. Mr. Holmes hires a detective (Elliott Reid) to watch her, with a camera, for any hint of scandal. That camera clicks like a Geiger counter. Because Charles Coburn is on board and he's up to his ears in diamond mines. As for Jane—she's enamored of the entire Olympic team (also on board) and she likes that detective, too, until she discovers he is one. Most of the songs that were in the original musical by Joseph Fields and Anita Loos are here. The comic effects of the flapper era (the flaming Twenties) are lost in this modern version. But you can't have everything.—20th-Fox LATIN LOVERS Lana Turner's problem is 37 million dollars, which may seem laughable to you, but has put this girl on an analyst's couch. Men want me for my money, she says. Doctor, cure me of that neurosis. Some neurosis! The thought of all those millions keeps even the analyst (Eduard Franz) up nights. He's no help. Neither is Beulah Bondi, John Lund's analyst. John has 48 million dollars, but even so, Lana can't bring herself to marry him. Beulah is supposed to make John irresistible. Switch to Brazil where Lund is mixing business with Turner and Turner is switching from him to Montalban. Montalban is masterful. He throws a fit when she's late, laughs at her dancing, complains about his loss of freedom. Lana is afraid he'll toss her out when he discovers she's a gold mine. Fat chance. He's delirious with delight. That's no good, either. Lana figures he must have known about the money all along. So it goes—until Lana wakes up and loves. It's Technicolor, some of it's funny, all of it's easy on the eyes. Louis Calhern, Jean Hagen and Archer MacDonald are in this.—MGM

Light and Bright has brought back natural looking lightness

Nothing to mix or fix

"It's simpler than setting your hair!"

Light and Bright

LIGHT AND BRIGHT by Richard Hudnut is the newest cosmetic gift to blondes, brownettes, redheads, with dull or lifeless looking hair. It's an entirely different kind of home hair lightener, a cosmetic really, that gives you natural-looking color that won't wash out because it brings out the lightness inherent in your hair. Not a dye, or rinse, it's a simple, single solution you apply directly to your hair to lighten and brighten a little or a lot depending on how many times you use it. And it's so easy to use. No mixing, timing or shampooing. So safe, too. Light and Bright contains no ammonia and the color change is gradual because you yourself decide how many applications to have. At all cosmetic counters. 1.50 PLUS TAX.

THE KID FROM LEFT FIELD Fox is batting a thousand with this baseball comedy that's full of laughs, love and whimsy. It centers around Dan Dailey who was once a baseball player but now sells peanuts in the stands. His nine-year-old son (Billy Chapin) worships him, anyway. Billy gets a job as batboy for the Bisons, a team so enfeebled it couldn't beat a rug. Dailey has studied all the players, though, and knows what would pull them out of their slump. He transmits this info to Billy who gives it to the team. Pretty soon Billy is hailed as a child prodigy, and manager Dick Eagan is out looking for another job. When Billy is hospitalized with virus pneumonia he tells the club owner (Ray Collins) that Dailey was the real brain behind the ball and Dailey is made manager just in time for the World Series. Anne Bancroft and Lloyd Bridges (playing a 36-year-old third baseman whose gaming days are numbered) provide romance.—20th-Fox

SO THIS IS LOVE This is the story of Grace Moore, whose life ended abruptly in an airplane crash. So This Is Love is concerned with the early years and closes with her debut at the Metropolitan Opera House. Noreen Corcoran plays the young Grace, a cute but headstrong child, who is to grow into a cute but ambitious woman (Kathryn Grayson). Grace wanted to be a missionary until her aunt (Rosemary DeCamp) suggested a singing career. Her father (Walter Abel) was vehemently opposed to her leaving home down south for any kind of career. But he lost out. So did a couple of men (Merv Griffith and Douglas Dick) who were in love with her later. But a girl who has become a musical comedy star and an opera star by the age of 27 wouldn't have had much time for romance. And a girl who's willing to remain silent for three months (in order not to lose her voice) won't be swayed from her goal. Technicolor adds much to this lavish production as does Kathryn Grayson's handling of light and operatic scores.—Warners

SECOND CHANCE What Linda Darnell remembers about her ex-boyfriend would tickle the Senate Crime Committee. That's why mister violent death himself, (Jack Palance) has been sent all the way down to South America. Only he thinks Linda's so pretty he'd rather seduce her than shoot her. She'd rather throw herself off a peak of the Andes. Would too, if it weren't for Bob Mitchum. He's a prizefighter with a heightened sense of life (he once killed a man in the ring) and he tells her come with me and be my love. She's willing, but that Jack Palance isn't easy to shake. Relentless, that one. Follows them right into a railway cable car that slides people from one mountain to another at 7,000 feet above the ground. Wouldn't you know that for the first time in 23 years the cables break? The car sways like a yo-yo in the sky. But trust Mitchum to pull Darnell right up out of it into a cloud. 3-D and Technicolor—RKO

GUN BELT George Montgomery is a good guy (once he was as bad as they come, pardner) and he lives on a ranch with his nephew, Tab Hunter. Tab's father is a regular monster. Fact is, he has just knifed a guard on his way out of prison. He and three outlaws descend on George; they want him to take up his guns again for a big job. Not George. So his brother (John Dehner) robs a bank while George is in there making a payment. You see, it's a frame-up. Now George has to ride out of town with the gang or the townspeople will lynch him. But George and his brother have a fight and his brother accidentally gets shot. Too bad Tab Hunter is around when it happens. He doesn't think it's an accident. He thinks George did it. George is beginning to get a little frantic, but he pulls himself together, decides to ride with the outlaws so he can turn the whole bunch of 'em over to the Marshal. Will he do it? You can bet your boots he will. Technicolor, with Helen Westcott, William Bishop, Douglas Kennedy —United Artists

THE BAND WAGON Songs (a lot of them old favorites) by Arthur Schwartz and Howard Dietz, dancing by Astaire and Cbarisse (the most spectacular number is a parody of Mickey Spillane's detective stories) and a well-turned script by Betty Comden and Adolph Green combine to make The Band Wagon one of the best musicals in years. Fred Astaire plays a celebrity people are beginning to ignore. When he arrives in New York the song on his lips is "By Myself," but a couple of people come along and change that tune. The couple are Oscar Levant and Nanette Fabray; they've written a show for him and they've lined up a brilliant, if somewhat eccentric, director (Jack Buchanan) to handle it. That's the take-off—the rest is color, gaiety and talent all the way. Technicolor, natch, with Vincente Minnelli directing.—MGM

ISLAND IN THE SKY Men are always fighting each other. What they sometimes forget is that they're often fighting nature, too. This movie tells you what that battle can be like. John Wayne, a pilot for 20 years, now flying an Army Transport plane, makes a forced landing somewhere in Greenland. Whether he'll be rescued or not is hard to say, but Wayne is counting on it, as is his crew of four. Radioman Wally Cassell keeps transmitting messages until the juice runs out. They have enough food for a few days and a nice, cool climate (70 below). Back in the States, Colonel Walter Abel gets up a searching party among the pilots who have known Wayne for years and won't let him down without a struggle. They can't find him the first time over and the wait in that desolate nowhere grows unbearable. Lovatt (Sean McClory) gets lost in a snowstorm and dies within arm's reach of the lean-to. But Wayne keeps them going. Big climax! Lloyd Nolan, James Arness, Andy Devine, Allyn Joslyn are in the cast.—Warners

MISSION OVER KOREA This movie is dedicated to the men who scout the skies in Army L-5 cub planes. They don't carry weapons; they just dart in and around enemy fire, taking pictures, observing, getting killed. John Hodiak and John Derek are stationed at Kimpo Field, Seoul, before the outbreak of war in Korea. Hodiak has a wife (Maureen O'Sullivan) and family; Derek is a brash young officer who meets an Army nurse (Audrey Totter) in Japan, but doesn't have much time to woo her. When the fighting starts Hodiak and Derek are in the thick of it, and you get a good idea of the desolation, terror and fury that war brings—even if it is only a police action. You also see how heroes are made and murdered in a matter of minutes. Cast included Harvey Lembeck, Richard Erdman, William Chun.—Col.

RIDE, VAQUERO! Howard Keel is a homesteader, or would be, if Anthony Quinn, leader of the Mexican border raiders, would stop burning down his ranch. Quinn is afraid of men like Keel—they're too smart, too idealistic and too brave—and for them to settle in Texas would mean the end of wild times. Robert Taylor is the silent, cynical right hand man whom Quinn loves like a brother. Together they raise terror at will because life means little to them. One day Keel catches up with Taylor and can easily kill him. Instead he asks for Taylor's help on the ranch. Taylor agrees. He admires Keel. He admires Keel's wife (Ava Gardner). And that's the trouble. When Taylor sees where admiration can lead he saddles up his horse and gits (underneath that brooding exterior lurks an honorable man). He rides into town a few minutes after Quinn has ripped it open and is in the process of slowly pumping Keel full of holes. The movie is fraught with atmosphere, but sometimes you can't help wondering why. Ansco Color—MGM.

EAST OF SUMATRA Jeff Chandler is a mining engineer who sets his crew down on the Island of Tunga to look for tin. First thing they find is Suzan Ball cavorting in a waterfall. She is the native chieftain's bride-to-be, and that chieftain (Anthony Quinn) is pretty wise in the ways of men. He makes Jeff promise to provide medicine for his people in return for their labor. Chandler promises but he can't help it if his boss (John Sutton) is a rat and won't even part with a Band-aid. Quinn thinks Chandler betrayed him and wants to start a war. "Don't fight, boys," says Suzan, and they don't—until the native rice crop mysteriously burns up. Quinn methodically destroys Chandler's plane and supplies and cuts off all means of escape. It looks like fast starvation until Chandler challenges Quinn to a fight to the death. (They use flaming torches and daggers.) Also in cast of East of Sumatra are Marilyn Maxwell, Jay C. Flippen. Technicolor.—U-I

RITA'S NEWEST LOVE

THE DANCING EX-PRINCESS HAS CHOSEN HER NEW FAVORITE—DICK HAYMES • By Consuelo Anderson

Rita has found her own kind of man, the romantic, Latin, marrying kind.

■ There are some actresses who, introverted and self-sufficient, can go through life for long periods of time without a man.

Rita Hayworth is not one of these.

Without love and masculine attention she is like a rose without sun and water. She withers.

Rita knows this. Which is why she has found herself a new beau and, potentially, a new husband. He is Dick Haymes, the tall, 37-year-old, handsome crooner from the Argentine whose love life has been every bit as hectic as Rita's.

As you undoubtedly know, Haymes, four years ago, was involved in one of Hollywood's juiciest and most publicized scandals. That was in Palm Springs when he took three looks at Errol Flynn's then-wife, the beautifully lusty Nora, and promptly lost his heart to her.

At the time he was married to Joanne Dru, a girl of quiet but insinuating beauty, and the mother of his three wonderful children. But Dick petitioned for his freedom.

As a matter of fact, he was so smitten by Nora, so anxious to make her his, that he agreed to pay Joanne any sum ranging from $9,600 to $14,000 a year for support in addition to taking out insurance policies for the offspring, paying their dental and medical bills, and dividing the community property.

Joanne gave Dick his liberty. Errol Flynn, his great ego shattered, gave Nora hers plus the promise to pay $550 a month for the support of their two daughters, Rory and Deirdre, a promise, incidentally, which he has been delinquent in fulfilling. On July 17, 1949, Nora Eddington Flynn became the bride of Richard Haymes.

"How does Rita Hayworth fit into this picture?" you ask.

It's very simple. Early this year, not long after she had lost a baby son via miscarriage, Nora Haymes decided that she and Dick just couldn't make a go of their marriage. There was a separation which left Haymes free and lonely.

In New York on business, he happened to run into Rita Hayworth who was in town to plug Salome. In fact they both stayed at the Plaza. They ate together. "Steak and black coffee," according to one waiter who served them. "And they looked very nice, very simpático." (Continued on page 80)

GABLE'S MYSTERY ROMANCE

Clark Gable's companion, model Susan Dodolle, took a leave of absence from Schioporelli's salon to help him look at Europe.

Time was when Clark Gable turned to hunting, fishing and desert resorts for entertainment and relaxation between pictures. Now he turns to the ladies.

BY ALICE HOFFMAN

■ What does an actor do between pictures? Especially if he's single, wealthy, handsome, and his name is Clark Gable?

In California when he had finished a film, the 52-year-old star used to go fishing and hunting in Oregon or speed down to La Quinta, a desert resort south of Palm Springs. When he was married to Lady Sylvia Ashley, he'd come home to his house in Encino, inspect Sylvia's latest improvements in décor and blow his top.

Only Gable hasn't been working in the U.S.A. for more than a year now. He's been in Africa and Europe, making films there in order to take advantage of the Federal income tax exemption. And life in Europe, to say the least, gives actors the opportunity to be infinitely more expansive than they can be at home.

Ever since April of this year, for example, when (Continued on page 88)

LOVE MARILYN

As Stengel is to the Yankees—that's how Skolsky is to The Monroe. But he can't write an article about her—he loves her too much.

by Sidney Skolsky

Mr. Charles D. Saxon
Editor,
MODERN SCREEN
Dear Chuck:

In reply to your letter, it's nice to be told that what Boswell was to Johnson I am to Monroe, but flattery will get you nowhere. I can't do an article on Marilyn Monroe for you.

Don't forget, Chuck, that when Boswell published his notes, Samuel Johnson was no longer around, and I still have to live with The Monroe. You know what I mean: I still have to see her at the studio, at restaurants, at her house and, of course, get lifts from her. No man ever had a better-looking chauffeur, or a chauffeur to whom other drivers paid more attention.

Look what you've got me saying: "I still have to see her!" This sounds as if it is a duty, which it certainly isn't. I don't know of any celebrity who is more amiable or more comfortable to be with than Marilyn. No, Chuck, if I can pull a line like that so early in just a personal letter, there's no telling what boners I might pull in an article. Honestly, I don't think I'm the boy for the job, despite the fact that I know Marilyn so well.

You probably want an article entitled "Why Monroe Will Marry DiMaggio," or "Why Monroe Won't Marry DiMaggio." I can't write that type of yarn for you. To tell the truth, Chuck, (Continued on page 35)

NOW THAT MARILYN IS FAMOUS, THE CAMERA FOLLOWS HER WHEREVER SHE GOES.

As a homeless child, Marilyn lived with strangers and relatives, longed for a bed she could call her own. With her first money she bought one—nice and low so she wouldn't fall out.

Comfort is important to The Monroe, both in companions and in dress. She has no use for girdles and pajamas and not much use for shoes; gets no credit for the lingerie she wears.

AS A CHILD, SHE WASN'T OFTEN

First sitting at six months

Marilyn can play almost two tunes on her old piano, a keepsake from pre-Hollywood days. She studies singing and dramatics diligently. And secretly, she reads and goes to movies.

Glamorous in the grand manner, Marilyn differs from her sisters of the Thirties by spending most of her time at home. After her wandering, unhappy childhood, she likes it there.

I really don't know whether Marilyn and Joe will marry or not. In fact, at the moment I don't think they know. I'd hate to have to decide for them, and then find they've done the opposite and be caught with my by-line down. You know this sort of thing sometimes happens in fan magazines.

It could be because I understand Marilyn that I won't hazard a guess as to her matrimonial future. But this much I can definitely state: there is nothing definite. However, at post time (I mean mailing this letter to you) this is somewhat their routine: Marilyn will often rush home from the studio, still in make-up, to cook dinner for Joe. She usually throws a couple of steaks or chops into the broiler. And Joe has taught her how to prepare spaghetti. Since going with him, she drinks Italian wine and knows a few words of Italian. After dinner Joe will stretch out on the couch and watch a Western movie on tv. Marilyn will study her lines for tomorrow, or talk to friends on the telephone. She prefers to lie on the floor or bed when on the phone. "I talk better lying down," she claims.

Joe doesn't try to guide her career or tell her how to play a role. He does occasionally make a sage remark drawn from his own glorious history: "Never mind all the publicity, honey," he'll say. "Get the money."

When Marilyn met DiMaggio all she knew about baseball was that it was played on a diamond and that it was good for publicity photos. It was because of one of those publicity pictures, in fact, that Joe expressed the desire to meet Marilyn. A little over a year ago she had posed with ballplayer Gus Zernial (Continued on page 62)

ALTHOUGH HE NEVER COMPLAINS AND NEVER EXPLAINS, BOB WAGNER IS CONSTANTLY APPALLED

Bob Wagner and Debbie Reynolds were a friendly twosome and a constant one. When they began to see less of each other, Bob was astounded to hear that he had "thrown her over—broken her heart."

He was enjoying his dates with blonde Susan Zanuck when the rumors about that reached him: "He took her out because she was the boss' daughter and he was too smart to miss the main chance."

the lies they tell about

■ Robert John Wagner, Jr., is a personable, good natured and well-adjusted young man of 23. It's amazing that some people have been prompted to tell so many lies about him.

Bob is amazed, too. He can't understand why it happens.

"Look," he says, "I'm easy to get along with. I like people and I hope they like me. I work hard at my job and try to do the best I can. I can't understand why people would go out of their way to tell lies about me."

Usually he follows the advice of another performer who is expert in the art of remaining a star—Alan Ladd. Bob used to date Carol Lee Ladd, and he listened carefully to words of wisdom from her father. After all, Alan has been

BY THE "NEWS" HE HEARS ABOUT HIMSELF.

Working with Barbara Stanwyck whom he admires, he sometimes went out with her and other members of the cast of Titanic after the day's shooting was over. In the news, this became a full-fledged romance.

On location in Florida, Bob was startled to hear of his sudden, dramatic engagement to Terry Moore. They cleared up that one and the story was that Bob was party to a publicity stunt.

Even at home, he isn't safe. The gossip on that front is that Robert Wagner, Sr., used his money and influence so that his little boy needn't go through the usual trials to be a star.

able to keep a large and devoted following through good pictures and bad.

On the question of what to do about false rumors, Alan said simply: "Never complain; never explain."

When major and minor crises arise, Bob remembers those words. Recently a columnist printed the information that Robert Wagner had hired an independent press agent—to keep his name and face out of print. The item attempted to explain that he had been on six magazine covers lately and felt too much publicity would endanger his career.

A studio publicist hastily called Bob for confirmation. The report was false, he said.

"Then don't you want to issue a denial?" asked the publicist.

Bob remembered Alan Ladd's words. "No," he replied. "Let's just let the whole matter drop."

But there comes a time when even such an easy-going guy as Bob Wagner must blow off steam. And so when I asked him to clear up all the distortions, untruths and outright lies that have been circulated about him, he jumped at the chance.

One writer put forth the claim that Bob had been unfair to Debbie Reynolds. The writer quoted a friend of Debbie's as saying:

"Oh! That Bob Wagner! How could he break that poor little girl's heart? I'm telling you that when he threw Debbie over, he broke her heart—broke it right into pieces! And what for? Just so that he could buzz from one girl to the next. I thought he had more sense than that. I really did. He didn't know when he was well off. I guess he'll just have to grow up."

The statement that he broke Debbie's heart is pure nonsense, says Bob.

"There never was anything serious between us," he explained. "We went out together—went out a great deal. But we never had any real romance. Debbie wanted it that way, and I agreed. After all, she is all wrapped up in her career, and so am I. We are both at a very critical stage, when hard work and concentration will make the difference between getting ahead in the business or missing the boat.

LOVE IS A LONG SHOT

The James' first big winner, Big Noise, thunders past Grey Tower and Count Me Out to win the Futurity and $100,000.

The wise money didn't back the Grable-James marriage. So what made it go for ten years? Betty offers a horsey reason.

JACK WADE

Once, when she was very young, Betty Grable shed bitter tears over a love that had failed. Like Elizabeth Taylor, Shirley Temple and Jane Powell, who in later years were to experience the folly of too-early marriage against parental objection, Betty cringed from the explosive publicity that accompanied her divorce from ex-child actor, Jackie Coogan, and swore to herself that next time she'd know the real thing. Yet, she admits that when she married orchestra leader Harry James, the "wise money" in Hollywood was betting that their marriage wouldn't go six weeks. The odds were simply against it. The recipe was one that had never worked.

Take one superb blonde movie star who had become the pin-up idol of millions of service men and the meal ticket for thousands of theater owners. Take one top band leader, required by the nature of his profession to bounce endlessly around the United States away from home for ten months out of the year. Mix them together in a marital state and any sensible person will tell you that the result must be unpalatable chaos.

Today, while the verdict may still be out on the love futures of Liz Taylor, Shirley Temple and Janie Powell, it appears that the marriage of Ruth Elizabeth Grable to a horn player named Harry James on July 5, 1943, has tossed normally sound reasoning into the ash can.

How have they managed to do it?

"We both like horses," Betty answers simply.

To some of the psychologists who prepare those deep thinking articles, such a statement is ridiculous in the extreme. Yet, the brainy efforts of these marriage experts over the years have done little to stem the tide of divorce. It would (Continued on page 85)

■ When the news broke in Cincinnati a few weeks ago that Rosemary Clooney, 25, of Maysville, Kentucky, and José Vicente Ferrer, 41, of Ossining, New York, had gotten married in a small Oklahoma town, four hours' ride from Dallas, a young woman who had once gone to Withrow High School with Rosemary leaned across the breakfast table. She handed her husband the morning newspaper and pointed to the Clooney-Ferrer wedding announcement.

"Now," she snapped, "I believe in miracles."

The husband of the young society matron read the brief news item and said, "What's wrong with their getting married?"

"Nothing. Except that if Rosemary Clooney can get a famous husband, so can any other girl on earth. Do you know, Dick, that when she was at Withrow, Rosemary was blackballed by four different sororities?"

The husband looked at his wife as a man might regard a backward child, with a mixture of love and pity. "There is nothing more cruel in the world," he said softly, "than the snobbishness of adolescent girls."

There was a time only a few months ago when recalling the hurt and poverty and bitter frustration of her youth, Rosemary Clooney would undoubtedly have agreed with the above statement. But now that she is Mrs. José Ferrer, she is so thrilled with the newness of marriage, so happy in her recently-rented Beverly Hills home, so altogether in love with Joe that the memories of humiliations she suffered as a child are in cold-storage.

And yet to those who knew her as a too-thin, jut-jawed, spindle-shanked girl it seems like only yesterday when she was aboard the Island Moon, an excursion steamer winding down the Ohio. Hundreds of high school boys and girls were heading for the picnic grounds, and Rosemary, dressed in a cheap little frock, made over by her Grandmother Guilfoyle, turned to her best friend. "I'm desperately in love with—" and she pointed out the local handsome Lothario. (Continued on page 77)

Turistas paying cover charges to see intrigue among the stars are delighted to find Arlene Dahl and Fernando Lamas, disappointed by their party manners.

Jane Wyman is among the few stars who still come out at night. She was one of the Bautzer girls (and Greg was one of the Wyman boys) but now it's plain Mrs. Karger.

Like most of the younger generation, Anne Francis turns up with her husband, seems to have a good time.

A FEW STARS STILL TWINKLE IN THE NIGHT CLUBS, BUT DECOROUSLY. GONE

what's happened to hollywood night life?

By STEVE CRONIN

■ One night a few years ago in a Hollywood establishment known then and now as Mocambo, a girl of mysterious identity and origin went over to Errol Flynn and broke a coddled egg on his head.

The incident churned up a few local headlines but did not excite anyone unduly. This was in an era when the unsteady graph of what is called "Hollywood night life" was on one of its periodic climbs toward delirium, and in fact, not to break coddled eggs on stars'

Esther Williams and Ben Gage enjoy a night out in a spot once famous for Bogart's fisticuffs and Virginia Hill's blithe trampling on her fabulous sable coats.

Nowadays, lucky tourists might see Jeanne Crain dancing with her husband; once they could have seen a lady break a carefully coddled egg on Errol Flynn's head.

In the good, old days, the lady stars hit the town with a different escort every night. Maureen O'Hara, husbandless, goes out with her brother, Jimmy Lilburn.

heads was considered effete. Actually the incident passed off rather well, occasioning no discomfort to anyone save Mr. Flynn, who underwent the shock you would expect of a man who has no deadly aversion to eggs taken externally but who hadn't happened to order a shampoo.

The red-haired girl had not known Mr. Flynn nor he her. She went over to his table and asked if he were Errol Flynn. No perjurer, Flynn said he was. The Errol Flynn? the girl asked. Mr. Flynn didn't simper. He just said yup. Squooosh.

Mocambo was loaded with filmdom's hot rocks that evening. They laughed appreciatively and resumed the somewhat intense business of roistering in the public eye. A few paid tribute to Flynn's acumen in hiring an egg-plopper all his own, and a few others decided the caper was an authentic one, raising the charitable grounds that Flynn's coiffure and a coddled egg were natural affinities. Ham, that is, was mentioned, but in no more vicious a spirit than a baby cobra might exhibit if stepped on. The girl was hauled away before she could apply pepper and salt and life went on.

Well, that was a normal Hollywood night life item yesterday. Tomorrow it may well be normal again. Today it is simply nostalgic and a little quaint, like a Duesenberg phaeton or a raccoon coat. Today, if truth must be told, Hollywood night life is decorous and becalmed, biding its time. (Continued on page 101)

A MODERN SCREEN EXCLUSIVE! HERE, FOR THE FIRST TIME, IS THE REAL STORY BEHIND SHIRLEY'S HOME-

Why Shirley Temple came back

by
Hedda Hopper

■ We had scarcely sat down for a chat when a doorbell rang; and one of the most famous young ladies in the world, a pert, svelte brunette, got up to answer. Naturally Hopper had to peep out to see who the caller could be. It was a middle-aged man bearing a yellow envelope.

"I have a telegram for Shirley Temple," he said.

"Well," said the girl, "I used to be Shirley Temple."

The messenger almost dropped his teeth. Scratching his head in wonderment, he stared at the girl and finally said, "If you're Shirley Temple, I must be getting older than I thought." He seemed a bit dubious about handing her the telegram. I still don't believe he thought the girl was Shirley Temple.

But indeed it was. After two years in the east, where her husband, Charles Black, had served a re-call term with Naval Intelligence in Washington, Shirley had come home—but not as Shirley Temple. She insists on being called Shirley Black. Her hair was a natural dark brunette in color. Though her looks are still bright with youth, they contain a suggestion of the matronly. Those famous childhood dimples are not so pronounced. "I'm a quarter of a century old," she said, seeming to take a particular satisfaction in that "century" bit.

Most outstanding in Shirley's personality is a gentle, mocking sense of humor, which is applied liberally toward herself. In conversation you have to watch that girl, or she'll have your neck in a twist from double-takes trying to find out whether she's serious or kidding. Almost always there is a faint trace of humor in her eyes.

"Well," said I, "you're stuck with being Shirley Temple whether or not you ever do another day of acting. You became an American institution. You grew into the hearts of movie-going people and they'll never let you go. When do you start back to work?"

She reflected for a moment before answering. "Hedda," she said finally, "you must understand (Continued on page 90)

"I used to be Shirley Temple," says svelte, matronly Mrs. Charles Black, mother of Linda Susan, 5, and Charles, Jr., 1. "Now I'm not a star; I'm just a contented housewife!"

Shirley has no trouble disciplining her baby. "I just give him a disapproving look," she says. With Susan, too, a look will usually do it. Spankings are rare at the Blacks'.

COMING AS SHE TOLD IT TO HEDDA—PLUS THE ONLY PICTURES TAKEN OF SHIRLEY'S FAMILY AT HOME!

Shirley's two children are good playmates and companions. When Charlie was born, the Blacks "gave" him to Susan, who watches after him like her own baby, shows no trace of usual jealousy.

A husky 26 pounds, Charlie is quite a bundle for his petite mother to handle, but he's such a good baby. Shirley has no trouble with him. Shirley came much nearer death at his birth, than most people realize.

Her son's first haircut gave Shirley a pang of nostalgia. "A boy's first haircut is his first step to manhood," says Shirley wistfully, "and it makes a mother feel that her baby is leaving her already."

Little Linda Susan Agar, the daughter of Shirley and her first husband, John Agar, is a bright, friendly child. She visited the White House with her parents recently, and surprised the President with her aplomb.

Jerry Lewis' home looks like an average American's . . . from the outside. Inside, it's a Grade A mansion.

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

THE NOT SO MAD HOUSE

■ A week before those two irrepressible zanies, Martin and Lewis, were scheduled to appear at the Palladium in London, a British magazine flew one of its top writers across the Atlantic to interview Jerry.

After many fruitless expeditions all over Hollywood, the scribe finally located the rubber-faced, crew-cut comic in a sporting goods store. Jerry was trying on golf shoes.

"I'll need an extra heavy shoe for those Scotch golf courses, don't you think, old boy?" That was Lewis' opening remark to the visiting Britisher.

"Why don't you wait and buy a pair in London?" the reporter suggested.

"Ridiculous," Jerry answered. "They're cheaper there." Then turning to the clerk, he said, "Do these shoes come in brown and white, too?"

Told that they did, the gangling screwball ordered identical pairs in black and white, cordovan, and Norwegian calf.

Next he tried on Bermuda-length shorts. They looked good to him so he bought an even dozen pairs in linen, flannel, and tropical worsted. Moving over to the camera department (Continued on page 48)

Patti picked the colors for the living room, thought that the grey-green carpet would be a good background for the pale mahogany furniture. The portrait of Jerry was a gift from Hal Wallis.

Jerry is leather-happy . . . a fact easily discerned by one look at his study. Everything—scrapbooks, radio scripts, movie scenarios, is bound in expensive gold embossed leather, and displayed there.

America's favorite screwball lives there.

BY MARVA PETERSON

Because of his insecure childhood, Jerry has many neurotic habits. For years, he used to sleep with a gun beneath his pillow. In this lovely master bedroom, Patti talked him into giving it up last year.

Guests are sometimes so comfortable in the Lewis guest room they refuse to leave! "Especially my mother-in-law," cracks Jerry. (He's only kidding.) The TV set, chaise longue, are perfect for relaxing.

The two Lewis children share this double-decker bedroom, but they're usually to be found out in their playhouse, the one Jerry had to buy for them after he took over the first one for himself.

Early American is the motif of the kitchen, but in convenience and modern appliances, it's strictly up-to-date. Along with the mechanical wonders, Patti has installed a magazine rack and a radio.

the not so mad house continued

The exterior of Jerry Lewis' backyard playhouse doesn't begin to hint at the fabulous interior. Projection booths, gun racks, fireplace, bar, practically every prop money can buy for social amusement is found behind this modest facade.

Patti had a few qualms about the playhouse when it was being built, but now agrees with Jerry that it's worth every cent. "Our gang has a million laughs out here, and our type of mayhem would wreck the rest of the place."

he ordered half a dozen reflectors and spotlights. "Need these for my camera work," Jerry explained.

"But I thought Paramount provided that sort of equipment!" the flabbergasted Englishman managed to sputter.

Lewis crossed his eyes and drew an imaginary pistol from his belt, aiming his index finger at the reporter's heart. "Say that one more time, you varmint," he drawled, "and I'll have you sent to the Tower. Do you hear me, you wretch?"

Unaccustomed to Jerry's shenanigans, the British reporter scratched his head in amazement, whereupon Lewis moved up to him and said, "Look, Hyman, I thought I told you to wait outside and wash the car."

Finished spending $800 in the sporting goods store, Jerry then raced across Wilshire Boulevard into a confectionary shop. Like a little boy with his allowance to spend, he eyed all the glass cases, finally settling for a pound of licorice, and bags of jelly beans, nuts, and assorted gum drops. "This bulk candy," he observed, "gets stale very quickly." He sampled a mouthful of jelly beans. "Now," he said, "all we have to do is to stop at the framer's and bookbinder's—then we're home."

At the bookbinder's Jerry picked up four large scrapbooks handsomely bound in expensive red leather. They contained photographs of their Honolulu Honeymoon #2, party pictures of son Gary's last birthday, stills from Scared Stiff, and hundreds of newspaper clippings.

At the picture-framer's there were 15 separate items waiting for J. Lewis. All of his possessions are either bound or framed. This time he picked up his MODERN SCREEN achievement award, a cartoon of his recent knee operation, and a commendation from the Cerebral Palsy Foundation, among other pictures and certificates.

Having been raised in a period of post-war austerity coupled with typical British restraint, the English reporter was staggered by the morning's shopping spree. "I say," he timidly asked Jack Keller, Jerry's press agent, "does this bloke carry on this way everywhere?"

Keller was prepared with a ready answer. "In automobile agencies," he explained, "he only buys one car at a time."

"And how about his home?" the writer continued.

"About his home and home-life," Jack said, "you'd better speak to his wife. She's absolutely normal and no harm will come to you."

Patti Lewis really enjoys keeping house for Jerry and their two sons, Gary, eight, and Ronnie, three and a half. (Continued on page 70)

THE COURAGE TO FEAR

■ The subject of faith is one which Stewart Granger does not care to talk about with strangers—especially strange writers. And the luncheon interview on which this story is based would certainly have been a failure had Stewart not suddenly reminded himself of an old and beloved friend, Peter Bull, whom he recalled as “truly religious.” He had to tell you of his admiration for Peter, and only while speaking of him, did some of Stewart’s own ideas come out.

The Church of England into which Stewart Granger was born is not as possessive as some churches; in the opinion of many students of Christianity it leaves a lot to the individual. One gathers from talking to Stewart that he thinks it is how a man uses this freedom of choice which determines the truth and dignity of his worship. This is where Peter comes in.

“Peter never talked about his religion,” said Stewart. “He had accepted it as a small boy because his father, to whom he was very close, was a believer who fascinated him with wonderful stories of God and the (Continued on page 94)

Mistakes that made her famous

by John Maynard

■ "It is good to battle, to suffer, to be thrown overboard and left to save ourselves. What we lose in comfort, we gain in energy—and energy is the most precious of man's weapons."

So wrote a man named Wagner a number of years ago. History does not record whether or not his observation knocked his audience as a whole into a spin. But it did induce in Joan Crawford an excited pang of recognition. She wrote it down in one of a number of leather-bound volumes in which, for 15 years now, she has been recording similar capsules of residual wisdom.

In the same manner, she has seen eye-to-eye with a Mr. Irving: "Love is never lost—if not reciprocated, it will flow back and soften and purify the heart."

And with a Mr. Moore: "The difficulty in life is the choice."

The difficulty, indeed. Probably there should be some journalistic ethics against gamboling up to a person of Miss Crawford's professional stature, dignity and beauty, and saying: "You've pulled a few rocks in your time, haven't you, pal, and if so, what were they?" To Miss Crawford's everlasting credit, she did not bridle. She laughed. Laughter should be a musical sound at all times but quite frequently it is not. Miss Crawford's though, is at least as pleasant to listen to as any in (Continued on page 98)

In fact, he felt so little like waiting any longer in the car for his pretty wife, Barbara, to come out of the gates of her studio that he finally walked over to the gateman and asked where he could get a tall, cool drink. The gateman merely pointed across the street and Jeff, being a Twentieth Century-Fox lad out of his neighborhood, had to look twice to see "The Keys," the small bar and grill which caters to the off-duty needs of the folks at U-I.

It was better in the bar, degrees better. Sitting comfortably over his tall, (Continued on page 93)

Mel's two-pounder gets the boys started. In skin divers' jargon, you "cut a fish" when you spear it, "bump" or "bounce" him if you miss.

Setting off for the deep kelp reefs offshore, Rory, Jeff and Bud swim along leisurely enjoying the view they get of the ocean floor. There is no beauty above land that can equal that of many rock formations played upon by the ever-changing sunlight and shadow patterns here.

Marine catches aren't all flora and fauna! Jeff comes up with an old rubber boot for his first try today. He's an old hand at skin diving, and has done it many times in the warm waters of the Mediterranean. For Rory the sport was brand new—but he's enthusiastic now.

STRIP A MOVIE STAR DOWN TO HIS SKIN DIVING SUIT AND YOU'LL FIND A FELLOW WHO WILL OUT-MANEUVER SHARKS AND SEALS FOR THE SAKE OF A DAY'S FISHING.

Getting ready for the day's skin diving, Rory, Mel and Bud slip on "flippers" over heavy socks. The socks protect feet from sharp rocks. Face masks go on next. The divers breathe through a snorkel tube when their faces are submerged, can see as deep as 50 feet.

Rory questions Bud about the double cock gun, the Torpon. Cocked with both of its heavy rubber bands, it can penetrate a two-by-four. "Mon," exclaims Rory, "this looks like it could kill a whole!"

Shivering with the cold, the boys come out of the deep water. Here at White's Point, one of the most productive spots for fishermen along the southern California coast, the water temperature is about 60 degrees. A diver doesn't feel the cold till he gets out in the chill air.

Jeff poses proudly with his five-pound halibut while Rory clowns next to him, promising big things for his second spear diving excursion. In addition to the fish, the group brought back a huge basket full of obalone, rock scollops and clams, more than enough for all to feast.

what it's like to be

TONY'S WIFE

by Janet Leigh

■ Lots of times when I've been on tour and talked with strangers they've asked me what it's like to be Tony's wife. It may be because they've caught his humor on the screen, or because they've read zany stories about his clowning. Whatever the reason, most people who've never met Tony seem to think life with him is a marathon comedy.

It's that all right, but it's a lot more. They say a woman can be married to a man for fifty years and still discover new things about him. It's certainly that way with me. In the two years we've been married I've continued to learn new things about Tony, and each discovery seems more important than the last. His sensitivity, his aggressiveness, his pride and his humility, his boyish ways and his maturity—all of them keep cropping up. And I don't suppose anything will ever affect me as much as his gentleness when I lost our baby last July.

Most people have to know him a while before they realize that Tony runs pretty deep. He is a truly funny guy, and the humor of our life together is a great blessing, yet it wasn't his humor that I noticed first.

When I met him at a Hollywood party I noticed, as any girl would, that he was very attractive. He seemed quiet, and I was impressed by the fact that he had none of the brash quality that so often surrounds successful young men. At that time he wasn't what the town would call successful—he hadn't yet had a leading role in a picture—but his (Continued on page 66)

"You, I like!"

The whole country's in love with a scared little guy. They're carving hearts around Red Buttons' name, and he loves it—when his knees stop shaking!

BY JOAN KING FLYNN

Helayne McNorton Buttons, formerly of Ohio and Miami, visits with her husband and his team at CBS

■ The little guy was scared, but you could never tell it by looking. He laughed and clowning on the stage during rehearsal and he behaved as though he had always belonged there.

He was a brand new tv star, "the brightest comedy discovery of the year," or so all the critics had said the week before when he made his television debut.

"Then what do I have to worry about, now?" he tried to reassure himself. "I'm in."

But Red Buttons knew better. At 33, he was a show business veteran. It wasn't opening night the stars and headliners really worried about. It was the second night. If the critics and audience panned a show when it opened, it didn't matter much what happened the next night, but if they liked you, if they stood up and cheered, "This boy's got it! He's a hit!" then the second night jitters set in.

You've got to follow yourself. You've got to be as good, if not better, than you were the night before so the fans will continue to say, "He's a hit!" instead of, "What do they see in him? He's a flash in the pan. He can't sustain the pace."

That was what worried Red Buttons even though the first and second nights for his tv show were a week apart. He had never been in this predicament before. When he was a kid in the Catskills trying out his jokes on an audience of summer vacationers, he was too young and inexperienced to be scared. When he was in burlesque or the nightclubs or theater, the second night jitters weren't so bad. His act was the same. He didn't have to worry about new material. All he had to worry about was himself.

Television was different. You couldn't do the same thing every time. Each week had to be an entirely new show. (Continued on page 81)

I love marilyn

(Continued from page 35) when he and his team were in Hollywood for spring training. "I never got to pose with such good-looking girls when I was playing ball," said DiMaggio. Some months later David March, a mutual friend, arranged for them to have dinner with him at the Villa Nova restaurant. Marilyn liked Joe immediately. Let me tell you something about Marilyn, Chuck. She has great instincts. She can detect a phony, person or situation, almost at once. She'd much rather, and often does, stay at home by herself than go out with some big movie star or producer or director. I know many who have asked her repeatedly—some of the names would shock even you—but she managed to avoid them all gracefully. If you'll think back, you can't recall one fake romantic item about her, and this is the general custom for starlets and young actresses being given the buildup.

When Marilyn and Joe first started going together, she was asked if she and Joe discussed baseball. She replied thoughtfully, "The subject has never come up." Since then she has seen a few games with Joe but doesn't quite dig it. She is not an outdoor sports enthusiast.

It has really never mattered to her that Big Joe (that's what Marilyn calls him) was one of the truly great ballplayers of all time. What impressed her much more was an incident that took place last Christmas Eve. Marilyn had attended the studio's annual Christmas party, appearing gay, seeming to be enjoying herself. Then she left, with nothing to do but to return home—at that time a single room at the Beverly Hills Hotel—and wait for a phone call from Joe, who was visiting his family in San Francisco. When Marilyn entered her room she found a miniature Christmas tree standing on the table, a pasteboard sign on which was hand-printed: "Merry Christmas, Marilyn," and Joe sitting in a chair in the corner.

"It's the first time in my life anyone ever gave me a Christmas tree," she told me days later. "I was so happy I cried." This from the blonde who sings "Diamonds Are A Girl's Best Friend."

This isn't the kind of sensational story I suspect you'd expect about a girl who can take a conventional product like a calendar and turn it into the talk of a nation. Maybe it's because I know Marilyn so well and am so close to her (there I go again with the kind of remark that could be misconstrued in an article!) that I can't do the type of story I believe you want. Often, Chuck, I find that if I know people too intimately I can't write about them as well as if I don't know too much about them. Does this ever happen to you?

It's a unique kind of friendship that Marilyn and I have. Just how it started, I don't know. Nor does The Monroe. We were discussing it the other evening, and neither of us could place the occasion when we first met, or how we took to each other. I guess our association, like Topsy, jes' grewed.

All I can definitely recall is that the first time I met her I told her she was going to be a movie star—one of the biggest the screen has known. And during the first year or so of our acquaintance, I remember, we were standing in front of the magazine rack at Schwab's and Marilyn was looking longingly at the row of fan magazines. She asked, "Do you think I'll ever have my picture in one of them?" Now, with her kisser on practically every magazine cover and pictures scattered throughout every magazine, it doesn't seem possible that there was a fan magazine without her picture, does it?

In your letter you asked me to explain how the bit about pinch-hitting for Joe DiMaggio started. Well, that's something I can do, Chuck, because it's a piece of personal info that's strictly for a letter. It was late in the afternoon and I was in my office when Marilyn phoned and asked me if I would escort her to a dinner given by a fan magazine at which she was to receive her first important award. Many more would follow, but I guess the first always has a special significance. I had already made my excuses to the magazine editor, for I had a great deal of work to do. "What's the matter with Joe?" I offered. "You know he doesn't like to go to those big public affairs. And besides, I'd rather you went," she said. And she said it in that soft, seductive voice of hers and of course I said yes. I'd like to hear you say no, Chuck.

My father took me to see the opera. During the second act, I poked poppa and said, "Look at that rich lady up there in the box! What do you think she's doing during all this beautiful music? She's sleeping!" And poppa said, "And for this you have to wake me up?"

Before Marilyn arrived I was paged. She was calling from the studio: "I'll be a little late. They're sewing my dress on me. I'll explain later." (Marilyn is always late. She once phoned an interviewer at the exact time she was supposed to meet him and asked him to postpone their date an hour so she wouldn't be late.) Anyway, Marilyn finally arrived, wearing a gold evening gown that both raised and lowered the gold standard at the same time. I knew immediately what she had meant by "they're sewing my dress on me." It was not something she had slipped into.

As Marilyn and I walked toward the banquet room, I asked why she had insisted I accompany her. She told me she likes to be with me because she feels comfortable. That's a big thing with Marilyn—feeling comfortable. She gets a sense of security and a conviction that she "belongs" from it. Maybe I'll tell you more about this later, Chuck. But there was another reason The Monroe wanted me with her this particular evening and it was revealed very soon. She was asked to pose for the newsreel cameras receiving the award, and the man in charge wanted a studio official to stand next to her and the magazine editor. In that soft, almost pleading voice of hers, Marilyn said: "I'd like Sidney to be with me in the newsreel. You see, he had faith in me when I could only dream of evenings like this. I'd feel much better if he were standing with me." You probably saw this newsreel, Chuck, but never noticed me. I tell you the incident because it's the beginning of the "pinch-hitting"; but I happen to like it, too, because it demonstrates Marilyn's loyalty.

Well, my boy, you have no idea what this pinch-hitting role did for me! I must have hit the ball out of the park, because soon I was known as Marilyn's pinch-hitting escort. Mickey Mantle can take DiMaggio's place with the Yankees—I much prefer to take his place with The Monroe. It's to be expected that more fellows would say hello to me than ever did before, but what I wasn't prepared for was the reaction of the ladies!

Glamor gals who had previously looked upon me as merely a short, dark, bespectacled fellow with a pencil, looked at me through different eyes. I became a glamor boy. It's to laugh, isn't it? Not only did some of the most important and loveliest actresses in town want to find out what Marilyn saw in me, but—and this is the pay-off—they wanted to prove to me that they were more—shall I say—attractive than Monroe! I won't mention names, even in a letter, so don't get excited and write me that this angle might make a good magazine piece. A gentleman doesn't tell such things.

I did tell Marilyn about this, however (we tell each other everything), and she was quite amused. Marilyn doesn't think other girls like her and she prefers the company of men. "Men understand me," she says. She is probably right, but to be more accurate, she should have said that she understands men. Marilyn has also said, "The luckiest thing that ever happened to me was being born a woman." In this she is undoubtedly right, but again, it is just as accurate to say that it's a lucky thing for men, too.

But The Monroe is off-base in her belief that women don't like her. If she gives them half a chance to know her, they always do. Take her relationships with Jane Russell and Betty Grable, for example. You'd think she and Jane and she and Betty would be at each other like cats. Some fan magazine even ran articles about Marilyn's feud with Russell, and others tried to promote a feud. (I can hear you, Chuck, saying: "Why I Like Jane and Betty, by Marilyn Monroe, as told to . . ." But I'm not your boy for that type of assignment. I couldn't stretch it and make it sustain for an article. I'll tell you the facts, and I think you'll see it my way.)

When Russell, under contract to the Howard Hughes Tool Company, came over to Twentieth Century-Fox Studios to make Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, she arrived with all the fanfare and justified importance of a visiting celebrity. Hughes was shrewdly protecting the most glamorous product of his tool company. He had clauses in the contract which provided for Jane to bring her own cameraman, Harry Wilde; her own make-up man, Lane "Shotgun" Britton; her own hairdresser, Stephanie Garland; and her own wardrobe girl, Mary Tate. Well, this is like Rocky Marciano going into a fight with lead in his gloves.

It would be absurd to say that Marilyn wasn't disturbed and worried by this. In plain words, Marilyn didn't like it. For the first few days on the picture Marilyn and Jane merely greeted each other cordially and stayed with their respective friends. This situation existed because neither knew how to break the ice.

The ice was finally broken when, while rehearsing a scene, Jane and Marilyn offered each other suggestions. This led to their speaking about their mutual interest in ball players. "Only they play different kinds of ball, don't they?" asked Marilyn. Bob Waterfield came on the set several times and met Marilyn, but DiMaggio never visited. Ultimately Jane and Marilyn became very friendly and Marilyn even attended two of Jane's religious group meetings. "Jane tried to convert me to her religion," Marilyn related later, "and I tried to interest her in Freud."

By the end of the filming, Jane and Marilyn were real friends—buddy-buddy. When anyone would say to The Monroe: "Watch out for Russell. She's got her own cameraman, etc., etc." Marilyn's moist lips would move into smile position. Then she'd say: "Oh, I have the title role and that about evens things."

(Continued from page 62) "Betty is the most real girl I've ever met," Marilyn says. And there were plenty of reasons for a genuine feud to develop between these two glamor packages. As you well know, Chuck, Betty was the Queen of the Lot, until the unprecedented avalanche of Monroe publicity dethroned her. No person likes being the victim of this and few can tolerate it. But Grable is quite a person. She is sharp, honest, has all the answers and knows the score.

During the few years Marilyn and Betty were at the studio together, their only encounter took place when they chanced to pass each other as one was walking to wardrobe and the other from wardrobe. They nodded, that's all. They never actually met until they were cast in the same picture, How To Marry A Millionaire.

Again Marilyn was frightened. She wanted Betty to like her. (She wants most people to like her, but especially Betty, who had been her favorite for years. Marilyn had wanted to be a star like Grable or Lana Turner for so long that she ached from the desire.) I don't know Grable's first words to Marilyn, but somewhere in their initial conversation Betty told Marilyn: "I've had it. Go get yours. It's your turn now."

Throughout the filming of How To Marry A Millionaire, Marilyn was simultaneously trying to get Betty to like her and trying to reassure herself that Betty did like her. Driving me from the studio one evening, Marilyn said excitedly: "Betty told me today that I'm the first actress who never tried, even subconsciously, to upstage her. I guess this means she likes me. I hope so."

Another time I was on the set when Marilyn was playing a scene in which she had to nudge Grable. She did and Betty fell on her fanny! Marilyn was all apologies. "I'm so sorry!" she said. "I didn't think I had pushed you so hard!" "It wasn't your fault," Betty replied lightly. "I was standing on one foot."

Marilyn was so distressed by this accident that later, doing another scene, she carelessly stepped on Betty's shoe. "I know this was my fault, and I'm terribly sorry!" she apologized. "It's nothing," Betty said. "But I dirtied your shoe!" persisted Marilyn. "Forget it, will you, kid?" said Grable. "The shoe doesn't show in the shot—and besides, it belongs to wardrobe."

Betty and Marilyn sincerely like each other and have visited together several times since filming on the picture ended, which is an indicator with Marilyn.

Now Chuck, because I'm kind of thinking out loud about The Monroe, I don't want you to consider this a commitment for an article. It's just my way of looking her over carefully (See? It's almost impossible to write about Marilyn without saying something that will have a double meaning) for you. Of course you wouldn't want an article about the now too-famous calendar; there've been too many. Yet there's a hunk of truth about the calendar incident which reveals a side of Marilyn never known before. (There! Another double-meaning sentence without intending it.)

Marilyn phoned early one morning and there was panic in her voice. The story of her and the calendar was going to break. (I had known about it, but it was one of our secrets.) "Oh Sidney, what shall I do about it? What shall I do?" There was a pause; I was thinking. Marilyn was impatient. She broke in: "I've been advised to deny the whole thing. To say it isn't me. I've also been advised to think up a good excuse for having done it. Do you know one?"

I wish I could say that I came to her rescue in this critical situation, but I can't.

I said: "Calm down a minute, and tell me how you really feel about the calendar and posing in the nude."

She replied: "I don't feel ashamed. But now I'm scared . . . My whole career can be ruined . . . But I didn't do anything bad . . . I didn't think so then and I don't think so now . . . If I had thought so, I wouldn't have done it . . . I needed a job and money to pay the rent . . . Lots of other girls were doing it . . . There's no law against it . . . They're trying to make me feel ashamed, but I'm not . . . Can't I just tell the truth? . . . I know I wouldn't condemn anyone who told me this . . ."

"Marilyn," I said, "you have solved your own problem. Just tell everyone what you've told me." This was my contribution: listening to Marilyn long enough for her to talk out her problem. I'll bet on The Monroe's instincts and honesty every time.

And Chuck, you know what happened as a result of Marilyn's own explanation. She turned what could have been ruination for her into a triumph. She won the public's sympathy and they began to love her. Marilyn has never been troubled by the calendar incident since, and both she and her studio now regard it with humor. A few months ago I was in the office of a publicity man at Twentieth Century-Fox and couldn't help noticing there on the wall a calendar with a photograph of a gorgeous nude who was captioned "The Flame Girl." Marilyn wasn't honored even at her own studio. "Why don't you have a Monroe calendar instead of an outsider like 'The Flame Girl'?" I asked. The publicity man answered: "That's what Marilyn wanted to know."

A baby is notoriously the most greedy, egocentric, ruthless and grasping organism known to science. Even while it is being tenderly talcumed, it is plotting how to snatch your eyeglasses, grab your watch, swallow the nearest safety pin, and scream with rage when unable to bite off one of its toes. I find them irresistible.

Ronald Colman

I trust you realize from the way Marilyn handled the calendar bit that she is a very smart chick. She's not all physical. She's brighter than most people think. They mistakenly go along on the assumption that if you're blonde and not out of shape, you've got to be dumb. Don't sell our little girl short: she knows what she's doing every minute. For example, she has learned through experience to wait until the interviewer puts pencil and paper away to say what she really wants quoted. I would say that her seeming helplessness is her strength. She can take care of herself. I'd bet, and give big odds, that if Marilyn were placed alone on a desert island, somehow a man would appear.

"All right," I can hear you saying, "You've convinced me. Marilyn is smart as well as beautiful. But what's with the article? We sent a staff photographer to her apartment to shoot some special art work. There must be an article on her by you!"

No, Chuck. Did you ever stop to think that maybe I'm not Boswell? Maybe I'm Pythias. And did he write about Damon? I was in Marilyn's apartment that evening when your photographer arrived. I was listening to Marilyn play her guitar and sing. Then I watched the photographer shoot a layout. It's quite a job posing for pictures. The average reader picking up a magazine might say, "Oh, another picture of Monroe" and flip the page. Well, it took from nine until a little past midnight to get those pictures. Marilyn's performance impressed me. She not only knew her best angles but she knows the best angles for the photographer. She knew if the light was casting a shadow across her. She was aware of minute details, such as what part of her thigh the blanket should cross. She even combed her hair so it would look uncombed. She doesn't leave it to chance that photographs of her will be interesting.

Marilyn doesn't stand in front of a mirror for hours practicing poses, as some people believe. But she does take a long time making up and dressing, considering the few clothes she is alleged to wear. She doesn't own a girdle, but when she considers it necessary—which is oftener than she is given credit for—she does wear panties and a bra. It's usually a flesh-colored bra and black panties. She kicks off her shoes the moment she enters her apartment. She sleeps in the raw, or as she has been quoted: "I wear nothing but Chanel No. 5 to bed." She claims she wears it to bed because "it makes sleeping dreamy."

A bed has always been important to Marilyn. (It's dat ol' debbil double meaning again.) Ever since she was an orphan kid she wanted to own her own bed. With the first money she ever saved she bought herself a bed. No matter where she lived—apartment, hotel or house—she would have this bed. When she didn't have a place of her own or was traveling, she would put the bed into storage. The upkeep of the bed far exceeded its original cost. It was a low bed, close to the floor, because as a child Marilyn was a restless sleeper, frequently had nightmares and would fall out of her bed and onto the floor. As you can see in the photos, Marilyn recently treated herself to a new bed. It is higher—not so close to the floor—because Marilyn is more sure of herself.

Don't get the idea, though, that Marilyn is taking it big; that she's bubbling over with confidence. Just the opposite; she could use a lot more of it. Back in the beginning, she wanted to be a movie star more than anything else.

She did become a movie star, and what a movie star! Oozing glamor like the great movie stars of yesteryear, when the movies were magic. You've got to admit it, Chuck, The Monroe has done more for Hollywood and motion pictures than any individual in a decade; for she created a spate of fresh interest on the part of a public growing weary of familiar faces, a public no longer believing in glamor.

At the preview of Gentlemen Prefer Blondes, I was again pinch-hitting for DiMaggio. Marilyn and I have an agreement, Chuck: if DiMaggio is ever taken out of the line-up, I can continue as pinch-hitter. Before the picture flashed on the screen, Marilyn whispered to me in that low, sexy voice that is natural with her: "Hold a good thought for me." She always says that when embarking on a venture. She feels much better when you tell her you will. So don't forget this, Chuck.

Marilyn didn't like the way she looked on the screen, especially her hair. She didn't think she had done the scenes and many of the numbers as well as she should have. She liked herself, especially her hair, in the "Diamonds Are A Girl's Best Friend" number. She genuinely enjoyed Jane Russell and actually laughed aloud at a few of Jane's remarks.

I'm telling you all this, Chuck, in case you'd like to know (strictly for yourself and maybe to whisper to the wife) how Marilyn reacts to herself on the screen. But again, you and I know there isn't a magazine article in it. I could go on to tell you how hard Marilyn works at her job and it would be all I could do to get you to believe it.

I know it's not good magazine copy that, despite nature's bounty, she works as hard at self-improvement as any other actress in town. She takes dramatics lessons, singing lessons, and is also grooming herself to appear in a play. The first charge account she ever opened was at Marian Hunter's book shop in Beverly Hills. She buys books on self-improvement, psychology, the latest plays, poetry, and practically everything on Abraham Lincoln, who is her special hero. She'll never tell you that she has read a certain book or has seen a certain movie, but during the course of a conversation, when the book or the movie is mentioned, she will make a pertinent comment. She is a secret reader and often sneaks off to the movies by herself.

Marilyn has her own special dramatic coach, Natasha Lytess, who is with her on every picture. Though she seldom makes a movie without Natasha, don't get the notion (as some studio people have) that Marilyn is a Trilby. Not so. This relationship is merely another example of Marilyn's loyalty, as well as of the fact that she never stops working at trying to become a fine actress. All the publicity, the acclaim, the marquee signs may thrill her, but they don't fool her.

Natasha was the dramatic coach at Columbia Studios, back when Marilyn worked there. Natasha was kind to her and gave her words of encouragement. Marilyn hasn't forgotten, and since she feels she requires coaching she has insisted on Natasha Lytess.

Marilyn can be standing still on the set and at the same time be going off in all directions. She needs someone with her whom she believes is taking a special interest in her, to take her aside and offer suggestions and reassurance. She likes most of her directors, but cannot help feeling slighted because they don't devote all their attention to her. Often it takes the directors and performers a while to become adjusted to this in her. Many believe she is putting on an act. The truth is she is working desperately hard both trying to make good and trying to make everyone on the set like her. During Clash By Night, the set workers had to explain to her that by the term "equipment" they meant the camera, sound boom and other paraphernalia of picture making. Because when the assistant director yelled to Marilyn: "Watch out for the equipment!" she demurely zipped up her sweater.

There was a scene in Love Nest that required Marilyn to enter her apartment and leisurely disrobe for a shower, unaware that the hero, Bill Lundigan, was asleep on a couch in the room. Just as she had stripped down to her flimsy underthings, director Joe Newman stopped the scene. Marilyn looked startled and frightened. "Did I do something wrong?" she asked. "No, honey," replied Newman. "You were perfect. But Lundigan was peeking!"

Marilyn is exceptionally moody and given to long periods of solitary introspection. She blames this on her lonely childhood and the fact that in her entire life she has known only a few couples in whom she could confide. I know from our chats while you visited Hollywood, Chuck, that this isn't the kind of thing for fan magazines, but I only mention it because it is The Monroe I know; and strange as it seems, Marilyn Monroe and the fan magazines don't mix. That's a honey, isn't it?

Regardless, I must tell you the piano story. Of all the folks Marilyn lived with as a child, her favorite and the one of whom she has the fondest recollections is the woman she called Aunt Ana. Aunt Ana was warm and maternally affectionate toward Marilyn. Some of their happiest hours were spent around the piano, the family's proudest possession. For this piano was said to have once belonged to Fredric March. Many years later Aunt Ana died and willed this precious piano to Marilyn. Although Marilyn often was not working and didn't have too much to eat, she had a piano, even if she had to borrow the money to pay for its storage. Now that Marilyn is in the chips and has her own apartment, the piano has been given a face-lift and occupies most of the living room. What's more, Marilyn can play almost two songs on it.

In answer to your main question, Chuck—what do I personally think makes The Monroe sexy?—I don't think you would print the answer. But I'll try to tell you in this letter.

It's obvious that Marilyn is a well-stacked, well-proportioned, unwrapped box of glamor. There are her red lips, always moist, there's the back of her hair so arranged it appears to have a permanent pillow dent; in fact everything about her spells out sex and everybody seems to get the message. But I get a special message, and it's the clincher on why I shouldn't do that article for you.

I happen to know that The Monroe's biggest sex appeal is an accident. What is she most famous for? What feature has been most imitated? Her walk! In Niagara they held a camera on her walk longer than on any other walk in cinema history. It evoked much discussion, pro and con. For Marilyn doesn't just walk: she wiggles, snake-hips, bumps, twists and slithers all at the same time. She has been described as "The Girl With The Horizontal Walk." She is the only performer in show business who makes her greatest entrance when she exits.

Yet Marilyn, when she walks, isn't trying to be sexy—believe me. She broke her ankle when she was a youngster and tried to walk so as to favor that ankle. The ankle is still weak, and the walk has become a habit. That's it. Marilyn is only doing what comes naturally, and my, how the natives have gone for it! You see, there are some things about sex that even Dr. Kinsey doesn't know.

In closing, let me ask you something, Chuck: what is there to write about Marilyn that hasn't already been written? Someone will have to invent a new life for her. Honest, Chuck, I'm not your boy. Maybe you ought to hire an inventor. But seriously, I want to remain friends with you, so why don't you think it over and then drop me a line saying that you agree with me that I can't do a fan magazine article on Marilyn Monroe?

Best wishes.

Sidney Skolsky

Dear Sidney:

You may not know it, but you just did what we consider a good fan mag piece on The Monroe.

Kindest regards.

what it's like to be tony's wife

(Continued from page 56) fan mail was coming in by the truckload and he must have realized he was definitely on his way up. He didn't throw the promise of his future at anyone; rather he seemed to efface himself and let others have the spotlight.

I saw him again some weeks later when we both joined a group that met once a week to study dramatics at the Actor's Lab. Most of the kids looked on it as a social gathering, but Tony was deadly serious about it. He seemed so shy in person, yet in his work he had no inhibitions. If he was asked to do pantomime, to 'be' Notre Dame or July's last snapdragon, he threw his heart and soul into it. I remember the first skit we did together. We were supposed to be parents watching our child at his first piano recital, and while we were to be bursting with pride at first, we were to realize slowly that the rest of the audience wasn't nearly as appreciative. When Tony turned to look at me toward the end of the skit there was such torture in his eyes, such real emotion, that I still remember the jolt it gave me. I told myself that this Tony Curtis was not only deeply serious about his work, he had great sensitivity.

These were impressions gained only in passing. I didn't begin to know Tony until we dated, and in that I found something else to admire. He had seen me only when I was with Arthur Loew, and it wasn't until the group at the Actor's Lab dissolved and then reconvened to plan for a new class that Tony saw me with another escort. He asked me then if I was going steady with anyone and as soon as I told him no, he asked for my phone number. He called two days later to ask for a date, and I realized that he may have wanted to phone me before, but observed a gentleman's code in not trespassing on someone else's territory. I liked him for it, and I liked him because he didn't rush impetuously into a frantic courtship. Instead of trying to date me every night in the week, he showed solid sense by asking to see me once or twice a week. I didn't have to worry, with Tony, about getting home early when I had a morning call at the studio the next day. He understood without my having to ask him, and always took me home at a decent hour.

WE talked a lot on those first dates. It didn't seem to matter where we went. There was no need for entertainment because we had so much to tell each other. I'd seen flashes of his humor before—Tony can never be serious for too long—but the ice really broke the night he handed me a pair of silver earrings I'd never seen before. "This is great," I said. "They're not mine. You've forgotten which girl they belong to."

At that he broke up and howled. He'd bought them for me as a gift, of course, and I guess that was the beginning of our schtickloks, our word for the crazy routines we sail into every once in a while.

Even so, I think he was more serious when with me than with anyone else. I got the impression that Tony wasn't very sure of me. I even felt he wasn't too used to dating girls. It made sense that he wouldn't be. His gang in New York weren't the type to turn romantic very early in life, and besides, I had the feeling that because he was so good looking he'd been the subject of a handful of crushes back in the Bronx. Travelling with the gang as he did, he couldn't very well break off and turn Casanova. They wouldn't have liked him for it, I suppose.

His manners were perfect, mainly because they stemmed from his thoughtfulness, but he just didn't seem at ease with me. I remember on our second date he spilled a glass of water on my dress and I've never seen anybody so embarrassed or upset. On the day he started his first leading role in The Prince Who Was A Thief, I sent him (Continued on page 68)

Mrs. Theo Croner of New York does a lot of housework but manages to be pretty as a picture.

"I wash 1400 pounds of laundry a year... but I'm proud of my pretty hands!"

If you ever meet Theo Croner, be sure to shake hands. You'll notice that hers are as soft and pretty as a pair of hands can be.

Yet Mrs. Croner (just like yourself) washes almost a ton of laundry every year. And plenty of it the hard way — by hand!

She's grateful for detergents, of course. Those miracle suds really chase grease and dirt. But detergents are a problem, too. That same grease-cutting action could send the natural oils and youthful softness of her hands down the drain, too.

Throw out detergents? Not Theo! She's found a way to keep hands lovely despite all harsh cleansers. It's a simple trick. After every chore, smooth pure, white Jergens Lotion on, right away.

You won't see any sticky film. Being a liquid, Jergens Lotion doesn't just "coat" the hands. It penetrates — helps replace softening moisture. (It has two ingredients doctors use for softening.) This is why more women use Jergens Lotion than any other hand care in the world.

Theo will tell you that Jergens is the reason her hands are so attractive. Her husband may not know the reason, but he appreciates it!

So keep detergents in your house (there's nothing like them). Just keep Jergens Lotion handy, and use it after every chore. It's such an easy habit, and so important to a woman.

Only 10¢ to $1.00 plus tax

Use JERGENS LOTION — avoid detergent hands

(Continued from page 66) some champagne, and he was so appreciative you'd have thought I'd sent over a Brink truck loaded with a million dollars. Tony wasn't a smoothie; he wasn't a wolf; he wasn't a Beau Brummel. He was just an average boy with qualities that made me like him more and more.

Along with his uneasiness with girls went a strange distrust of them. I've never known why, but it was as if Tony expected me to be dishonest with him. As a result, every time he found I'd told him the truth, he was as happy as a puppy with a bone. He has told me since our marriage that when he asked for a date and was told I had an engagement that evening, he used to wait down the street to find out if this was the truth. And when he'd see me leave the house on another man's arm, he was almost as pleased as though he'd been with me himself.

I don't know why, but it seems I frightened him. I went to New York soon after we began dating, and before I left he said he was sure he'd never see me again. I told him quite frankly that I was going for a rest, that I had friends there and that I would probably go out with one man in particular. He took me to the airport, still believing this was the end of our friendship and that for some reason I was too weak to tell him. He stewed for days afterwards, all during the shooting of his picture. The cast and crew kept telling him to telephone me. "I can't," he said. "She'd hang up on me." But he did call, and was amazed when I talked to him. He was even more surprised when I wired I was coming home and asked him to meet me at the airport.

PERHAPS this idea of his had some connection with the way he presented me to his friends. Tony's friends are of all ages and interests—a wider variety I've never known. He gradually introduced me to all of them, standing on the sidelines and watching to see my reaction. It was as if he expected me to suddenly turn bored or impolite, as if he'd found a golden egg and wanted to make sure it wasn't all a dream. I realize now that he was desperately anxious for them to like me as much as he did. Tony has a tremendous loyalty to all his friends, a love so deep that he feels the compulsion to share his every joy with them. He calls them all frequently. He must know where they are at all times. It is almost an obsession with him.

I have thought that this might be the result of his brother's death, years ago, in New York traffic. Tony lost track of Julius and it was the last he ever saw of him. The tragedy was such a shock to Tony's emotional heart that it is perhaps the reason that even today, he must know where and how his friends are. And perhaps it was the reason he felt he was losing me when I went to New York.

We hadn't dated very often before the evening we were driving along and he suddenly said, "Jerry's home. Let's call him." Tony had told me a lot about Jerry Lewis and their friendship, and while I had felt some trepidation about winning the approval of others, the prospect of meeting Jerry loomed like an impossible task. I'm not the quick-answer type, and having seen Jerry only as an entertainer, I had a sinking feeling that Tony's best friend would think I was as interesting as a squeezed lemon. Jerry and Patti had been away on tour ever since I'd known Tony. It was typical that Tony should suddenly know they had returned. It wasn't the last time I was to experience his uncanny sixth sense.

We telephoned and sure enough, they were home and wanted us to come over. I kept telling myself I couldn't change, that if they didn't like me the way I was, I couldn't do much about it. The minute we walked in, Tony and Jerry went into a loony routine. It was the first time I'd seen this craziness of Tony's, the wacky routines that people now seem to think monopolize his days—and I loved it. Patti and I went off in a corner and talked girl-talk, and I realized, with considerable relief, that I wasn't expected to "be on" when I was around Jerry. I could tell Tony was as happy as a clam that evening, so I knew that I had been accepted into the family. Then Patti and Jerry included me in one of their home movies. You can't get closer than that to the Lewis clan.

By now I was growing more and more certain that Tony was a thoughtful, good-hearted, sensible boy, and the visit to his parents boosted him another notch in my estimation. Mom and Pop Schwartz are the salt of the earth, and truer gentlefolk than many millionaires. I say this because they lived in a tiny, unpretentious house in the valley, and although they were poor in material things, they were richer in love than any people I have known. Tony told me before we went to expect his mother to be excited. She had seen me in a movie and was flustered as a hen at the thought of having me to dinner. She couldn't know that I was even more flustered than she, because I wanted Tony's parents to like me. I wanted very much to have them like me.

It was one of the easiest, happiest evenings I ever spent. We played games with Tony's kid brother, Bobby, and I noticed Tony's understanding and patience with the child. We ate dinner in the kitchen, as I used to do at home, as most people do, and I liked it because Mrs. Schwartz made no apologies. I ate everything on my plate and a big helping of dessert, loving the Hungarian cooking. Mom Schwartz beamed at me as though I'd given her a mink coat. Afterward, I helped her with the dishes, and Tony and Pop sat back in the living room, watching us like proud roosters. The Schwartzes gave themselves to me as they were, and I loved them for it. And that night I saw Tony's devotion to his family. A strong, unbreakable link in his life, a thing I like in a man.

AFTER I came back from New York we limited our dates to each other. That was a period of getting to know each other well because marriage was in the back of both our minds. We talked about our childhood, our families, our careers, our beliefs, our philosophies. We were pretty well talked out when Tony left on a trip to Denver for MODERN SCREEN and I took off for Pittsburgh to make Angels In The Outfield. He telephoned me constantly and one night when he couldn't reach me, he was frantic. I still didn't know, then, about Tony's obsession; his having to know where his loved ones are. If I had, I most certainly would never have let it happen. It was the night when the cast of the picture and the Pirate team had a wing-ding, one of those social things that go with picture making, and I didn't get back to my hotel until three A.M. Tony had been calling all evening and when he finally reached me, soon after my return, he was almost hysterical with worry. I wanted to beat myself for having put him through such a wringer.

It was that night that he asked me to marry him, and when I cautioned that he was upset and we should talk it over later under more normal circumstances, he thought it was my way of refusing him. By the time he met me in Pittsburgh he had simmered down and regained his confidence sufficiently to bring me a gold ring, set with a pearl. It was a beautiful thing, and the first opportunity I had for knowing that Tony's taste in such delicate things is exquisite. Despite the ring, I kept insisting that we talk things over when we got home. I already knew what I wanted, but I wanted him to be absolutely sure. As I look back now, I don't know what more assurance I could have wanted. Tony is impulsive in small matters, but in the big things, the things that count, he's cautious as a cat. Jerry and Dean settled it for us when we stopped to see their act in Chicago on our way back to the coast. We sat in the back room thinking we hadn't been spotted, and then we saw a table moving over the heads of the customers. The waiter put it down in the middle of the dance floor and then Jerry began yelling for us to come up and make ourselves at home. He saw the ring right away and before we could stop him, announced gleefully to the whole house that we were going to be married. I don't think Tony really wanted to stop him—he wanted the whole world to share his happiness.

I saw Tony's strength when he stood up to his studio. They didn't want him to marry so soon, but Tony said, "If my popularity is only because I'm single, I might as well give up acting right now." Their disagreement upset me, but Tony made sense, and so we were married—in Greenwich, Connecticut.

I left shortly after to come back to Hollywood to make a picture, and that brief separation affected him so much that he actually got sick, and the studio allowed him to come home for a brief week-end. I began to understand how violently emotional Tony is, how he gives himself so completely to those he loves.

THEN his father had the heart attack and again I saw Tony's strength. He telephoned the doctor and the hospital, long distance, made all the arrangements, canceled his tour and flew home to his dad. He spent all day every day at the hospital and I joined him there after work every day. We stayed until 9 P.M. and then ate dinner on the way home. In his devotion he forgot himself completely, and I worried that he might collapse. I remember the day he came to the set where I was shooting. He looked terribly haggard and he came to me in my dressing room and put his arms around me. I knew then that he had done with being strong, that he needed my help, and much as I had admired his strength, I loved him more that day for showing human weakness.

All of this happened in the first month of our marriage, and I think in that period we lived a lifetime. The stress and strain it put on our marriage, which at that time should have been a carefree honeymoon, gave it the most solid foundation possible. If you can go on loving and understanding through adversity, you build something wonderful with each other.

I learned about his generosity. With Tony, what's his is everyone's. Jerry Gershwin came over one day while Tony was shaving and admired his razor. "Here," said Tony, "take it." He is possessive only where people are concerned, and he finds it hard to let them go. If a friend disappoints him in some way, Tony tries to find out why it happened. If there is no reason for a friend's misusing him, that person no longer has Tony for a friend. But Tony suffers real torture in the process of disillusionment. He is gradually learning that open trust can be betrayed, yet every time it happens, he is deeply hurt again.

I learned that he dislikes arguments and hates to fight. In our marriage he can't stand loose threads of misunderstanding, and has proved time and again his willingness to try to work things out for the better. He has pride and humility, and is never too stuffy to say, "I'm sorry." We are really 50-50 on that score.

I learned about his moods. Sophie Rosenstein, who was dramatic coach at Universal-International before her death, once asked Tony if I had ever seen him when he was "in one of his moods." He told me about her question, and I laughed and said he couldn't scare me. After our marriage, I knew what Sophie had meant. Once in a while Tony became very withdrawn, and when I questioned him about it, refused to talk. "Look," I said. "If you're enjoying a mood I don't want to break into it, but in the interim I'm blaming myself for your unhappiness. I wonder if I've done anything wrong, if it is my fault." Gradually he began telling me, and I came to know that many times he was upset by little things; something that had gone wrong on his picture, or something he had read, and he hadn't wanted to tell me because he was afraid I would think he was silly to be affected by such minor things. "I get upset about silly and sentimental things, too," I told him. "Don't mind me." So he learned to talk things out with me and his moods don't come so often.

LAST June he went into another one, and it took me four days to find out he was worried about going to Honolulu to make Beachhead. Tony has always had a fear of flying. I don't know why—he hadn't seemed to be bothered by long days in a submerged submarine during the war, which to me would be much more frightening—but he is terrified by planes. So are a lot of other people, but he is still ashamed of the fear. The studio wanted him to fly to Hawaii with the company, and he wanted to take the boat. But the boat would mean a longer separation for us. He made himself miserable over it until I found I could go with him by boat. I'd be on 24-hour call, but I could go. As it turned out, we had the trip over as well as six long days together, the only real vacation we've had together in two years of marriage.

I stayed until he began work, and when I got home I learned we were going to have a baby. I don't know that there was ever a man as excited as Tony. He was delirious with joy. We had decided to limit ourselves to a phone call every other day, but when I phoned Tony the news the budget broke wide open. He hates writing letters, but he wrote me every single night we were apart. I will always treasure the letters about the baby. He wrote that he was reading serious books in every spare moment, books about the earth and religion and life itself to help him to understand our own miracle.

And then when I lost the baby, we had again that round robin of strength and dependence. He had called me on Saturday, when I was feeling a bit rocky, and although I said nothing about it he detected something in my voice. He called back later that night. "I can't go to sleep. I know something's wrong. What is it?" He called again on Monday, my birthday, and I assured him everything was all right. I lost the baby Tuesday evening, and although it wasn't his night to phone, he knew something was wrong and put through a call. That deep bond again, the closeness he feels with those he loves. He called at home and got no answer and then called his parents. My own folks had told the Schwartzes that the doctor had given me a sedative and put me to bed, and when Mom told Tony that, he knew. He wrote me that night and called at the hospital the next morning, and afterward, once he knew I was all right, he wrote the most beautiful letter I've ever read. It was gentle and loving, yet strong. He was doing his best to bolster my spirits, from 3000 miles away. The letter was so like Tony, so tender, and yet not without humor. In it he wrote, "We will have forgotten all this in the years to come when we're surrounded by our four children, not to mention the twins at college, and George. George? Who's George?"

I couldn't help laughing, and in the days that followed, his letters and phone calls gave me the strength I needed. Then, imperceptibly, I began feeling a resentment. I was sorry for myself. There I was, enduring our tragedy all alone, and Tony was far away, laughing and talking with other people. He seemed to me to be untouched by it and I was sure he couldn't feel as stricken as I did. And then on Sunday he called, and I could hear the tears in his voice. He was no longer the pillar of strength, the comforter. "I can't stand it any longer," he said. "I've got to come home to you."

That snapped me right out of my orgy of self-pity, and I began to bolster him. It's like that all the time. One of us leaning on the other.

Tony is insecure in some ways, but he has a great strength, a strong self-will. He is not afraid to make a decision, nor to act. We need each other, but I know that in a pinch, he is the stronger one of us. The long separation while he was in Hawaii was difficult to bear, particularly under the early circumstances, but it taught us even more what our relationship means to each of us. I think we both grew up a lot during those long weeks, and with time and space to view ourselves, felt happier than ever in our marriage.

People have asked me, when Tony is working in Hollywood and calls me ten times a day from his set, "What's the matter?—Doesn't he trust you?" But I know what it is. It's because he's Tony, and he must know that I am here and well, that his world is still safe and happy. I like it this way, this being loved so much and needed so much. That's what it's like to be Tony's wife.

the not so mad house

Five years ago come November, Jerry and Patti bought their home in the Pacific Palisades. They purchased it just as soon as they were certain that Martin and Lewis would be working steadily. "It's the first real house either of us have ever known," Patti points out. "As kids we lived in city apartments, I in Detroit, and Jerry in Jersey. Both of us left school pretty early to go into show business, and we were on the road a lot. That's pretty tough living. You move from room to room and train to train, and you never have an acre of ground you can call your own."

When Jerry and Patti first got married they used to spend non-working evenings perusing the various shelter magazines. "After Gary was born," Patti recalls, "we really needed a house, and once the boys signed a contract with Hal Wallis, we started looking for one type of place, budget or no budget. We wanted the most completely House And Garden type of home we could find. And today, five years later, we still think we found it."

The Jerry Lewis house is essentially the All-American dream home come true. Red brick, white trim, a picket fence, roses in the backyard, dogs yelping, a white gate, the whole works.

Wonderful to begin with, it still wouldn't be genuine Lewis if it had been permitted to remain in its natural state. Jerry has a theory he applies to practically everything tangible: if you like something why not have a lot more of the same? This goes for golf clubs—at the last counting he had nine sets—guns, cameras, dogs, shirts, shoes, and jelly beans. And of course, houses.

Jerry liked his original structure so much that he decided to add a super deluxe playhouse a few yards away.

Originally the project started out to involve a small enlarging of the tool shed into a separate playroom for Gary and his kindergarten gang. Midway, Jerry took over the building supervision.

"This room," he announced, "must have a barbecue. And if you've got a barbecue, you certainly need a refrigerator. Who wants to carry food from the kitchen all the time? But then if you can get ice cubes from your refrigerator, it'd be crazy not to figure on a small bar." Even though Jerry drinks nothing but soda pop, a bar and apartment-size kitchen were added.

By the time construction got under way, Patti had accepted the fact that the building wasn't going to be a rumpus room—at least not a rumpus room for children. When the costs approached the $25,000 mark, she called a halt. "Now, Jerry," she stormed, "this whole thing has definitely got out of hand. You've got a fireplace, parquet floors, a four-machine projection room. If you don't stop we'll end up with something like Radio City."

Jerry argued that having a playroom away from the main house was really very economical. "Just think," he offered, "how much wear and tear we're saving by keeping people out of our living room." He grinned. "Seriously, Patti," he said, "we don't go out very much, and I've always wanted a recreation room." Jerry won his point—which is very easy to do with Patti since her heart is made of butter—and work on the playroom was resumed. Today, it is worth somewhere in the neighborhood of $80,000 which is twice what the Lewises paid for their original residence.

"That rumpus room," Jerry says, "is worth every cent it cost."

To satisfy her two sons, Patti bought a pre-fabricated playhouse and set it up alongside their father's.

The result of all these additional structures was that they cut the size of the Lewis lawn. One morning Jerry awoke and looking out on his property, said, "You know, Patti, every family should have enough room to play a little pick-up baseball."

"Yes, dear," Patti mumbled, then promptly turned over on her side and returned to sleep.

Jerry, however, got dressed, went outside, and bought the vacant lot next door. He now uses this for practicing chip shots.

The changes Jerry has wrought outside their home Patti has practically matched inside. Although she loved the basic plan of their U-shaped house, to begin with she realized that alterations would have to be made to suit their own particular needs. In the gabled living room, for example, she added window seats on one side of the fireplace and shelves on the other. The seats are for guests and the shelves are for Patti's collection of porcelain dogs that she started when she was a little girl. Here, too, she hangs the show ribbons won by her two Springer spaniels, Chipper and Percy.

According to her mother, "Esther (Patti's real name is Esther Callonico Lewis) is a pushover for children and dogs. She can't ignore a child and she can't go to the vet without bringing home a pup."

All the colors throughout the Lewis home were chosen by Patti. Without leaning on a decorator's arm, she simply made up her own mind as to furnishings. For the living room she chose a grey-green carpet that matches the wall and ceiling. The piano, coffee table, and lamp tables were ordered in pale mahogany. Then to give her room a logical center she placed a large, round, hooked rug in front of the fireplace. This, plus a bowl of Jerry's bulk candy on a square table, helps to draw conversational groups together.

Two Christmases ago portraits of Jerry and Patti were added to the room via the coincidence route. It started with Hal

Wallis' approaching Patti and suggesting that Paul Clemens, the popular artist, paint her. Patti went along for the sittings without telling Jerry. On Christmas Eve she placed the completed picture under the tree. It was wrapped in a suit box. Jerry's gift to her looked like it might be a bass fiddle, "Just in case you want to start up your all-girls band again."

Early next morning they opened the boxes. Patti fought her way through layers of paper and found herself looking at a bright oil painting of her laughing husband. "Oh, no," she squealed. "But how did you ever guess what I had for you?" Jerry howled. "I'm psychic."

After remodeling her living room, Patti went after the children's wing of the house. She added two small bedrooms so that each boy might have his own private realm with the nurse's bedroom in between. Of late, however, the boys have decided to move in together. They begged their mother to buy double-decker bunks so they could sleep in one room but keep their toys in separate ones.

They also demanded that they be allowed to eat with their father. Patti broached the subject to Jerry, and he said, "Sure, let 'em eat with us."

"But not in the dining room," Patti protested. "They'll ruin the rug."

"Okay," Jerry agreed, "we'll all eat in the kitchen." Which meant that Patti had to make the kitchen larger. She ordered new appliances, a refrigerator and dishwasher, a giant freezer, and a six-burner stove. She moved all the laundry equipment outside to a lattice-enclosed porch, then bought a large oval table and four well-cushioned chairs. In addition she had a niche built for a radio because Jerry likes music with his food. She also had the carpenters hang a magazine rack along one wall since the master of the house likes to read while he waits for his food. He likes to read a trade paper called Variety.

THE formal dining room in the Lewis ménage is saved for guest night which is at least once a week. Jerry and Patti both love people, and when the group is small they serve a sit-down dinner by candlelight. Their favorite meals have a slight Italian flavor with a side dish of spaghetti or ravioli and Patti's special fried chicken. She fries the chicken slowly in a skillet with onions, parsley, green peppers, and garlic. She makes a gravy with the left-over seasoning, and no one who has tasted this concoction has ever refused a second helping. Nor can anyone understand how Jerry can eat at home and still stay so thin. Actually he's hypersensitive, hypernervous, and congenitally restless.

For her part, Patti does everything to make life at home serene for her husband. No comfort is too much for him. Only a few weeks ago she called in a cabinet-maker to construct a new dressing room for her boy. Jerry's old wardrobe space wasn't large enough to hold the tremendous amount of haberdashery he buys. Now an entire room has been assigned to that purpose.

Jerry and Patti have been so happy in their home that friends are constantly asking them for help in house-shopping.

"It's not the house that counts," Jerry recently told Janet and Tony Curtis. "It's what you've got inside. Patti and me and the kids—heck, we've just got a lot of love for each other."

And there's where the Clown Prince of Nonsense has made the most sense of his life.

Accent-Stockings

■ Cyd Charisse, last seen in MGM's The Band Wagon, features stocking as an important part of her evening costume—a beige gown by René of Kay-Selig. Cyd's stockings are Cameo's Ballet Toe—exciting brand new 12 denier finest knit seamless ever made. The other award winning Cameo styles in Cyd's stocking wardrobe include: Burmilace, the 60 gauge Can't Run daytime stocking with "eye appeal" and "wear for real"; Wonder Top, a wispy, full-fashioned all-purpose stocking with magic top (to ease all strain); Cameo's 66, a full-fashioned 12 denier glamor stocking reserved for late day and evening. Cyd's pearls are by Deltah.

Ricardo Montalban views Cyd Charisse's gift—a lovely compact.

And in turn, Ricardo watches Shelley Winters give her stockings the acid test.

The Captain of the Brown Derby serves Greer Garson her gift while Bob Stack looks on.

Stretched lightly in French hand mirrors to show sheer perfection and variety of weave, a Cameo stocking wardrobe delighted the stars.

Gifts galore—Cameo stockings for all! Cameo was presented the M. S. Fashion Award for superior construction, styling and beauty.

"It's all set," the friend told her. "I know him very well. Don't worry, Rosemary, I'll fix it." So she went to this boy and told him that Rosemary Clooney was just dying to meet him, and the teenage Don Juan said, "Sure. Bring her over. I'll give her a whirl." So Rosemary was brought over and was introduced to her secret love.

The boy took one look at her—the flat chest, the crooked teeth, the large mouth—and closing his eyes as though they could not stand the sight of this teen-age female horror, he shook his head in violent disbelief. "Oh, no!" he wailed. "Oh! No."

Rosemary Clooney's youth was filled with such incidents. "I used to look at myself in the mirror, and it was awful. . . . We never had a permanent home . . . I was never much to look at . . . No sorority really wanted me."

With what is amazing candor for any woman, these are the sort of remarks which used to sprinkle Rosemary's reminiscences. But now that her love, long prison-pent and repressed, has been released in marriage, she feels fulfilled and requited. Whereas she has felt bitter toward those who scorned and snubbed her because of her poverty, she now looks back upon them with pity and understanding. For in her life as a newlywed there is room in her heart for nothing save love and José Ferrer—which she considers synonymous.

WHEN Rosemary, the daughter of an impoverished Kentucky house painter, eloped to Durant, Oklahoma, with José, the son of a wealthy Puerto Rican attorney, no one in Hollywood was the slightest bit surprised. For Rosemary had been Ferrer's steady girl for months.

Paramount tried to put the silencer on the news because technically Ferrer was still married to his second wife, Phyllis Hill, and the studio was in the process of giving Rosemary a Cinderella buildup—but the Ferrer-Clooney love affair never was a secret.

As soon as Ferrer could arrange a financial settlement with Phyllis Hill, all of his friends expected him to make Rosemary the third Mrs. Ferrer. As one of them points out, "Rosemary complements Joe very nicely. He's so intense, and she's so matter-of-fact. There's a very good balance there. Complement instead of conflict."

There is also the question of physical attraction. Some detractors insist that all of Rosemary's sex appeal lies in her vocal chords. Others are of the opinion that she generates as much sex as a grape. There is no accounting for diversity in human taste, but when José Ferrer first met the Clooney girl in Lisa Kirk's Manhattan apartment, he liked what he saw in the way of figure, face, and personality, and he liked it very much.

A man of depth and probity, Ferrer has never picked his wives on the basis of physical beauty. The mind, the mentality, and the manner—these have always intrigued him.

In Rosemary he found a young girl who has not, to date, been disillusioned by life. He found a simple, honest, ambitious girl without polish, erudition, or background; and whether she appealed primarily to the Pygmalion drive characteristic of so many actors and directors, he isn't saying. But she intrigued him, and they began to go around together.

Rosemary first made certain that Joe was definitely estranged from his wife. "When we go out," she said, "I want it to be in the open, not sneaking around to hideouts."

It was a transcontinental courtship with these two. They ate at Sardi's in New York, Chasen's in California, and all the while, Ferrer's lawyer, Edwin Reiskind was trying to work out some sort of settlement which would satisfy the second Mrs. Ferrer and give Joe his freedom.

When the second Mrs. Ferrer went into a New York play, The Fifth Season, it looked very much as though there would be no Ferrer divorce this year. After all, when would Phyllis Hill be able to get away to establish six weeks' residence in Reno or Hot Springs?

There was only one solution—a Mexican divorce. It is possible for a citizen of the U.S.A. to obtain a divorce in Mexico without any of the parties' going there.

On July 6, this year, Mrs. Phyllis Hill Ferrer filed for divorce in the First Civil Court of Juarez, Mexico. She was in New York at the time, and her husband was in Dallas, starring in the stage version of Kiss Me Kate. The suit stated that the Ferrers had been married in Greenwich, Connecticut, in 1948, and had been separated since May, 1952. Incompatibility was the major charge, and the divorce was granted.

WHEREUPON Rosemary Clooney, having just finished Red Garters over at Paramount, caught the first plane to Dallas for a rendezvous with her lover at the Stoneleigh Hotel.

Ordinarily, Joe and Rosemary Ferrer are cooperative and communicative people, but when reporters asked if they intended to get married in the near future—an intention as obvious as Marilyn Monroe's physical endowments—both of them said, "No comment."

They waited for Joe Shribman, Rosemary's manager, to fly into Dallas, and for Ed Reiskind and Kurt and Ketti Frings and Olivia De Havilland and the cast of The Dazzling Hour—Ferrer rehearsed the cast in Dallas for the play he later staged in La Jolla—and after the whole gang had arrived, and Ed Reiskind had checked on all the legal requirements for marriage in and around Texas, Joe and Rosemary decided to take the big step. "We wanted it done quickly, simply, and without any fanfare."

Early Monday morning the prospective newlyweds, accompanied by Joe's agent, Kurt Frings, and Mrs. Frings, climbed into Ed Reiskind's car and drove to Durant, Oklahoma. Joe Shribman came along, too. The lovers took blood tests, filled out the marriage license, and then marched into the chambers of County Judge Seth Shoemaker who performed the short ceremony.

There was the usual kissing at the end of the ritual and then the drive back to Dallas. That night, José went to work in Kiss Me Kate, and when the final curtain came down, everyone went over to Mario's, an Italian restaurant in town, for the Ferrer wedding party. It was a hum-dinger, considering the fact that Ferrer had to work the next day.

There was no honeymoon. In fact, the following afternoon, Rosemary kissed her Joe goodbye and took off for Hollywood with Kurt Frings. Kurt left his wife Ketti in Dallas to work with Ferrer on the rewrite of The Dazzling Hour.

In Hollywood, Rosemary posed for some MODERN SCREEN photos, had her hair trimmed, tried on a new dress for the premiere of Stalag 17, announced that "I came back because my brother, Nick, is going into the service, and I promised I'd go to the preview with him."

She was so happy, she was jumping, "Flippin' my lid," she cried. "Just flippin' my lid. Never been happier."

HOLLYWOOD wonders how long this ecstatic happiness will last, since the years have shown consistently that two acting careers in one family usually lead to discord and divorce.

There is one particular group in the movie colony which dislikes José Ferrer on the basis of his politics. These people insist that "the only thing José Ferrer can ever stay married to is his career." They warned and advised Rosemary not to marry the producer-director-actor, but the Clooney girl decided to follow her heart.

There are other groups in Hollywood that insist that Joe is one of the most intelligent, versatile, and sensitive talents in the business. Not only that, but that his background, education, and perspicacity are hard to match, and that as a human being, he is kind, tolerant, warm-hearted and generous. For years he has carried countless persons on his payroll. A young dancer in Paris, for example, receives a check from him every month, merely because he knows that she needs the money.

José Vicente Ferrer Oteroy Cintron was born on January 8, 1912, in Santuro, Puerto Rico. Both of his parents were born in Spain, later becoming American citizens. His father attended St. John's College at Annapolis and won his law degree at Syracuse University. His mother was graduated from Sacred Heart College in New York.

When young José was six, his parents took him to New York where he was enrolled in a series of private and public schools. At 14, the boy was considered a piano prodigy, and for a while he hoped to become a concert pianist. But his folks shipped him off to Switzerland for more schooling, and when he returned to the States he decided to enter Princeton's School of Architecture.

While he was in college, Ferrer organized a six-piece band known as Ferrer's Pied Pipers. It was quickly expanded to include 18 members, and during the summers, it used to tour Italy, France, and Switzerland, which is one reason Ferrer speaks five languages with surprising fluency.

While he was at Princeton, Joe—this is the name by which all his friends call him—decided to become a teacher. He took a year's graduate work in French literature and then moved on to Columbia University where he studied for his Master's degree.

At Columbia, Ferrer decided to forsake teaching for the theater and got himself a job as an assistant stage manager in Josh Logan's summer stock company at Suffern, New York. From there he worked himself up to his current eminence.

Now, let's take a look at Rosemary Clooney's background. This singing chick was born in the small Ohio River town of Maysville, Kentucky on May 23, 1928. Her father, Andy Clooney was a house painter who couldn't find enough houses to paint, especially when another daughter and a son were added to his family.

In fact, things were so bad in the Clooney household, financially that is, that the marriage came apart, Rosemary's mother going to work in a dress shop in Lexington, and Andy looking around for a new start in Washington.

The Clooney kids were moved around from grandparent to grandparent. Grandpa Clooney, the perpetual mayor of Maysville, owned a jewelry store and had a little money but when Rosemary was nine, Grandma Clooney died, and the little girl was moved over to Grandmother Guilfoyle's. A widow with nine children of her own to look after, Grandma Guilfoyle found it extremely difficult to bring up Rosemary and her sister. There just wasn't enough money to go around.

Rosemary had to wear hand-me-downs and makeshifts. Dental treatment was neglected. Family security was lacking when she needed it most.

In short, she suffered all the pains and heartaches and humiliations which walk hand-in-hand with poverty. The wonder of it all is that Rosemary Clooney is an optimistic, lively, and stimulating young woman, today.

While she may suffer from an inferiority complex brought on by the lack of physical beauty, she certainly gives no blatant manifestations of chronic insecurity. Rosemary tells of her poverty-ridden days with poignancy but she always points out the lighter side and the happy moments. She talks about the wonderful breaks she got when she and her sister went to work at w.l.w. in Cincinnati, when she signed with Tony Pastor's band and when Joe Shribman, Pastor's manager, got her a recording contract with Columbia Records.

Blue-eyed Rosie was often hurt when she was a child. While these hurts undoubtedly have left their mark, they have not marred her personality or outlook. Rosemary Clooney wants to become a big motion picture star. Right now she has a personable way, a pleasing voice, and a little acting talent.

Married to José Ferrer, however, Rosie is likely to improve as an actress. She will have an excellent influence in the house. There is no doubt but that José can and will enrich Rosie's life. He cooks like a master chef, he plays the piano like a virtuoso; he paints and sculptures; he produces, directs, and acts, he lives every day as if it were his last.

A friend of Clooney's was asked what Rosie could contribute to this marriage. Her retort: "What is this? France in the nineteenth century or Hollywood in the twentieth? All a woman brings to a marriage is herself. Sometimes that's a little, and sometimes that's a lot. In Rosie's case, I can tell you—it's enough!" END

rita's newest love

(Continued from page 28) From that point on, Haymes and Hayworth have been virtually inseparable. Even when Rita flew to Hawaii for location work on Miss Sadie Thompson, Haymes wasn't far behind. He had his agents arrange a concert tour in the Islands, and while it didn't come off too well, it brought him close to Rita.

When Hayworth winged back to Hollywood with José Ferrer, who is also in Miss Sadie Thompson, Haymes was again on hand to continue the romance.

Dick has been Rita's constant escort, so constant that he has had no time for anyone else. Not even Nora Haymes, his separated wife, could contact Dick with any regularity. A newspaperman in the Hobnob, a Beverly Hills eatery, overheard her complaining to her friend, Beetsy Wynn, "I can't get with this bit. I don't know where Richard is keeping himself these days. I want to talk to him about putting up some loot for the divorce, but it's easier to get in touch with Eisenhower."

"Everybody I ask tells me to try Hayworth's house. Can you imagine my doing that?"

Even Bob Eaton, Dick's lawyer, couldn't find him for long periods of time when he needed to discuss the divorce from Nora. "I don't know where he's keeping himself these days," Eaton confided to reporters. "My assumption is that he's out of town."

By this time, of course, the Haymes divorce papers have undoubtedly been filed; and it is just a question of waiting for the proper interval before Richard and Rita make their romance officially public.

Under the circumstances, however, Rita is naturally reticent when it comes to discussing Haymes. When asked about him in New York after they were seen dining, all she would say was "He's a very nice man."

In Hollywood, however, especially before the Haymes divorce papers were drawn up, the ex-Princess was extremely circumspect, particularly for her.

When a friend, a long-term friend who has known her through three arduous marriages, asked at her swimming pool one day, "What goes with you and Dick Haymes?" Rita would only smile and say, "Let's not go into that."

A few days later the actress took off for a short vacation, and coincidentally, Richard Haymes left town at the same time.

All of which goes to prove that having found each other, Dick Haymes and Rita Hayworth are determined to hold on. For many years now, both of them have been in love with love. Since both of them have Spanish blood in their veins and Latin backgrounds, there is undoubtedly much more to their mutual attraction than pure physical appeal.

Whether this is enough to lead eventually to marriage no one can prophesy.

RIGHT now, Rita is a little disillusioned by matrimony but certainly not by men. The only time she was ready to cross the opposite sex off her list was when she left Aly Khan two years ago.

Then she was hurt, bitter, frustrated, and completely disenchanted, and with good reason. Her life with Aly had been anything but a bed of roses. In the midst of all sorts of wild, intractable rumors, she had verified her father-in-law's prediction that she would give birth to a premature child. "Premature children run in our family," the four-times-married Aga Khan had told the press during Rita's pregnancy, whereupon the actress presented her husband with his third child, a beautiful, dark-haired girl whom they named Yasmin.

Yasmin's birth was a big event duly reported throughout the world, but it didn't keep Aly at home, and it didn't curb his reckless spending. In an effort to keep up with her husband's profligate tastes, Rita ran through all her hard-earned cash, approximately $150,000. And in the end, all her sacrifices, all her attempts to remodel her life, to become the worldly sophisticate—all this came to nothing.

One morning the realization burst upon Rita that she was married to a man whose nature was basically inconstant. That's when she pulled up the stakes of her European tent and sailed for home, a wiser, sadder young woman. She was determined, nevertheless, to get a financial settlement of $1,000,000 for her baby daughter.

All she got was a lot of publicity, a whopping lawyer's bill, and the well-founded suspicion that she was destined to support Yasmin through her own earnings just as she is supporting Rebecca, her daughter by Orson Welles.

In the words of an agent who has known her well, "Rita is a lot like Lana Turner. Both of these babes bounce back from loused-up love affairs like a couple of pogo sticks."

"Take a dame like Hayworth. Aly Khan gives her a terrible time in Europe; so she comes back here, goes up to Reno and establishes residence. She tells everyone, 'I don't want a penny for myself. All I want is support for my child.'"

... Boris Karloff, who sold his home in Beverly Hills, is looking for a place to rent. Said Karloff: "I guess you might say I'm house-haunting."

Sidney Skolsky
N. Y. Post

"What happens? Aly Khan comes to Hollywood. Whispers a few sweet nothings in her left ear. Right away the babe takes off for Paris and a rendezvous. All that trouble for one evening, and the next thing anybody knows Khan has blown this babe off and is going around with Gene Tierney. She's hurt, Hayworth is; so she gets herself this Spanish count for an escort, one of Aly's old pals, Count Villa Padierna; only this guy won't come to Hollywood. So she comes back alone. This time she's good and sore at Aly; so she gets the divorce. The Nevada courts tell him he has to pay $48,000 a year for the support of Yasmin. It's a big joke. This is like telling the king of Sweden he has to drink German beer."

"I'm not kidding when I tell you that Hayworth's just like Lana Turner. They're both the world's louisiest pickers of lovers."

"Take this Dick Haymes. He's a nice, loused-up kid, very personable, very charming, maybe a year older than Rita, but he doesn't have a buck. He's a very proud kid, too, and an honorable one."

"Haymes is a man with an eye for beauty. When he gets that mating call, watch out. There he goes. He gave up Joanne Dru, a swell dish, for Nora Haymes. After four years with Nora, that's finished. Instead of concentrating on his work, he concentrates on Hayworth."

"I don't blame him, because Hayworth is really something to concentrate on, but just take a peek at that long list of predecessors, Eddie Judson, Orson Welles, Vic Mature, Tony Martin, Alain Bernheim, Ted Stauffer, Aly Khan, Peter Lawford, Cy Howard, Gilbert Roland, Richard Greene, Kirk Douglas. In her day, Hayworth has had some real big league talent."

"Like I say, Dick is a nice boy, but what chance would he have as Rita's husband?"

He'd lose his own identity. Marrying Rita is like marrying a national institution. You've got to come out second best.

"If Dick were the kind of boy who could manage his wife's career like some birds around this town, that would be different. But he's not built that way. This kid's got integrity and honor. He could never let himself be supported by any dame."

"Just exactly what's gonna happen between these two, I don't know. I'm sure they don't either, except that Dick is not one of these fast-fling boys. When he falls in love, he's always sure it's for keeps this time. With Rita it's a little different. I think she's more realistic, lives every day as if it were her last. Let's have a ball right now because tomorrow maybe Aly Khan will walk through the front door."

NORA Eddington Flynn Haymes, who fell so rapturously in love with Haymes that she gave the skidoo to Errol Flynn, has long been recognized as one of the most regular females in Hollywood.

Honest, straight-shooting, and never-complaining, although she certainly has plenty to wail about, Nora says, "When Dick and I separated in March, he was free to go his way, and I was free to go mine. We're definitely not—well, we're not suited to each other any more."

"As for his personal life, I don't know what he's been doing. I hear from various sources that he's been seeing an awful lot of Miss Hayworth. When I was married to Errol Flynn, she came aboard our boat with Orson Welles for about two weeks; and she's really a very nice person."

"Friends tell me that she's got Dick wound around so tightly that he doesn't know whether he's coming or going, but you know how rumors spread in this town. Probably no foundation to that, whatever. My personal assumption is that they're good friends. Shall we leave it at that?"

"You say has Dick asked for a divorce because he wants to marry Rita? He's never mentioned her to me at all. Richard is a romanticist, a dreamer, a wonderful man with high ideals. If he falls in love with a girl he wants to marry her. He's a wonderful guy. I hope he'll be happy."

IN Hollywood the general consensus of opinion is that Haymes is cut from a fabric different from many crooners. As a boy he studied for the priesthood in Argentina. As a young man he succeeded Frank Sinatra with the Harry James band, and for a period of time he was extremely hot with bobbysoxers.

During the war, Dick was classified 4C, a citizen of a neutral nation, Argentina; and although he tried time and time again to enlist in the Army, he was turned down because of high blood pressure. He was married to Joanne Dru during World War II, and that marriage was youthfully successful until Dick met Nora Flynn in Palm Springs.

Unfortunately for Dick, his career has been sliding downhill ever since his marriage to Nora. He left his agent, Bill Burton; his recordings began to diminish in popularity; picture work became increasingly scarce; but careers in show business are unpredictable, and as they say in Hollywood, "all you need to get on top is one good break."

Whether Dick's one "good break" was meeting and falling in love with Rita Hayworth only the calendar will tell.

Right now, Hollywood is betting on only one thing. Proximity to lovely Rita is not going to reduce the crooner's high blood pressure.

END

(Dick Haymes can now be seen in Columbia's Cruising Down The River.)

"you, I like!"

(Continued from page 59) "So what if they liked me last week," the boyish-faced comic with flecks of grey in his curly brown hair, nagged himself. Show business was a funny thing, he knew. A star today and a bum tomorrow. He had worked too hard, too long to lose it now.

He thought of his mother and father at home in the Bronx, waiting to see him live up to his notices. He thought of his wife, Helayne, who loved him so and helped to ease the hurt of an unhappy first marriage.

The nervous tension of the years of work and waiting welled within him and as he thought of the night ahead and all his yesterdays, Red Buttons collapsed on the tv stage.

He didn't go on that second week in October last year. A film was hastily shown instead and the CBS switchboards were flooded with calls from friendly fans concerned about the comic they had taken to their hearts but a few days before.

That reassurance of their faith in him, the loyalty they showed, their willingness to laugh and sympathize gave him the will and strength he needed to make secure the stardom televisioners had bestowed upon him.

The following week and every week thereafter, Red Buttons continued to endear himself to his fans. If they believed in him, he could believe in himself.

Funny, he secretly admitted later, that he who had never dared lose confidence in himself lest he lose all his hopes should have lost it at the moment when his dreams were fulfilled. He was a star, nationally known and nationally applauded.

EVER since he could remember, he had wanted to be a star.

To anyone but him it might have seemed an impossible dream. Aaron Chwatt, the second of Michael and Sophie Chwatt's three children, was born in a fourth floor walk-up in a tenement in New York's lower East Side on February 5, 1919.

His parents were poor but happy. His father earned $18 a week blocking hats in a millinery shop. He had a quiet dignity and an old world philosophy that children are the future of a country. Michael Chwatt wanted his children, Joe, Aaron and Ida, to be a credit to their parents and to their country.

Sophie Chwatt was born in Poland and immigrated to the United States when she was 16. She was short and plump and pretty with smiling blue eyes and curly red hair like little Aaron's. She was too happy being in America to mind being poor. All she wanted was to keep her children as clean and as well-fed and as happy as she could. There were worse things in life than being poor, Mrs. Chwatt knew, and a mother's love and freedom couldn't be bought at any price.

In these surroundings, Aaron was a lively, jovial, energetic kid willing to do anything for a smile. Skinny and small, he never let his size bother him. What he lacked in stature he compensated for in heart and humor and leadership.

Wiry and muscular, he could hold his own in any brawl, and fighting was the number one sport in Aaron's neighborhood, Third Street between Avenues A and B.

If the older, bigger boys challenged him to a fight and he felt he didn't stand a chance, he'd tilt his head to the side, assume the plaintive facial expressions of a whipped dog and plead mournfully, "I ain't got no mudder."

It always worked. Nobody would hit a kid without a mother, for the only security those poor kids had was a mother.

When Aaron was about seven, his mother cut his bangs and substituted a long pants blue serge suit for erstwhile Saturday and Sunday best, a sailor outfit with white stockings and black shoes. The blue serge was his choir singing uniform, worn when his sweet, clear soprano voice rang out in answer to the Cantor's chants in the local synagogue. If any fellow members of the "Rinky Dink," his own block gang of which he was the undisputed leader, ever referred to his angelic face or singing in any but the most complimentary manner, they had the soprano's fists in their kissers to prove he was no sissy.

WHEN Papa Chwatt got a small increase in salary, he moved out of the lower East Side uptown to East 176th Street in the Bronx, so his family could be brought up in better surroundings.

In P. S. 44 in the Bronx, ten-year-old Aaron quickly established himself as a popular, versatile personality. He played on the baseball team, portrayed one of the frenetic leads in the school's version of "The Katzenjammer Kids" and generally ingratiated himself with his teachers and fellow students. He would stop at nothing to keep his audience entertained.

His buddies, among them Arthur Brent, now a partner with Red's brother Joe in the ABCO Hardware store in the Bronx, knew that Red had one peculiarity. He couldn't pass up a mirror, whether in a store window, a livingroom or a washroom. Whenever he spotted a looking glass, he stopped whatever he was doing to peer at his likeness, not to admire himself but to distort his features into weird grimaces.

"Whatcha doin', Aaron?" his surprised companions asked at first.

"Practicin', just practicin'," he answered without getting out of character. "If I'm gonna be an actor, I gotta be able to act."

Mugsy Buttons, Rocky Buttons, Salty Buttons were conceived in a mirror. As Red watched the mannerisms and expressions of each one emerge before his very eyes, he also developed another characteristic. Shaking his finger at his mirrored reflections, he admonished them waggishly, "I like you. You, I don't like."

He wasn't too engrossed in his career to be unmindful of the fair sex. The girls tagged after the cute redheaded jester, but his favorite was a long-legged brunette. They demonstrated their mutual affection by playfully throwing stones at each other in lieu of cupid's darts.

Nothing but applause was hurled at the 13-year-old boy the night he appeared in an amateur contest at the Fox Cretona theatre a few blocks from his apartment house. When he sang "Roll On Mississippi, Roll On" and "Sweet Jenny Lee," he brought down the house and won first prize.

His reward was a singing spot in the overture to the vaudeville acts. Nightly, for 15 weeks until the Children's Society stepped in and stopped him, the slight, shinin'-faced, redheaded singer stood on a soapbox in the orchestra pit and in his good blue serge suit and budding alto bade the Mississippi roll on.

For a couple of years after the Children's Society rang down the curtain on him, his only brush with show business was when he subways downtown and went to the Palace to hang around the stage door or when he climbed over the fence of the old Biograph Film Studios in the Bronx.

On one of these excursions, he met Bud Pollard, a Biograph film producer who took an interest in the boy.

"Show business isn't easy, kid," the older man advised. "You've got to work hard to get there. You need all the breaks you can get and then when you do arrive, if you're one of the lucky few, the toughest thing is to stay on top."

But how was a kid with no background, no real experience and nobody to help him, going to break into show business? That was Aaron Chwatt's number one problem. No talent scout from Broadway was haunting the amateur theatricals of the Evander Childs High School. He couldn't afford to take an ad in weekly Variety saying "At liberty" so he did the next best thing. He answered an ad for a singing bellhop to work during the summer at Dinty Moore's City Island Tavern. He was 16 and impatient to get his theatrical career under way.

One night he confided his ambition to a customer.

"What's your name, kid?" the customer asked.

"Aaron Chwatt."

"Aaron what? That's no name for a comedian. You have to get something they'll remember. How about Red? Your hair's red." The customer paused a minute and studied the serious face of the brass-buttoned bellhop. Then he snapped his fingers. "I've got it. Buttons. Red Buttons. That's a name they'll never forget."

The newly christened Red Buttons realized that before people could remember his name they had to hear it. How? Where? When?

A movie star attended a show, in which an amateur was impersonating the star. After the performance, the amateur asked the star, eagerly: "Tell me the truth! What do you think of my impersonation of you?"

"Well," said the star, "one of us is really awful!"

Soon, he hoped. Occasionally during the winter, he sang for free at parties given by his father's co-workers. At one of these parties, Red met somebody who knew somebody who owned a hotel in the Catskill Mountains. The chain of hotels dotting the Catskills was known as the Borscht Circuit because good food, borscht included, was the chief attraction of these summer hostleries. The customers had to be entertained, too, but managements preferred to pay less to their entertainers so they could pay more to their cooks.

Red Buttons could be bought cheap. The Beerkill Hotel in Greenfield Park, New York, hired him as a singer at $1.50 per week plus room and board.

That was the life. It seemed too good to be true and midway in the season Red awoke one morning to find his worst fears justified. Something had happened to change his luck—and his voice. Overnight the boy alto had become a boy bass and there was no place on the program, he knew, for a singer with a crinkly smile and a crackly voice.

"They'll fire me. They'll fire me," he worried. His desperation was readily apparent when he confronted the program director with his crisis.

"Don't worry, Red," the showman said, "the summer's almost over. I've seen you make with the jokes. You're pretty funny. Stay on as a comedian."

Red didn't find it hard to make the people laugh. He pretended the audience was his family and his friends. He always could make them laugh so why not these people who came from the same, warmhearted kind of background?

As the basis of his humor, he fell back on an exaggeration of his childhood experiences. He never wanted to be funny at anybody else's expense. His cute pixie face, impish expressions and slight stature made his memories of the lower East Side seem incongruous and funny.

"Where I came from," he announced, "anybody with teeth in his mouth was considered a sissy. In school they used to have recess just to carry out the wounded. We were evicted so many times my mother made curtains to match the sidewalks." Then he'd swing into the swagger and gestures of Jimmy Cagney and the tough guy tones of Edward G. Robinson, the screen bad men of his youth.

Cupping his hand over his ear, he illustrated his alleged childhood miseries with "Oiy, oiy," and broke into a little dance. In time he was to change the "Oiy, Oiy" to "Ho-Ho" and add to it a musical introduction of more quips and patter, "Strange Things Are Happening."

His third summer in the Catskills when he was 19, a burlesque agent touring the Catskills for talent caught Red's act.

"Come see me after Labor Day," he told the comedian. "I'll give you a two-weeks' trial at Minsky's."

Mr. Harold Minsky was no Charles Frohman or David Belasco but he was the number one producer of burlesque shows. The Misses Gypsy Rose Lee, Georgia Southern, Margie Hart and Ann Corio were his stellar strippers.

Frank Faye, Bert Lahr, the late Rags Ragland, Robert Alda, and Phil Silvers were among the graduates of the burlesque comedy school.

Opening night he was so frightened that in a sketch called "Get Out Of The Car," in which he was to support a prop automobile, he was shaking so from stage fright that the automobile rattled in unexpected places, but rattled as he was, Red didn't forget his lines or cues. His natural pace and timing helped him adapt himself quickly to the fast turns and blackouts of burlesque. In time he learned to "cut it," burlesque lingo for making good.

His mother and father used to come down from the Bronx to the Gaiety at 42nd and Broadway to see him. Only a mother's desire to see her son on the stage could have lured Sophie Chwatt into a burlesque house. When the strip teasers were teasing, Mrs. Chwatt buried her face in her hands. She only looked up—and cautiously at that—when her son, Aaron (she still calls him Aaron), was singing "Sam. You Made The Pants Too Long," or doing some other such enlightening scene.

One of the proudest moments in Sophie's life came when Al Jolson, in a box seat, applauded her son's comedy. Afterwards the Mammy singer went backstage to see the young comic.

"You've got it, kid," Jolson told Red Buttons. "Someday you'll be a star."

STARS and would-be stars have to live and love, too. Outside of his school time romance when he pelted his favorite girl with stones, Red had been so busy trying to carve his name in lights that he hadn't given much time to romance. He fell in love, not with a girl from his old neighborhood, but with a stripper in the show. She was a tall brunette named Roxanne (not to be confused with the blonde Roxanne of television).

He was the most dazed and the happiest guy on Broadway when she said she would marry him. And he was the loneliest, unhappiest comedian in show business a couple of years later when she divorced him. The torch Red carried was bigger than himself. In the true Pagliacci tradition, he tried to lose himself in work; the Catskills, the night club dates, the one night stands, but in a sequence of bad luck events all the breaks seemed to be against him.

He was working in Margie Hart's Wine, Women And Song when the censors banned the play and burlesque from New York.

In 1941, he had his foot in the legitimate theater when it was ousted from the door.

SPECIAL GREASELESS TREATMENT FOR

Blackheads Oiliness Enlarged Pores Flaky Skin

MANY A GIRL has her worst skin troubles when "looks" count most!

Abruptly, the oil glands start to overwork. The skin turns sluggish. Dead-skin flakes begin to build up in oily layers over the pore openings. Then, large pores, even blackheads, are on the way.

Now Pond's recommends an effective, greaseless treatment for these "Young Skin" problems: oiliness, enlarged pores, blackheads, flakiness. It's quick, easy—and it works.

Give your complexion this "YOUNG SKIN" TREATMENT every night

Cover your face, except eyes, with greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream. The cream's "keratolytic" action loosens, dissolves off dead skin flakes. Frees the tiny skin gland openings to function normally. After 1 minute—wipe off. Rinse with cold water.

Hundreds of girls with "Young Skin" problems tested this treatment. Improvements showed within 2 weeks! Oiliness disappeared. Blackheads, large pores decreased. Often blemishes cleared away.

"Young Skin" doesn't like a heavy make-up! A touch of greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream makes a fresh, un-shiny base. Really holds powder!

José Ferrer had chosen him for the juvenile lead in a musical with a Pearl Harbor locale. The play was due to open December 8, 1941, but that was the day after Pearl Harbor was bombed and The Admiral Takes A Wife was blasted off Broadway before it got there.

He was set for a role in a James Cagney film but another actor got the part because he also got less money.

The day he was due to leave for Hollywood and a Paramount movie, his draft notice showed up. It looked like the end of everything for him. According to the accepted movie tradition, his worst break proved to be his best. In the Army, Moss Hart picked Red for a lead in the Army Air Force musical production, Winged Victory, and later the comedian also appeared in its movie version.

In 1945, the khaki-clothed comedian emceed a show at the Potsdam Conference before Harry S. Truman and Winston Churchill. They agreed unanimously that Private Red Buttons was funny.

When he got out of the Army, he knew he could always earn a good living, at least $500 a week or so, with his nightclub routine, but he still hearkened back to those days as an East Side kid when Broadway was his dream. He wanted to be in the bigtime. In order to do so, he took a salary cut to appear in the plays Barefoot Boy With Cheek and Hold It. His notices were better than the plays' notices.

BACK he went to his old faithful, the club dates and theaters. In the winter of 1949, he was playing a nightclub in Miami Beach, Florida. A petite black-haired girl with the elfin features of a Leslie Caron, Helayne McNorton from Ohio, was working as a manicurist in a Miami hotel. She saw the comic work and said to herself, "I'd like to know him."

After the show when Red came out front to sit with some friends, Helayne did meet him. They exchanged hellos and she realized he hardly noticed her, but she didn't forget about him.

That summer, she was in Lindy's restaurant in New York one evening and was re-introduced to Red. They exchanged hellos again but with little recognition on his part. Several nights later, they met once more in Lindy's. This time Red said, "Doll face, I'll drive you home."

There were other people in the apartment Helayne shared with her roommate and they made scrambled eggs and coffee for the late visitors. "I'll help you do the dishes, Doll face," Red offered. It was the first and last time he dried the dishes, but for Helayne, once was enough. Red Buttons was the boy she wanted to marry.

"How about meeting me tomorrow night at Toots Shor's?" Red suggested. Helayne had met actors before. Sometimes they didn't show up for dates so the next night on the pretext of being delayed, she called Shor's and asked for Red. To her surprise, he was there.

"I'll be right over," she told him. She fell in love with him that night. Her future was Red, she was sure. She knew he had been hurt deeply by the failure of his first marriage and that he didn't want to get burned twice. She was willing to wait.

Early in their courtship, she broke other dates to be with Red. He was somewhat serious offstage. He didn't joke and clown as much as when he was a kid but his ad libs were fast and furious.

When he questioned Helayne once about breaking a date she disarmed him with her straightforward reply, "I'd rather be with you."

"Why waste your time with me?" he said, "I don't want to get married."

"You will," she countered. Three and a half years ago they were married.

They lived in an apartment in the West 50's within shouting distance of Broadway. Helayne went to cooking school so she could wield the pots and pans with as much agility as Red dished out his humor.

Last fall they signed a lease on an expensive five-room apartment on exclusive Sutton Place, just 51 city blocks north of the East Side tenement where Aaron Chwatt was born.

THEN television, which devours talent like a hungry tigress, wanted new stars. Red Buttons was a comparative unknown outside of New York and Florida, but Marlo Lewis, a CBS-TV variety show producer, realized the capabilities and potentialities of the versatile comedian, who was 33 but looked 23.

Red was anxious to try the medium. It was his only chance for national recognition. The movies wouldn't hire him because he wasn't known so TV offered him the culmination of a dream.

"Where did this kid come from?" everybody wanted to know after his sensational debut. He had something in his act for everybody, an appeal that got to all kinds of Americans. Within a few weeks, the "Strange Things Are Happening" routine swept the country. Audiences chimed in and home viewers chanted, "Ho-ho, hee-hee, stra-a-a-ange things are hap-penning."

Milton Berle had just returned from Hollywood, where it had rained almost unusually. He met Charlton Heston, who asked, "And how was California weather?"

Berle answered, "The sun was coming down in sheets."

Paul Denis

Up in the Bronx on East 176th where they have lived for the past 24 years, Michael and Sophie Chwatt didn't think there was anything strange about their son's success. Their boy, Aaron, had to make good because he was good. He never hurt anybody. He just made them laugh. He was kind and generous. Every winter since he could afford it, he has sent his parents to Arizona for the cold months because the desert air is good for Mrs. Chwatt's asthma.

A darling, dimpled, plump version of her son, Sophie's story, too, is a success story. An immigrant at 16, she raised a boy who became an American Horatio Alger. When she goes to the grocery store or the neighborhood stationer's to buy a birthday card, the tradespeople point her out, "That's Red Buttons' mother," but for Sophie the greatest thrill is always her frequent visits from her second son, her Aaron, who says, "Hi, Ma," and kisses her.

Up in the Bronx, in brother Joe's hardware store, the school kids flock in to ask Joe to have Red autograph pictures for them. "Ho-Ho," he signs, "Red Buttons."

In her river view apartment on Sutton Place, Mrs. Red Buttons (he legally adopted the name) doesn't think it's strange that success in a bigtime way has come to her husband. He always went out of his way to help other entertainers, she knew. And Red was due for the big break.

She and Red wish they had some little Buttons tearing loose around the house. Monday nights after his TV show, and after he has had a masseuse limber him up after his strenuous shenanigans, the comedian takes his wife to Lindy's where they sit around like old times and chat with the other comics, Milton Berle, Jack Carter, Phil Silvers, all local boys who made good.

Over at CBS-TV Red Buttons puts in long hours each week. He's too busy preparing for Monday to stop and marvel at all the strange and wonderful things that have happened to him. Because to Red Buttons, every Monday is Opening Night. END

love is a long shot

"Harry and I have one big mutual interest to which we anchor our love," Betty explains. "Then, too, there are other elements in our successful life together. We respect each other. I suppose I could feel sorry for myself because he spends more time on the road than a traveling salesman. I don't. I admire him for sticking with his band even though business hasn't been very good in the last five or six years."

DURING wartime, when the country took to the dance floors to relieve its tension, Harry James earned upwards of a half million dollars a year. Now, with the decline of interest in orchestras, his earnings have been cut to around $200,000. Like a man used to earning a hundred dollars a week who is cut to fifty, Harry could well become morose and difficult to live with.

"He isn't," Betty points out. "Harry likes the band business more than ever and wants to stay with it, even though he doesn't have to. A lot of musicians don't know anything else; some of them can't even read music. But Harry can arrange and conduct. He could easily get a job in some studio or do radio and tv work. That would make life a lot easier for him. But he sticks to his band."

"He maintains the quality of his organization, too. Some band leaders disband their outfits when they come back into town. But even when he's home and not playing dates, Harry keeps five key men under contract and on salary. He pays them too money, too. Right now he's got Buddy Rich with his band, and he's great."

Although musicians are supposed to be a shiftless lot, Betty finds that living around music is the best possible existence for her. She refused for years to bring scripts home from the studio or rehearse scenes at home. Despite the fact that she held all sorts of records for being the biggest money maker in pictures, there is no evidence of movie star Betty Grable's triumphs in the residence of Mr. and Mrs. Harry James.

"Yes," Betty says, "I think it's true that 'love is a long shot.' Certainly, I'm the luckiest girl in the world. But I want to make it plain that with Harry and me it has never been a case of emphasis on fame or money, whether anyone will believe it or not. We've worked for happiness, not for money—and we've had setbacks that could have cost us our last dime in the end if we hadn't worked together."

BETTY and Harry didn't start out in the racing and breeding of thoroughbred horses by throwing sevens and elevens. When they first decided to enter the "sport of kings," they took the plunge like a couple of naive chumps. Betty had been crazy about horses since she was a tiny tot. Her mother had to bribe her to take dancing lessons by promising pony rides afterward. And Harry James fell in love with horses while he was playing with circus bands.

A few years ago, they cut a huge slice out of their savings to purchase a string of horses at a fabulous price. The result was a big nothing. Only about one of these expensive buys amounted to a thing. Betty and Harry felt that they had a legitimate squawk, so they took the case to court, claiming rank misrepresentation on the part of the man who acted as agent. The case never reached trial. was made out of court, but Betty and Harry had learned a cold, hard, cash lesson the hard way.

Instead of brooding about this defeat, they talked it over and wound up with more determination than ever to breed and raise their own horses. They dipped into their savings still deeper to purchase a thirty-eight-acre ranch in the San Fernando Valley.

Meantime, the kidding about their folly was even more severe than the cheerful abuse heaped on Bing Crosby for his non-winning nags. Today, Betty and Harry have only six brood mares, but in the last three years from this small band have come two brilliant stakes winners. (In racing, "stakes" is a major race, like the Kentucky Derby or the Santa Anita Handicap.) One of their victorious horses is Big Noise, named for Harry's high falutin' trumpet, and Betty will never forget the day he ran under their colors at Bing Crosby's Del Mar track in the $100,000 Futurity Handicap.

She was close to tears as she trained her binoculars on the big chestnut horse who was approaching the starting gate, kicking up his heels and giving jockey Ralph Neves a bad time. With her fingers crossed, Betty swung the glasses up toward "moocher's hill," where there were hundreds of people who couldn't afford the admission price to the track. In a moment, she located Harry, sitting in his sleek convertible, looking hot, glum and impatient. He should have been sitting next to Betty, but he was late for a band engagement in nearby La Jolla.

"They're off and running!"

Betty closed her eyes as the pack thundered past the grandstand the first time. Seconds later, she opened them to see that Grey Tower, the horse they feared the most, was a length and a half in front. Big Noise, number six, was trailing next to last.

"Come on Beautiful, get moving," Betty yelled in anguish. Her voice was lost in the roar of thousands, but the big chestnut horse began to gain on the leaders. He was on their heels as the horses rounded the far turn. Coming into the stretch, Jockey Neves barely touched Big Noise with the whip. They passed Grey Tower like a breeze and nosed ahead of the number four horse, Count Me Out.

As they swept across the finish line, Big Noise winning it by a length, Harry James stood up on the back seat of his car and clasped his hands above his head in a victory salute, hoping Betty could see him. Betty could as she walked on air down to the winner's circle to accept congratulations for their first big winner. To the delight of thousands, she planted a great big kiss on Jockey Neves' dirt-stained face, an act that caused the diminutive rider later to exclaim, "When I ride for the Jameses, it's not just my ten per cent of the winnings I'm after; it's the kiss I get from Betty when I win. Wow! She's the greatest thing that's happened to racing since the invention of the starting gate!"

THAT night at a ringside table as Harry James tootled his trumpet victoriously, Betty grew serious, explaining what the day had meant to them both. "When one of your own horses, whose mating you've planned by poring over pedigrees for months, wins a big stakes, your cup of joy runs over. Here is complete satisfaction that has no equal. The praise and profit are like bubbles in a windstorm compared to the urge—yes, passion—to have your own convictions bear such a marvelous harvest. To win like this is something you know cannot be assured even with the help of unlimited money. Many fortunes have been squandered by people who have accepted the challenge because they thought they could "buy" success in breeding as they had in almost everything else. That's ridiculous. Too many people have the idea that money and happiness go hand-in-hand. Of course, Harry and I needed money to start with, but all it takes is one good colt to win a race, and plenty of people have done it on a shoe-string."

Betty went on to tell, two years later, of the excitement and misfortunes attendant to the ruling love of their lives. Early this year, their stable fell into a slump. Every time a horse won, neither of them was present. Each accused the other of being the jinx. When Harry went back east for band engagements, Betty trailed along for a vacation. Big Noise won another feature race and the stable manager wired them both to "stay lost."

Arch Oboler, movie producer-writer, visited Africa in 1948, with a tape recorder and movie cameras. Once, he found himself far in the interior, in a place called Ruhengeri, where a couple of thousand of natives had gathered to sing and dance while he recorded the sounds. In that jungle clearing, a group of small children came forth to sing a tribal song to the accompaniment of native flutes. And as they sang, the melody became more and more familiar. Soon, there was no doubt about it. The children were singing the American melody, "Battle Hymn of the Republic." But, somehow, the title was now: "On the Place Where I Sit Down, You Kicked Me."

However, Betty came home, defying superstition. It was then that their horses, Bingo, Laughin Louie and James Session won a batch of races. Betty was gleeful as a kitten with a ball of yarn. The pressure was all on Harry. Betty called him every night by long distance telephone to recreate the race and sent him air mail special photos of their horses winning. And wouldn't you know it? When Harry came home, Laughin Louie went to the post with their high hopes that he would win his first stakes race. Louie started from the gate in sixth position and finished a bad seventh.

"I think," Betty said on that first night Harry was home, "that you'd better hit the road again."

Harry didn't bend his trumpet over her head. He said he'd stick around and prove that the horses didn't win just for her, even though they act that way. The truth is that every member of the family feels personally responsible for their racing luck. Daughters Vickie, nine, and Jessica, six, are also wild about the nags. They take a personal interest in every horse from the time it is foaled. The little girls have seldom been to the track, however, because they're bored with adult conversation during the long waits between races.

BETTY is not a wild better on her own horses. When she decides to lay a wager she can usually be seen at the ten-dollar window, but she seldom bets on her own horses. "I figure if my horse wins and collects a purse, my small bet wouldn't make much difference in the take-home pay. Besides, if I don't wager on my own horses, I'm never sore at them when they lose!"

"But there is one wonderful thing about our horses. When I'm not making money, they are. When I went on suspension for turning down the role in The Girl Next Door, Big Noise eased the situation by winning a hundred thousand dollars. When I was suspended for refusing to go to Columbia Studios on loan-out, James Session copped a $20,000 stake race."

It may be hard to believe, but Betty was busting out all over with joy the day she parted company with 20th Century-Fox.

"I've been trying to get out of the studio for a year and a half," she glowed. "I kept reading in the columns that all I had to do was to ask for my release and I'd get it. It didn't turn out that way. Every time I asked, the bosses just shook their heads."

Of course, there are always two sides to every story, and the studio undoubtedly had its reasons, but this is the way Betty looks at the situation: "I couldn't see why the studio would want to keep me. They didn't seem to have any important pictures planned for me. The only thing I could figure was that they were worried that I might go out and make a lot of money for someone else."

"I figured that it was time to leave the studio. I had wonderful years there, but I don't think it's smart to stay with one studio for more than ten years. Enthusiasm begins to wane and executives are continually losing their excitement about your possibilities every time they see a new-comer."

Betty has made no secret of her unhappiness with the studio during the past two years. "I wasn't bitter about my first suspension," she says, "but I was a little hurt by the way it was done. I put in a request for a little rest. The next thing I knew they had suspended me. I didn't expect to get paid on vacation, but I didn't think I should be treated in such an impersonal manner."

The next two suspensions deepened the wound. Betty was unhappy with the scripts offered her; important stockholders rangled over her whopping salary.

"It was different in the old days," Betty explained. "Then I could go in and discuss my problems. Like the time Darryl Zanuck wanted me to do The Razor's Edge, later played by Anne Baxter. I went to Darryl and convinced him that I was wrong for the role. I'm still not sorry, even though the part was so beautifully played by Anne that she won an Academy Award."

Now that Betty has her freedom, she's not going to go dashing off in all directions, jumping into new enterprises. For the first time in a long while, hard-working Harry James took five weeks off from his band labors, so that the whole family could go to Del Mar for the racing season. At the time, Betty said: "I won't sign another studio contract unless I have the right to do outside pictures of my own choosing. I'll never sign another contract with a 'good girl' clause that cuts off the money every time I don't do exactly what the studio executives have planned."

A few years ago, Betty cut a "bootleg" record with Harry, because his vocalist got sick at the last moment. Betty filled in and the record came out under an assumed name. Now she wants to do more recording on her own. About TV she says, "Maybe yes, maybe no: it all depends. I'm the kind of girl who never plans her career ahead. I just let nature take its course."

BETTY chooses to ignore the fact that her career has been no snap all the way. While she was still a small girl in St. Louis, her mother installed a small dance floor in the family apartment so Betty could practice her dance lessons at home. From the time her mother brought her to Hollywood in 1929, Betty was being pushed toward the stardom she has so long enjoyed. There was a lot of heartbreak and disappointment along the way.

Still, when Betty became the unofficial Queen of Hollywood, she wore her crown well. Although she claimed to be lazy, she always worked hard. Her pictures required weeks of tough dance rehearsal, consuming as much as six to eight months for the entire production.

A hardboiled old grip, learning the news of her leaving the studio, had tears in his eyes as he said, "I'm sorry as hell to see her go. Most stars have a bunch of flunkies hanging around to keep their egos boosted and their tempers cooled. Betty didn't go for that junk. She doesn't have an ounce of temperament. She never asked for anything unreasonable, but when she thought she had been done wrong she stood up for her rights, and everybody knew they couldn't push her around."

As for Betty, she says, "It's nice to be able to look backward and forward at the same time. I know that a lot of people have regarded my preoccupation with racing as a silly pastime engaged in by a more or less empty-headed movie star, and I'm glad to have a chance to talk about it.

"The fascination of racing and breeding is so intangible and heartfelt that it's difficult to explain, but I do know that it has given Harry and me the happiest days of our lives. Of course, it takes all kinds of people to make a world and I know a lot of folks will never understand me. But for those who can't see anything to racing but betting I say, 'Take a look at the names of the horses.' They're wonderful!

"Take Native Dancer, the big news horse of the year. He is the son of Polynesian and Geisha. Just the other day I noticed that Cherry Fizz, Quick Lunch and Bicarb all won at Jamaica. Oh, what a parlay! And of course, Bicarb is a son of Bride's Biscuit out of Hard Tack. If that isn't appropriate, what is?

"It was seven years ago that Harry presented me with my first brood mare (that's a girl horse who has been retired to become a mama and improve the breed). Her name was Lady Florise, and she had been some shucks as a racer herself. Before long she had a foal (baby) by a sire named Special Agent. We named the filly Night Special, and she was as fast as a Hollywood play girl. But like them, she had something wrong in her head, and this impaired her breathing. Rather than risk an operation on this sweet filly that we both loved so much we added her to our band of matrons. Her romance with King Abbey resulted in a colt named James Session, after one of Harry's recordings, and he won the coveted Haggin Stakes at Hollywood Park this last summer. Do you wonder, now, that our horses are really loved, and that they are more to us than just nags running to win a race?

"Honestly, there is so much more to racing than most people even suspect. It has practically rid itself, by self-governing, of scandal. It is the number one spectator sport, and so far as the menace of gambling is concerned, I think that's greatly overplayed. For instance, a murder always hits page one of the newspapers. A happy marriage doesn't get into print. It is the same way with intemperance. We hear and read all the bad things, but rarely the good. Racing is a wonderful diversion and I'm happy to live in a country where I'm given the privilege of taking it or leaving it alone. I just happen to want to take it.

"And when we add it all up, Harry and I realize that despite the comic old warning—never marry a horse-player—it's the horse playing that has enriched our lives together. There are times when I have to agree with an old boy who hangs around the tracks when he says, 'The more I see of people, the better I like horses!'"

For a time, Gable was under the erroneous impression that he might keep this romance a dark secret.

In Venice he told his hotel manager that under no circumstances was his girl's name to be released. Newspapersmen quickly jumped to the conclusion that Susan was a wealthy American widow. They had Gable and the girl followed by photographers who snapped them touring the Grand Canal in gondolas, feeding the pigeons in front of St. Mark's, walking hand-in-hand across the hundreds of picturesque little bridges that dot the city.

When asked about his traveling partner, all Gable would say was, "She's just a friend."

Once photographs of Clark's "mystery friend" were released, however, her identity was no longer a secret.

In Paris, one Schiaparelli model, picking up the afternoon paper, turned to a friend and pointing to Susan's picture, asked, "Who does this look like?"

The second model grinned. "It is Susan Dadolle," she said. "Who else? Don't you know about her?" An explanation was forthcoming immediately. "A few weeks ago when Clark Gable came here to Paris he got in touch with Susan. I think they have known each other a long time or something. Anyway, she went to Madame Schiaparelli and said, 'I would like to have some time off.' And she is very understanding about these things, so she said, 'But, of course, Susan.' So she went away with Monsieur Gable, and now they are traveling all over Europe, and since his divorce from his fourth wife—I think she was his fourth wife, that blonde English one—I guess Susan is hoping to marry him. She has always been in love with him, you know. Susan would make him a very good wife."

WHILE such talk was making the rounds of Paris, Gable and his new love were sunning themselves on the beach at Capri. And in Italy, of course, no one interfered with the privacy of the lovers.

Occasionally, someone would ask a professional question such as, "What's your next picture, Mr. Gable?" and Clark would prop himself up on his elbows and say, "Really don't know. Everytime I call Hollywood from here I can't understand what they say. They can hear me but I can't hear them. I guess the studio will rope up something for me."

In Capri, Gable lived in the hotel suite formerly occupied by Egypt's ex-King Farouk which prompted him to quip, "Even I can be a king for a few bucks."

Natives who saw Susan and Clark said, "There is no doubt about it. They are both deeply in love. They are together always. They are always smiling. I am sure they have already married. I say this because what you see in their eyes is the light of honeymooners."

Gable has insisted ever since his divorce from Sylvia Ashley that "I'm not against marriage. I've believed in marriage for years, only the next time I'm going to be very careful."

Gable usually gravitates to mature, successful women. Susan has neither age nor a very large bank account. She is a brunette in her middle thirties who has a slavish devotion to Gable, a Gallic wit, a sophisticated outlook on life, a respect for thrift—a quality very close to Gable's heart—and an acquaintance with the actor which goes back to 1950.

In December of 1950, Frank Burd, president of Prestige Hosiery of New York, flew to Paris. "I had an idea," Burd says, "that if I could make a tie-up between Prestige Hosiery and the leading dress designers in France, it would be a very good thing for everyone concerned. My company would sell more hosiery, and the French dress designers would sell more dresses."

"I spoke to Jean Patou, Jean Desses, Jacques Fath, Jacques Griffe, Robert Piguet and Marcel Rochas. They all agreed to go ahead with the scheme. We would get six gorgeous models, dress them to the teeth, then fly them to New York."

"Our next problem was getting the girls. Well, each of these dress designers had a favorite model. Unfortunately, some of these girls weren't equipped with great legs; so for our purposes that let them out. We managed to get hold of three or four swell girls—they were beautifully proportioned everywhere—and then I got in touch with a model agency."

"This agency sent over to my place a girl named Susan Dadolle. She's the young woman currently going around with Clark Gable. I looked her over—very attractive, nice figure, good legs—and said, 'Okay, Miss Dadolle, you've got the job.'"

IT HAPPENED TO ME

We were having dinner at a Chinese restaurant in San Francisco when a handsome man and a very beautiful lady came over and asked us to teach them how to use the chopsticks. It wasn't until we had helped them master the art that we were told by our waiter that our students had been Tony Martin and his wife, Cyd Charisse.

Mrs. A. Wong
Palo Alto, Calif.

In January, 1951, six French models, Catherine Fath, Michele Tevnard, Danielle Chevron, Nicole Tuchar, Josette Farges, and Susan Dadolle arrived in New York.

Now, of these six girls, two were dying to get to Hollywood. One was Susan Dadolle who kept telling the other models that she simply had to meet Clark Gable, and the other was Danielle Chevron.

UNFORTUNATELY, neither Hollywood nor Los Angeles was on the itinerary for the Prestige Hosiery Fashion Show. The models played Boston, Philadelphia, Washington, Cleveland, even went as far west as Chicago, but no farther.

Susan and Danielle decided the time had come for a little independent action. The following day they caught a plane to the west coast, and in Hollywood, through the intervention of French friends in the movie colony, Susan Dadolle finally met her hero, Clark Gable.

Reportedly, Gable was not immediately smitten by the model's beauty. He exchanged pleasantries, showed her around town, then bade her adieu. Susan, however, was unforgettably thrilled. "If you ever come to Paris," she told the actor, "you must look me up."

There are friends of Gable who doubt the above version of the first Susan-Clark meeting.

"I was in Paris," one of the actor's intimates explains, "when he first met this woman. I spoke to her, and she told me that she'd never been west of Chicago. I think maybe Gable first ran into her in the lobby of the Crillon Hotel. Anyway, he moves around in fancy circles. I guess he met her at some French salon. Who cares anyway?"

"Gable was burned pretty badly by Sylvia, and he's playing it very cagey. You read a lot about him and Susan Dadolle in Paris, in Capri, in Como, in Venice, in Naples, on the French Riviera. But I can tell you there have been other girls, too."

"In England he saw Joan Harrison—that's no secret, and in Paris, well, there was a lovely American girl he was dating, and then at Como, it was another babe, an Italian with Turkish blood. Maybe he has fallen for Susan, but I don't think she's got him all wrapped up and ready for a trip down the aisle like they say."

"To tell you the truth, Grace Kelly seems more like his type than this Dadolle babe. My own feeling is that he's afraid of foreign women. I mean he likes them but he doesn't want to marry them. Grace is a lot like Carole Lombard, fresh and well-bred. I'd bet on the success of a Kelly-Gable marriage but with Dadolle, I don't know."

"Of course, Susan was very sweet, very diplomatic, gave The King his head all the time, but I'll give you dollars to doughnuts that he drops her within a month or two. Of course, I could be wrong. I said the same thing about Sylvia Ashley, and look what happened there."

GABLE has always been known to concentrate on one woman at a time, but in many European capitals it is currently being said that it is Susan Dadolle who is concentrating on him.

In Paris, however, they are saying that Susan is definitely Gable's romance and that he doesn't care who knows. Certainly he no longer objects to being photographed with the tall French model although he insists, "There's nothing to this mystery romance business. What's mysterious about it? You meet an attractive woman and take her out. That doesn't necessarily mean you're going to marry her. Susan is an acquaintance. I've got a lot of acquaintances."

The basic reason Gable is always being connected with one woman or another is that he prefers the society of females to males. Not that he isn't a man's man, but except for a few friends such as Al Menasco and Wayne Griffin, he likes to spend a lot of time with the girls. All of his really close friends have been women, usually older women in whom he confides.

It may well be, of course, that Gable has now reached the point in life where he needs young blood to maintain the illusion of perpetual youth. This is why actresses in their forties frequently marry younger men; and it may be why lately Clark has chosen Grace Kelly, a blonde in her early twenties, and Susan Dadolle, a brunette in her early thirties. But friends insist this isn't true.

One MGM director who probably knows the actor as well as any other man, says, "There are some men who, when they have nothing to do, read a book. There are others who go hunting or fishing. Clark Gable is tired of these pursuits. The one thing he will never tire of is girls—all sizes, all shapes, all ages. It makes no difference to the guy. He's very democratic where women are concerned. The minute a film is over he likes to relax. Right now he's re-laxing with this French girl, Susan Dadolle. How long she can hold him nobody knows."

"At least she has the opportunity to try out her charms. A million girls would give anything, well, almost anything, to have the same opportunity."

HOLLYWOOD ABROAD

LEX BARKER, who is slowly being dropped by his one-time constant companion, Lana Turner, is in Paris to work opposite the French film light, Sophie Desmarets, in something tentatively titled Always Look For Sunday.

VIVIEN LEIGH and SIR LAURENCE OLIVIER have been running into some tough luck. While they were chatting in their Oxfordshire drawing room with Sir Ralph and Lady Richardson, a gang of thieves stole all of Vivien's jewelry. Next day, Olivier appealed to the thieves. "There is one piece my wife treasures most," he announced. "A ruby ring I gave her when I came back from Hollywood to join the Navy during the war. It's a sentimental thing. If she could have that one piece back I think she'd be satisfied." No reply from the crooks. Said Sir Laurence, "They seem to be quite heartless."

ANNE BAXTER grew so lonely in Munich for her one-year-old daughter, Katrinka, that she put in a long-distance phone call to Chorley Wendling, her agent back in Hollywood. "Isn't there any way," the actress asked, "we can get Katrinka over here? This is a very picturesque, bombed-out city, but it's been raining for a month now, and I'd just love to see Katrinka."

"Tell you what," said Chorley, who is Clouette Colbert's brother, "I'll fly the baby over myself." Which is how come Anne Baxter's baby daughter is currently in Munich with the Carnival cost. This picture, incidentally, is being shot in two versions, American and German. Eva Bartok plays Anne's role in the German version. She's the Hungarian actress MGM has talked about bringing to the United States. Relationship between Miss Baxter and Miss Bartok is strictly professional. B-r-r-r!

RICHARD BURTON, the young Welsh actor who created quite a stir in Hollywood by his uninhibited behavior—in some circles he was called "the British Marlon Brando"—is back in London working for the Old Vic Repertory. Burton who was paid $100,000 a film in Hollywood is currently receiving $125 a week for playing Shakespeare. The Old Vic will present nothing but Shakespeare, all of his plays, for the next five years, only Burton insists he won't be around that long. Fox plans to bring the young Welsh actor back to New York for the opening of The Robe, but Burton doesn't think he'll come. "I'm a contrary gent," he says, "who believes in obeying his impulses."

AUDREY HEPBURN who has been seeing a good deal of Gregory Peck in London and Paris—they starred in Rome together in Roman Holiday—has been given the stor buildup by Paramount in England. The 23-year-old actress whom everyone says will be a candidate for an Academy Award, was recently given a large reception in London's plushiest hotel. After it was over she said, "It's difficult to believe all this. I'm taking it with a grain of salt. Of course, I don't think I'm a stor." Had she been visiting much with Mr. Peck? "Not me; my mother."

JOE MANKIEWICZ, the director responsible for All About Eve, A Letter To Three Wives, and Julius Caesar, is currently in Europe trying to cast his new production, The Barefoot Countess. An actress who has read the script claims it's the story of Rita Hayworth and Aly Khan or a reasonable facsimile.

DIANA LYNN, freshly-divorced from architect John Lindsay, arrived in London recently to star in the stage version of The Moon Is Blue. Hollywood's perpetual teen-ager was a bit reluctant about revealing her true age but finally owned up to 27. "Are you disillusioned about marriage or about Hollywood?" she was asked. "Heavens, no," she answered. "I'm not even disillusioned about men."

FRANK SINATRA, chastened and much wiser, is now presenting himself to the press and public as a calm, settled, peaceful, and completely lovable Joe. After a not-too-successful European tour, he amazed London photographers recently not only by posing for pictures but by politely asking, "Is this a good angle for you fellows?"

"No matter what you hear," Frank went on to tell them, "I'm an easy-going character, now." Not only that, but when Ava told Frank how much she missed the dog they'd left behind in Hollywood, the crooner went right out and bought her a new Welsh corgi. They christened him "Rebel."

why shirley temple came back

(Continued from page 44) this. When I was a teen-ager I was very definite about everything. Now I am not so sure. But I cannot see myself ever returning to show business. Making pictures was a happy experience for me; and I have never regretted spending my childhood on sound stages, as some grownup ex-child actors would have you believe they did. But I started at three and feel that I've had enough."

"Is this the real cause for your retirement?" I asked.

"It's not the whole picture," said Shirley. "In 1950, David Selznick made me a very exciting offer. He wanted me to go to Europe and do films under his guidance. That would have given me a wonderful opportunity to develop as an actress, by working with great foreign directors. It also provided a situation in which I could do a lot of traveling, an idea that appealed to me.

"I had to make a decision; and I couldn't do it in this town. I had to get away and think. So I flew to Honolulu. On the plane over, I began to think of Susan. She needed my care. And I could never go to Europe and leave her behind. Also I didn't want to endanger another marriage by having a career. This was before I met Charles Black. Anyhow, before I reached Honolulu, I'd made my decision. I was going to retire."

"You mean you wouldn't make a picture or do a television show if good scripts were given you?" I asked.

"Hedda, as I said before, I'm a quarter of a century old and am not too sure about anything except my marriage. But I'll tell you this: The script would have to be—let's say irresistible—before I'd come out of retirement. Charles and I were amazed by a report that he and I were going to do a television series together. We had no such intentions. I may try a comeback like some people such as—let's see—no, Gloria Swanson isn't old enough."

"Where is Charles, by the way?" I said.

"Downtown," was her vague reply. Then she turned upon me a puckish smile that seemed to say, "He got away in time to escape this grilling."

"I understand he's going back to television," said I.

"I can't say what he's going to do," said Shirley. "It's so wonderful to be able to say that instead of answering questions about myself."

At this juncture, in bounced daughter Susan. "Do you want to say hello to Hedda?" asked Shirley.

"Fello," said Susan.

"Now, do you wish to shake hands or avoid it?" asked Shirley with a sparkling mirth in her eyes.

SUSAN thought the matter over and stuck out her hand to me. There certainly wasn't anything phony or repressed about that child. Shirley was teaching her to make her own decisions.

"Susan has on her President Eisenhower dress," explained Shirley. "She wore it to the White House when we visited the President just before returning here."

"Was she awed by Ike?" I asked.

"Awed!" exclaimed Shirley. "The first thing she said was: 'Good morning, Mr. President, man of the hour.' That positively wasn't rehearsed. Mr. Eisenhower tried to explain to Susan that during campaigns terms were loosely applied to candidates. Then Susan asked the President what he had for breakfast. Mr. Eisenhower said he had a businessman's breakfast. 'Oh, that's too bad,' said Susan. After that Charlie and I took a back seat. Susan sat down, rested her chin in her hand, and gazed at the President like a teen-ager." She monopolized the whole conversation."

"I can play monkey music," said Susan. "Do you want to see me do it?"

I replied that the idea intrigued me no end.

Susan sat down at a small piano. "You do just like this on the keys," she explained, illustrating with one hand. "Then I can do lion and monkey music together with both hands. And there's tiger music."

"Susan," said Shirley, "Hedda and I are going to talk. You can go outside, or you can sit here and be very, very quiet. Do you think that's possible?"

The little girl, after reflecting on the problem, decided that silence would be too great a strain. She skipped out to a balcony where red geraniums shone brightly in the morning sunshine.

"We call her Sarah Heartburn," laughed Shirley. "Any minute now she'll make an entrance with hand on hip."

"At her age, you were a star," I said. "Would you have any objection to her going into show business?"

"She'll have to be old enough to make her own decision about that," answered Shirley. "I wasn't, but at heart I suppose I was a little exhibitionist. I loved working in films, as I told you. But I cannot tell whether Susan would or not. She has plenty of time to find out."

I SAW IT HAPPEN

Gregory Peck was visiting in La Jolla, California, one summer. I was sunning on the beach, and he was standing a few yards away from me. Surrounding him was a group of giggling, flirting youngsters, each trying to get his special attention.

There was one girl who stood back from the rest. She was very pretty but extremely tall, and I could see that she was self-conscious about her height. Blushing furiously, with autograph book in hand, she looked as though she might turn and run at any moment.

Evidently I was not the only one who observed this girl. Mr. Peck looked up and strolled over to her. He took her autograph book, signed it, then said something to her which I was too far away to hear. At first she seemed tongue tied, but soon I noticed that she was smiling and chatting like he was an old friend.

Then with a wave of his hand, he walked on. All the other girls stood speechless, looking at the tall girl. Then they gathered around her, the heroine of the day and probably not self-conscious anymore.

Mrs. Robert Feller
Longview Avenue

often been erroneously reported. For a couple it is ideal in size.

"Why did you ever sell this place?" I asked Shirley when she returned from the phone.

"I wanted to sell it," she said, "because I was a Navy wife. Charlie and I didn't know where we would land while he was in service. So I put the place up for sale, before we started driving East. We had got no farther than Palm Springs, before my parents called to say they'd like to buy the house themselves. So they did."

Shirley, incidentally, found a home in Beverly Hills a few days later, and rented it for a year. "I suppose I should be sentimental over Hollywood," said she, "but I've discovered that if you're happily married, where you live doesn't matter. Charlie and I always love best the place in which we've lived last. Our home, as you know, was very simple in Maryland, but we grew very sentimental about it."

SUSAN had come back into the room just as a small cry came from a bedroom. "Mommy—the baby," said she. Both mother and daughter dashed into the temporary nursery.

From it, soon I could hear Shirley and Susan singing "The Big Bad Wolf" for the awakening baby's amusement.

"He's got a bald head down here," said Susan.

"That must be because he is getting older," said Shirley.

I translated this cryptic language into the fact that on the previous day Charles Jr. had got his first haircut for the MODERN SCREEN photographers we were expecting.

Susan pranced back into the room, announcing, "We've got a little boy here." The baby, whom Susan insists on calling Barton is a husky infant, weighs twenty-six pounds, and looks much like his father. Shirley handled him with great care and competence.

"You know," said Susan, pointing to a spot on the back of her neck, "Barton used to have hair right down to here."

"But the barber cut it off. He's growing into a big boy like daddy," Shirley explained. Then like any mother she gazed upon the shorn locks and said to me, "He looks so different. His hair used to be cute and curly."

"I know," said I. "That haircut is the first step to manhood. It makes a mother feel that her boy is already starting to leave her."

"Yes," said Shirley with a sigh of resignation, as Susan sat down to the piano and began playing monkey music, but always with an ear cocked to our conversation. "After two years of absence I expected everything to be changed. Everybody looks the same. I'm no different, except my hair is black."

"My hair is black, too," said Susan, who obviously adores her mother and wants to be as much like her as possible.

"No, darling," Shirley said. "Your hair is honey-colored. I think it's very beautiful. It has gold in it."

"It used to have sand in it," said Susan.

"You'd better go outside again," said Shirley. "You can swing on the trees if you don't get your dress dirty."

"I'll get dirty," said Susan.

"Then," said Mommy, "why don't you go out to the yard and see if the flowers are awake yet."

That appealed to Susan's curiosity; so she left us. I wanted to know how Shirley disciplined her children.

"The baby's still too young to be affected by anything but a disapproving look," she said. "When Susan has done something wrong, I put one hand under her chin, hold her hands with the other, and make her look straight into my eyes. The system

The telephone rang. "More real estate people," sighed Shirley, as she went to answer it. At that time she was frantically searching for a home for her family. She, Charles, the two children, a brother, and her parents were all temporarily living in the famous "Doll House," where Shirley had dwelled during her first marriage. It is a small but beautiful place that got its name from a collection of 1500 dolls Shirley kept in a downstairs room. And it was never a playhouse for the child star, as has has worked well, as I rarely have to spank Susan. Children, when they've been bad, just don't want to look at their parents. It seems to increase their sense of guilt, and makes them less apt to break the rules the next time. Susan gets good marks at school; but everyone agrees she has a bossy quality. She wants to be the leader." Suddenly Shirley stopped and said, "This must be fascinating to you—a mother talking about her children."

In the case of Shirley Temple it was.

WHEN Susan came back in, she asked her mother for a pencil and piece of paper. "I'll write you a letter so you can reverence it," she explained to me. She sat down at a table and began to scrawl, holding up the completed work for her mother's approval.

"Now, what is that," said Shirley.

"Santa Claus," replied Susan.

"Oh, Santa Claus again," said Mommy.

"The year round she writes him. In her class at school was a little Chinese boy. Susan had a crush on him because he painted so beautifully. So she asked Santa Claus for a little Chinese boy last Christmas."

"And what did you do about that?"

"I got her a Chinese doll," said Shirley.

"Now, what is this, Mommy?" asked Susan, again holding up her sketching paper.

"Oh, that's easy," said Shirley. "It's the danger signs you see along the roads. You know, we came out here by station wagon, stayed at motels, and often cooked our meals on the roadsides. It seemed that every time I took over the driving, I'd get lost and land up in a lumber yard. There I would be sitting and looking like a simpleton. At such times, Susan would always ask, 'Is this the way to California, Mommy?' She'd make me furious."

"We had clay in school. But we wasted it making turtles. I made all the turtles," said Susan. "Do you want me to make a spider for you?"

"Susan," said Shirley, "whose baby is this?"

"Why, he's mine," replied the little girl, as if almost surprised at the question, and resumed her sketching.

"That's the way Charlie and I want her to feel," explained Shirley. "From the beginning the baby has been her boy. Daddy and Mommy just take care of him for her. So she's never been jealous of him or felt that he was an intruder. She's a fine little nurse, too. Susan..."

"Yes, Mommy. I have now made a spider and a baby spider."

"But it's time for the baby's bottle to be warmed. If I put him on the floor will you watch him? Don't let him touch the flowers; and don't tease."

For a little while things went swimmingly. The baby became absorbed in one of his old shoes, while Susan examined an empty adhesive tape container. Then she suddenly started to do a somersault and bumped heads with the baby. Both began to cry.

In rushed Shirley. "What happened?" she said.

"We bumped heads," said Susan. "I have a headache right in the middle of my forehead."

"Oh, dear," said Shirley, picking up the baby and brushing his tears away, "and just after I told Hedda what a fine nurse you were."

THE bell at the electrically operated gate rang and got stuck. Shirley put the baby in a play pen in order to go out and let in the photographers. Susan rushed to Barton. "Not too much sympathy now," said Shirley.

"But he bumped his head," said Susan.

"He's all right," said Shirley.

When the photographers began to set up their equipment, Shirley was feeding the baby vitamins with a dropper. "Fish oil," she explained. Then she left the room for a comb and brush. Barton began playing with his shoes; and when Shirley returned, he was cooing to himself, oblivious to the commotion around him.

"Now, don't you men play with the baby," Susan warned the photographers. "He doesn't very much like men."

"He does, too," said Mommy, eyeing the effects of the comb and brush on Barton's new haircut. "He looks like an old tintype," she observed.

"An old tin pipe," echoed Susan.

"How's Hymie?" Shirley asked the photographers.

"He's fine," one of them said.

"And his little girl?"

"She's okay."

Shirley was referring to Hymie Fink, the photographer, who had worked with her in her acting days. The questions illustrated a salient point in her personality. She never forgets old friends. So I had to laugh when a Washington columnist once wrote that "old friends from Hollywood" were disappointed in not being able to get in touch with Shirley Temple. Well, I wasn't. I simply got in a cab and drove out to see her. Neither did John Ford (Susan's godfather) have any difficulty in locating her. Nor a hairdresser by the name of Annabel. The range of her friends is exceedingly great.

But those days in Maryland were busy ones for Shirley. She did her own house work, took care of Susan, and came nearer to death than most people ever knew in having her second baby. Then there was ragweed. Three acres of it surrounded her home and had to be cut about every two weeks during the season. Shirley borrowed a tractor from a neighbor and cut the weeds herself.

The photographers were ready, and after several shots, Susan said, "How about me and Barton?"

Shirley smiled at her two children, and said, "Well, how about you two?"

"How about me and Barton and no Mommy?" Susan explained to the photographer.

"You have to have a mommy in the picture," the photographer said, and Susan was satisfied.

"Don't you miss the excitement of show business; or are you completely domesticated?" I asked Shirley.

"I've been domesticated for a long time," she said. "Taking care of a family properly is much harder than having a movie career."

THE photographers wanted a shot of Shirley, Susan, and Barton walking together. (The baby, an adept crawler, still needs support when walking.) Before posing for the shot, Shirley went into the kitchen to get the baby's bottle. "He's getting hungry," she explained to the photographers upon returning, "and if he sees this bottle, we're dead."

Then she described to Susan what they were all to do in the next shot, ending by singing "I'm Walking Behind You." But when they started the walk, the little girl got a step ahead of mother and brother. "Now," grinned Shirley, "you don't have to take the camera angle in this one, Susan."

The photographers moved to another part of the room, leaving a piece of electric cord on the floor. "Men," called Susan, "please take the electricity with you. He" (indicating Barton) "likes electricity."

Shirley gave the baby his bottle; and I asked what happened to her dogs.

"Very sad," she said. "The Boxer and the Great Dane were great buddies. But in Maryland the Boxer got in a fight with a Competition's Wonderful!

It's one reason we all have so many of the good things that make life worth living!

Johnny couldn't tell you whether Mary's friendlier smile, or her name on the sign, made him choose her lemonade. But he's glad he did! Because let's face it—we all like to have somebody try extra hard to win our good will.

In fact, when so many brand manufacturers compete for your favor, as they do every day in this land of ours—it makes you feel pretty wonderful, doesn't it?

Their keen competition is the chief reason we can all choose today from the biggest line-up of top-quality brands of merchandise ever offered to a purchaser anywhere in the world! It explains why makers of brand-name products never stop trying to improve their brands to increase our satisfaction. And why they keep us up-to-date about them in magazines like this.

Yes, today it is truer than ever before—when you name your brand, you better your brand of living!

skunk. It was terrible. He smelled so bad that he couldn't sleep in his own dog house without holding his head out the door to breathe. Finally, he walked in front of a truck and was killed. I think he deliberately committed suicide to get away from that odor. The Great Dane didn't get over his pal's death for a year. Before we left Maryland I had to sell him, not knowing whether we could find a place to keep him here."

"You shouldn't say that. It isn't nice." The voice was Susan's; and it was directed at one of the photographers who had been teasing her.

"Well, all men aren't nice," said the photographer.

"Oh, yes, they are," declared Susan.

"Remember that big word we used the other night," said Shirley. "Tell him he's that."

"What, Mommy?"

"You know—in . . ."

"You are incorrigible," said Susan triumphantly.

"And what does that mean?" I asked.

"It means," said Susan, "that the man is hopeless."

As the baby continued to drain the bottle, Shirley got into a discussion with the photographers about having her motion pictures—thirty-four altogether—cut down from 35 millimeters to 16 millimeters in size. She wanted to save them for her children. As the talk continued, Susan, who was holding Barton's bottle, said, "If the men didn't talk so much, the baby would eat better." Shirley cast an amused grin in her daughter's direction.

"What's your secret for housekeeping?" I asked Shirley.

"No secret," she said. "All you need is a little organization. We usually get up around six in the morning. Charlie's an early riser—Navy training, I guess. And we go to bed around nine or ten at night. Most of our eastern friends went to bed quite early, worked, and had children; so I followed their pattern. You can get a lot done around the house, if you start at six in the morning."

As the photographers packed their equipment, Shirley explained to them that two minute scars on her face had been caused by the chicken pox.

"I gave my Mommy the chicken pox," said Susan proudly. She was back at her drawing again; and this time came up with a pelican. "Well, goodbye, men," she said to the departing photographers, "you won't be seeing me again."

SHIRLEY suggested we go out to lunch and for a moment wondered if we should take Susan along. "No, I think we'd better not," she said finally. "But I'll have to have a private talk with her." What she said to her daughter I did not ask; but Susan, without the slightest protest, skipped away into the kitchen for her lunch as Shirley called. "And, darling, don't forget to take your nap on time."

We lunched in a small open air patio connected with a nearby market, where one chose food cafeteria fashion; and there were no waiters. For her luncheon, the ex-film star had an enchilada, beans, a carrot salad, and milk. There was but little ogling of Shirley by the other patrons. I doubt if the men, especially the younger ones, knew who she was. Nobody asked her for her autograph. But the girls dealing out the food knew Mrs. Charles Black. They inquired about Susan.

"We see a lot of friends, and read a great deal," said Shirley. "Oh, I've got to tell you this one. We went to see Guys And Dolls in New York, and during intermission, Charles said, 'Damon Runyon had a great flair for catching the personalities of New York people. You ought to get acquainted with his writing,' I asked, 'Did you ever hear of a picture called Little Miss Marker?' He said, 'Yes. That was a picture you made as a baby, wasn't it?' I answered, 'Yes. And do you know who wrote that story? Damon Runyon.'

"How did you learn to drive that tractor?" I asked.

"It's very simple—like driving an old car," she said. "You can't get much speed. If you hit a rock—very bad practice—you get off the tractor, pick up the sickle bar and free it of the stone. Then," she mused, "you might dig up a wasp nest. I did. One of the wasps started buzzing my face. I headed full speed—about three miles an hour—for the garage. The wasp simply circled and dive-bombed me from the rear, stinging me right through my blue jeans."

"Charles, who was working in the garage, said, 'For immediate relief for sting apply gasoline,' and did so. The result was that I suffered from gasoline burn as well as the sting."

"Navy training?" I suggested.

"Maybe," laughed Shirley. "Another wasp got me, but that was when I was painting the well."

"Shirley," I said, "you're having too much fun just living to go back to the movie world. Have the producers really been putting the pressure on you to return to work?"

"I got a lot of television offers while I was in Maryland—we were close to New York, you know. And I've had two nice television series offered me here. Oh, don't let me forget to buy some milk before we leave here."

Alan Wilson's definition of Cinema: A new movie process that will make Katharine Hepburn look like Jane Russell.

Erskine Johnson

In the grocery store, she bought seven quarts of milk. As they were being placed in a sack, a man standing nearby said, "You must have some children."

"Kittens," said Shirley.

I helped carry the groceries into the kitchen, where Mrs. Temple was talking to Susan while she ate. She looked at me, shook her head, and said, "I knew it would be only a matter of time before that daughter of mine would be putting you to work."

WALKING to my car through the grounds over which the child star had romped, I began to reflect: Shirley Temple is gone. We now have Mrs. Shirley Temple Black. She might have been the most spoiled young lady in America. But instead she has worn her success with the dignity of a queen.

With equal poise she can talk to the President of the United States or a grocery clerk. Not only has she learned the true values in life, but has put them into application.

She may break into show business again; and if she does, she'll break big. As a child, she was beautiful and talented. As a lady, she has humor, depth, understanding, and above all, much common sense. She has known the glitter of fame; the power of wealth; but she has learned that they are meaningless unless accompanied by happiness.

So, Mr. Producers, if you want to get Shirley back into show business, you'll have to take these things into consideration. Your "irresistible script" will have to trump what Shirley already has: Contentment in the loving care of a mother for two adorable children, and tremendous respect and love for a fellow named Charles Black.

operation skin dive

"It's great, down there on the Mediterranean," he was saying, casually. "Sun-bathing, sleeping, skin diving . . ."

The young man's face burst into such a sudden sunbeam of joy that Jeff anticipated a funny.

"Did you say skin diving?" the young man asked.

"Yeah, skin diving," Jeff replied, emphatically, bracing himself for the retort.

"Ever do any diving down at White's Point?" the young fellow asked. "Last Monday, I smacked a three-foot shark down there. Best shot I ever made in my life."

"Spear?" asked Jeff, relaxing.

"Nope. I cut him with my Tarpon gun from about six feet. He churned up the water for a block."

"No kidding?" Jeff got excited.

WHEN Barbara came in half an hour later, Jeff and the young bartender (who happened to be the owner's son, Bud Keyes) were still talking heatedly about skin diving. Snorkels, blow masks, CO₂ guns, fins—none of it made any sense to Barbara. But she sat patiently, as she has often had to do when her handsome young husband has become involved in sports talk, and waited. A few minutes later, Jeff and Bud were shaking hands and making a skin diving date.

"Maybe I can get Mel Fisher to go with us," Bud suggested as Jeff went out backwards, Barbara tugging him gently by the coat sleeve. "He's a real shark. He wrapped up that 438-pound black sea bass down in La Paz, Mexico. You must have read about it."

"Swell," Jeff answered, from the door. "And I'll try to get Rory Calhoun, too. He's a bear when it comes to swimming."

And that's how it all started. Bud and Jeff spent the next two nights on the telephone, talking about gear, water temperatures, and the best spots for clear diving. And sure enough, both Mel and Rory could make it. The trip began to shape up like a real deal, and so MODERN SCREEN was invited along to make a picture record of it.

On the morning before Jeff left home with all his gear, Barbara frankly became upset about the whole project. "Why don't you stay home like a nice civilized husband instead of trying to mix socially with the fish?" she pleaded.

"I'll be okay," said Jeff, with a big grin.

"Don't you dare come home with one of those old spears stuck in you," Barbara shouted after him.

"I won't, honey," said Jeff, throwing his gear in the car.

When he met Rory, Jeff asked him a few questions about his gear, and was surprised to discover that Rory, though dead game, had never tried skin diving before.

"Man, you're in for a treat," said Jeff, reassuringly. "There's nothing to it once you get used to the mask and learn how to breathe through the snorkel tube."

"Through the what?" asked Rory.

"Through this crooked gadget," said Jeff, pulling his snorkel out of the back seat. "You put one end in your mouth and the other end sticks up out of the water. It makes it possible for you to breathe while you are swimming around with your face underwater. Of course, if you get too deep it fills up with water and you have to blow it out."

"I can hardly wait to try it," said Rory.

Bud and Mel Fisher were already at the Point when Rory and Jeff pulled up. Although there was a brisk breeze, they were sitting around in their swim trunks, apparently warm as toast.

"The water looks a little cold today," said Mel, surveying the surf with a practiced eye. "But it's clear as crystal over in the lagoon there. We ought to get some good fishing out toward the kelp."

"What about sharks?" Rory asked nervously, looking out at the deep water.

"They never bother swimmers, I've been told," said Mel. "But you do have to watch the seals. A seal with a pup can get awfully disagreeable at times. Not long ago, a buddy of mine came up out of a dive to find an old seal cow staring him in the eye. She gave him a whack with her tail that you could hear for blocks. My buddy got out of the water like a hydroplane."

While Rory and Jeff were putting on their gear, Mel gave them both a briefing on the underwater guns he'd brought along. He manufactures them in all sizes—from the little Peewee, a rubber-propelled model designed primarily for perch and other small species on up to the heavy CO₂ cannon which he uses on deep sea monsters weighing 50 pounds or more.

"You can't stop big fish with just one shot," he told them. "Even when they're hit with this blaster, big fish will run until the spear breaks them down."

A lot depends on a skin diver's skill in handling his gun or spear. Some experts like Mel can shoot accurately up to ten feet, but the best range for average skin divers is between four and five feet. It's pretty difficult to get much closer to fish without scaring them unless, of course, you happen to be an exceptionally stealthy underwater swimmer.

FROM the moment they entered the water, paddling around with their faces submerged, the fellows lost all interest in talking and became utterly preoccupied with the life going on beneath the sea. Rory was absolutely fascinated by his first look at the submarine formations along the bottom and the almost countless varieties of sea animals that he had never realized were there. As he cruised along on the surface, looking down through his glass mask plate, he saw school after school of tiny fish sweeping through eerie corridors of rock and sand, a lush multi-colored background that has no equal above the sea. Rory was thinking dreamily about a marine painting he'd once seen when a big perch zipped by his nose. It was gone before he even had time to aim his gun.

"Man, I just saw a big one," he yelled, after surfacing. "But he was moving too fast for me."

Then he saw Mel, swimming in from the kelp with a good-sized bass on his spear. "Hey, this is great!"

"It gets you the first time," Mel replied sagely, as if he had seen countless thousands of swimmers go through the same experience on their first skin diving trips.

"Hey, come on out here," Jeff yelled from the deep water where he and Bud had been exploring for fish. Rory churned out, pulling up alongside a jutting rock in 25 feet of water.

"Go straight down and take a look," Jeff suggested. "It's simply great."

Rory arched for a deep dive and submerged. Below him, in the glassy, limpid water, lay a bar of white sandstone perhaps 30 feet long, covered by hundreds of tiny purple sea urchins that looked for all the world like expensive Christmas tree ornaments. To his right, a school of golden Garibaldi perch were swimming along slowly, reflecting the sunlight like bright new pennies. Back against a rocky ledge, four or five flowering sea worms were rippling their feathery tentacles in the ebb and flow of the deep current. To Rory, the whole scene looked more like an enchanted fairyland than the bottom of the sea.

"That's the most beautiful sight I've ever seen," he spluttered enthusiastically when he came up. "If I never catch a single fish, I'll still be sold on this deal."

The fellows splashed around for another 15 minutes before Jeff spotted a big five-pound halibut lying dreamily on the bottom of a sand bar, and went down to spear it expertly. Bud spent most of his time working in close to the rocks and ledges along the edge of the lagoon, making a sample collection of the edible shellfish to show Rory. In just a few minutes, he piled up a basketful of abalone, rock scallops, and clams, more than enough for a hearty meal for any gourmet.

"Hey, let's get out," Jeff yelled. "There's no reason to turn blue."

"I already have," said Bud, his teeth chattering. "I always do when the water is below 65 degrees. But that's no reason to give up diving. I've even gone in when the water was down to around 50 degrees and it was so cold you couldn't hold your snorkel in your mouth because your teeth were chattering so badly. I guess I'm nuts."

"We all are," Mel agreed. "Skin diving gets into your blood like a fever. I've been going in for more than ten years and I still get a terrific kick out of it. If you have any feeling at all about nature, you can't help but marvel at the variety of life beneath the sea. It's like another world, and much as I enjoy cutting a fish—spearing it, that is—I think my greatest thrills have come from recording on film the fabulous marine scenes I've encountered."

Mel is perhaps the best underwater photographer in the west. He is frequently hired by the studios to film real submarine scenes which would be virtually impossible to duplicate on a process stage on land. He has shot dozens of famous color shots for the national magazines, and at the moment, is working in Florida waters for Walt Disney, shooting a vast amount of color film to be used in later Disney productions depicting the world beneath the sea.

"It's almost impossible to translate the beauty and excitement which skin diving offers to someone who has never tried it," Mel continued, while they were drying off and warming themselves with the hot soup in Bud's thermos. "Take the two of you. You are both busy, active in pictures, but I'll bet anything that you will never forget your first real look at life below the surface of the sea."

"That's for sure," Rory agreed. "Until today, I always thought that the whole deal was a matter of jumping in the ocean with a spear and sticking a fish with it. But today, I was too busy watching what was going on all over the bottom to shoot at fish when they swam by."

the courage to fear

(Continued from page 49) church. Peter was a man who laughed a lot and joined in your fun; he had no need to enshroud himself or his friends with his belief. His favorite church was an odd little chapel on St. James Place, favored by the Grenadier Guards. He would attend service early every morning.

"When you knew Peter long you began to feel how strongly love and honesty must be part of true piety. Peter was a skipper of a landing craft in the British Navy during World War II. He was often very frightened. Yet his men loved him as I have never seen men love an officer, because he never for a moment pretended otherwise—and also because he stayed at his post though he couldn't hide the fear that gripped him.

Then Mel told them his most thrilling experience with a big fish. Two years ago, he shot a huge 91-pound yellowtail while diving off the coast of Guaymas, Mexico. Before the battling game fish finally expired, Mel had been towed for hundreds of yards into deep water.

"I hate to think what would have happened if that old mossback hadn't given up when he did. I might not be here to talk about it."

It is truly remarkable how rapidly the sport of skin diving has swept the southland. Today, there are more than 100 clubs like the Pacific Telephone Co. club that Bud belongs to, as well as more than 15,000 unaffiliated divers, going into southern California ocean waters each week during the summer. The sport has infected most of the robust young men of the movie colony, too. Jeff and Rory aren't the only lads who have given the underwater world a look. Big John Wayne usually goes skin diving whenever he is with his kids at Catalina or in Mexico. Former frog-man Aldo Ray spends more time in the ocean than a healthy seal. Rock Hudson, who loves to swim, anywhere, at any time, joined the enthusiasts a few months ago while resting up between pictures. Tony Curtis bought some equipment and gave the sport a try. And there will be others.

A large part of skin diving's recent appeal is the economical price of an entire outfit. Since American manufacturers began to make inexpensive swim-fins and masks, a complete rig may be purchased for as little as 20 dollars, including mask, snorkel, fins, and spear. And the skin diver need not be an expert marksman to enjoy the sport. He need only be a reasonably strong swimmer with no disturbing fear of ocean currents.

All along the California coastline are dozens of edible varieties of fish for the skin diver to pursue—perch, bass, croaker, corbina, halibut and grouper. The adventuresome also have the sharks and rays and larger game fish to tackle. But the real thrill is not in the hunt, if you would believe Rory and Jeff and Mel and Bud, but in the opportunity which skin diving gives you to appreciate raw nature as it is constantly unfolding before your eyes beneath the sea.

"Imagine my trying to sell that idea to Barbara," said Jeff, with a smile, as they were walking back to the car. "Me, a nature lover? She'd never believe me. I'll be better off, I think, if I just hand her my fish and say, 'Here, honey, is something for the pan.'"

END

(Rory Calhoun will be seen in 20th Century-Fox's CinemaScope How To Marry A Millionaire.)

"My favorite story involving Peter brings a picture to mind that makes me smile fondly about him every time I think of it. It concerns a time when his ship was being bombed and machine-gunned in Mediterranean waters by Nazi planes. Peter was on the bridge at the time, a bridge, incidentally, where he grew geraniums in clay pots. He ducked every time the planes dived; ducked, and grabbed at his geranium pots to save them from being hit, yelling alternately from fear and from desire for reprisal.

"Get that fellow! he would cry to his anti-aircraft crews, pointing upward at a plane even as he scrooched over with his arms full of geraniums. 'No! That one! The other one! He's after my flowers!'

"His men swear that one day, off an Italian beach, Peter's prayers saved them from certain disaster. They had just put a landing party of soldiers ashore and were about to turn back to sea when an exploding shell put their port propeller out of commission. At this moment they were portside to the land with a stiff on-shore wind blowing and so close that only a sharp turn to right, or starboard, could take them out to sea and safety. But with the port propeller gone the starboard propeller would swing them right into shore.

"Nevertheless, Peter, they say, offered up quick prayers, then signalled for full power ahead. And the ship, against every rule of seamanship, not to say the mechanics of force and moving bodies, turned right! It is hard to believe. It is something like putting your car in reverse and yet having it go forward. And it must therefore come under the heading of miracle works. Yet I was intrigued some time ago to read that the scientists today hold that physical law is not absolute but merely a matter of high probabilities. A teakettle of water over a fire has never been known to do anything but boil, yet, scientifically it is possible for it to freeze instead! God not only performs his wonders, but has arranged loopholes by which they can appear to be natural happenings."

It is apparent that Stewart never had the advantage of as loving an introduction to religion as Peter had, and he bemoans the fact. When Stewart was born his father was already 50. When Stewart was old enough to understand a bit of what was going on, when he was about nine, his father was almost 60.

"We were almost two generations apart in our views and probably more than that in our habits," he comments. "Intimate father-son chats, like Peter enjoyed, were not possible. I never had one with him. My father's death when I was very young provided the occasion for my first intimate relationship with the church, and it was a most painful one for me.

"I stood close to my mother at the services and was conscious of her deep suffering; knew that for her the world had practically come to an end. When it came time for the minister to speak I was certain he would say something which would inspire and comfort her. Instead, he was a man who spoke in the most worn platitudes, spoke with professional dispatch and unctious, much like an auctioneer briskly disposing of his wares, and without a trace of genuine feeling or sympathy audible. Even at my age I sensed his inner disinterest in his assignment.

"Naturally I was bitter about it and no doubt youthfully revolted at the whole idea of the church. Later I rationalized, made a distinction between the man and what he represented. There is a difference. Yet, to this day, I wish more attention would be paid to eliminating this difference. I feel that our ministers should be our most sensitive men, our best minds, and, above all, gentle, conscientious, earnest talkers. I am forever offended by holy words spoken in routine fashion.

"I am sure the world of man needs religion. Peter proves that. A world full of men like him would be nothing short of the Promised Land. Peter is religion in action."

As it is for most people, it is difficult for Stewart Granger to peg his faith, tell how strong it is. One suspects that he feels it is certainly not as strong as that of some men he knows, yet stronger than that of others he has met. Is it strong enough?

The trouble with conscience, as far as Stewart is concerned, is that it can often make a lot of trouble for him. His friends report that in the Army he could not accept the presence and military functions of chaplains. It seemed wrong to him to assemble men before battle, for the purpose of blessing their assignment, when that assignment was to go out and slay their fellow men. He is credited with saying as much, and in the English Army, as probably in all Armies, such talk is not favorably received. Stewart, it is said, got his come-uppance in a steady fare of the more unpleasant duties his superiors could allocate to him.

All he had to do was to hold his tongue but even in Hollywood he is not noted for this gift. He has told off some of the biggest men in the industry, and whether seated in a studio office or on the witness stand in court, has always, and bluntly, made his thoughts plain. As a matter of fact, he doesn't think that holding one's tongue is always best described as the practice of tact. He thinks that more often it amounts to the practice of moral cowardice.

"A fellow who wants to get along without unpleasantness often finds himself silent while the God-awfullest things happen in front of his eyes," he declares. This harks back to his feeling about chaplains in the Army. He doesn't think war will ever be eliminated if people do not admit to themselves that it never can be sanctified religiously. Yet he does not make statements like these as if he were lecturing. He seems to be lost in his thoughts and they come out as if he were simply giving voice to his conscience.

The distinction between moral cowardice and physical cowardice is one which Stewart is known to have studied for most of his life. He considers the first of these, moral cowardice, the root of the most serious evil in man's history. He thinks that it permits men to look on injustice with equanimity, or more often lets them turn their backs on it and pretend it isn't taking place. Whereas physical cowardice, in his opinion, while hardly an inspiring facet of man's makeup, is as necessary to his survival as his ability to breathe.

He points out that in dealings with his son, Jamie, born of his first marriage, he has had several opportunities to be a moral coward by pretending to the boy that he never had been a physical one. "No man wants his son to think he is a coward but I deliberately made a point of doing so," Stewart says.

When Jamie was about eight he made a visit from England to see Stewart in California. One late afternoon, after he had attended a Halloween party, it seemed to Stewart that Jamie was being unusually silent and giving evidence of inner anguish. The boy refused to tell what was wrong but from the nurse who had accompanied him Stewart learned that he had been threatened by three boys at the party and she thought he was suffering because he felt himself a coward—he had run.

"Were you scared?" Stewart asked Jamie. "Tell the truth. The truth never hurts. I have often been scared in my life." "Have you, really?" Jamie asked.

"Yes."

Then Jamie admitted it. "Look, Jamie," Stewart said. "This is something you must learn. If three boys are going to set on you, run. If two boys—run. If one boy and he is bigger than you—run. If one boy and he is your size, stay and fight. It won't be terrible. If one boy and he is smaller than you are, don't fight. Let him run. That's the way of the world."

"But isn't that wrong, Dad?" Jamie asked.

"What could I say," added Stewart, "knowing that if he doesn't learn to bend reasonably with the winds that will blow at him in his years to come he will be destroyed?"

STEWART reports that he answered "No." "More than anything else I want Jamie to be honest," Stewart declares. "I want him to know that the fox who flees the hunter's dogs is honest and without guilt, and similarly the man who runs from that with which he cannot cope. It is dishonest only to run and pretend you didn't or even that you are better than your fellow man and shouldn't have; morally dishonest, even moral cowardice. Such a man could also pretend that he is in the church because he loves it, when actually he trembles before it. Such a man comes to God as a hypocrite.

"Not all men bend before life, I know. But for every exceptional youth who has the qualities of true heroism, and, I might add, the stoicism to suffer prolonged martyrdom, you get ten thousand youngsters who become frightened, twisted, little souls trying to live up to impossible standards. In time to come we may all be noble. The lesson of today is that we are not, and most of us must come before our Maker at least honestly as human beings who have sinned, as what we are. Somehow, in admitting our weaknesses, there is a saving grace; enough, I hope, to count."

According to Stewart he spent much of his early twenties being a foolish pretender about himself. He worried so deeply about a fancied cowardice that he would deliberately pick fights when there was absolutely no provocation. He would challenge a man in a pub because he fancied the man was looking at him insolently. Before he made the challenge he would be shaking inside with fear of what would happen. But he had to do it. "It was a horrible thing," Stewart recalls.

HE used to know Freddie Mills, former light heavyweight champion of England, and would spar with him at exhibitions. They would go to events like picnics staged for the benefit of the English Ford company, and put on a bout before thousands of their workers. Stewart thought that out of such deeds he would rise in his own estimation and be able to live with himself without being besieged by all sorts of doubts. But it didn't work.

"Nothing worked for me but the truth—the truth about who I am and what I am. And—I'm just another chap. No more—no less," he says.

"I remember that when I wanted to be an actor I held back from trying until after I was twenty because I thought acting was effete work for a man. I was hardly being honest with myself. What I was afraid of was being accused of being effete. That's quite another story.

"When I could admit this to myself I went on the stage. There were times when the very accusations I had feared were made. I coped with them the best way I could. I don't think a man is to be blamed for ducking a blow, but I do think he is wrong to hang back from some desired step because it might bring on a blow. The first is an act of self-preservation, the second is debasing one's self."

Out of this interview with Stewart Granger, dealing with matters that he would rather not have discussed (but from which it was against his principles to run), it became apparent that he does not consider it an easy matter to solve one's spiritual problems. In his honesty he gives the impression that he, for one, has not yet found the formula; the teaching of the Scriptures, multiplied by the number of times he has had to violate them to live in a practical world, has probably not yet equaled X for him—X, of course, being the possession of a pure faith.

"Man is to his God what he is to himself," is about the most direct conclusion Stewart ventured to make. "You might say I am working on myself."

(Stewart Granger can now be seen in MGM's All The Brothers Were Valiant.)

the lies they tell about bob wagner

(Continued from page 37) went steady or anything like that. After we had gone out for a few months, I felt it was unfair to Debbie to be monopolizing so much of her time. One night when I was driving her home, we talked about it. We both decided it would be better if we didn't see so much of each other. It was all very friendly."

But others decided that a big thing should be made of it. One magazine editor called him breathlessly and demanded to know the reasons for the breakup of their engagement.

"You were the ones who made this appear to be a big romance," Bob replied emphatically. "You were the ones who had us engaged. Now you can dream up the reasons why we are breaking up."

ANOTHER thing that makes Bob sore is the implication that his short-lived "engagement" to Terry Moore was a publicity stunt. When the two were locationing with 12-Mile Reef, the news broke from Florida that they would be married shortly. The report was quickly denied, and the scoffers then said it was all a grandstand play for newspaper space.

The truth is that Bob was no party to the fiasco and was genuinely upset by it. He immediately called the studio publicity chief to see what could be done about stopping the story and determining the source. No one at the studio has yet determined how the story got into print.

"I have to be more careful than some other actors. I have been fortunate in having a following of young kids. Although that has been great for my career, it also presents certain responsibilities. I can't do anything disillusioning."

Bob has a point there. The bobbysox following is not to be trifled with in matters of personal lives. Van Johnson discovered that. He was absolutely tops with the malt shop crowd until he ran off to marry his best friend's wife. His fans didn't think that was cricket, and his popularity took a nosedive.

The Bob Wagner-Barbara Stanwyck "affair" was an item that kept the gossip columnists busy for a spell. It was blown up in such a manner that it proved very embarrassing to both Bob and Barbara.

"There's another case of jumping to conclusions," Bob explained. "It happened this way: when we were making Titanic, Barbara, Clifton Webb, Thelma Ritter and I would always have lunch together.

"On Halloween, we decided to have our own tricks or treats. We were all going to Romanoff's for dinner and have a lot of fun. Thelma couldn't join us, so there were just Clifton, Barbara and I."

A columnist happened by their table that night and Clifton remarked, "I'd like you to meet our illegitimate son, Robert." It was all very jolly. But the next day, the columnist wrote that Barbara Stanwyck and Robert Wagner were doing the night spots together.

Then other columnists played with the combination, and the magazines took the items and blew the whole thing up into a big romance. The term has been misused in the Hollywood parlance, but Bob and Barbara have been and intend to remain merely good friends.

Bob's friendship with Dan Dailey has been another target for the self-appointed critics. These busybodies have promoted the notion that Dan is a bad influence on the younger actor. Dailey, worldly-wise and from a different background from Bob's, was supposed to be giving him a liberal education in Hollywood night life. The fact that they had adjoining apartments added to the fable.

"Baloney," said Bob in reply to all of this. "It was by accident that I got an apartment next to Dan's. I had to have a place big enough to accommodate my folks when they got into town."

He and Dan have done some water-skiing and other sports together, but that's as far as it goes.

WHAT about the growing reports that Wagner is getting difficult about publicity? They are largely untruths, he said.

The lad has been the subject of more magazine articles than any other new player in screen history. He has done over 100 in the last 12 months. He has remained at the top of all the movie magazine polls for months, and writers continue to clamor for interviews.

Some players in a similar situation get concerned. Dale Robertson, for example. He says he has received too much publicity; he has turned down magazine stories because he fears he is burning out his career before his time. I asked Bob if he subscribed to the Robertson theory.

"No, I don't think you can get too much publicity," he observed. "But there is such a thing as getting the wrong kind of publicity. That's one thing I've tried to watch, and that's why I may have got some people mad at me.

"I present a problem, as far as publicity is concerned. I'm 23 years old and have led a fairly quiet life. Yet the magazines have to keep turning out more stories about me. They can tell my life story just so many times, and then they have to start resorting to gimmicks. Some of the gimmicks can make me look pretty silly if I submit to them. So, I've turned down some of them.

"But that doesn't mean I'm getting difficult. I'll do any interview I'm asked to do, as long as it's done intelligently."

A columnist recently carried the item that on Barbara Stanwyck's suggestion, Bob had hired her press agent in an effort to cut down his publicity. The truth is that Bob has known the publicist for years and has often gone to her for advice. But he hasn't hired her to work for him and is perfectly happy with the job that his studio publicity department has done.

Magazine writers have made much of the fact that Bob comes from a well-to-do family. Some have even gone so far as to assert that Bob used his wealth to get into pictures; that his father helped him to win his job.

What about these stories?

"More baloney," Bob snorted. "Sure, my folks are well off, but they're not loaded." It's true that R. J. Wagner, Sr., did help out with Bob's career, but in a very businesslike way.

"My dad staked me when I was trying to break into pictures," said Bob. "I ran out of my own money, and an actor has to buy his own clothes and so forth. By the time I got my contract at Fox, I was $3,000 in debt. I started at $150 a week, and that was for only 20 out of 26 weeks. By the time I had paid Dad back, I had to start borrowing again."

As for his father's getting him the job, that's sheer nonsense. Bob's success was strictly a matter of his own hard work and good luck. He hustled himself around the studios with scant success. Then one night he was dining with his folks at the Gourmet restaurant in Beverly Hills. He clowned with a friend at the piano, and Henry Willson was struck by his pleasant personality. The topflight agent took over Bob's career and lined up a contract at 20th Century-Fox.

HERE are some more untruths that need to be brought out into the light:

Lie: That Bob dated the boss' daughter, Susan Zanuck, in order to get ahead at the studio.

Fact: Bob's career was well on its way to success before he ever dated Susan. He and Susan had good times together, and their dates had nothing to do with business.

Lie: That Bob is a playboy who dates a different doll every night.

Fact: Like every young man who is not eager for marriage at this time, he takes out a lot of girls. But he's no wolf. "I don't think it's a good idea to take a different girl out to the night clubs three and four nights a week," he said. "They take your picture, and the shots end up in a layout in a magazine, each one with a different girl. It makes you look like a loose character."

Lie: That Bob is getting fed up with the movie star routine.

Fact: "I'm the luckiest guy in the world. I'm doing stimulating work and getting paid well for it. I get to live in California, which is the best place in the world to live.

"Sure, there are some drawbacks to being well-known. Sometimes I even get frightened when I go out on tour and I see the kids yelling and screaming at you as though you were some kind of god. But it's kind of wonderful, too. Any star who says he is sick of the routine of signing autographs and so forth is just plain nuts. He knew he was getting into that kind of life when he started in the picture business. The advantages far outweigh any disadvantages."

Lie: That Bob has gone Hollywood and is tossing his wealth around like an oil millionaire.

Fact: Bob earns $350 a week, which is small potatoes compared with other movie star salaries. What's more, he draws no salary 12 weeks out of the year. Bob's expenses are not fabulous. He is currently driving a 1949 Ford while most stars of his caliber are motoring with Jags and Cads. Despite his sensible living, Bob found he couldn't save a cent from his salary, once he had paid his agent's ten per cent, insurance, clothes, rent, etc. So he had a talk with a business agent who handles stars like Humphrey Bogart and Dick Powell.

"If you can't save on $350 a week, you probably couldn't save on $60,000 a year," the agent chided. "Do you realize that some judges make only as much as you do and yet are able to maintain nice houses and cars, put their children through school, etc?"

Bob was convinced. He hired the man to supervise his finances. Now Bob is on a strict budget so that "I couldn't get an extra quarter to see an earthquake."

He's a sensible boy where money is concerned. "I can't see how some of these actors can go in for big houses and expensive cars," he mused. "They can't possibly do it and stay out of debt. Then they start getting behind in their income taxes."

Lie: That Bob is mad at his studio for keeping his salary low.

Fact: Bob has no beef with 20th-Fox. A less level-headed performer might be pounding the executives' desks and demanding more money. After all, $350 a week is pretty small change for a guy who has starred in 12-Mile Reef and Prince Valiant, two of the big Technicolor CinemaScope epics.

"I'm grateful to the studio," said Bob. "After all, when I came here four years ago, I couldn't read the label off a jar with any dramatic value. I couldn't have had better training. Every picture I have been in has been a top attraction, with the exception of two. That's the kind of buildup you can get only at a major studio."

But don't get the idea that he is being a Pollyanna about this. He's shrewd enough to know that the present situation is in his favor.

"I could probably go to the studio now and get a new deal," he reasoned. "Or I could wait until my next option time in April. By then 12-Mile Reef and Prince Valiant will be out, and I will be in a better bargaining position."

"Prince Valiant alone is worth five million dollars to me, as far as my future career is concerned. It is a natural, the kind of picture that comes to an actor once in a lifetime. Why should I be mad at the studio?"

Bob looks at his career from a long-range point of view. If he signs a new contract within a year, he'll be about 30 when he gets out of the studio. By that time—if his success continues to grow—he will be able to grab off the really big money enjoyed by free-lance stars.

"I've got to get off the dime and prove myself," he said. "I've come to the point where I must move ahead into the field where the big competition is. I've done all right with the younger crowd, but now I must establish myself with the older audiences."

Unfortunately more and more lies will be told about him as he progresses. "I can't understand it," said Bob. "Most of the people who tell these lies make a good living from the motion picture business. Yet they continue to spread malicious gossip that does harm to the industry."

"Why, I can't believe people could repeat the twisted, distorted things that I hear are said about me. There are things you couldn't print. Now people spread these stupid lies about me as though they were the honest truth."

It's an old Hollywood axiom that the bigger the star the bigger the target. That's something Bob Wagner will have to face as his success grows.

"Pulling a rock" is sports page patois for making a mistake. Make enough of them and you call it experience. (Oscar Wilde—roughly.)

"Wilde was a true cynic," said Miss Crawford. "Bitter, too. What a criminal waste of time, being bitter! Where is the point? Curling up with a—a cud of misery! Mistakes add up to experience only if you profit by them. But then they are experience, whatever Wilde may have thought about it."

But she had made them?

"Do I seem to you to have divine attributes? Of course, I've made them. I'd hate to count. I've made them and I've tried to learn from them, but if I had to do it all over again, I'd make the same ones, because I am what I am. A fresh start wouldn't change me. I'd be little Lucille Le Sueur just as I was before, the same weapons, the same frailties. Mistakes! Oh, yes."

And would she specify?

"I'd rather generalize. You can see the reason for that, can't you?" It was a very hot day in Brentwood Park, West Los Angeles, etc. Most unusual. There were parboiled publicists at the bottom of Miss Crawford's garden, and another interrogator waiting to come to bat. Here on the east patio of the lovely home that is in a constant state of growth or flux, there were exterior evidences of home-work well done—or so one could surmise. In the past, Miss Crawford has been charged by critics with being rather vociferously over-groomed. She wore a simple cotton dress now and she had kicked off her shoes. She has been scored, as a matter of record, with being on occasion oppressively regal in bearing, the Movie Star in spades. It may once have been so; it is not so today. She is amiable, humorous and self-deprecating. It has been said of her that her public utterances are, or were, painfully contrived. On the contrary, she is, with the possible exception of Humphrey Bogart, the warmest, most candid and unguarded lip in Hollywood. Her friends in the press—and the press is very fond of her—tend to protect her for her own good. Miss Crawford underwent several nasty jolts before she learned the efficacy of the off-the-record pronouncement. Now she says, "No more talking off the record."

ANOTHER, much lesser, actress had that morning sounded off for a wire service on the subject of men in general. Men in general were foul balls. Wasn't that a corollary instance of indiscretion?

Miss Crawford grinned, a facial contortion not permitted many women, but on her it looks good.

"Very corollary," she said. "But maybe she has another reason for not liking them. I hear she smells a bit—uh—musky." There was a moment's tight silence, then strangled laughter. "Oh, no!" said Miss Crawford. "Tie me down and gag me before I—Dear heaven, where were we? Quick!"

"Generalize."

"Generalize. All right. You understand, I can't talk about my mistakes in terms of my husbands. Wouldn't if I could." Douglas Fairbanks, Jr. Franchot Tone. Phil Terry. "They were fine guys. From each of them, I—oh, you know. Let's not sound as though I milked people for what they had to offer. They were fine guys, period. And I don't want to talk about the pictures I shouldn't have made because there we're involving directors or writers or producers or all three, and what's done is done. I'm not blameless, either, not by a very long shot. You know something, when I make a good, solid bloomer, like a picture a while ago that shall be nameless, it's because I think about the thing. I reason. With me, that's apt to be fatal. If I don't go by instinct, I'm wrong nine times out of ten. By instinct alone, I bat anyway .500, maybe a little better."

"But in general, my greatest mistake, only it's more a failing than a mistake, is wanting so desperately to be liked. That doesn't make me unique, I know, but I work too hard at it. I—I seem to need friendship, not just enjoy, but need it like a plant needs water. I go overboard and press, and it makes people wary. I don't know, I think they're thinking, 'What's this?', and sometimes they shy away, and I know what I'm doing wrong but then I can't help it; the momentum's established. Friendship should come easily and naturally and even casually; I know that but I don't feel it. You understand? I've driven off people by just the intensity of my need for their affection. Isn't that funny? No, that's not funny. Not to me. Listen, I don't sound pathetic, do I? I'm not pathetic. I'm a certain way, that's all."

THE leather-bound book lay open on Miss Crawford's lap, the adopted conclusions of her elders painstakingly assembled in her own slanting hand. An educator who had greatly influenced her formative thinking had made his contribution, and she had noted it and stuck with it with rather touching accuracy and faith. "The world," (she must have written from memory or dictation), "is not interested in your troubles. When your problems are the deepest, let your laughter be the loudest."

"Not pathetic," said Miss Crawford. "Please not pathetic. All right, here's another. I've mistaken opportunists for friends. Let's be sure and get that one straight. I have to use a label I don't like to use. Movie star. But I don't mean myself, Joan Crawford, as a movie star, big wheel, anything like that. A movie star, however much she herself may happen to contribute to the process, is really in the end the product of a system. A—there's a good word for this—a—happenstance. A happenstance. But a movie star is a fact, too. And as a fact, a movie star is an exploitable asset. Mmm. This is one of my really glib days. So anyway, men would call me and want dates, but not with me and not even with Joan Crawford, but with a movie star, and only for the good it would do them, for a career boost or a little publicity or what have you. Frankly, it's not very flattering. I'll be franker than that. It's a little nauseating. I like guys who call for dates and I respect actors who look for jobs. But I wish they would make it two separate phone calls."

Lauren Bacall tells about the friendly argument Humphrey Bogart and Richard Burton had recently about acting. Neither convinced the other he was right. Suddenly Bogie left the room, returned with his Oscar, slammed it down on the table and said, "See. This proves I'm right."

Sidney Skolsky
N. Y. Post

It should be noted here that Miss Crawford's voice was neither plaintive nor querulous. Evidently she had simply come to a conclusion and then thrust it behind her. "How active," Miss Crawford had written in her book, copying laboriously a random thought of Alexander Pope's, "springs the mind that leaves the load of yesterday behind."

Joan Crawford is a load-leaver of considerable adroitness and strength. ("I never look back! Never, never! What can be more stupid?") The motion picture industry calls her tough and it calls her shrewd, but with vast respect and in many cases actual affection. The jungle learns to appreciate and sometimes to love its own. Nobody ever thought she had it terribly easy, although that is a biographical phase she does not dwell on. But neither has anyone felt she wasn't capable of protecting herself in the clinches. She has once in a while taken something of a beating from the ringsiders but like any good pro fighter, she hasn't let it distract her.

Or maybe she has—a trifle. It's her business. In lieu of direct comment, she underscored in the book a borrowing from Voltaire and read it aloud with somewhat more feeling than she had accorded the rest:

"I envy the beasts two things—their ignorance of evil to come and their ignorance of what is said about them."

Well, Miss Crawford shouldn't feel too bad about this. She does better than par for the course. A fast but thorough piece of research in support of this essay would indicate that among things said about her are these: She's honest, good-hearted, and generous to a fault. Her professional courtesy is impeccable, and she has many of the virtues customarily supposed to be limited to men, such as forthright willingness to acknowledge error where she is wrong.

BUT let us say that she is, by her own necessary lights, tough. Who wants to be used, maneuvered or exploited? Who wants to bite for the same dodge over and over again? That's where Cliquot comes in. Cliquot, in fact, did come in, right about then. Cliquot is Miss Crawford's poodle, smart even for a poodle and poodles are the nuclear physicists among dogs. Miss Crawford is unreservedly devoted to Cliquot. In her heart, he may occupy second place to her four adopted children. He may. Cliquot came in, offered a rubber ball in an advanced state of deterioration, was fussed over mightily, and went away again. There was something faintly moving in the scene, as there is in the scene of any person with fame, influence or authority in the presence of his dog.

"Here's a third thing," she said. "And this may be the greatest mistake of all; I don't care what I said to begin with. I'm too honest. You've heard people say they're too honest but give it that tone that means they want you to pat them on the head. Not me. There's honesty and honesty but you can learn to temper bluntness. You can. I can't. If my friends make mistakes, I have to run and tell them about it. Believe me, it's a form of well-meaning helpfulness that's likely to get you strictly nowhere. But strictly. Mistake? It's a mistake all right. Sometimes I think anything that costs you a friend is a mistake. And that has cost me some."

EVENING was coming on now and the air cooled a little. Miss Crawford leaned back in the lounge chair and her slightly tense face with the matchless bone structure assumed a kind of repose. She closed her eyes and for a brief moment looked tired. Was she?

The much-caricatured eyes opened wide again. "Do you know what they call me? They call me 'The General'. I'm not tired. I sleep two hours a night. Never any more. Being tired must be a little like dying. Here. Read this." It was a jotting in the book from a gent named Clark, who had felt it incumbent to declare: "I have lived to know that the secret of happiness is never to allow your energies to stagnate."

But on two hours sleep a night? "On two hours sleep a night! It's all I need. I guess it's because each new day is such a big deal to me. Whatever it brings, you know, it's exciting. I can't remember any one day when there wasn't something, something!" Edison, next to Miss Crawford, was a sack hound. "I go to bed fairly early but I read and read, and I'm never asleep before four or four-thirty. Then up early, and so forth. Truly, it doesn't bother me." And truly, she didn't look as if it did. The momentary dropping of the lids had passed.

When MODERN SCREEN walked in, Miss Crawford had just finished a high pressure conference with agents and writers apropos a script. Daily these were going on and on and Miss C. was surrounded by omniscient males, some of whom had begun to get her goat.

"Some of the men I work with resent a career woman!" she pronounced suddenly, "in the same way they resent a woman with a sense of humor! It's an impingement on their egos, in case you can spell 'impingement'. I could make it reflection. They sit around and I can practically hear them thinking: 'Now, now, dear, you're only a woman. We know what's best.' So many are like that. The loyal opposition. Well, bless the opposition's hearts. I don't know what I would have done over the years without enemies. They're like a home. Beloved enemy! Who said that? It doesn't matter."

She was not, then, affronted by enmities? Women do not snort but Miss Crawford came reasonably close to it. "Affronted! The book, darling, the book. Right—there!" Right there was this: "He that wrestles with us strengthens our nerves and sharpens our skills. Our antagonist is our helper."

She put the book back beside her. "You're going to ask me in a minute why I don't give up the battle and retire. I can see it in your kind, blood-shot eyes. It's a look I've learned to recognize. She's had fame, had success, had career, family, home, now why doesn't she sit back and take it easy? How much ambition, how much anxiety, does one person want or need? Oh, yes, you were, weren't you? Well, great heavens to Betsy, why should I retire? I'm geared to this sort of thing, I love work!"

Did the book contain a rule of thumb to cope with that one?

"I don't live by the book, darling. Not the way you mean it. By my book, yes. This is my book, remember. I didn't compose it but I collected it. It's me. Wait a minute. Uh-huh. Here it is." It was by Kahlil Gibran, a name somehow suggesting it might spell something backward. It went: "To love life's true labor is to be intimate with life's innermost secret."

"Besides," said Miss Crawford, "what would I do if I retired? In a month they would find me down there beside the pool with moss up to here. Breathing but immobilized."

AND time was running close, and what in the world had ever happened to those mistakes we had started off with so bravely? Remember the plot?

"Oh, those mistakes," said Miss Crawford. "Those mistakes, I mean. They're still there, darling. Made. Rooted. I could never call them back and I'd never want to. And I'd do it all over again. If I didn't, it wouldn't be me. You can see that, can't you? And a ladylike phooey on Oscar Wilde. This I like better." The book was all but inexhaustible. "A man," Miss Crawford had written, "can learn twice as much from defeat as he can from victory."

The California twilight was getting in its licks in earnest now.

"You know," resumed Miss Crawford presently, apropos some privy thought of her own, "what a sad thing is? It's a sad thing that we're always too young to appreciate our parents. By the time we do appreciate them, it's too late. It's one of the very few things that are too late. Most things aren't too late at all. Never look forward, never look back. That definately is for me. Or forward just a little. Listen: "This day will bring some lovely thing. I say it over each new dawn. Some gay, adventurous thing to hold—and so I rise and go to meet the day with wings upon my feet."

On two hours sleep? No kidding?

"On two hours sleep." A woman of remarkable nervous and physical stamina. With few if any qualms. "Oh, some qualms," said Miss Crawford. "I believe in omens. Like a few months ago, I enrolled for a course at UCLA. The very first night, there was an earthquake. You remember the earthquake. I went home and didn't go back again. I'd had it." Miss Crawford laughs low in her throat. "Nothing in the book about that."

A mistake, then? "An act of God. I made the mistakes." And would not unmake them if she could?

"Right. Could not. But would not if could. How horrible to lead a perfect life. How uninteresting. If you'll forgive a little homespun philosophy, aren't we all the sum total of our mistakes? Among other things? No, no, I'd do it all over again. That was what you wanted to know to begin with, wasn't it?"

That was it. "And now you know."

SHE is an incredibly beautiful woman, this one, who apparently has bitten into life quite a lot harder than most have the guts to do. Also, and not quite incidentally, she is an avid admirer of guts, guts of all kinds and guts as evidenced by anybody. That is one of the most clearly defined of the standards she lives by. You would know it without, so to speak, knowing it. Her look is level, her voice strong, her personality incisive to the point of being slashing. Indeed this is a trademark, as all filmgoers must be aware.

... Jeff Chandler tells me that he thinks Western movies should be called drawing-room dramas because every time a guy comes into a room everybody else starts drawing.

Sidney Skolsky
N. Y. Post

She enters a room like the edge of a buoyant sword. Whatever has hurt her—and reputedly she bears a wound or two—the scars are skillfully sutured over. Her friends, however, figure her a certainty to be hurt again and maybe seven or eight more times after that. She has a vulnerable streak there, which, in character, she would have to deny. It has to do with her great propensity for giving and her singular bad luck, on known occasions, of not getting back. However widely sung the joys of generosity, its purveyors are oddly susceptible to the shrug of the ingrate, whose doubtful favors have been likened by Shakespeare to winter wind. Those closest to Joan Crawford suspect she'd save herself pain, if she stopped proffering gifts of the spirit and locked up the vault. It is here the lady herself has to snort again. But The Book, her own, betrays her. In it, she has inscribed in a place of honor an especially favorite utterance, stunningly Christian in sentiment but hardly the stuff of realism for an avowed General. Read it and see for yourself how tough she is:

"I shall pass through this world but once. Any good thing, therefore, that I can do, or any kindness that I can show any human being, let me do it now. Let me not defer nor neglect it, for I shall not pass this way again."

Amen, General, but keep the storm cellar handy

(Joan Crawford will be seen soon in Torch Song.)

what's happened to hollywood night life?

(Continued from page 43) perhaps, like General Grant at Galena, waiting for someone to come along and open up with the seltzer bottle again. Today Hollywood night life, while by no means in doldrums, is like—oh like this:

The same Mocambo was pretty well jammed on a Friday night a few weeks ago. At nine P. M. there had been only four customers in the place but at eleven a deep breath was ill-advised. The green parakeets in their glass cage overhanging the south wall were in moderate frenzy, and the eyes of Texas were bulging in their search for famed identities. The eyes of Texas are extremely welcome in Mocambo these days, and in Ciro's as well, Ciro's being the other first-line Hollywood night club. Texans are about the only people the tariff doesn't seem to bother. Anyway, after a while, the Dallas table spotted a party that looked so familiar everybody figured "movie stars" and sat back happy. At the same time, the other party spotted the Dallas table and came to the same conclusion. A half hour of mutual ogling ensued before the dismal truth became evident. The two parties lived a block from one another in Dallas and frequently exchanged nods at the neighborhood supermarket. Their mutual disappointment was so violent that they all got up and went to Las Vegas on the next plane.

As a waiter observed dolefully, it never woulda happened when Lupe was around.

Actually things weren't so bad as all that. There were two stars of unquestioned rank in Mocambo that night, and stars that don't get out much any more, too. They were the Dick Powells, half of whom is June Allyson, and they were feeling frisky enough at one point to dance with their arms around one another and kick their heels. There was a Los Angeles disc jockey and with him a girl who had played a striking bit in a Metro film and now was being, as the deathless phrase has it, groomed for stardom. There was a short agent with a tall blonde whose mink coat the agent would take back at the end of the evening because it belonged to him, not to her. And when these two danced, the agent, who had to steer the couple, looked like an engineer sticking his head out of the cab. There was another agent with the divorced wife of a producer, and three tables away the producer with an unknown redhead, maybe the one who bopped Flynn, and a table away from them a Houston playboy who had had his name misspelled in four columns that week. As a matter of fact, the trade papers and columns two days hence would report all sorts of undercurrents and intrigue going on under Mocambo's roof that night, but none was apparent to the eyes of Texas nor to any other lay eye. Subtlety of so private a stripe does not nudge the turnstiles on the tourists' side of the tent.

Yet, the question posed by the title of this essay is in a way invidious. It's loaded, for instance, clearly implying that Hollywood night life is dead in its harness, and that is not so. It is, let us say, only suffering temporary anemia because star names and publicity are its life blood, and one cannot be legitimately sustained without the other.

Then again, the query can be answered in another way—and it has been. Nothing has happened to Hollywood night life. It goes on as before. Only now it takes place in Las Vegas.

Las Vegas is indeed, by remarkably well informed accounts, the primary villain of the piece.

"I give you," said a famed Hollywood Boniface the other day, "two words: Las Vegas. That answers your question. I run a night club here, I shouldn't be this honest. But why kid ourselves? Mocambo, Ciro's, the Cocoanut Grove, we all ask a two dollar covert. We have to. But Vegas with its gambling? You can see a twenty thousand dollar show there for the price of a beer. Have you checked on Vegas this week? Here's who you can see. Red Skelton. Betty Hutton. Milton Berle. Tony Martin. Only a few blocks apart. I'll give you salary figures. Betty's drawing $20,000 a week, Berle $25,000. Tony'll come in around $15,000 and Skelton—get this now—$32,500! I'm told Dietrich'll get fifty when she plays there! Non-gambling establishments can't pay that money. And if we could, the acts still play Vegas first. Then there's another thing. Vegas is between here and the East. Tourists on their way to Hollywood stop over there for a drink and a try at the tables. Two weeks go by and they're still there. Broke or flush, beat or healthy, they then turn around and go home again.

"That's the big item. Another is general economic conditions. This industry's divided and nervous and the old plush days are over. For the time being, anyway. The stars stay home. They do their partying there. The younger players are being forbidden by their studios to go to night clubs. That doesn't help us. Don't use my name now. I shouldn't be this honest. I should be like—" he mentioned a prominent rival, "—and tell you everything's great. But I can't. Finally, we get around to Vegas again. A star does have a week-end off, a few days to play, he heads for there. Less than three hundred miles from here, five hours' hard driving, and no restraints at all. You've asked me, I've told you."

But there was something this spokesman hadn't mentioned. Decorum. It is practiced in Hollywood night clubs these days. Rarely any more are jaws swung at or hair pulled. This is laudable. But there are few night club impresarios who do not know that uninhibited behavior is good for business. In quiet corners, they applaud the exhibitionism and fracas they deplore for the press. Once the owner of a place on the Sunset Strip sat and watched an argument between a second-rate actress and a Pasadena post-debutante come to an ugly boil. He was frankly interested, noting the presence at ringside of two columnists. When his staff showed symptoms of intervening, he waved them down. "Let 'em fight," he said. "We've lost money long enough."

Whether or not his psychology was correct is debatable. But certainly it is so that few Hollywood habitués can speak of the good old days of its night life—pre-war to a great extent—without choking back a tear or, in even less grammatical circles, winking back a lump in the throat.

There was the vivid, tragic, Mexican star who spent that night of undiluted gaiety in Mocambo, a white ermine coat over her shoulders, a super-big hello for everyone. As she left, she encountered a writer friend. "Tell me, beega boy!", she called. "Am I a bad girl?" She shook a finger without letting him speak. "You bedda not say yes!" The writer said instead: "See you tomorrow." The two had a tentative interview date. "Mebbe you see me," said the star. "Mebbe I dawns't see you. I dawns't know." She turned and surveyed the whole room lovingly. "G'bye," she called. "G'bye, now!" The next morning Lupe Velez chose to take her own life by the sleeping pill route. Perhaps she had chosen before that night. Her gaiety had had none of the constrains of indecision. It is anybody's guess. But there was a memorable swatch of Hollywood night life history.

In happier, more tempestuous days, the same Miss Velez had once tapped an obstreperous wolf briskly across the pate with a champagne bottle, then leaped on a table and challenged anyone in the room. Just carried away, that was all.

The belligerent spirit apparently is more readily evoked by the atmosphere of Ciro's, Mocambo's elegant counterpart a few blocks east on the Strip and across the street, although old hands are inclined to regard Ciro's fisticuffs as strictly prelims. "The main eventers," one has said, "wait for Mocambo. Not so many stairs to fall down in case they trip."

Frank Sinatra and New York columnist Lee Mortimer did not wait. At the top of the stairs leading down to Ciro's old parking ramp, they had at it, with superficial wounds to Mortimer's frame and a much deeper incision in Sinatra's bank account, after he'd settled the damages out of court. Nat Dallinger, the veteran photographer of Hollywood night life who pulled the combatants apart, has remembered the details well. "It never would have happened," he has said, "if it weren't for a couple of Frankie's so-called friends. They egged him on. I might have got the picture of the year if I hadn't decided to be peacemaker instead. But Mortimer could have been really hurt. He'd been down twice, and there was broken glass on those steps that night. That wasn't funny."

It was at Mocambo, on the other hand, that in the heyday of the era, the punch of the decade was landed, one girl's uppercut catching the chin of another with such unswerving precision that the recipient was knocked clean out of her shoes.

And it was at Mocambo that Victor Mature, frolicking a bit after many arduous and perilous months with the Coast Guard on the Murmansk run in wartime, entered the gents' room and straightway ran into a civilian heckler who accused him of fighting the war in a night club. Mature is no professional hero but was forced this time to point to his ribbons as evidence that this was just a stopover. The heckler persisted. And since he was actually as big as Mature himself, Mature decided he was entitled to act. "Keep it up," he told the menace, "and I'll dunk you in this wash-bowl, even though I filled it for another purpose." The man kept it up. He will never have his head under water so long again; not without drowning.

VIRGINIA Hill, good friend of gangland's late Benjamin (Bugsy) Siegel, is not around any more, either. She got mad at the Government. Estimates of her are varied and have no special place in this account, but no Hollywood night life Bucko has denied her color and headlong generosity. An old friend has said: "She thought money was for only one thing—to make people happy." So Virginia, when night-hood was in flower on the Strip, made people happy. On each evening of wassail, she fared forth with ten one-hundred dollar bills in the bottom of her jewel case. These she distributed as tips among hat-check girls, powder room attendants, waiters, parking lot attendants, bus boys, photographers or simply people whose looks she liked. One night she entered a night club past a group of the awed little people who stand with cameras and autograph albums outside the Strip's swankier spots. She wore a full-length mink of sufficient pictorial impact to draw an anguished sigh from one of these, a young girl in rather shabby straits. "You ever see anything more beautiful?" the girl managed finally. Miss Hill, who later was to confound the Kefauver Committee with her ignorance of the tax structure, stopped in her tracks.

"You like my coat?" she asked her unknown admirer. "You got my coat." And she threw it to her.

Another time, by word of an eye witness, Miss Hill became sated with a Russian sable number. Arrived at Ciro's, she first dropped it on the floor, then kicked it pettishly under a table. A waiter hurried over and retrieved it. "Yours, madame?" he asked. "Yeah," snapped Miss H. "Take it. Lose it. Don't come back with it."

But even this, our fun-loving heroine was able to top. Hearing one night that the wife of a close friend of hers in the night club press had only a few hours past given birth to a son, she approached her pal, the proud father, for confirmation. He grinningly confided it was so, barely stopping himself from offering her a cigar. "Well, now," said Miss Hill. Next day the infant received a token from Miss Hill, a little gift to get it started off okay. Five thousand dollars in war bonds. The Hollywood night club atmosphere in those days plainly had a quality all its own.

A career or two has been made in Strip environs, or at least boosted along. Lana Turner, a one-time night club regular who doesn't bother so much any more, has been instrumental in several. A guy named Joe in Mocambo or Ciro's is a guy named Joe and nothing more. But if he happened to be Miss Turner's escort, they took the trouble to find out how it was spelled. And Miss Turner, a good-hearted girl, was glad to provide this information, hold still for pictures, or even lend the columnists a pencil. This sort of cooperation did not exactly poison the career leanings of Turhan Beys or Stephen Cranes.

But the switch didn't occur till later. A time came when starlets were in season and many of them bedecked Mocambo nightly, letting the breeze blow them across the range of whatever producers were present. Outside, meanwhile, a young man was too busy hustling arriving and departing Cadillacs to get his profile into a strong light. He worked there, but strictly. Nonetheless, he was observed one fine evening, and by and by, while the starlets returned to their own particular underbrush, he put away his jumper and got to be known here and there as Champ Butler.

THE good, the stimulating, the pugnacious old days of the Hollywood neon scene—may they come again and soon, with their Band-aids, thousand dollar bills, jeroboams of champagne, baked Alaska, and flying butterballs and breadsticks. While Errol Flynn was the busiest light heavyweight in the circuit, the most willing of the welter contenders was Humphrey Bogart, once faulted by a friend on the single flaw: "When he's had a couple of belts, he thinks he is Humphrey Bogart."

Like Flynn, Bogart was the victim in most cases of objectionable strangers, bums who tried to chivvy him into fights merely in the hope of a little stray publicity for themselves. Bogart, however, was not averse to playing ball with them, with the result that one fine day he found himself barred from just about every deadfall in the block.

So he stayed home—or confined himself to the saloons he professes to like better than night clubs anyway. But there came a certain time and a visit from an out-of-town friend who wanted to tour the brightest places. Bogart confessed his plight sadly. "I've reformed," he told the friend, "but who'll believe me?" The friend bristled righteously in Bogart's defense, and together they set out. Club after club rejected Bogart, who stood meekly in the background, but finally they found one whose manager was willing in a qualified sort of way to relent. Bogie, the friend said, was waiting out on the sidewalk, thoroughly chastened. He was a changed man now and wished only to drink a glass or two of lemonade in an obscure corner and look on wistfully while others enjoyed the fun that was denied him. At this, the manager burst into tears and cried: "Go get him! The fatted calf's not on the regular menu but I'll have the chef run it up!" And the friend went out to get Bogie—who was rolling around the walk in fierce combat with a sprocket salesman from central Michigan.

Bogart lived dangerously in other ways during the salad days of Hollywood's public merriment. One early morning, he and a producer friend returned from an extensive junket up and down the Strip, having decided to adjourn to the producer's home after Bogart had swung at a fellow-actor and missed him by 30 feet, or precisely the distance the actor was away from him. Home again in a manner of speaking, Bogart felt disposed to curl up in the producer's fireplace and get a little shut-eye. This was all right with the producer but he felt Bogart's tie should be loosened, and got to work on the project. Bogart tried several times in a patient way to tell his friend that he was tightening rather than loosening the knot, but could not make himself any clearer than "Uk," and was registering straight magenta when the producer's wife intervened.

But on a third occasion, Bogart emerged triumphant. He was entertaining a visiting interviewer at Ciro's when, with stunning unexpectedness, the visitor went to sleep. He slept for two unbroken hours while Ciro's ebbed, flowed and bellowed. Finally he awoke and the two left. Bogart thought nothing of the incident until the next morning, when he had the invigorating realization that the writer doubtless would remember nothing of what had happened during his siesta. Immediately he called the man on the phone. There was nothing to worry about, Bogart began stoutly. Bogart would stand by in the event of any crisis. Wh-what crisis, croaked the poor writer, groping for his mental hinges. Oh, nothing, really, Bogart purred reassuringly. Of course, the clam juice down the woman's back might have seemed odd in some places but this, after all, was Hollywood. The writer groaned and shuddered. Naturally, Bogart went on, it might have been a wee mite better if the writer hadn't brought down the comedian with a flying tackle in the middle of the floor show, but the comic was a tolerant fellow and would understand. Furthermore, Bogart concluded, his friend should not worry a bit over having to be carried out in full view of a packed house. Happened every night in the year.

The writer was on his way to join the Foreign Legion before Bogart decided to pull the knife out.

So goes it no longer. Bogie stays home these days, or goes to Europe or whatever he does. Sonny Tufts, on whose blithe record is informal conducting of orchestras and turning flips down trolley tracks, is nowhere to be seen. Joan Crawford, too, has gone to ground, and when Tom Neal had at Franchot Tone over love of Barbara Peyton, it was in comparative private.

THE youngsters turn up from time to time. Mitzi Gaynor is about the most regular and a godsend to the photographers, who have a habit at present of showing up but leaving their cameras in the car. Jane Wyman and her bandleader husband, Freddy Karger, are on hand now and then, and Ginger Rogers and her husband, Jacques Bergerac, if they happen to be in town. Betty Grable you might see, with or without Harry James, who spends a lot of time on the road, but if she's not with him, she's with Betty and Harry Ritz. Terry Moore. Corinne Calvet and John Bromfield. A handful of others.

Not long ago, Joan Caulfield made the casual observation: "If you want to write a story about Hollywood night life, go from home to home, where it's really taking place. All the little cliques, you know. Who goes out?"

Not even Marilyn Monroe, who showed promise at first, has saved the day. She stays home now, too.

A few traditions are maintained. If a married or dating couple really want to have a knockdown, dragout, yowling fight, they save it till they reach a night club and the undivided attention of press and public. There's no sense throwing a natural like that away.

Likewise, almost any event smacking in some devious way of "charity" still flushes a fair quota of big names. Let a regulation eat-and-guzzle promise to devote 20 per cent of the take to the Society for the Prevention of Throwing Firecrackers Down Crocodiles' Throats, and it'll get a notable turnout of the old, familiar faces.

But whereas the Flynn omelette of another time was a thing of no more than passing interest, the big scuttlebutt among the press a few months ago was a paler incident by far: the reluctant agreement of Gene Nelson to pose with Jane Powell two days before Miss Powell and husband Geary Steffen announced their breakup. Nelson's consent rather affronted a number of folk who back in the days of Lupe and Virginia, Bogart and Flynn, Clara Bow or Jean Harlow or Paulette Goddard—would have been affronted by nothing less than a poke in the eye with a sharp stick.

IN yet another sense, the saga of Hollywood night life makes its own minor contribution to contemporary history. In January of 1949, for example, this magazine ran a story by-lined by Charlie Morrison, Mocombo's owner. It featured pictures made at the night club of couples presumably enmeshed at the time in various stages of amour. Less than five years ago, they were Diana Lynn and Bob Neal, "a steady Mocombo duo before her engagement to architect John Lindsay"—now divorced from Diana Lynn. They were Shirley Temple and John Agar, husband and wife, holding hands; "Errol and Nora Flynn" (remember?); Clark Gable with Nancy (Slim) Hawks. Quaint, as previously remarked, like the 'coon and the Duesenberg.

Or way, way back, when Saturday or Sunday nights were the big Sunset Strip deal, here by recollection of photographer Dallinger was a favorite group table, these an inseparable lot: Claudette Colbert and Dr. Joel Preston, her husband, whose marital status is said to be shaky now; Gary and Rocky Cooper, whose m.s. definitely is shaky; the Fred MacMurrays—the beautiful Mrs. MacMurray died earlier this year after a long and tragic illness; the Robert Taylors, when Mrs. Taylor was—and is again—Barbara Stanwyck; the Henry Fondas—Mrs. Fonda is dead by her own hand; last and most happily, the Ray Millands and the Jack Bennys, still live, together and content.

In Hollywood night life, history is a matter of which edition you read. And this phase, while reasonably stable and prosperous, is not the full and lusty, nor lustrous, thing that its predecessors made of themselves. Carole Lombard is gone—and there are no echoes of dead laughter because dead laughter has no echoes.

Cycle is inevitable. The "good old days" will come again. Lana will be back from Europe, Rita's in circulation, all is by no means lost. While glamor takes a break, stability and decorum will have to stand in for it. Some Hollywoodians applaud the change. But most are saddened.

Special, Greaseless Corrective for OILY SKIN BLACKHEADS FLAKINESS

A GIRL'S COMPLEXION is often her own worst enemy. Especially in the teens—just when parties and "dates" are so important!

All at once, the oil glands begin to overwork. Then, your skin grows too sluggish to get rid of its day-to-day accumulation of dead skin cells. So, the dead skin flakes build into a greasy layer and "choke" the pore openings. Your skin grows "muddy." Pores begin to enlarge. Soon—blackheads are apt to start cropping out.

NOW—Pond's recommends a special greaseless treatment for these "Young Skin" problems: oiliness, large pores, blackheads, flakiness. It's quick, easy, and it works!

Just cover face, except eyes, with greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream. Leave on a full minute. The Cream's "keratolytic" action loosens, dissolves off clinging dead skin flakes. Frees the tiny skin gland openings to function normally.

After 1 minute, wipe off. Rinse with cold water. Now—see your "new" look! Greasiness is gone. Your skin looks brighter, clearer!

"Young Skin" doesn't like heavy make-up. A sheer touch of greaseless Pond's Vanishing Cream makes a fresh, un-shiny powder base.

Q. I keep reading that John Wayne's first wife was either Cuban or Dominican. Where was she born, anyway?

—J. J., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

A. Josephine Saenz was born in Mexico.

Q. How much commission did Mario Lanza's manager, Sam Weiler, take from him? Are they back together again?

—G. T., NEW YORK, N. Y.

A. Weiler took 20% of Lanza's gross earnings, 10% of their radio show, insisted on 5% of the singer's earnings for the next 15 years, before he would agree to leave Lanza's employment.

Q. Who is most responsible for Yvonne de Carlo's motion picture career?

T. R., VANCOUVER, B. C.

A. Walter Wanger "discovered" Yvonne and gave her a buildup as "The most beautiful girl in the world."

Q. Could you tell me if Dale Robertson did his own singing in The Farmer Takes A Wife?—G. H., PADUCAH, KY.

A. Yes.

Q. Was Cyd Charisse ever in love with MGM producer Jack Cummings? I heard this rumor when I was in Mexico some years ago.

—T. S., WILSON, CONN.

A. Toss-up between John Wayne and Gary Cooper.

Q. Marilyn Monroe's former husband lives only twenty miles away from her. Are they still friendly?

—T. T., VAN NUYS, CALIF.

A. They have nothing to do with each other.

Q. Is it a practice in Hollywood for top-name actresses to insist upon all the close-ups? If a young actress looks good in a scene, doesn't the top-name actress insist upon having that scene deleted? —G. F., LOS ANGELES, CAL.

A. It depends on the actress.

Q. I've read that Esther Williams has the best money mind in show business. Is that on the level?

—C. Y., MIAMI, FLA.

A. She understands the handling of money.

Q. Why was Anna Maria Alberghetti dropped by Paramount?

—S. L., LIMA, OHIO

A. The studio had no pictures for her.

Q. Leonard Goldstein, the producer who goes around with Piper Laurie, must be much older than she. How much? —C. L., CLEVELAND, OHIO

A. Twenty-eight years older.

Q. What kind of eyelashes does Ethel Merman wear, and how many children does she have?

—E. R., DENVER, COLO.

A. Miss Merman wears artificial eyelashes made of nylon; she has two children.

Q. Is Marlon Brando going to a psychiatrist? —F. F., COLUMBUS, NEB.

A. Not any more.

Q. A friend told me that Rock Hudson is more interested in other things than he is in girls. What about it?

H. R., VENTURA, CAL.

A. Hudson is primarily interested in his career at this point.

Q. Doesn't Judy Garland become a very difficult girl when she goes on a diet? —J. G., PROVO, UTAH.

A. She just becomes edgy.

Q. Is it true (or is it just publicity) that Leslie Caron makes her own clothes? —F. Y., BALTIMORE, MD.

A. True.

Q. Betty Hutton's husband, Charlie O'Curran, stages all her acts. Why doesn't she give him any credit for that? Are these two fighting?

LOUELLA PARSONS' GOOD

Bob Hope breaks a long standing rule against pictures of his family and invites MODERN SCREEN to a

Bob chats with Father English, friend of many stars, Jeanne Crain, Paul Brinkman. Fears that Jeanne's new glamour would injure her marriage have proven false. Not so lucky was guest Jane Withers, whose divorce is imminent.

Bob waltzes with mother-in-law, Mrs. Teresa Defina. One of Hollywood's best citizens, Bob is constantly active in charity affairs; his home is one of Hollywood's happiest.

Bob's 12-year-old son Tony, and daughters Nara, 5, and Linda, 14, help Dalores Hope blow out the candles while members of famous Trapp Family Singers, who entertained at the party, look on. Tony wore full-dress military school uniform.

LOUELLA SHARES BIRTHDAY WITH

SO DETERMINED is Rita Hayworth to marry Dick Haymes that neither lawyers, studio nor friends can talk her into changing her mind.

Incidentally, unless Dick can persuade Nora Eddington Haymes to get a divorce in Nevada or Alabama, Rita cannot marry Dick for a year. Nora insists on a California divorce, since out of state divorces are vulnerable to legal attack.

The serious trouble Dick had with the Immigration Department came as a terrific shock. Few people knew that he was an alien, was born in Argentina and had signed away his rights of ever becoming an American citizen when he avoided the draft by registering as an alien neutral.

Dick's attorney insists that the McCarran Act does not hold in the case of the singer, since he sang twice in the Civic Auditorium in Honolulu and did not go to the Hawaiian gala party at his home.

Newlyweds Ann Blyth and Dr. James McNulty toast each other over a flower-decked table. Most of the ladies wore or carried sprays of fresh garden flowers; Mrs. Hope wore a lei of white carnations over a pleated pastel dress.

Loretta Young and Mory Livingstone find an almost quiet spot in the spacious Hope livingroom. Among the many other famous guests were Robert Young, Jerry Colonna, Fred MacMurray and Pat O'Brien, all old friends of the Hopes.

Mory Livingstone feeds a cherry to husband, Jock Benny. Gracie Allen, half of another famous husband and wife comedy team, looks on while she waits for George Burns.

LUCILLE BALL . . . JANET LEIGH SAYS NO TO NUDITY. . . GLORIA DE HAVEN HAS NEW IN-LAW TROUBLES

Islands for the express purpose of seeing Rita Hayworth. That he did see her every night and every day has nothing to do with the case, according to the Haymes attorneys.

At the time the story broke, I must say for Nora that she came to Dick's rescue. She said, "Poor guy! I don't believe he ever tried to dodge the draft. I know he went twice to the draft board and tried to enlist, but was turned down on account of high blood pressure. If he wants me to, I will stick with him in his troubles."

Rita was equally loyal, but she couldn't very well make a public statement, since Dick was still married to Nora. She was so upset by the whole thing that she took to her bed in a state of nervous collapse.

Is there anybody in the world who gets herself into more awkward situations than this redheaded glamour girl? With every husband, with every romance, there is trouble and good copy.

The big question around Hollywood these days is—who put the finger on Dick? Or maybe the boys in Washington have a long memory.

THE new love in Olivia de Havilland's life, the charming Frenchman, Pierre Galante, will probably be her husband by the time this reaches MODERN SCREEN.

Olivia confided to me that she wouldn't wait too long to marry Galante, who is a writer and an executive on "Match" magazine, a French publication comparable to our "Life".

I met Livvy's fiancé at a party given for Rosemary Clooney and José Ferrer. He is young, he is charming and he is desperately in love with Livvy.

She tells me that he was born under the same sign as Marcus Goodrich, her first husband, and that they both love cheesecake, but

I believe she will be happier with Galante than she was with Marcus.

Livvy seems to favor writers, but Pierre has none of Marcus' moodiness and critical appraisal of our Livvy. Besides, he has never been married before and Marcus had a number of wives.

IT CAN be told now that there were two days when Donald O'Connor was very ill in Cedars of Lebanon Hospital and his doctors feared it might be polio. Only a few people know this. Thank God, it was just tropical fever and Don will soon be well.

Added to his high temperature was an emotional upset. He worried about every little thing and telephoned me in a panic because someone had printed that his ex-wife Gwen O'Connor, had never been near him.

This was entirely untrue, because Gwen has not only been with him, but has telephoned to inquire about him almost every day. Of course, she probably didn't want to run into Marilyn Erskine, although the two girls are not unfriendly. Gwen is the one who asked Don for a divorce.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

The thing that everyone regrets so much is that Don lost his role in White Christmas. He would have been just as wonderful dancing again with Vera-Ellen as he was in Call Me Madam.

THE saddest little woman in Hollywood is Jane Withers, who fought with grim determination not to break up her marriage, but the one thing her rich husband, Bill Moss, seemed to want was his freedom.

"With three children," Jane told me, "I think it is wrong for us to divorce and I wanted to wait a little longer. But when a man wants his freedom as much as Bill does, what can I do?"

Jane's health is not good and her doctors tell her that she must rest and not get emotionally upset. How can you help getting emotionally upset when the man you love says he doesn't love you?

I SHARE the opinion of many people that Suzan Ball's faith will cure her knee if anything in the world can. She has a new doctor who has put her on a special diet. I hear this is a new treatment for this kind of case.

Also, Suzan is in love. Dick Long is courting her, but she won't marry anyone until she is sure she is all right. Suzan is that kind of girl.

PERSONAL OPINIONS: In my opinion, Deborah Kerr was trying to disguise her personality on a TV program when she answered the question, "Are you from Hollywood?" with "Unfortunately, yes." I don't think she meant a slam at Hollywood...

I still can't see James Mason as Judy Garland's co-star in A Star Is Born. Maybe I'm remembering Fredric March's great performance with Janet Gaynor too vividly...

Even with Jeanne Crain's pretty legs, I can't stand the knee-short skirts. So far, Jeanne is the only glamour girl to fall for the Dior fad.

Kinda cute, the way Tony Curtis, who has never been a fast boy with a dollar, cut loose with the bankroll and bought himself a new $6000 car and Janet Leigh a diamond bracelet, after U-I upped his salary in a big, big way.

Rosemary Clooney and José Ferrer are denying the stork rumors now, but I'm betting Rosie will have a baby as soon as possible. She loves children.

Took myself to Del Mar, the little racetrack where "the turf meets the surf," for my birthday and really had a time!

It was also Lucille Ball's birthday and after the last race, Desi Arnaz tossed a surprise birthday party for Lucy in the Turf Club.

Poor Lucille! She was so sick she could remain just long enough for the guests to sing "Happy Birthday" and then she had to take off for home. It wasn't anything too serious with Lucille. She was just tired and overworked and a reaction set in when she went on her holiday.

But I was feeling in fine fettle and got such a kick out of little Desirée Arnaz, looking like a doll in her blue dress and coat, warbling a special "Happy Birthday" to me.

I just can't remember having more fun. Jimmy Durante—just love that man—was on hand at my birthday party at the Del Mar hotel and he sang and sang. The crowd didn't want to let him off, but he finally said it was enough. Then pretty May Wynn, the former Copacabana chorus girl who got the plum part of the season as the only girl in The Caine Mutiny, came on and delighted everyone with Jimmy McHugh's song, "I Can't Believe That You're In Love With Me". Wait until you see May. I think you'll agree she's going to be one of our big stars.

Glamorous Elaine Stewart drove down from Beverly Hills with her fella, Johnny Grant, especially for my party. Some of the columnists have been insisting this isn't a serious romance. I don't agree. In fact, I think Elaine and Johnny may surprise everyone, including her MGM bosses, by marrying when he returns from staging his disc jockey show in Korea.

Johnny told me, "I'm very much in love with Elaine. She's the only girl for me."

To switch from romance back to the races—the next day Betty Grable's and Harry James' nag, Big Noise, won the $40,000 feature race.

A wag said, "Betty's horses seem to know when she isn't working and they always seem to win when she can use the moola."

HERE'S hoping the trouble between Gloria De Haven and her wealthy bridegroom of just a few months, Martin Kimmel, isn't serious.

I get it straight that Kimmel's family, veddy, veddy social, never approved of his marriage to Gloria because she is an actress. Thought that sort of attitude went out with the dodo bird.

At this writing, the Kimmels have not yet received Gloria, but I hope they will change their minds. She's a very nice girl.

LATE NEWS FROM LOUELLA PARSONS

■ Hardly had the public heard about the Ida Lupino-Howard Duff separation (supposedly a result of Howard's interest in Gussie Moran, famous for her lace panties and her tennis game) when it was all over.

My telephone rang and a happy Ida said, "Howard and I want you to know we've reconciled."

By this time, Gussie was in Buffalo with her fiancé, Edward Hand, and Howard hadn't heard from her. Gussie had a small part in The Bigamist, written and produced by Collier Young, Ida's ex-husband, and directed by Ida. Howard and Ida were both in the picture, as was Joan Fontaine, Young's present wife.

Ida, like any woman in love, took much of the blame for the separation, saying, "I guess I was too self-centered and too involved in my career. Now I'm just going to be a wife and mother and I'm going to let somebody else direct The Story Of A Cop, Howard's next picture. A career, to my way of thinking, should never interfere with a marriage."

She added that Howard's big complaint was that they never saw each other.

IT's a lot of stuff and nonsense that Janet Leigh's swim scene in Prince Valiant is as nude as Hedy Lamarr was in Ecstasy or as Marilyn Monroe was on the calendar.

Janet tells me, "I have to admit that the scene makes me look as though I were in my birthday suit! As a matter of fact, I'm quite well covered in a bathing suit made of a flesh-colored net material."

"However, after I did the scene, I flatly refused to let the still cameramen snap pictures of me—because I have no intention of becoming this kind of calendar girl."

Janet says that when the swimming scene was shot, the only men present were the cameramen, director and Bob Wagner, all vitally necessary to the action.

No, Tony Curtis did not kick up a fuss. But it is not his favorite screen appearance of his pretty wife.

LOUELLA PARSONS' good news

FUNNY story back of how Johnnie Ray's movie career at 20th got "hot" after being very, very "cold."

After the studio signed the cry-singer, he managed to get quite a bit of bad publicity in various parts of the country, and he made tactless remarks at the time of his separation from Marilyn Morrison Ray.

It had been all set for the weeper to be in Ethel Merman's There's No Business Like Show Business until all this came up. Then, without any fuss or bother, it was agreed it might be better to let Ray sit out his contract.

But boss Darryl Zanuck was summoned to Washington to be a dinner guest of President Eisenhower at the White House. By coincidence, Ray was singing in a local theatre the same week.

Darryl had never seen Ray perform and having a bit of idle time on his hands, he decided to drop by the theatre just as Johnnie's act went on.

Result? The boss thought the "cry-Ray-by" was just terrific and telephoned 20th that his contract was very much "alive" again.

THE LETTER BOX: Mrs. P. M. J., of Kansas City, wants to know if the movie stars spank their children or discipline them by the more "progressive" methods. Screen star parents are just like private-life parents on this score, Mrs. P. M. J. Some believe in mild spankings (Joan Crawford, for one). Others adhere to the "progressive" school of thought.

Doris Waterstram, Johnstown, Pa., is a strong rooter for Richard Carlson, "that fine gentleman and actor" who, she feels, doesn't get his share of good screen parts.

Marlene Oechsner, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, writes: "I believe that Jane Powell and Gene Nelson cannot possibly know the terrific disillusionment their actions have brought to the teen-agers of this country."

I haven't been printing service men's addresses lately, but I couldn't resist the plea of two who say, "We are probably the two most unknown people in Korea, as far as receiving mail is concerned." We can't have that, so write to:

And to his buddy, PFC Robert G. Larue RA13425501, same address.

The quiet Wayne marriage exploded into court last summer and hasn't left the headlines yet. Now after months of trial by rumor, Duke can answer back.

the big guy takes the stand

BY SANDY CUMMINGS

■ Barring a last minute out-of-court settlement, Hollywood and the public are going to be treated, on October 19, to one of the toughest, roughest legal battles ever waged between a movie star and his wife.

John Wayne, forty-six, and his hot-tempered, excitable, thirty-year-old wife, Esperanza, are scheduled to throw the book at each other in a divorce suit that will make world-wide headlines.

These two handsome people, once so tenderly and romantically in love, now dislike each other with such violence and intensity that they are prepared to make public the most private aspects of their marital confusion.

"Chata," as Mrs. Wayne is known throughout the film colony, has charged John Wayne with beating her. That charge is already part of the public record.

So, too, is Duke Wayne's denial. "I have never in my life struck Mrs. Wayne," the actor testified in court last May. "But there have been many times," he continued, "when I have had to protect myself from her temper. I've held her hands and feet but only to protect myself."

When Wayne made that statement in court, his wife, sitting next to her lawyer, suddenly crimsoned. "Why! That's a lie," she blurted out.

Spectators smiled. The picture of Duke Wayne, six feet, four inches tall, weighing 200 pounds, protecting himself from Chata, five feet, seven and 135 pounds, conjured up such a comic scene, that several of the more uninhibited people in the courtroom were startled into laughter.

There is no doubt (Continued on page 76)

First, there's a TRIANGLE composed of three big stars... Ginger Rogers as a glamorous Broadway actress; Paul Douglas as a producer and Ginger's last year's hubby; William Holden as a playwright and Ginger's this year's hobby. Then I step in and throw the whole thing into a QUADRANGLE! WOW!"

SPECIAL TO MODERN SCREEN:

hollywood report

by Mike Connolly

famous columnist for
The Hollywood Reporter

LONG HUNCHES:

Gene Nelson's best friends, Gordon and Sheila MacRae and Marge and Gower Champion, deserted him when he left his Miriam for Jane Powell. They're sticking by Miriam's side . . . And Jess Barker's pals have deserted him because of that black eye he gave Susan Hayward . . . I've got a feeling Ingrid Bergman will give up her fight to obtain the custody of daughter Pia. Ingrid is completely surrounded by children, now—her own brood of four, including Roberto Rossellini's son by a former marriage, plus what Ingrid describes as "family children," which category includes Roberto's brothers' and sisters' children . . . Her studio fears that Rita Hayworth's romantic interest in Dick Haymes will harm her career.

Shirley Temple, back in Hollywood, tells us she wants to remain "just a housewife." It may be just an attempt to find out whether her fans want her back on the screen or not, but this is what Shirley told me about family life and housekeeping: "I'd rather be doing this than anything I know. I've found great happiness in my marriage and in running my home" . . . Of all the critical raves for From Here To Eternity, the lion's share went to Frank Sinatra. Frankie Boy should never have to wait in another nightclub after his performance in this fine movie . . . Ann Blyth asked that the newshounds let up for a while. "We had so much publicity during our courtship and at the time of our marriage," Annie explains.

Temple

Lawford

WHO'S MAD AT WHOM:

Judy Holliday's husband was reportedly looking down his nose at the many, many public—and private—huddles Judy and Pete

Lawford were having concerning the staging of their nightclub act . . . The noise when Gloria Grahame and Cy Howard broke up was almost as loud as the Susie Hayward-Jess Barker bust-up, the difference being that Gloria and Cy were back together again next day . . . Their friends were pulling for the John and Patti Derek marriage to hold together, and this just before the new baby was due! . . . Joan Crawford is sore at the person who gave out the story that Joan herself doesn't sing the songs in her new picture, Torch Song. As a matter of fact, it wasn't Joan's voice when the picture went out for its first sneak preview—it was that of a new singer named India Adams. Next thing we knew, Joan had asked studio boss Dore Schary if he would let Joan re-dub it, this time with her own voice, and as we go to press I don't know whose pipes have been decided on, Joan's or India's.

Just before they separated, John Carroll and his wife, casting director Lucille Ryman, tossed a gigantic "breakup party" to which 300 guests were invited . . . Gossip is that Bette Davis' poor health is not being improved by the return from Europe of her ex, William Grant Sherry.

Davis

ODDS BODKINS:

Bob Taylor cabled a birthday bouquet from abroad to his ex, Barbara Stanwyck . . . And once a year Bill Holden sends roses to this same Missy Stanwyck because she once upon a time insisted that he co-star with her in Golden Boy . . . Linda Christian, Ty Power's spouse, has three astrologers: one in Hollywood, one in Mexico City, one in Rome . . . Paulette Goddard's Switzerland home is a diamond's throw away from her ex, Charlie Chaplin's. (Continued on page 20)

Mrs. Lily Rekas of Connecticut may be a hardworking wife and mother, but she's also a very attractive woman.

"I wash 9000 pieces of glassware a year... but I'm proud of my pretty hands!"

When Lily Rekas lifts a glass to toast her husband, he can see that her hands are as soft and pretty as a bride's.

Yet those hands have to wash thousands of glasses a year. (And so do yours!)

Detergents make lighter work for Lily. Detergent suds really melt away dirt and grease. But — those suds can also take away the natural oils and youthful softness of your hands!

How does Lily keep her hands so nice? She never forgets this simple step. After detergents or any harsh cleanser—pure, white Jergens Lotion goes right on her hands.

Being liquid, Jergens penetrates instantly (doesn't merely "coat" skin). In seconds, it helps replace softening moisture hands need.

It has two ingredients doctors use for softening. And women use much more Jergens Lotion than any other hand care in the world.

You ought to see Lily's lovely hands. They're two of the best reasons for remembering Jergens Lotion!

So keep on using detergents, and keep on using Jergens Lotion. You can tell your husband about your hard work — but don't ever let him feel it in your soft and pretty hands.

Use JERGENS LOTION — avoid detergent hands

Now—lotion dispenser FREE of extra cost with $1.00 size. Supply limited.

Laraine Day listed herself as "Housewife" while paying a $5 traffic ticket . . . Aldo Ray left Del Mar with $237 for the Daily Double.

HOME FIRES BURNING:

Audie Murphy hopes the March stork arrival will be a girl . . . Janet Leigh was working on the set of Prince Valiant when Tony Curtis came back home from Honolulu. Janet's director, Henry Hathaway, gave her the day off, explaining that he wanted Janet and Tony to "catch up" . . . Whenever Ginger Rogers and Jacques Bergerac are invited to a dinner party, Ginger insists on being seated next to her groom. It's love, kiddies . . . When you ring the bell at Yvonne De Carlo's below-the-road cottage in Coldwater Canyon she sticks her head out the window and hollers. "Come on down but watch out for rattlesnakes!" And y'know something funny—there's something about those dark canyon roads that may mean she ain't kiddin'! . . . Loretta Young and Tom Lewis celebrated their Lucky Thirteenth wedding anniversary.

Rogers and Bergerac

Newlywed Rosemary Clooney is miffed already that spouse José Ferrer doesn't have enough time to be as domestic as she'd like him to be . . . Dinah Shore flew back from an eastern trip in one plane, George Montgomery in another. They never fly together, which is insurance for the children—just in case . . . A recording company asked Katie Grayson to record an album of lullabies with her five-year-old Patty Kate—and Katie says she's willing if Patty is!

FINANCIAL PAGE:

Bing Crosby, in trying to sell his Beverly Hills mansion for $300,000, didn't get many nibbles because it takes a staff of five to run the estate properly . . . Alan Ladd and Kirk Douglas hoped to return from making pictures in Europe with $1,000,000 apiece; because of the Government's action on stars spending eighteen months abroad, they'll be lucky if they make $200,000 apiece. But that, of course, ain't hay! . . . Ann Sheridan has been trying to sell her house, too. It cost her $125,000 originally, plus $3,000 a month to run it . . . Guy Madison signed a contract to make five more pictures for Warners, in addition to Feather River and Rear Guard, at $100,000 each, that's how hot he is! And Jack Palance, who couldn't get a job eighteen months ago, is now getting $50,000 per picture. He should thank Joan Crawford every day of his life for insisting that he be her leading man in Sudden Fear . . . New York's Hotel Pierre offered Van Johnson $3,500 a week to do his nightclub act in its Cotillion Room . . . The Betty Grable-Harry James deal to play the Chicago Theatre in Chicago is for seventy cents of every dollar taken in at the box office. The Shuberts are after Betty, too, to star in their stage revival of Ziegfeld Follies while Harry leads the band.

Palance

You may spare yourself and your family a long siege of colds. That is also true of sore throats due to colds.

Kills Germs on Throat Surfaces

Listerine fights infections as an infection should be fought . . . with quick, germ-killing action.

Listerine Antiseptic reaches way back on throat surfaces to kill millions of germs, including those called "secondary invaders" (see panel above).

These are the very bacteria that often are responsible for so much of a cold's misery when they stage a mass invasion of the body through throat tissues. Listerine Antiseptic attacks them on these surfaces

Kills germs like these way back on throat surfaces

- (1) Pneumococcus Type III, (2) Hemophilus influenzae,
(3) Streptococcus pyogenes, (4) Pneumococcus Type II,
(5) Streptococcus salivarius.

These, and other "secondary invaders," as well as germ-types not shown, can be quickly reduced in number by the Listerine Antiseptic gargle.

Fewer Colds for Listerine Users

Remember that tests made over a 12-year period showed that regular twice-a-day users of Listerine had fewer colds and generally milder ones, and fewer sore throats than non-users.

PICTURE OF THE MONTH

THE ROBE The long-awaited Technicolor version of Lloyd C. Douglas' famous novel is a movie milestone in which 20th Century-Fox has unveiled its new super-wide CinemaScope process for the first time. Heading the all-star cast is Richard Burton as Marcellus, the young Roman officer assigned to the Crucifixion. Having incurred the hatred of the Emperor's son Caligula (Jay Robinson), over the purchase of the Greek slave Demetrius (Victor Mature), Marcellus is sent to garrison duty in Jerusalem while Caligula takes the opportunity to make advances to Marcellus' fiancée (Jean Simmons). Marcellus and Demetrius arrive in the Holy City on Passover eve, witnessing the Messiah's entrance into Jerusalem. Demetrius is converted to the new religion, but Marcellus is contemptuous, gambles for Jesus' robe on Golgotha. When he puts it on he becomes violently conscious of his guilt and feels he has gone mad. Demetrius picks up the robe and escapes. Returning to Rome, Marcellus finds that the "bewitched" robe has become a symbol, is ordered to find and destroy it. But Marcellus himself is converted, and with the disciple Peter (Michael Rennie), witnesses the torture and death of Demetrius and his miraculous resurrection. CinemaScope, by the way, is neither 3-D nor just wide screen. It is a wide angle on a curved screen combined with three-dimensional sound for a new kind of realism. No goggles.

THE CADDY In case you've wondered how Martin and Lewis teamed up, The Caddy will tell you. You see, Jerry's father was a golf champ. Jerry could have been one, too, it crowds didn't panic him, and if every time he eyed the ball the ball didn't wink. Martin's father owned a fishing boat, but a glass of water could make Martin seasick. It was inevitable Martin would meet Lewis. Martin's sister (Barbara Bates) was engaged to him. Jerry persuaded Martin to enter golf tournaments. Lewis caddied and was always left holding the bag. Martin got invited to swank parties; Lewis got the gate—watchdogs pursued him, butlers snubbed him. But whenever Lewis fell on his face, or into a swimming pool, there was always a little fat man standing about three feet away, helpless with laughter. You ought to be in show business, he kept saying. And it was this little fat man who put them there, that is, according to The Caddy, whose cast includes Donna Reed, Fred Clark, Clinton Sundberg and Romo Vincent.—Para.

GIVE A GIRL A BREAK When a star turns prima donna and walks out on a Broadway musical, what are you going to do? "Give a girl a break," says Gower Champion, director and co-star of said musical. Next day the theatre's flooded with anxiety-ridden hopefuls, among whom are Debbie Reynolds, Marge Champion and Helen Wood. These three are great but they can't all fit into one costume. Gower is with Marge, Bob Fosse—general assistant and coffee runner—lapses into a coma over Debbie, and composer Kurt Kasznar turns calf-eyes toward ballerina Helen Wood. Colorful dances, based on daydreams of love and glory enter here. The Champions float against a backdrop out of the Modern Museum; Debbie and Bob break up a jungle of bright balloons and Kurt, uncomfortable in fuchsia tights, hurlesques a pas de deux with swan-like Helen Wood. Ira Gershwin wrote the lyrics to music by Burton Lane. And Stanley Donen directed.—M-G-M.

The deep secret of Dry Skin care

by Rosemary Hall
BEAUTY AUTHORITY

There's no mystery about the problems of dry skin. The flakiness, the "grainy" look it gives make-up, and the little dry lines that hint of wrinkles are all too familiar to many of us. The puzzle is why more women don't learn how lovely dry skin can be.

Dry skin, with proper care, is apt to be far more delicate-looking, clearer of blackheads, enlarged pores and blemishes than any other type. And the finest care I can recommend is a single cream so effective that a five-minute application really gets results—Woodbury Dry Skin Cream.

The secret of Woodbury Dry Skin Cream's success is literally a "deep" one. All face creams, naturally, contain softening ingredients, but many simply grease the surface of the skin.

Woodbury, however, also contains an exclusive ingredient called Penaten which carries the lanolin and four other rich softening oils deep into the important corneum layer of your skin.

5-minute facial—that really works

Smooth rich Woodbury Dry Skin Cream into your skin with gentle upward strokes. Leave it on for 5 minutes, then tissue off. Your mirror will reflect a fresher, more youthful look than you've had in years. Penaten helps the oils penetrate so quickly that five minutes does the trick—provided you do it faithfully every day. And if you'll act now while the sale lasts, you can get the big $1.00 size Woodbury Dry Skin Cream for only 69¢ plus tax—so little for such priceless results!

Eleanor Parker
writes a
"thank you"
note

Eleanor Parker

Dear Helen—
Thanks for saying I looked nice in my latest picture! And I'll report, since you ask, that I use Woodbury Cold Cream. It has an ingredient called Penaten (exclusively Woodbury's) which makes the cream penetrate deeply into pore openings and loosen every particle of hidden dirt. I find Woodbury cleanses and softens more thoroughly than any cream I ever used. (And now the dollar size is only 69¢!) Try it. You'll find Woodbury Cold Cream leaves your skin so fresh and soft. Thanks again. Eleanor

THE STAND AT APACHE RIVER Most pictures starring Stephen McNally seem pretty good to me. The Stand at Apache River is a tense, exciting western. It concerns only the siege of an inn at a stage-coach stop by a band of Apaches. But what emerges amid the violence and terror are several effective if somewhat sketchy portraits. There's the Colonel, Hugh Marlowe. Killing Apaches amounts to a disease with him, giving you more than a glimmer of how corruption turns power into evil. Pitted against Marlowe is McNally, a sheriff. He also stands for power, which he tries to temper with reason. Even so, his reason often explodes into self-righteous wrath and he has the muscle to back it. Among the women, Julia Adams is more or less a sweet, brave thing, but Jaclynne Greene, the innkeeper's wife, is a bitter, frightened person who deteriorates rapidly under pressure. This isn't 3-D, for which you'll be thankful when the arrows start whizzing by. Technicolor—U.I.

LITTLE FUGITIVE As any psychologist will tell you, it isn't easy to be somebody's kid brother. Especially when you are about six years old and big shot and his friends think you're nothing but a pest. Little Fugitive started out as a study of a couple of siblings caught in Brooklyn, but what it turned into was a day at Coney Island. If you've never been to Coney, this will be instructive. Big shot (Ricky Brewster) sprinkles ketchup on his chest and falls down. His kid brother (Richie Andrusco—and that is a darling boy) has a gun in his hand, so he thinks he has committed murder. He runs away, via the subway, and has a ball at the amusement park with everybody accepting his dough and no questions asked. Big brother repents, finds him on the beach and takes him home again, not much the worse for wear. But it will come out on the analyst's couch some day, don't worry. Where was Mama? Out visiting a sick relative. Ray Ashley and Morris Engel produced Little Fugitive. What it lacks in professional polish is made up in eager intensity.

THE ALL-AMERICAN All-American Tony Curtis quits football the day his parents are killed en route to a game. His father had wanted him to be an architect, so he picks up a scholarship to an Ivy League school. He belongs in that place the way Marilyn Monroe belongs at Radcliffe. Richard Long, whose father (Donald Randolph) owns most of the school and possibly the entire United States, would like Tony to pack up his pinstripe suit and leave. He is not alone in this desire—until Tony clymb into his cleats and knee-guards to heap glory on alma mater. Pretty soon you can't tell Richard Long from an alcoholic, he's that depressed about democracy in action. Anyway, Long passes out in a beer-joint under the guidance of his off-limits sweetheart, Mamie Van Doren. When Tony tries to save Richard from himself, Mamie opens a beer bottle on his head. The eve of the big game, too. Want to bet Tony plays in that game? Richard, too. Cast includes Lori Nelson, Gregg Palmer, Herman Hickman—U.I.

DEVIL'S CANYON Five hundred men and a girl (Virginia Mayo) are serving time together in the Yuma Territorial Prison, a prison that makes Sing Sing look like heaven. Virginia has it easy—she works in the hospital. But Stephen McNally, a brutal killer, Dale Robertson, who shot McNally's brothers in self-defense and 498 other prisoners, including Arthur Hunnicutt, aren't ecstatic. The warden (Robert Keith) is okay, but the chief guard (Jay C. Flippen) is slightly sadistic. He figures it's a good day when three or four prisoners expire on the rock pile. He doesn't like Dale. Neither does McNally, who throws a knife at him in the mess hall. Well, McNally and Mayo plan a break, and McNally is bent on turning all the inmates in the direction of Yuma, trusting they will lift the lid off that town. He, personally, will lift the lid off Dale Robertson. But you know what happens to the best laid plans. Naturally, this is in Technicolor and 3-D.—RKO.

THE DIAMOND QUEEN Fernando Lamas' old man (Richard Hale) shatters a diamond he's cutting for the crown of Louis XIV. Gilbert Roland throws senior to the guards, but takes junior to India. India is rife with diamonds. India also has a jungle, in the middle of which is a pool, in the middle of which is, of all people, Arlene Dahl. She's bathing. Arlene is Queen of the Nepalese who are currently dying of thirst. It hasn't rained out that way since the diamond eye of their goddess was stolen. To get it back, Arlene will marry Sheldon Leonard, the Great Mogul. He promised it to her for a wedding gift. Give me the diamond, says Fernando to Mogul, and I'll give you France's secret weapon, so you can conquer India. Sure, says the Mogul, much to Arlene's displeasure. That Mogul gets blown to kingdom come during an impromptu demonstration. But Arlene never liked him, anyway. Sujato and Asoka revive interest with their Indian dances. Technicolor.—Warners.

THE MOONLIGHTER A lynching mob breaks into jail to hang Fred MacMurray for "moonlighting" (rustling cattle after dark) but they nab some poor critter instead and MacMurray rides back to Barbara Stanwyck. Not that she wants him. You're bad, Wes, bad, she tells him. I don't want no part of you. I and your kid brother are going to be married. Kid brother is a hulking young fellow in his thirties (William Ching) who works in a bank and is dying to rob it. MacMurray and Ward Bond give him the opportunity. Danged if Stanwyck isn't sworn into the posse to track 'im down. Time she catches up to Mac he's pretty disgusted. He didn't want to be a "moonlighter." He did want to get even with the lynchers, which vengeance he effected by lassoing a few of them and dragging them over the rocks behind his horse. But somebody forced him into this sordid life. Somebody's initials are B.S. who urged him to get off the farm and make something of himself!—Warners.

THE GOLDEN BLADE Picture Bagdad in Technicolor—the bazaars, the palaces, the rabble rousers in the square shouting their lungs out. Unrest, you see. The Princess Khairuzan (Piper Laurie) and her pop, the Caliph, (Edgar Barrier) are being plotted against by the chief minister (George Macready) and his sub-normal son (Gene Evans). Nobody counted on Rock Hudson to come galloping in, brandishing the Sword of Damascus, a golden blade which hacks through iron like nobody's business. The blade has magic powers, and it's always falling into the wrong hands at the most crucial moments. It finally gets plunged into a stone wall at the palace and the legend goes that he who would rule must unsheathe it. Plenty of blood is spilled meanwhile; there's an old fashioned joust and enough plots and counter-plots to make you dizzy—but not bored. The Golden Blade has a delightful Arabian Nights flavor.—U-I.

INFERNO Bob Ryan was just another millionaire until his wife (Rhonda Fleming) and a clean-cut chap named William Lundigan left him in a western desert to rot. It isn't really murder, is it? Rhonda asks Lundigan who has been studiously covering up their tracks and throwing evidence all over the Rocky Mountains to make it look like accidental suicide. It's murder, says Lundigan, the realist, but he overlooks one thing: Robert Ryan is not about to die, even though he's perched like an eagle in an aerie with nothing but a broken leg and a canteen of water to occupy his mind. When he realizes what his treacherous bride has in her mind he leaps—or limps—into action. Displaying all the ingenuity of a caveman with a 20th century brain, he gets the devil out of that wasteland. How he does it is what makes this picture. Watch out for the snake—it'll leap right into your popcorn.—20th Century-Fox.

RECOMMENDED FILMS NOW PLAYING

FROM HERE TO ETERNITY (Col.): A brilliant portrait of Army lives and loves adapted from James Jones' best seller. Excellent performances by Montgomery Clift, Frank Sinatra, Burt Lancaster, Deborah Kerr and Donna Reed.

GENTLEMEN PREFER BLONDES (20th-Fox): Marilyn Monroe and Jane Russell in tights and Technicolor as Anita Loos' uninhibited gals with diamonds on their minds. Also involved: Charles Coburn, Tommy Noonan, Elliott Reed.

LATIN LOVERS (M-G-M): Lana Turner doesn't know what to do with all her money and can't decide whether to let millionaire John Lund or masterful Latin Ricardo Montalban help her out. Technicolor.

THE BAND WAGON (M-G-M): Fred Astaire and Cyd Charisse team for top-notch dancing in this above-average musical; delightful songs and a lot of Technicolored fun with Oscar Levant, Nanette Fabray and Jack Buchanan.

ISLAND IN THE SKY (Warners): John Wayne and a crew of Army pilots are downed in a Greenland snowstorm; Colonel Walter Abel makes a desperate attempt to locate the lost men before their supplies run out.

EAST OF SUMATRA (U-I): Jeff Chandler, Marilyn Maxwell, and Suzan Ball get involved in a South Sea tussle with native chieftain Anthony Quinn over a tin mine. When the engineers find their supplies cut off they decide to settle matters by duel with flaming torches and daggers. Technicolor.

After seven years of trying,

"It just didn't work"

BY ALICE FINLETTER

■ A tall young actor was sitting in his room in the Hotel Sherry-Netherland looking down on New York's Central Park.

His name was Jeff Chandler, and he had come to the big city to do promotion work for a film, The Great Sioux Uprising, in which he was playing the lead.

This thirty-four-year-old giant with the deep bass voice and the prematurely grey hair should have been happy. After all, this was his home town. This was the return of the native, a classic example of the local boy who had made good to the tune of almost $3,000 a week.

Only Jeff wasn't happy. He had just finished speaking to his wife in Hollywood, and Marge hadn't changed her mind. She wanted a divorce. No hurry about it, but after seven years of trying, they both knew it was hopeless. Divorce was the answer.

Jeff got up and paced his room, and as he did, a soul-searing realization overwhelmed him—the more successful his career, the less successful his marriage.

In seven years he had worked his way up from nothing to full-fledged stardom, and in those same seven years his marriage had deteriorated (Continued on page 81)

THE SHOCKING FAILURE OF SUSAN HAYWARD'S MARRIAGE

by Louella Parsons

■ She had been in hiding for the few days after the story of their startlingly sudden separation broke. When she came in, I noticed she was trying to keep one side of her face away from me.

"Susie, darling, don't do that," I said, "I already know about that black eye Jess gave you. Don't you know, by now, that you don't have to keep anything from me? I'm your friend."

Suddenly, she was in my arms, not crying or sobbing, but holding me tight, just as she used to do when she was one of my little starlets on our stage road tour and someone had hurt her feelings.

No, she was not crying as I patted her shoulder, because she was past that stage. The tears had dried up long before this, or else they were dropping back inside instead of spilling down her face.

That poor eye. So discolored and swollen. The whole side of her face was puffed, distorting one of the loveliest faces in the world.

It was as though an artist with a misplaced sense of drama had made one side of a woman's face perfect and the other bruised and discolored.

The girl I have known and been fond of for so many years sat down and started talking almost in the middle of her story, as though the deep hurt were crowding to come out.

"We had been quarreling, and I saw he was going to slap me. He had slapped me many times, but this time I could tell it was going to be worse.

"His face was so distorted with rage I knew he had lost control of himself. I knew I was in great physical danger.

"I was brought up in a tough section of Brooklyn and I've seen men get drunk on their pay nights and beat up their wives, but it was nothing like this.

"He went after my face and I kept running from him, first all over the house and then down by the swimming pool where he caught me."

In a voice so low I had to lean close to hear her, she told me how he beat her unmercifully, blacking both eyes and bruising her body. Susan's screams brought the police to the house. Neighbors had telephoned them. (Continued on page 87)

"Hi, honey— so long, dear"

By Kirtley Baskette

The Hestons have had only one joint vacation in ten years of marriage—and even then, they read scripts.

They say goodnight on the telephone and they see each other on a movie screen —but the hectic Hestons are making their long-distance marriage work!

One lonesome evening, a dainty, brunette doll called Lydia Clarke was happily watching her favorite actor, Charlton Heston, perform Shakespeare's Macbeth on a television program. Suddenly she screamed, clapped her hands over her hazel eyes and blanked out, mercifully.

Mrs. Heston had swooned at the sight of a grisly head—unmistakably her husband's—hacked off at the neck, dripping blood and lifted up by its familiar curls before her very eyes.

Luckily, Lydia came to in time to see the man she loved taking bows with a perfectly sound Adam's apple and telling his public he hoped that they had enjoyed the show. Obviously, one of these—his wife—had not. Lydia hadn't known about the flesh colored, rubber head, carefully molded to a perfect likeness of Chuck's features for that gory touch of realism. Her big, lovable, exasperating husband had neglected to tell her about that.

Fortunately, Lydia Heston's recovery from the shock was complete, although she wasn't quite herself for days. She had time to reflect that the long distance married life of two actors left a few things to be desired. At other times, Charlton Heston has had the same misgivings.

On a recent night, for instance—this time when Chuck was in Hollywood and Lydia in New York—he put in a midnight phone call and soon heard the familiar feminine tones of his wife saying, "Hello . . . hello." But at the same time he heard an unfamiliar baritone saying the same thing. Chuck clicked the operator impatiently. "Something's wrong," he complained, "Try it again." She did; same result. Back came the wifely greeting—and the same disturbing man's voice too. Well—you know how husbands are.

"Look," barked Chuck, "I may be old fashioned—but just what the hell is a man doing in your apartment at three o'clock in the morning?"

There was, Lydia came back sharply, no man in her apartment, but obviously some obnoxious male character on her party line. "Get off!" yelled Chuck to the unknown kibitzer and was invited in colorful language to get off, himself. So all that came of that tender long distance contact was a three-cornered hassle, rising blood pressure and some sleeplessness for the Hestons.

Both Charlton and (Continued on page 83)

Chuck feels he has a lot to learn about acting, does TV and theatre work besides movies. Major ambition: to be world's greatest Macbeth.

Both Hestons like outdoor living; hope to settle down in a rustic hunting lodge on their 1300 acres in Michigan's wild north woods.

Evenings together are rare. The Hestons spend many domestic hours in railroad stations, wave anniversary greetings from separate planes.

how ever can they stay so in love?

■ To the sleepy gas station attendant, the slim figure rapping at his glass door looked like some little girl lost. It was plenty past midnight in Hollywood and he'd seen her scurry across Sunset Boulevard from the darkened front of Schwab's Drug Store. Her round, brown eyes under the blonde, bun-tucked hair looked anxiously troubled, and he thought, "Some dame who got ditched by her date after a hassle."

So when she said, "May I use your telephone?" he just grunted, "Help yourself," and went back to the race track results. But he looked up again when she told the operator, "New York, please," and started feeding half-dollars into the slot as if it were a Las Vegas one-arm bandit.

You couldn't blame him for eavesdropping a bit after that but he didn't hear much. Just this girl telling some Joe across the country, that she loved him and couldn't sleep until she heard (Continued on page 60)

Marilyn has traded Hollywood for the north woods—but just till her new picture is finished. Now she's sitting on fences instead of cushions, wearing blue jeans, and falling into rivers!

by Richard Moore

■ Wrapped in blue jeans instead of marabou, Marilyn Monroe was camping in Jasper National Park with the rest of those who were working on River Of The Sun. No matter how Marilyn is costumed, she doesn't look as though she belonged in the north woods. As a matter of fact, although she'd surely look more natural in southern California, she doesn't seem to notice where she is, just now.

For Marilyn Monroe is the most married girl you've ever seen!

For months, everybody has been reading about Marilyn's romance with Joe DiMaggio. Would she marry him? Wouldn't she?

Here's the answer to that. This is a girl in a dream. True, she's wrapped up in her career. So wrapped up that when a visitor arrived on the location scene, he found her pacing back and forth between takes muttering lines. She looked up, caught his eye, said, "When did you get back?" and kept right on pacing and rehearsing.

Later she sat down with him to talk it over. "There may be a surprise for you on the train tonight," he told her, repeating the rumor he had heard (Continued on page 80)

love begins at 30

■ During Ava Gardner's playgirl period, before she had become the second Mrs. Frank Sinatra, she frolicked in a Hollywood night club with that perennial escort of beautiful women, Peter Lawford.

Ava danced with verve and abandon and grace. She sang as she danced, and occasionally her lips would break into a wide smile as Lawford whispered sweet nothings. Back at her table, she imbibed freely, chain-smoked, greeted friends with warmth and delight; in short, she appeared to be a classic Hollywood Sybarite.

One man, a wise old MGM executive sitting in a corner booth with his wife, wasn't fooled. "You see Ava Gardner?" he asked. The wife nodded.

"There," said the old man, "sits the most mixed-up girl in Hollywood. This one," he went on, "doesn't know whether she feels sad or glad."

"A very beautiful girl," the wife of the MGM executive said. "In fact, the most beautiful girl here."

The studio executive nodded slowly. "Unfortunately," he said, "it's all exterior beauty. All on the face. Inside," he tapped his chest lightly, "the poor kid is bedeviled. A million little devils scurrying inside her soul. I don't think she'll get rid of them until she is thirty. Maybe not even then. Time will tell."

A few weeks ago, he was reminded of his appraisal of Miss Gardner and assured that she is thirty years old now. Does he think she is emotionally unscrambled?

The executive smiled wryly. "To begin with, Ava is now Mrs. Frank Sinatra."

Does that make so much difference?

The executive paused (Continued on page 88)

A MODERN SCREEN PHOTOGRAPHER CATCHES UP

Homesick but happy

■ In my pursuit of the Alan Ladds, I checked in at the lush and famous Banff Springs Hotel. Getting lost is a hazard in this tremendous castle-like structure which can accommodate 1200 people. Although it was dwarfed by the huge peaks of year-round-snow-capped Mount Rundel, this place is busier than Times Square on a Friday before a long weekend. Eventually, with the aid of a college student—one of a couple of hundred employed during the tourist season—I made the mile-long trek to my room. There, on the door, was a sign that read:

"Bert: We're waiting for you. Please get in touch."

When I went downstairs, I found the Alan Ladds in a beautiful oak-paneled room, having dinner with the hotel manager and his friends. Sue threw her arms around me and exclaimed, "Golly, it's good to see someone from home." Alan, right behind her, stretched out one sun-tanned paw and gave me a grip of the sort that will break three fingers unless you're braced for it.

anything can happen

■ When Lana Turner is in love, anything can happen. And it just did.

After months of rumors and counter-rumors Lana married Lex Barker at City Hall in Turin, Italy. The wedding came as a surprise in Italy, since the American Consulate had not been informed of the date in advance, as is customary overseas.

At home the wedding was a different kind of surprise. There had been no question of Lex's intentions. The superlatives Barker had used to express his admiration and affection for the 33-year-old actress are endless. Certainly a proposal from the one-time Tarzan was expected to be forthcoming the moment his divorce from Arlene Dahl was final. But nobody knew what Lana's answer would be. Nothing she does seems inevitable. In fact, she didn't know, herself, what she would do. At least, so she said. Here is a portion of a conversation she had only a few weeks ago with a (Continued on page 72)

LANZA LIVES BIG

by Marwa Peterson

■ Among the rumors you might have read about Mario Lanza, are the rumors about his home—stories that his handsome Bel Air house is equipped with gun turrets, secret trapdoors, a tremendous wine cellar, and a great, big gymnasium. All of this is interesting, if not true.

Mr. Lanza does enjoy large-scale living. But he expresses this in outsize livingroom and bedroom furniture—not in arsenals and playing fields.

The Lanza's house is a tremendous, rambling, Mediterranean-style mansion that occupies a knoll overlooking Bel Air, the swankiest residential district in Los Angeles. It is a two-story job, well concealed by lush foliage. Years ago it cost $250,000 to build.

"Few people can afford to build homes like this any more," Mario says. "The walls are at least two feet thick. We have a private patio paved with beautiful Spanish tiles. We have our own fountains, our own statuary. Really, it's out of this world."

Betty holds Damon, 8 mos, the latest Lanzo, while Mario beams proudly over his two girls, Colleen, 5, and Elliso, 3.

The Lanzas live in a casa in Bel Air—and all of their fourteen rooms overflow with children, guests and singing—and just plain happiness!

HOUSE OF THE MONTH

Muted rose sofas and gold lampshades accent the quiet, cream-colored fireplace and pale green rug; the gold motif is continued in the Chinese scroll design of the mantelpiece.

Mario's favorite combination of green and rose reappear in deeper tones in the farmol dining room. Another Lanzo favorite: the wrought iron chairs and window design.

The paneled library holds Mario's oldest, most prized possessions. Located in a remote corner of the house, it is his private haven. Only Betty is allowed in to dust and straighten up a bit.

The Spanish patio is a completely walled outdoor room, displaying a magnificent tile floor and a barbecue featuring the same tile design and supplementary gas burners.

LANZA LIVES BIG

An office is a necessity for Betty, who must supervise four servants, three highly active children, and a fourteen-room home. Her oversize desk stands at one end of the sun-porch. Note early-model Victrola: Mario's first, it has been treasured for twenty years.

The master suite, in a separate wing of the house, boasts a private stairway, two balconies, and on $1800 bed—huge, even for Hollywood, but just big enough for the Lanzas' early-morning romps with the kids.

Mario believes childhood is the time for fun, provides kids with plenty of toys. The big pink nursery adjoining the youngsters' sleeping quarters is their first try at a joint playroom for the children.

head, Betty Lanza admits that her house is beautiful. "Only," she adds, "the architect did some pretty funny and impractical things. Maybe he didn't worry about mundane matters, but he forgot to provide sufficient space for hanging clothes. This house is built on a hillside, you know, and the only level spot we could find to hang our clotheslines is under the master bedroom. Also our dressing room closet—it's only large enough for Mario's wardrobe, so I've had to use the linen closet for my things. I took out the shelves and put in some portable racks. On the whole, however, the good features of the place certainly outweigh the bad ones."

The Lanzas have had five homes since they first arrived in California, and this is the only one in which Mario has ever had a music studio where he could work without interruption. He rehearses at least two hours every day, usually from one in the afternoon to three. Many days, however, he will sing for five or six hours, then knock off, play some recordings, or watch tv. The Lanzas have three television sets in the house.

The most striking room in their house is the living room which is really a miniature concert hall. It is fifty feet long, forty feet wide, and thirty feet high. There is a dais at the far end. When the Lanzas entertain and Mario is asked to sing, he mounts this dais and gives out. Singing, of course, is the great passion of his life, and once he is sure the audience is with him, he'll go through his amazing repertoire even if the party lasts until four in the morning.

At a recent Lanza shindig, Della Russell, Andy's wife, asked Mario to sing "Song Of India." By the time the tenor had finished it, Della was crying unashamedly. Mario repeated the song four times before his father insisted upon his doing an old Neapolitan tune.

When the Lanzas first moved into their new home last fall, there was (Continued on page 70)

to all as to myself

■ It is not to my credit, religiously, (at least it isn't a clear credit) that I served as an altar boy at St. Christopher's in Baldwin, Long Island. Unfortunately, the part of my position I liked the most was the opportunity to appear before an audience. I was more the actor than the acolyte.

When sometimes, as during Holy Week, I was permitted to read to the congregation from the Gospel, I was really in my glory. And I did a good job. Just the same, it ought to be pretty evident that my piety was not all it should have been. It still isn't. But if there are hurdles I still must take, some thinking about myself I still must do to straighten out my views, I am a man of faith, if not in steady church attendance, at least in my overall view. There is a bond. I seek to be deserving of a stronger one.

As I see it, getting to be the person you should be, religiously, takes in more than just your relationship to your church. What you are to your family, to your neighbors, and to your fellow worker must match. I might add that what you are to yourself must be examined sometimes, and straightened out, if you want to do an honest job. This isn't always easy. I've had my troubles.

You can put yourself into the hands of the experts on this sort of thing, the psychiatrists and psychoanalysts, but even they will tell you that ultimately the cure rests with you; it rests on your ability to adjust to a world that is rarely as you would have it.

■ A few months ago, the spectators at an industrial league baseball game in California's San Fernando Valley saw that one of the pitchers was blowing up. And they knew why. Seated among the crowd in the crude, wooden stand behind home plate was a young girl who was riding him expertly. "What's the matter?" she would call. "Just because you're cute can't you put the ball over?"

Ever since she had arrived, in jeans and light pullover, people had turned to each other and speculated about her identity. In her attire and manner she was like any of a dozen other girls present, yet everyone agreed that her face was familiar—they had seen her somewhere before. The girl resembled the third baseman on one of the teams, and it was apparent that she was rooting for his side. Several innings passed before everybody found out who she was. Word got around after some old men, retired gaffers who came daily to smoke their pipes and watch the games, were heard speaking to her. "Been watchin' ya, Debbie, while you were away," they said. "Been seein' how you been doin' in the movies."

Debbie Reynolds, after a round of personal appearances through South America and a season of playing summer theatre in the middlewest and southwest, was back home in Burbank and again fitting happily into the ways of the community she loved.

"Oh, you robber!" she screamed at the umpire, as he called a questionable strike on her brother Bill, who was playing for the Burbank Blues against the Blanchard Lumber Nine.

"That's the old Debbie," murmured one of the oldsters approvingly. "That's tellin' him. You hain't forgot your baseball."

Debbie "hain't forgot" more than her baseball. She "hain't forgot" her old friends, her Girl Scout activities, the taste of a double root beer float at Bob's Drive-In around the corner from her home, her mother's sewing room where she always got in her mother's way—and still does—and a thousand and one other warm elements of her girlhood. Riding high in glamourland, where the pitfalls, both social and professional, are as deep as the heights are dizzy, she is so heart-tied to the old and beloved associations of her youth that new ones—the kind that so often trip up a young star—have no undue attraction for her.

As one of her old school friends puts it: "Debbie hasn't pulled a 'boo-boo' yet and she isn't going to. Hollywood isn't going to get her because Burbank's got her!" (Continued on page 62)

AUDREY HEPBURN

She is the most exciting new star of 1953—and here is her own story, told in her own words to JANE WILKIE

■ Everything Hollywood has ever accomplished, all the actors it has ever discovered, all the pictures it has produced, have been 'sensational', 'terrific' and 'colossal'. The words have been used so often that by now nobody listens to them.

So when Hollywood got its first look at Audrey Hepburn on the screen, in Roman Holiday, the press was left without suitable adjectives. It was necessary, and accurate, to describe this new, young actress in the most complimentary terms, but somehow the correct words sounded empty. She is truly great, but the critics who saw the press preview agreed it was going to be difficult to convince the public that Miss Hepburn is that magnificent.

After the showing was over, the editors present immediately began to plan Audrey Hepburn stories, certain that the minute Roman Holiday was released to the public, there would be a surge of curiosity about her. The next morning, Paramount's publicity department was swamped with questions. Where did Audrey Hepburn come from? What was she like? Was she under contract? What did she eat for breakfast? Was she married?

They didn't know a great deal. She had been born near Brussels and educated in England. She had studied ballet, and she had played the title role in the Broadway production of Gigi. Her performance drew rave reviews. The show had toured the United States, and William Wyler had contracted her for Roman Holiday, to be made in Rome. Before Miss Hepburn was whisked away to eastern cities and eventually to Italy, Paramount publicists managed to learn enough about her to write a brief biography. Unfortunately, Miss Hepburn was not available for interviews. She was in England and would not return to Hollywood until September, when she would star in Sabrina Fair.

This was a disappointment to everyone, MODERN SCREEN included. Roman Holiday would be released in September, and everybody would want to know all about Audrey Hepburn, at once.

MODERN SCREEN had an idea, though. "It must be done, and there's a way to do it. Tape an interview and send it to her in England, and with Paramount's cooperation, she will tape record her answers and send them back."

So over at Paramount studio, a very uneasy reporter was hooked up to a frightening machine that looked like the instrument panel of a Stratocruiser. Then they stuck a microphone in her hand and said, "Go ahead." (Continued on page 90)

When a film star decides to buck the stage, somebody always wants to know why in thunderation he does it and the star replies that it is a challenge. It is an innocent colloquy, predicated on the knowledge of both that the star is at least temporarily washed up in pictures and is needful of maintaining his wardrobe, his alimony, and his three meals a day.

In the case of Tyrone Power, there occurred a mildly interesting switch. Power, who is not washed up in any sense, still did not bother to reach for the "challenge" handle. He said "security."

"Work," he said, sweating frankly in 106 degrees of Lone Pine, California, heat, "is the actor's only provision for security. It's his back door, the old escape hatch. That goes for the rich ones, too, and how many of them do you know? I know some. Got enough money in the bank to last them till they die. Last 'em real fancy, too. But they haven't got security. They're stagnant. You know who I mean? Wealthy, idle, miserable in the knowledge of their own limitations, actually very unhappy people. I don't care how well-upholstered a vacuum is, it's a vacuum. Nature hates its guts, as somebody has said before me. And better. You go forward, you go backward, or you die. And if you're going backward, you might as well send the mortician a memo anyway. Just so he can begin scratching around, getting things ready. But the squirrel cage is worst of all." (Continued on page 67)

A tragic sidelight on hollywood glamour

RITA'S

FORGOTTEN CHILD

This 1951 news shot shows Yasmin and her nurse; Rebecca typically in the background. Rebecca is rarely photographed these days.

■ A bored little girl shuffled through the steps of the Seguidilla and brought her castanets to a languid stop.

"Rebecca Welles! Please do it right, just once, for me, then you may go."

Eduardo Cansino's pretty, hard-working, second wife, Pat, was again entreating Rita Hayworth's older daughter to work with the rest of the children in the Saturday dancing class. Rebecca thrust out a defiant chin and went through the steps again, mechanically.

Her hair was carelessly combed and her brown and white checked gingham dress was not particularly becoming. There was no spark of interest or pleasure in her brown eyes.

Across the room, with Rita's housekeeper and two nurses, Rebecca's step-sister, the Princess Yasmin, sat quietly watching the class.

Yasmin, an exquisite little creature, was dressed just as a baby Princess should be dressed. She wore a handmade, pink, French organdy dress. Her softly curled hair shone from careful brushing and her pink hair ribbon was placed just right.

None of the dancing class mothers or nursemaids seemed to pay attention to the tragic difference between these two daughters of Rita Hayworth. The doting mamas on the sidelines watched their own darlings. Many of them, and a large portion of the American public, have forgotten, perhaps, that Rita Hayworth has an older child named Rebecca.

Suddenly, Rebecca's face brightened. Grandpa (Rita Hayworth's father) had come into the (Continued on page 92)

Outside the door, an usher had a list of those who were to be permitted inside during the rehearsal. It was a long list. In the tv theatre the audience seats were occupied by an assortment of producers, writers, kibitzers, tv technicians, press agents, song-pluggers, fans and friends. They were all there to see Eddie Fisher or to attend to business connected with some offshoot of his career.

The person who seemed least affected by the activity and excitement was Eddie Fisher himself, the star of Coke Time.

(Continued from page 37) his voice. He didn't know that for this soothing assurance, Marge Champion had rolled down from the top of the mountain and her lonely house, which didn't have a telephone then, to haunt Schwabs' booths for three hours until they swept her out, trying to talk a Manhattan hotel into violating "Do Not Disturb" instructions. He didn't know how important it was to her just to hear a tall, boyish-looking and undeniably drowsy fellow say the words she had to hear. But then, of course, he didn't know Marge and Gower Champion.

Since Gower had gone to New York, everything had gone wrong. First, the plumbing at their house had burst in the middle of the night. In the studio, three feet of water had poured onto the expensive cork dance floor they'd laboriously sanded to just the right slipper touch. It took Marge, two patrol cops and assorted friends until dawn, bailing and swabbing in hip boots, to save the place. Then a windstorm had whipped up, sending the spare shutters Gow had stacked whistling around the place like boomerangs. After that, a tipsy milkman whirled into the drive and knocked over part of a brick wall and three prize camellias. Two cherished cats had vanished and, just to wrap things up dandy, a cop had ticketed Marge that morning for crossing a white line!

Of course, Marge hadn't let "the Boss" in on the bad news that night—he had the choreography of a Broadway show on his mind. But just saying hello made things better. And he would soon be home. She gunned her roadster back up the hill and flopped into bed.

Luckily, the absent lover blues have seldom seized Marge Champion in her half dozen years of marriage. Marge and Gower have been as inseparable as shadows—walking, eating, working, playing, sleeping.

A few days before last October 5, the graceful, crewcut stringbean Marge Champion loves pulled the gold engagement ring off his dainty wife's finger and took it down to Tobias, the Beverly Hills jeweler. This year the diamond he added to the glittering arc of five is the brightest of all to Marge and Gower—and with good reason.

When he bought that ring, Gower Champion had to scrape the pockets of his lone tuxedo to do it. The Champs were a struggling dance team then, chronically in hock for Marge's gowns, fighting to pay the rent on a basement apartment. They had prospects, it's true, but few dance dates.

Now things are different. As anyone knows, the Champions are the most popular, highest-paid dance duo in America. Since they dazzled Hollywood four years ago with their fairyfooted, romantic grace, they've been the highspots of such picture hits as Mr. Music, Showboat, Lovely To Look At, Everything I Have Is Yours and Give A Girl A Break. They've also been, and still are, record smashers at the best hotels and nightclubs all over the land and on tv, too. Last year they collected $130,000 and many awards for this and that. They've got what both have always wanted—a big time career.

The grey house with the black shutters tucked into a Hollywood hillside is also what they've both always dreamed about. And the two barrels of knickknacks, the Lautrec poster and the unpaid-for piano with which they started housekeeping are surrounded by rich (and paid for) antique and modern furnishings, good prints and sketches, shelves of books, racks of records—all the things that make a house the kind of home both Champions love. They've got relatives all around them, friends galore, five spoiled cats, and two white cars in their garage. But most of all, they've got each other, and a marriage that grows richer and firmer every hour. And that, considering Marge and Gower Champion's Siamese twin setup, is the most amazing accomplishment of all.

Now, ideally the ancient rites of marriage should result in a perfect blending. But in practice, many brides and grooms who have shaken the rice out of their hair will attest that it is nothing of the sort, although it is true that sometimes they get to looking like each other even by the tin anniversary. They talk alike. A sort of mental telepathy develops so that they think the same things at the same time. That's evident in the Champions' dancing which, as one critic marveled, "seems as if they had radar in every muscle." For example, Marge tripped, making an entrance, and fell on her face. Behind her, Gow immediately made the same stumble and flopped the same way.

When they played the Statler hotel in Cleveland, Marge got woozy with a fever. The doctor came and gave her sulfa. Next day she was all over red spots. "Measles," he said. So they slapped her into the contagion ward of the City Hospital with barely time to tell Gow goodbye, and no way of communicating with him—no phone, not even notes that might carry germs. A City doctor took over, and for a couple of days Marge might as well have been in jail.

The place was swarming with speckled kids. One of them peeped at her and blurted, "You don't have measles—you don't have measles eyes." Marge began to wonder. That noon, her original doctor came in. "I'm not supposed to be here," he said, "but your husband keeps insisting you don't have measles. To keep him quiet, I came over." Well, she didn't have measles. Just flu and a sulfa reaction. But how did Gow ever know that, with Marge incommunicado?

That phenomenon is sometimes weird, but it's also fairly common with any Mr. and Mrs. What's remarkable in the Champions' case is that the side-by-side, round-the-clock, foot-away life they lead, constantly under the nervous tension of creating, pressed by deadlines, exhausted by physical exertion, remains a lovebird affair. As a good pal of theirs, a star whose home broke under similar Hollywood strains marvels, "By now, those kids should be sick of each other, but they get sick without each other. The way they live they should be throwing rocks. Instead, they throw kisses. How do they do it?"

MARGE and Gower Champion are very different. The Midget has a personality as open and airy as a barn door. Gower keeps his corked up like a bottle of champagne; when he pops it, the boy can bubble in sparkling style, but usually he's standoffish, even shy. As a new acquaintance put it a little bitingly, "Somebody left the 'I' out of Gower's name." Another long-time friend, warm, demonstrative Nanette Fabray, always used to greet Gow with a hug and a smack until Marge took her aside one day. "Nanny," she said, "if you don't mind, please don't swarm over Gower like that. It makes him miserable." Yet, Marge is inclined to do the same thing to her friends' husbands, or to practically anybody she's fond of.

Marge's piano smile is easily her best feature. Often you wouldn't know Gower had teeth. He's a worrier, she seldom creases a wrinkle. He's the grand sweep boy; Marge ties the ideas down. Gow writes and Marge edits. In most other ways you stack them up they're different.

Marge is a gourmet; food is just food to Gow. She has to watch stuffing; he has to be coaxed to eat. Marge will have a drink or two; her husband doesn't touch the stuff. He likes to get up early; she clings to the hay. In money matters he is extravagant and Marge makes like a Scotch housewife. Gow will shoot the roll on a canvas while Marge argues with a housepainter over how much thinner to use. And so it goes up and down the line—big things, little things—they're no double exposure. But this, some people think, is exactly what keeps their sandwich style married life from going stale.

"You see," explains the same Nanette Fabray, "Marge and Gow don't blend at all—they balance. What Marge lacks, Gower has; what he's missing, she makes up. They need each other every hour. It's as simple as that."

Another factor, as Miriam Nelson (Gene's estranged wife) points out rather wistfully, "is a little item called love." Stanley Roberts, a screen writer, once observed, "When Marge looks at Gower her eyes tell him he's the most important person who ever lived—and to her he is." Experts agree that even in their dancing Gow's "I-could-eat-you-alive" look is a big reason why both sexes, from sixteen to sixty, get mushy inside and stay breathless when they float out on a stage. A huddle of terpsichore critics, analyzing their success, explored every egg-headed angle of technique, training, art and what-all. Finally one blurted, "You can plant me in rows for a corn crop, maybe—but in my book, the extra factor that makes them great is this: You can tell they're so damned much in love!"

WHEN you look beyond moonlight and roses for the ties that bind the Champion marriage, they aren't hard to find.

One of the strongest, of course, is the mutual life's work. It throws Marge and Gower together in what could be explosive proximity. Like the husband and wife who run a chinchilla farm together, they both work every day toward the same goal. They worked toward it separately, as kids, before either looked sideways at the other.

To say that dancing is the mutual driving force of Mr. and Mrs. Champions' lives is an understatement. They never get away from it and never really want to. Of course, what Marge gets asked, ad infinitum, is, "Do you ever have any fun just going out dancing?" Her answer is always, "Of course. If we don't have to perform." Nowadays, what the Champs call "Arthur Murray dancing" is for them, curiously, a rare treat. Not long ago they decided, sentimentally, to step out to the Del Mar Club at the Beach. As teenagers, they had gone on dates there.

But after just one dreamy waltz, sure enough, the bandleader spotted them, stepped to the mike and—there went the romantic evening. They were on exhibit. That happens all the time. They're glad it does, of course, but admittedly it's one of the things that keeps them at home, or sends them scurrying back early. "At midnight," laughs Miriam Nelson, "Gower and Marge turn into pumpkins." But there's a bigger reason for that. Their home is another powerful binder for their marriage. Both Marge and Gower fervently appreciate it.

For one thing, neither of them ever really had a home until they had this one together. Gower was a divorce orphan from the age of three, brought up by his mother. Marge had the same story, only it was her father who brought her up. In both cases, the job, though done singly, was done well. Still, it wasn't what the rest of the kids had. Now, a couple of families have, in effect, joined up.

ALL this is more than either Marge or Gower Champion dared dream about when they first teamed up to dance. Their love story started when both were junior high adolescents, but between that groping time and their marriage they both collected some beautiful bruises going through separate mills.

While she was still in her teens, Marge had the shattering experience of a broken marriage. Gower racketed around, too, with disappointing attachments. Both tackled New York alone and when they met again they finally knew what they wanted—each other. They didn't launch their lives together with champagne, nor even beer. When they were married six months after their first dance engagement, they couldn't afford a honeymoon.

Marge still can't stand the taste of boiled eggs, because in those newlywed years she bubbled so many over a hot plate in their hotel rooms. There's a battered portable refrigerator in their studio today that helped keep them alive on the road when they couldn't afford to buy a meal where they danced.

But if Marge and Gower Champion were sometimes short of cash, they've never been short of love and courage. It took a helping of moxie, in the first place, for Marge to ditch the best chance she'd ever had at Broadway fame, when she passed up the lead in Rodgers and Hammerstein's Allegro to join Gower chasing their rainbow. Later, it took some more to leave the east, where they'd made a name, and take on Hollywood. That shrewd show business queen, Sophie Tucker, for instance, told them they were crazy to come to Mocambo in Hollywood. "You'll die on that small floor with that tough audience," she predicted. "But," she sighed, "you're both young and you'll bounce back."

As everyone knows, at Mocambo the Champs bounced not back but ahead—right into pictures. And on the first Hollywood hop they bought the house where they live. They couldn't afford that then, either; the price was as steep as the hillside it clung to. But they know it's been worth every penny they mortgaged themselves for—not only as the security anchor both Marge and Gower craved, but also as the escape valve for their high pressure two-career marriage.

Marge has a deep affection for flowers. She still keeps three pressed roses which Anna Pavlova gave her the first time they met. That was following a performance, during which the ballerina slipped to the floor in a rare fluff of her art. Afterwards, taken to her dressing room by her dad, Marge noticed roses scattered helter skelter in a corner. Although at that point Pavlova rated with her like Babe Ruth would rate with a boy, Marge, five, indignantly spoke her piece.

"You oughtn't to throw roses like that," she lectured. "They can't help it if you fell down!" The dancer laughed, promised never to mistreat flowers again, and gave her the three posies.

GOWER is not so romantic about flowers, but just as artistic outdoors as he is in. As in his dance numbers, he does the spade work, lays out the plots and manages a ballet effect, sometimes with the strangest things. Last spring they set out some deep blue delphinium. That called for a color contrast, Gower felt, so he backed it with a hedge of rhubarb. In front, he planted parsley. And on a bare slope that threatened to run mud with the rains, he dotted artichokes. It looks surprisingly good, and tastes good, too.

Once you penetrate the Champion jungle and step inside the house, there's evidence all around of Marge and Gower's relaxing outlets at home. Marge, by now, is a cook

UNIQUE SUCCESS STORY

Denise Darcel, the Cattle Boat War Bride

■ Although the love has long since gone, French-born Denise Darcel arrived in this country as a French war bride, aboard a cattle boat. Later divorced, she began to concentrate on her singing career, and oddly enough her extreme beauty has been her greatest handicap. She first created a sensation in the picture, Battleground, in which she had the only feminine role in a costume that out-Russelled Jane Russell. From that point on, producers couldn't see her talents as an actress for her statuesque and startling physique. Slightly snubbed by those who failed to realize that she had both dramatic and comic ability, Denise took to the night club circuit. One evening she volunteered to substitute for Danny Thomas and went on with such competition as the Ritz Brothers and Jane Powell, and completely stole the show. She kept the promise she made to herself not to go back to Paris until she had made good. When she returns to this country this time, not on a cattle boat but on the Ile de France, she will begin work in the life story of Jane Avril, the magnificent character played briefly by Zsa Zsa Gabor in Moulin Rouge—a far cry from her first effort as the slave girl in Lex Barker's initial Tarzan picture.

That will still leave her with one unfulfilled ambition: she'd like to fall in love again, for keeps. In Hollywood she has yet to meet the man who will look not at her figure, but into her eyes, which, by the way, are about as disturbing as a pair of eyes can be.

supreme. As for Gower, he's eternally got some Rube Goldberg device underway. The latest is a dumb-waiter to their pool, four flights down the hill from the kitchen. He overlooked the small matter of motive power, so you have to haul it up and down by hand, but he thinks it's wonderful. Sensitive to noise, he's got all the phones artfully padded with some sort of fluff so, as Dick Pribor, their accompanist, says, "they don't ring—they purr."

The Champs have flocks of friends in all sets and circles and by now about everywhere you can name. In Hollywood, their house, which has Victorian ice cream parlor chairs in the kitchen, antique bird cages in the front room, modern paintings on the wall and functional pieces under Gay Nineties fixtures still blend in what they call "modern-baroque" for a colorful, cozy effect. As Lisa Kirk has noted, "Marge and Gower's house says, 'Come in' and after that, 'Be yourself'." And that's a compliment.

Their friends do come in, constantly and endlessly, despite the Alpine climb. The favorite open house is Sunday around the kidney shaped pool when Marge whips out the herbs and prepares her famous 'California hamburgers.' Regulars include Lisa Kirk and her husband, Bob Wells, Paula Stone and Mike Sloane, Nanette, Miriam Nelson, Tony Curtis and Janet Leigh, John and Jeanne Champion, Marge's brother, Dick, and family, Dick Pribor—and of course the five haughty pussy-cats—Clarabow, Flowerpot, Muggins, Lester and Albert.

In their friendships, neither Marge nor Gower are passive. Their outgoing natures, one demonstrative, the other reserved, seem to be equally spontaneous and sincere. Almost everyone they know can come up with a story wherein the Champs have been actively friends in need.

Nanette Fabray moved into her new house last spring, and got the flu on moving day, a dismal ordeal anyway. But Nan is a lone divorcée, and she couldn't have been more depressed, with everything piled in a mess and her temperature up to 102. Although they were busy getting together new dances for their last tour, Gower and Marge rattled right over, shifted all the furniture into place, screwed in the light bulbs, hooked up this and that, hung pictures and cooked her dinner, too.

PEOPLE are so used to seeing the Champions a deux that when either shows up publicly without the other, it's a natural gossip item.

Last time, that happened after one of those Sunday night parties when the Nelsons, Nanette, Lisa Kirk, Curtis, Leigh and company wanted to go on to Mocambo. Gower shook his head because he had a dance idea on his mind and wanted to block it out at the crack of dawn on Monday. But Marge got talked into going on alone. "You'll be sorry," kidded her boss. She was. That brief exposure without Gower made the room buzz and next morning the columns had question marks after their names.

It will take mightier crowbars than those to pry the Champions apart. After six solid years, they're still happy with each other, although they are together every hour. That could be because, as one critic recently observed, "They dance, not from their feet up, but from their heads down." It could also be because they keep dancing from their hearts out.

is it bad to be good?

(Continued from page 51) Debbie hasn't sworn off Hollywood's social circles; her life just isn't confined to those orbits. She had a well rounded, satisfactory life before she ever got into the movies. She gets a kick out of the after-première parties, the gay Bel Air affairs and the Strip-club shindigs she sometimes attends, but she walks and talks best to the tempo of the life she was born into. The real Debbie Reynolds is the girl who spent her last vacation exactly as she used to spend vacations when she was a school girl; she slept a lot, cleaned the yard, helped her father paint the back fence, got whacked at tennis by everybody and put in a week as a counselor up at the Girl Scout Camp in Fraser, California.

She was at Ciro's when Peggy Lee was singing there. She is crazy about Peggy's song technique. She spent a lot more nights at the Melody, an unpublishized jazz grotto in Burbank, where the musicians turn real "cat" while the bopster-patrons, Debbie included, sit swaying ecstatically with the beat and whispering, "Go! Go! Go!"

It is true that she was squired by such Hollywood men as Dick Anderson, Hugh O'Brien and Tab Hunter. But much more often her escorts were Paul Lillard and Danny Sites—together at that—a couple of Korean war veterans who love Debbie like brothers. Paul is the soldier-fan who wrote such interesting letters to Debbie and her folks from the battlefield that they invited him to visit them when he came back. Now, they have informally adopted him into the family. Danny has lived near Debbie since they were both children. When he was leaving for Korea two years ago, Debbie gave him Paul's address. The boys not only met but became fast friends. Now that they are back they are writing a book about their war experiences—much to Debbie's discomfiture, sometimes.

"I often wonder if they know I'm with them," she complains. "Each one carries a little pad and pencil, and every few minutes one of them thinks of something for the book. Out comes the note pad and they scribble away like mad. If I want to dance they offer to find someone for me!"

LIKE the rest of Debbie's friends, Paul and Danny see her as a sweet, bright girl, not as a movie star, and they aim to keep seeing her that way. They are not a bit bashful about straightening her out when they think she needs it. Like any girl, especially one with an inborn gift for mimicry, Debbie will sometimes unconsciously take on the color and manner of people around her; she'll return from the studio, for instance, acting a bit like the grande artiste. When this happens the kids go to work. They look at her coldly and ask, "What's with you?" And before she can figure out what they mean, they add, "So shut up and sit down!" Then Debbie knows she has been "glorifying."

Her mother, Mrs. Maxene Reynolds, takes a hand at this, too. Not long ago, Debbie came home after a fashionable reception attended by many of Hollywood's English set and began talking like a female David Niven. After she had "rawthered" all around the place for a few minutes Mrs. Reynolds interrupted to ask Debbie to please swallow.

"Swallow what?" asked Debbie.

"All that mush you've got in your mouth," her mother told her.

Debbie swallowed and talked straight again. She is grateful to her mother and the others for jerking her back into character every time she starts riding a high horse.

"If ever I get away from being just me," she says, "I'd be sure to wake up some day and hate the person I was pretending to be. I spent years, from the time I was nine, developing the friends I have around home. I've got all those years invested in them, and they'll keep me happy for the rest of my life. That's my way of being rich and secure. They make me content to come home when otherwise, well—who knows what would happen, where and how I would seek to express myself if I didn't have them?"

In Hollywood, where the next flower, you pick up can sting you, it isn't bad to have this sort of background, this incentive to settle for the good and not seek the overgay.

DEBBIE is still "investing" in friendship.

Between her South American tour and the summer theatre work, last season, she had just five days in Hollywood in which to study scripts, learn the musical score of her first show, Best Foot Forward, and be fitted for costumes. Any other star would automatically have gone into seclusion under the stress of a rugged schedule like that. Not Debbie. She not only called and talked to her old pals, she took a day off to give a baby shower in her home for one of her three closest friends, Diana Higley, now Mrs. Barry Cheek. The other two members of this high school foursome, Barbara Christie and Jeanette Johnson, suggested that Debbie might not have the time to spare. "Of course!" responded Debbie. "Diane's first baby? Why nothing could be more important than that!"

That wasn't all. Debbie had just returned from playing Hinsdale, Illinois and Dallas, Texas, when Diane went into the hospital to have her baby. Her three pals got hold of her husband, Barry, took him to Debbie's home, fed him and tried to talk him out of his worry. Three times, they pulled him out of the pool into which he kept falling while he wandered around the place in his distraction. "This boy is positively the end!" the girls agreed, and kept a sharp eye on him until the baby was born.

Debbie keeps her appointments straight by using a system unlike any other star's. She has no book. She just uses the annual calendar issued by the Girl Scouts of America. It hangs on the wall of her room. Whenever she makes an appointment, she jots down a note about it in and around the particular date on the calendar. Noodled between the numbers in the month of July, for instance, are fragments like "HOB Tennis" (tennis with Hugh O'Brien), "P. O." (piano lessons), "PR-TH" (attend première with Tab Hunter) and "B" (bowling with Paul and Danny).

When Debbie attends a première she is both star and fan, of course. She drives up in style, makes her little speech over the public address system for the benefit of the crowd, enters the theatre—and then sneaks back out to a convenient corner where she can watch the other stars arrive. That's exactly the program she and Tab Hunter followed when he took her to the Stalag 17 première in his salmon-colored convertible.

After the show he checked his money and told Debbie they could have as wild a time as could be squeezed out of two dollars. It turned out that they only needed forty cents for a root beer float and a lemonade in a drive-in.

When Debbie is with kids she grew up with, being herself comes easy. With others she sometimes has to work at it. And she does. She can't stand the strangeness that falls like a damp cloak between her and people who are overpowered by her professional identity.

"The most important things about the kids I know is that they are down to earth, yet very reasonable about other people's lives. If you are wealthy, that's okay with them, just so you don't pin the dollar sign on your sleeve. They know I'm doing well in the movies, but when they hear about my getting up at five o'clock, morning after morning, to get to the studio, and not getting back until way after dinner, they begin to think I'm crazy.

"Hey, that's not like you," they say. "You're working too hard, girl. Slow up."

WHEN she went to Girl Scout camp, Debbie had a different problem. She had never met the seventeen-year-olds placed in her charge and her first two days with them didn't go well. She knew they couldn't accept her as a real person. She was a movie star and they insisted on being overawed about it. They were shy; none of them ever cut up and whatever they were asked to do, they did without any back talk.

That was bad. Debbie felt that she was not only spoiling their vacation, but her own as well. She quietly discussed with her mother, who had come along, the advisability of slipping away and leaving the girls free to enjoy themselves without the distraction of her presence. But her mother urged her to stay for another day, anyway.

Debbie worked hard at it, kidding the girls, poking fun at herself, asking their advice on a whole series of subjects including diet, make-up, etiquette and boys. When one kid tentatively suggested that Debbie didn't eat enough, she felt she was getting somewhere with them. When, by nightfall, another girl let something slip about Debbie's being too skinny, she knew the girls were getting to be themselves again and everything was going to be all right. For the rest of the week they all had a hilarious time together. The last night the kids staged a gag ballet performance for her. They ran around under the stars, tripping over huge blankets they were using as veils. Debbie fell off her cot laughing.

When she got back to Burbank, she got in touch with Jeanette Johnson and they had a conference about a matter that has had them thinking a lot the last few months. Out of the eighty girls in their graduation class at Burbank High, only Jeanette and Debbie are still unmarried. At first they kept asking each other: "What's the matter with the boys around here?" Now they are beginning to take a more objective view of the situation. "Do you suppose it's us?" Debbie asked.

"Wouldn't that be, positively the end?" asked Jeanette.

"We better check," Debbie replied grimly.

That's what they've got a thing about right now.

(Continued from page 58) looking in person than he is on the television screen. He moved effortlessly among these people, stopping to say "hello" to a friend, to confer momentarily with his manager or to step onstage and rehearse a number with Ann Crowley, the pretty singing guest of that day.

Eddie had a word of greeting, a smile, a nod for everybody. Virile, vibrant and personable, he seemed to be exactly what a young American star should be.

Since he got out of the Army last April, after a two-year hitch, ex-private Edwin Jack Fisher's rise to fame has been meteoric. While he was in G.I. garb and maybe on some Army detail, entertaining in the front lines at Korea or another U.S. base, or recruiting on the home front, his singing voice rang out on radio and juke boxes around the country. Some $300,000 in record royalties from his long string of song hits was piled up and waiting for him on his return to civilian life.

Eddie Fisher alighted in New York from a Washington train one morning last April, and still in uniform, went directly to the Paramount Theatre. His fans were lined up, impatient to see their singing hero.

Backstage, a tailor and a hurriedly-hired valet were waiting for him in his Paramount dressingroom. His clothes for the opening had been ordered long distance. Cashmere sports jackets, slacks, blue suits and two tuxedos, all fresh from the tailor's workroom, were hanging neatly on the racks. The transformation from Private Fisher, soldier, to Citizen Fisher, singer, was completed.

An hour or so later, onstage at the Paramount where Frank Sinatra rocketed into fame via bobby-soxers' swooning, Eddie Fisher was crowned the new "King of Sing." To make his coronation official, the first week after his Army discharge, he launched his twice-weekly TV and radio show, Coke Time.

LEST he have time to catch his breath, the bachelor baritone temporarily suspended his American activities to take his place in the spotlight of the London Palladium where Britishers flocked to see and hear the slender singer. He was making a benefit appearance at the Red, White and Blue ball, a big charity affair at the Dorchester Hotel, when he received a note from a young lady in the audience.

"Don't be nervous," it read, "the response may not be like that at the Palladium, but I shall lead the applause and they will love you." As everybody knows by now, Princess Margaret Rose, sister of the Queen of England, was Eddie's royal cheerleader. After he sang, she invited him to her table.

This acclaim abroad and his popularity at home might turn another's head, but not Eddie Fisher's. He's grateful for it.

He lives unobtrusively in a 4½-room, furnished apartment on New York's Sutton Place, which he took over lock, stock, furnishings and books from Eddie Cantor. He got his headlong start to success four years ago, when the older Eddie heard the younger Eddie sing at Grossinger's, a Catskill Mountain hotel, and hired him for a cross-country personal appearance tour.

A hospitable host, the singer welcomed MODERN SCREEN into his home. In the diningroom, an alcove off the livingroom, a round pedestal table was attractively set for luncheon. One whole wall consisted of windows opening on a view of the East River with its bridges and barges.

The singer's personal belongings were strewn with wifeless abandon around the room. In one corner on the floor, there was a big movie projector and photographic equipment. Against one wall was a piano, and piled atop bookcases and a combination TV set and phonograph, were stacks of long-playing records, classical and modern.

On the lower shelf of an end table were mementoes of Eddie's trip to London, "Golden Book Of The Coronation," "The Connoisseur, Coronation Book, 1953" and "King George V, His Life And Reign."

There was evidence of the life and reign of King Eddie Fisher, royal crooner, too. He has a plaque in crest form, imprinted "Eddie Fisher, London Palladium, Variety Season, 1953." A glass-encased gold record of RCA Victor's "Anytime" was shining testimony that his recording of that song had passed the million-sales mark. In a corner cupboard was a trophy, a sculptured figure holding a gold disc and inscribed, "The Cash Box, in behalf of the Automatic Music Industry of America, the Best Male Vocalist of 1952."

There were no personal pictures around the apartment, no likenesses of pretty blondes or brunettes.

IN HIS bedroom, besides the unmade bed were well-stocked closets and dresser drawers. Hanging alongside his expensive suits was a khaki souvenir of his Army days, his G.I. jacket with the Korean and Overseas medals still fastened on the front.

"I like to keep it where I can see it. It reminds me how lucky I am," civilian Fisher said.

Being able to buy all the clothes he wants is a comparatively new experience for him and he doesn't pretend not to enjoy it. Cashmere jackets, shirts and sweaters are his sartorial weakness, he admitted. Black is his favorite color in suits. Not funeral black, but the shining richness of mohair cloth or shantung.

"Somebody gave me a black cashmere sports shirt," he explained, "and I just liked the color." Argyle socks, colored handkerchiefs (which he wears in his jacket pocket in preference to white), sweaters and sports shirts were tossed about in the drawers. It looked as though the owner had dressed in haste.

"I have a valet, but he's away on vacation and I'm kind of lost without him." His one other servant, Gypsy, an attractive, poised maid, prepared luncheon.

"Bring some melted butter for the lobster, will you please, Gypsy?" he requested, gawping unglamorously on an ear of corn. True to his sponsor, he drank several Coca-Colas.

When Eddie excused himself to answer the telephone, Gypsy discussed her famous boss.

"He only has dinner home on Tuesday and Thursday nights," she said, "and I never know how many there'll be for dinner. He often calls up an hour before and says he's bringing several friends home to dinner."

During luncheon, relaxed and easy to be with, Eddie talked.

He had celebrated his twenty-fifth birthday on August 10.

"I think back when I came to New York eight years ago and it seems like yesterday," he said. "I think I should be about eighteen now and I'm twenty-five. Otherwise, I feel very young. I'm ready to go . . . I'm kept busy these days, but I was just as busy in the Army. I always had to be up early. I used to record at 9 A.M. for the Army shows. At least I don't have to do that now."

"I sing best when I feel good, when I'm not under pressure and when I sing what I like. When I was in the Army, I didn't always sing what I liked, but when you're in the Army you do a lot of things you don't want to do."

His face and voice are very expressive as he speaks, although he says he was bashful and shy as a kid. The fourth of Kate and Joe Fisher's seven children, he had a tough life as a youngster in Philadelphia. The Fishers didn't have much money, and Eddie used to accompany his father's fruit and vegetable wagon, vending his wares in song.

He has sung ever since he can remember, in the synagogue, in amateur contests, over radio station WFIL in Philadelphia. His mother nicknamed him "Sonny," because as a little boy he used to imitate Al Jolson's "Sonny Boy."

When he was seventeen, he came to New York to seek fame and fortune—and a singing job.

"I went down to the Copa and auditioned for Monte Proser," he recalled. "I sang many songs. Afterwards, Proser told me, 'I'll pay you $125 a week. Is that enough?' I would have paid him to let me work there if I had had the money, but I didn't realize I'd be singing with girls. I wanted to sing alone and I wanted to sing what I liked. That's why I didn't want to sing with the bands."

"I woke up wearing a costume and singing with eight girls," he said. "I was at the Copa for three months. It was like home. Joe E. Lewis was the star while I was there. I sang songs like 'The Great Big World Is Yours And Mine,' 'Simon Bolivar' and 'They Say That I'm Too Young To Know'—and they're so right," he ad libbed. "I was and I still am."

A special evening at the Copa is a bright spot in Eddie's memory.

"They would have informal evenings," he said, "when Joe E. Lewis would introduce the celebrities in the audience. One night Frank Sinatra, Eddy Duchin and Vic Damone were there. Vic had just started to work at the Martinique. Joe E. Lewis introduced all of these people. Then he said, 'Now I got a kid. This is my kid.' And he pointed to me! I felt like crying. I went on after all these people and sang. Afterwards, a couple of people wanted to be my manager, but Milton Blackstone, a friend of Monte Proser's and head of an advertising agency, became my manager."

"Everyone said to him, 'What are you messing around with this kid for? He's not good enough. He's not going to be that big.' But Blackstone was one of the few people who really had faith in me. He has taught me many things. He taught me patience, which I didn't have."

Eddie needed patience. After his thirteen-week stint at the Copa he was out of work for nearly a year, with an occasional singing engagement at some small club, or the steadier but financially not very remunerative work of singing on the staff of Grossinger's.

As he sat on one of the modern sectional couches in the livingroom, looking casual and comfortable in brown slacks, a white, long-sleeved sports shirt and brown and white loafers, the tv star discussed many things: that he likes to get presents; he doesn't smoke, although once in a while he'll pick up a cigarette, but doesn't inhale; that when he first came to New York he saw a Perry Como picture. He couldn't remember the title but he remembered that Perry sang "Here Comes Heaven Again."

When he played in a recent golf tournament, he was in the foursome behind Perry Como.

Eddie sang his own song hit which was particularly apropos, "I'm Walking Behind You."

Perry's answer was his favorite quip, "You crazy, mixed-up kid," and then Perry burst into song, kidding back, "Mine, Tell Me That You're Mine."

Eddie's buddy, Bernie Rich, dropped by. Bernie has his own apartment, but while his mother or visiting friends use his abode, he bunks at Eddie's.

This is very convenient for Bernie. He gets to wear Eddie's shirts, socks, and ties which as he says, "are so much nicer than the ones I can afford."

Bernie can have delusions of grandeur, too, for Eddie lets him drive his new navy blue Cadillac convertible. They're used to sharing what they've got because for a long time they had nothing between them.

FIVE YEARS ago, Bernie and another friend from Philadelphia, Joey Forman, came to New York. Bernie wanted to be an actor and Joey a comedian. Eddie was living in a hotel room and his two pals moved in. Since Eddie was the only one working he got the bed. Joey used to take the mattress off the bed and sleep on the floor. Bernie didn't have it so good. Frequently he found himself relegated to the bath tub.

Bernie had one phrase to describe his friend Eddie: "Completely selfless." "There's nothing he wouldn't do for any of his friends," he said, and told how when Eddie was booked into the Paramount after being discharged from the Army, he insisted that Joey Forman be signed as the comic for the stage show.

Excusing himself with, "You don't mind if I borrow one of your shirts, do you, pal?" Bernie left.

Eddie called after him, "See you at rehearsal. Do you want to borrow the car?" "No, I'll let you use it this afternoon," Bernie said generously.

Laughing after him, it was evident that the comfortable-as-an-old-shoe friendship he enjoyed with Bernie helped to relieve the strain and tension of many a day. As long as Bernie and Joey Forman were around it was pretty hard to think of himself as anything but Eddie Fisher, the poor kid from Philadelphia who used to play "Slick" on a teen-age program there for 15¢ a week carfare.

"Ever since I was a kid, or ever since I can remember, show business was a big dream," Eddie reminisced, "show people and people like Bing Crosby, John Garfield and Al Jolson weren't like other people to me. They weren't earth men. But when I came to New York this whole bubble burst. It wasn't what I thought it was. It's glamorous but not as glamorous as I thought it would be. There's only one thing left—the movies. I was out there in 1949 and I had a taste of it.

There was a chance he might go to Hollywood, the tv star said. His agent was talking over a one-picture-a-year deal with Paramount.

"If I made a picture I'd like to play opposite Debbie Reynolds," he said, "but I don't suppose Paramount could borrow her."

It was the first time in all his conversation that Eddie had mentioned a girl. Except for an occasional line in a column, linking him with a pretty model or an aspiring actress or a young singer, there have been no stories about his romantic life. But there have been theories and speculation.

"He's carrying a torch for a girl he was in love with," some said:

"The truth is," whispered others, "and I have this right from the horse's mouth, that he has been told not to get married for fear he'll lose his bobbysox following."

"Nah, that's not the reason. He won't marry anybody unless his mother approves of her."

IF A fellow won't talk about his girls, other people will, especially if he's famous, for when a man becomes successful there are all sorts of people who knew him when, the "I remember" friends.

"Eddie went with a girl by the name of Joan Wynne," a Fisher expert had told MODERN SCREEN a few days before the meeting with Eddie.

"He met her when he sang at the Copa. She's in the chorus at the Riviera now. Nobody knows why they broke up."

Joan Wynne was sixteen, brown-haired and blue-eyed, when she first met Eddie Fisher at the Copa. She's twenty-four now, and still single, as cute, pretty and shapely as ever, but her hair is tinted a soft red and she wears it short in the current fashion. Backstage in the dressingroom of the Riviera nightclub, where she has worked for three seasons, she was willing to discuss Eddie.

"Eddie and I were a big romance for a long time," Joan Wynne admitted, "something like five years. When we first met we were both just out of high school, a first job and everything. There wasn't any of this glamour or anything there is now. It was completely different.

"Besides working in a nightclub, we never saw the inside of one. In the first place, Eddie never had any money. He only worked at the Copa for three months. I was there for a year and a half. After he left, he didn't have a job for almost a year, I'd say, but he still came around to the Copa and waited for me. He never came into the club because he didn't have the money. He didn't like to be around like a bum.

"When he was working at the Copa, we used to go for walks along Fifth Avenue and Central Park between shows. In the afternoons, we went to the movies on Forty-second Street, sometimes two and three double features a day. Eddie loves the movies. Afterwards, we'd have a hot dog. That's all we could afford.

"Sometimes we visited his family in Philadelphia. We talked about a lot of things, our future, religion. His career was always uppermost in his mind. It came first, which is the way it should be, I suppose.

"We used to have a lot of fights and arguments, then two years ago at Christmas we had a big fight. That was the beginning of the end. He wrote to me when he was in the Army, and we're still friends. A couple of weeks ago, he was out at the Club with some friends. I went out and sat down with him.

"I don't think he's changed at all. He has good instincts. He isn't flighty or fickle. It's just that there are always millions of people around him, a million phone calls, a million things to be done. It's as though he hasn't had time to rest. He thinks nothing of working hard and singing and meeting people.

"Eddie always said I was the only one he could ever really relax with, but after we had our big argument, I started seeing other people. I want to be happily married. I met someone who is just about the finest person I ever met. He's wonderful, but Eddie was on my mind when I met this person and I know that was bad."

Why, then, if this love of Eddie's had consumed a fifth of his lifetime, was he so reluctant to talk about it? Or maybe there was some truth to the report that Eddie's mentors thought it better if he remained single.

THESE were questions that only Eddie could answer.

He was there for the answering, relaxed and handsome, sitting in his livingroom, one of the most successful entertainers in America, today, and an eligible bachelor.

Because he is a nice person—honest and anxious to be liked and understood he broke his long silence about his love life, his romantic interests and told his side of the story.

His dark eyes flashing, he unleashed his feelings.

"I have never been advised by my managers nor anyone else about my personal life," he said adamantly. "I'm free to do whatever I want, when I want, and how I want.

"It's just that I have been so tied up with my career, with the tv show and radio, that I haven't had time for much social life. This is the first time since I've come back from the Army that I've been in one place so long.

"As for Joan Wynne, she's a wonderful girl. We're friends. We went together for a long time. I was just starting out in show business. I didn't meet many people. We always went around together. I was struggling and she was very, very nice. We were good company. I went steady with her, but I was out of town a lot. I never knew anybody when I came to town. I'd call her up and we'd go to a movie, sometimes two or three," he chuckled.

"Although we went together for a long while, I guess I just didn't love her enough, if I didn't marry her. All my time was spent with my work, with my singing. There was never a girl in my life who came before singing.

"This business of not getting married because it might affect my career is nonsense. I won't get married until the right girl comes along.

"I like the outdoor type, the natural girl. I would prefer that she not be in show business. It wouldn't be good to have two careers. There'd be a conflict. I'm very jealous. I would want my wife all for myself.

"So far," he said simply, "I haven't met the right girl. When she comes along, it'll be wonderful."

With fervor and feeling, the bachelor baritone had cleared up the secrecy surrounding his love life. He proved another thing, too—that he's an all right guy looking for the right girl.

(Continued from page 54) Lone Pine had promoted another half-degree of heat while he was talking. This was August and Lone Pine was really leaning into it. The scene was location for 20th Century-Fox's King Of The Khyber Rifles, the fourth week the company had been at it, and everybody looked a trifle wilted. Power and his leading woman, Terry Moore, were having a rough time of it in a dismantled fortress looking out on what was presumably India's Khyber Pass. Although Power and Miss Moore had spent most of the day in the fortress, they now were just getting ready to reach it, a piece of directorial sequence too complicated to go into. They had to grope in out of a dust storm, and not even Darryl Zanuck can will a dust storm in the Mojave Desert. Explosive had to be detonated and wind machines set to work. Visitors to the set were being urged to step aside a trifle—say about a mile down the road. "Please, please!" said an assistant to Director Henry King. "Anybody not connected with this sequence, please! Take to the hills!" The wind machines snarled into action and Miss Moore, who is not fond of noise of any kind, squeaked and cowered.

She and Power, among others, were seated on canvas chairs banked forward on a slope of earth, directly behind the cameras. Power wore boots, rather snazzy campaign breeches and a T-shirt, having divested himself of tunic and kepi shortly before. Miss Moore, on the other hand, was dressed to kill—any male, for example, who happened to be lurking around Khyber Pass in the middle of the nineteenth century. What she was doing in a besieged fortress thus toggled out was anybody's guess, with the script writer the probable winner.

"I'm not just generalizing," resumed Power, over the noise of the machines. "I'd be a fool not to know this thing's going to blow up. My association with pictures, I mean. I'm pushing forty. The younger men are pushing up behind me. The kids are pushing up behind them. But the trouble with that figure of speech is, they're not boosting me, they're dislodging my handhold, and sooner or later, there's not going to be room for everybody. All right. Last come, first served. That's how I got there, too. But now's the time to get the net ready, the one that has to break the fall. Not later. And there you have John Brown's Body."

Paul Gregory's production of John Brown's Body, as just about everybody knows by now, is the dramatic reading of Stephen Vincent Benet's poem, in which Power, Raymond Massey and Judith Anderson have been touring the country. It is significant that of the original group, only Power was reasonably firm in pictures. "When," he said, "you're through in this business, you've got to have established that you can do something else."

AS HE spoke, Power's professional standing, as closely as can be determined, was approximately this:

When he first went out with John Brown, he was slipping. He was, for instance, no longer the apple of Fox's eye, no longer tendered their gaudiest parts as a matter of course, and there had even been talk of a loanout to a lesser studio, worthy picture makers but sometimes an oasis on the escalator down. Instead, the loanout was to Universal-International and a film titled Mississippi Gambler, made in five fast weeks but mother lode as far as boxoffice was concerned. Since there was no discernible reason for this, save Power's presence in the cast, he found himself promptly back on top of the chute again and tossed by his home studio into Khyber Rifles, big budget stuff for these days. Yet the resurgence appears neither to have excited him nor settled his qualms. His verbal animation he reserved for his upcoming John Brown reprise and his problem as a whole. Indeed, the process of Khyber Rifles seemed to affect him as no more than a chore he had done before, likely would do again, and where was a good place to eat that night?

"Forty," he repeated, as though the idea both fascinated and oppressed him. "Forty years old. Not quite but almost. There's no such thing as forever. That loanout was the first I'd had since I've been with Fox. Seventeen years with one studio, take or give a dime. That's all right in a way. In another way—well, it's the old squirrel cage again. This kind of picture here—" he indicated all of the Khyber set with a wave of his hand, "I guess it's fine for the studio. I've made enough of them. Dashing fellow under the kepi, and all that. Stand the varmints off and tell the little lady to keep her head down. But the edge wears away and wears away until one fine day you're looking down a one-way street and no room to turn around. That's when you need an out.

"Mine, in a sense, came with the war." Power served with honor as a Marine flier, first lieutenant when he returned to peace time. "A man would be a dangerous lunatic to speak of war as a blessing in any way, shape or manner, but I did come back to pictures with an entirely new perspective. That lasted two, three years. Then I could feel the staleness setting in again, the edge going. You know? Over and over. Swash and buckle, damn the torpedoes. One picture I liked. Nobody else seemed to. Nightmare Alley." Nightmare Alley, re-capsuled here simply to illustrate the divergence between Power's point of view and his employers', was derived from a book that featured the degeneration of a carnival performer to the role of what carnies call a "geek." A geek does not rescue distressed females. He bites the heads off living chickens in a sideshow. Power later named a plane in which he toured the world The Geek. "I thought that picture would do something for me," Power said. "My mistake."

"Here's where I earn my money," said Power. "Don't go away." He and Miss Moore walked out into the desert about fifty yards, turned and oriented themselves toward the fortress setup. They joined hands. The spectators were clear. There was a deep, coughing blast, three converging wind machines boiled into high, and dust writhed and billowed up in an impenetrable cloud. A few onlookers were genuinely scared. Presently Power and Miss Moore appeared out of the holocaust. They were the dustiest people you ever saw, their eyes staring out in pale, dark-ringed surmise. It developed they couldn't see a thing in there.

"All I could think of," said Miss Moore, "was, what if we walked into a wind machine?"

"A hell of a thing to happen to a man up in Khyber," said Power.

There was excitement and confusion up forward. Power grunted and turned sideways with his hands up. "A hair on the lens," he translated obligingly. "Got to do it again." A hair on a camera lens makes for a picture that is divided and tricky indeed. "Well, what's the difference? You know what they'll say anyway, when the picture's released. 'Doubles. They always use doubles for shots like these.' That's what they'll say."

POWER does not, as you know, look forty. He looks, as you know equally well, like an amalgam of all the gentlemen in the toothpaste ads with the redeeming qualities of animation, humor, and high, articulate intelligence. He no longer has the juvenile façade of the pre-war years—his features are set now—but there are few lines, few departures from symmetry. He could still bound onto a musical comedy stage in flannels, carol "Tennis, anyone?" and get away with it, were he so a-mind. He is not so a-mind.

"After every picture," he said now, while functionaries were chipping off the lamp-black, "I'd go to the front office and ask for another formula, a change of pace. It was like talking down a rainspout. I don't have to tell you. They knew best. Well, they did know best—for them. And for me, too, looking at it in a different way. You know, I sit here barking like a seal with colic, but this is strictly shop. I mean, you take the broad view and I owe pictures everything I've had in life, or adult life, and that's been plenty. And by pictures, I've got to mean Fox. Besides all the other stuff, money and whatever the polite word for fame is—public interest, I guess—I've been all over the world, met kings and presidents—there's just been no limit to it. I've got to say that. Every star's got to say it if he's not the world's bottom slob of an ingrate. But the mistake is to ride with it, sit back and figure you've got it taped once and for all, I've made it, this is the end, I'm up to my rump in the pot at the end of the rainbow, amen. Accept that and it's the beginning of the end. You haven't arrived. You're dead."

A while back, when Tony Curtis first landed in Hollywood, voice coaches went to work on his Bronx accent to eliminate its traces in his film roles. Now Tony is working with a voice coach—to get back some of that Bronx accent for his role as a hoodlum in "Drifting."

Sidney Skolsky
N. Y. Post

He stretched out his dusty boots, leaned his head back and closed his eyes, blood-shot from dust and sun and ready for the little man with the drops. "Take Hollywood," he said. "I mean, the industry, the climate of Southern California, the whole set-up. It's not really a good place to work. And it's a worse place not to work, to lay off between pictures. Hollywood's a lotus land. The sky is blue, the air is soft, the swimming pools are the right temperature, flowers everywhere, even the outdoor furniture is comfortable. Oh, you could lie back between jobs and vegetate in those lush surroundings, and God help you! What you ought to do—what I ought to do, what I have to do and do do—is get out right after a film and stay out till the next one. Complacency is too easy down there. They say death comes like a lover sometimes, and when I breathe night-blooming jasmine, I believe it. No, lotus land is no good for work. The thing now is, make two pictures a year—you can't make more anyway—and when fall comes, go out on the road and work at your trade. Keep at it. Stay alive, or that monkey with the jasmine breath will get you yet."

ONE PINE proper, 1000-odd population, twenty-seven miles distant, drowsed heavily in the late afternoon sun. It would have drowsed in the shadow of Mt. Whitney, the United States' biggest, if Mt. Whitney had been casting a shadow that day, which, oddly enough, it was not. Lone Pine is a village long inured to movie locations. In a combination restaurant and bar, a waitress said to another: "You seen Tyrone Power yet?" giving it a pretty big Ty. Power thinks of his first name as Tuh-rone. "Unh-uh," said the other. "One I want to see some time is this Robert Wagner." Both girls are under twenty. At the bar, a deterrent of sensational aspect was in the custody of local law, who had orders to have him on the next bus out of town. "I threw a guy through a plate glass window last night," he said tiredly. "I wish I wouldn't ever again throw a guy through a window. They run me out of Frisco for the same thing."

In the evening, it was cooler, down to about a flat ninety-five. Power, in his room in a motel south of town, was crisp and shaved and dapper in grey slacks and sports shirt, ready to take local friends of his to a farewell dinner in a nearby cafe. The friends had a filling station out the road.

"When you're a so-called rising star," he said, "which I was back around the time Alcock and Brown flew the Atlantic, or so it seems right now, the psychological outlook is entirely different. You live from one picture to the next, there's no tomorrow, and you never had it so good. Then one day you're what they call an established star. Don't ask me when or how that day comes about because I don't know. But that's when you're supposed to have it made, really made. Naturally, that's not the case. That's the day you begin building for the future. That's the day you remember that sooner or later you start down the other side. You asked me about the difference in psychology, that's the best I can do for you. Come to think of it, it's good enough, at that." He changed the subject.

"You know, these four weeks up here have really been something. Work, eat, sleep, read, go to the movies if you feel very footloose. Nothing else. It's wonderful, except that I ought to be home."

Linda Christian Power was, roughly two weeks thence, expected to present her husband with the Powers' second child, confident it would be a boy. The prospect momentarily derailed Power's train of thought.

"Linda is truly the one to ask," he said. "The mother's so much closer to these things. For my part, any child of mine, boy or girl, would have free rein until he reached the age of reason. What's that—seventeen? Then I'd want to steer them as best I could, then implement for all I'm worth the decision they reach. Doctor, lawyer, merchant, nurse—or actor. I haven't any fixed ideas right now, but then our first child, Romina, is only two, you know. There's time. By the time she does reach that age, I'll be close to fifty-five and ought to have made up my mind in some way. One thing, if either or both do decide that acting's the deal, then I think we can dispense with some of the formal education. It's not necessary to an actor, and I think I speak with some authority. A different sort of schooling and environment would be better. That's pretty sweeping speculation, though. They'll make up their own minds."

Power, of course, is as much the product of theatrical forebears as the Barrymores are. His great grandfather started it all on the Dublin stage in 1827. That was Tyrone Power, the original. A grandfather declined this particular tag, but Power's own father, a noted Shakespearean actor earlier in the century, was Tyrone Power II.

TYRONE POWER may be ready to say goodbye to Hollywood now, or au revoir at the least. It is fairly well established that he wants to set up his own producing company in Rome and that plans are, at this time, well along toward completion. When he's not doing that, he'll be play-acting wherever audiences can be found. The circle that, for him, began in earnest in 1936 with the Fox picture, Lloyds Of London, has come complete now. The dossier above is offered in evidence.

But it was quite a circle for all of that, and considerably slow in beginning. The first breath took place in Cincinnati, where testimony indicates he was a well-behaved if not prodigious infant. After that, there was a spell of being trunked about from one theatre habitat to another, and a sitting out of World War I on the sands of Coronado, California, while his mother supervised troop entertainment in and about San Diego. Power was roughly thirteen years too young for the draft.

The legitimate theatre took rather kindly to Power as a child mime, although veteran player Fritz Lieber almost tore his head off with a knife—purely by accident—during a rendering of The Merchant Of Venice. By and by, he was ready to forego this and sniff around the edges of the Hollywood cheese. But the time was not yet.

Furthermore, his associations with the place had been jarred shockingly by the death of his distinguished father. While working on the film, The Miracle Man, he collapsed, and, hours later, he died in his son's arms.

There was stage and radio work further east for a longish spell after that, usually under expert tutelage. Don Ameche helped, Eugenie Leontovich helped, Helen Mencken helped. Katharine Cornell helped. You can't get much better help than that.

Followed then summer stock, followed then more Broadway (notably the role of De Ponlengey in Miss Cornell's St. Joan), followed then Darryl Zanuck.

Nor is it, nor has it ever been, at that time or later, fair to say of Power that his prime asset was a supremely photogenic face with an overlay of animal magnetism. Spectacular refutation, at any rate, of this quasi-slur is contained in the observation of Edmund Goulding, a stage and film director of sound critical faculty, who has referred to Power categorically as "the greatest actor of this generation." The effulgence of that one is thought by friends sufficient to warm Power for a lifetime.

ONCE set in films, Power played his cards as they fell, but with the increasing restlessness of an authentically sensitive and creative talent. The timely—as ever—arrival of the United States Marines intervened. Sensitivity was not precisely what they sought, but Power proved an asset, anyway. He moved up from boot camp at San Diego to ocs at Quantico, into Squadron 353 of the Marine Transport command, and flew out of such rest spots as Kwajalein, Saipan, Iwo Jima, Okinawa and Kyushu.

A new grip on things subsequently brought him in the post-war years to his greatest stature as a film actor, but, as duly recorded, the inroads of what he believed to be a static situation began to gnaw at him again. The hair in his personal lens diffused the frame into several Tyrone Powers: star, world traveler, international gadabout in a quiet way, some disposition to a scholarly bent to which he has always been more or less subject, and finally the flowering of his professional growth in John Brown's Body. Here was a cleavage, an incisive turning away from one thing and toward another.

Power's official Fox biography, a rip-roaring document of eleven pages, states among other musings that its subject's favorite color is blue, his favorite fruit the avocado, his favorite classical painter Van Gogh, and his favorite illustrator Petty, he who throws perspective away when it comes to girls' legs. Assuredly, the biography is thorough. Its one manifest failing is that it comes to an end. There is a strong feeling here and there that this is not the case at all, that there is a great deal more to come, and that the second part will be better yet. The hair in the lens may have moved aside now; the picture should be clearer.

(Continued from page 48) no gate around it. One night they entertained at a buffet dinner, and afterwards Mario was asked to perform. He sang six numbers, the last of which was "Call Me Fool."

Applause, bravos, shouts of "More. We want more. Don't stop now," began to emanate from outside. Betty went to the window. "You wouldn't believe it," she recalls. "People in cars going down the highway had heard Mario singing. The drivers had stopped. They had followed the sound of the music. They had parked their cars in our driveway, and a whole audience had formed outside our windows. Mario was giving a free concert, and these people didn't want to miss a single trick."

"Mario didn't mind. He was pleased and flattered. Only the very next day, the word spread around. Soon we had coeds from the university banging on the door, and that surprising woman who saves Mario's old clothes (she wanted to know if he had anything to throw away) and all kinds of salesmen and crackpots; so in self-defense there was only one thing to do. I ordered one of those photo electrically-controlled gates installed across the driveway. That was the first change we made in the house."

Others followed. A complete inter-communications system was placed in the fourteen-room mansion. Betty insisted upon this very quickly. "I always want to know what's going on in the nursery," she says. "Besides, this house is so large that if I didn't have an intercom I'd walk my feet off going from one room to another." Betty also made sure that the garden fish pond was well-fenced. And a month after the Lanzas moved into the place, they found Ellisa climbing up the Chinese carved balustrade that adorns the living room balcony, whereupon the railing was backed with smooth plywood boards.

At about the same time, there was a series of robberies in the neighborhood, so Mario had the house rigged with a complete burglar alarm system and then flooded the grounds each night with exterior lighting to keep the prowlers away.

MARIO'S favorite room is, of course, his studio, which he also uses as a den and office. It is a large room, equipped with sliding glass doors and furnished in contemporary style. It contains all his recording equipment, his vast record library, his books, and his scripts.

The furniture is oversized and covered with a green and white worsted to match the draperies. There is a green leather easy chair and a small upright piano. There are no rugs in the room because of the acoustics. The studio has its own private patio, and Lanza usually has his lunch there. Two hard-boiled eggs and coffee.

The house is built in the form of a large "H" with the enormous living room as the center line. Running parallel to the living room is a glass-enclosed sun porch, one end of which Betty Lanza uses as her office. She has four in help plus Mario and three children to look after, and this takes quite a bit of careful planning. Betty works at a large-top desk with a telephone at one elbow and a filing cabinet at the other. Near her desk, as a memento of Mario's childhood, she keeps the phonograph which his family bought for him when he was a boy of ten.

The sun porch is done in Nile green. It boasts a brick floor and contains in addition to some solid oak furniture, another television set, a radio, a fireplace which backs up the one in the living room, and an octagonal table good for card-playing.

The eating rooms are downstairs, the nursery and sleeping quarters upstairs.

The children's bedrooms are grouped around one large playroom with Colleen and Ellisa sharing the nursery, and Damon, eight months old, coming in once in a while for his bit of fun with his sisters. The nursery is decorated in pink and equipped with quantities of toys.

"We don't believe in spoiling our children," Mario says, "but childhood is the time for fun, and Betty and I just live for the smiles on those little faces. When I see Ellisa and Colleen and that Damon—that boy is really a bruiser—when I see them all playing together in that nursery, I just want to sing until the rafters shake."

There used to be two nurses for the three Lanza children, but now there is one nurse who looks after Damon while Betty supervises the two girls.

The Lanzas have two rather small dining rooms, small, that is, for a family that rarely dines out. The breakfast room is bright and gay, and exactly right for the children, who take their meals there. The dining room, on the other hand, with its well-cushioned wrought-iron furniture and its $1000 tea service, is a mite too small for the large dinner parties Mario likes. Of late, however, the Lanza family has limited its guests to ten or twelve and gone in for barbecues. Thick charcoal-broiled steaks are the main dish. This Christmas, as usual, Mario plans to have open house with brunch served from noon until midnight. Ordinarily, from two hundred to five hundred people show up at these festivities. Sometimes the activity gets so hectic at this affair that Mario and Betty go upstairs, lock themselves in the master bedroom, and toast each other with pink champagne.

THE master bedroom is dominated by one of the largest beds in the entire film colony. In Betty's own words, "It stretches from here to eternity." The room, however, is extremely large and the oversize bed is therefore in proportion. It cost $1800, handmade bedspread included.

"The reason we like a big bed," Mario says, "is because the children come in every morning and climb all over us and we like to rough-house with them. Betty screams when they jump up and down on the mattress, but I don't mind. It's much better than their jumping up and down on my chest."

Green and red are the dominant colors of the room, and there's a balcony which looks out on the garden. The room also contains a small desk at which Betty does some of her work. All the furniture is modern and utilitarian, with no period pieces whatever.

The Lanza house is a happy home, and stories to the effect that Mario and Betty are constantly quarreling simply amuse them.

"For years," Betty says, "those rumors used to upset me. Now, we realize that they're just an integral part of the Hollywood grapevine, and we don't pay them any attention. A few weeks ago Mario bought two of the cutest boxer puppies for Colleen and Ellisa. He built a play pen for the dogs, and the girls have just been having the greatest time with them. There's one columnist in town, however, who insists that our puppies are really ferocious Great Danes, guarding the property."

In a home where people sing and children smile, happiness must play the major role. The size of the Lanza estate, the Cadillacs, the equipment, the gadgets, the physical property—all these are nothing compared to the light in Colleen's eyes, the smile on Damon's lips, the clapping of Ellisa's hands, and the beating of Betty's heart when Mario comes into his house, looks around that tremendous living room of his, and at the top of his lungs, shouts, "How's my family today?"

"Is it true, Miss Turner," he began, "that you and Lex Barker plan to get married some time after October 15, when his divorce becomes final?"

"I don't know anything at all about it." "But you do know Mr. Barker, don't you?"

"Of course," Lana said.

"Well, Mr. Barker has never made his fondness for you a secret. In fact, he has told many friends that he's in love with you."

"Is that bad?" Lana Turner smiled.

"No, I'd say it's good," the reporter continued. "After all, you two have been going together for almost a year now. Will this friendship culminate in marriage?"

"Look," Lana said, "I don't have any marriage plans. I don't know what I'm going to do."

"There's a story making the rounds that you and Lex have quarreled. Is that one true?"

"No," Lana said. "It certainly isn't."

"Have you seen Lex since he went to Italy to make a picture and you stayed in London for The Flame And The Flesh?"

"Yes, I've seen him."

"Isn't it true," the reporter asked, "that Lex missed you so much that for the weekend, he flew in from the continent for a rendezvous with you?"

"Had a rendezvous where?"

"In Maidenhead, twenty-seven miles west of London."

"Yes, that's true."

"How is he?"

"Just fine," Lana said. "He has had his two children visiting him in Italy."

"Isn't your daughter, Cheryl, with you?"

"Yes, she is. She came over with my mother."

"Had they ever been to Europe before?"

"In 1948."

"How does Cheryl like it? In fact, how do you like it? Have you been working hard?"

"Very hard," Lana agreed. "And it's been so dull, but Cheryl loves London. She has a tutor, and we're not going back to Hollywood for a while. She's going to stay over here with me."

"How does Cheryl like Lex Barker?" the reporter asked.

"Very much. She likes him very much."

"Don't you plan to meet Lex in Paris after your picture is done?"

"I don't know. I don't know what I'm going to do."

"Suppose Lex proposes to you. What will your answer be?"

Lana thought for a minute. "I don't know."

"You don't know or you won't say?"

"I just don't know. When and if the time comes, then I'll make up my mind."

"Are you in love with Lex Barker?"

Miss Turner's voice stamped its foot a little. "Look, it's my personal life, and I'll live it the way I see fit. Some magazine carried an article saying that Lex and I scandalized Europe by traveling around together. Why! The nerve of them! It's my life, and it's my business, and I'm going to run it."

"Of course it's your life, Miss Turner. All we're trying to find out is whether you are in love with Lex Barker and, if so, if you intend to marry him."

"I honestly don't know. Right now, I have no marriage plans. How things will be in the future I can't say."

"Would you say," the reporter persisted.

"that you have no intentions of ever marrying Lex?"

"I'd never say that."

"Then there is that possibility?"

"Of course," Lana Turner said, "but right now I don't know."

"Is that because, Miss Turner, you've been going around with Carlos Thompson in London?"

Lana was angry. "I should say not. I haven't been out with anyone."

"What do you do at night?"

"I told you. It's dull. I just work and sleep."

Not very long before this conversation took place, Lana had told another reporter, "I'm being attacked in Hollywood for seeing too much of Lex Barker since I left. We've been misquoted as saying we're deeply in love with each other. We're just close friends, and we've definitely no marriage plans. I want a rest from marriage."

What is the truth? Will Lana marry Lex or won't she?

According to an intimate, "Lana doesn't know, herself. She says she wants a rest from marriage, but that's only because her marriages, thus far, have been unhappy. This girl is completely without self-sufficiency. She's got to have a man. Now, for a girl like that, marriage is indispensable. That's why I think she'll marry Lex before the year is over."

This same source, a leading figure in the motion picture industry who has known Lana since she was fifteen, goes on to point out that Barker would probably make the actress an excellent husband.

"One of Lana's biggest mistakes," he explains, is her poor judgment when men are involved. Artie Shaw was too smart for her. Stephen Crane wasn't good enough for her, and Bob Topping had too much social background for her.

"This Barker boy, however, seems to fit her needs perfectly. You'd never call him dull, but certainly he's no mental heavy-weight. Neither is Lana. He got a few more years in high school than she did, but intellectually, they're on a par. That's one reason they get on so well together. Primarily, they're physical creatures, both very attractive, both very charming, both very kind.

"Lex has been married a couple of times and so has Lana. What have they got to lose?"

THIS seems to be the consensus of Hollywood opinion about Lex and Lana, but where the Turner beauty is concerned, one rule has always held true—anything can happen.

Lana is a mercurial woman who falls in and out of love quickly and unexpectedly.

Just look at some of her past performances. Supposedly, she was in love with Greg Bautzer when she ran off and married Artie Shaw. Supposedly, she was in love with Turhan Bey when she ran off and married Steve Crane. Supposedly, she was engaged to Tyrone Power when a few months later she became Mrs. Henry "Bob" Topping. Supposedly, she had been in love with Fernando Lamas when, not long after, she flew to Europe with Lex Barker.

How do you figure a girl like that? Is she a creature of whim, a victim of circumstances, a child of impulse?

Adela Rogers St. John, a writer who has watched Lana in action at MGM for more than a decade, says, "Lana is an exaggerated, unconventional, slightly mad, utterly enchanting creature unlike anybody else in the world, with plenty of brains but practically no sense."

All of which means that Lana Turner is absolutely unpredictable, or as one girl on the set of The Flame And The Flesh confided to a columnist, "She'll marry Lex Barker, I think, provided she doesn't fall in love with somebody else before she gets around to it."

Friends of Lex Barker say that Lex knows this, that he realizes how susceptible Lana can be to masculine charms, and they attribute his European stay to that very understanding.

When Lex flew over to Paris with Lana this past spring, he was scheduled to return to Hollywood in the summer to make a film for producer Eddie Small. Only Lex didn't return. He had his agent, Paul Kohner, find some film work for him in Europe. Lex wanted to be near Lana. For weeks during the months of April and May they had been inseparable, traveling through France, Spain, and Italy. Lex had even accompanied Lana to England. He had spent so much time courting this beauty in Hollywood and Palm Springs, he was taking no chance of losing her to some European dandy. He asked Eddie Small for an extension of Cannibal Island, the picture he was scheduled to make in Hollywood. Small said, "Sure."

ODDLY enough, there wasn't too much difficulty in getting Lex a job or two in Europe, despite the fact that most continental film producers had never heard of him except in connection with Lana Turner. This isn't surprising. As an actor, Lex is a relative beginner.

Anyway, Paul Kohner signed him to a role in a picture tentatively entitled Tiger Of Malaya, and then booked him for work in a French film, They Still Fish On Sunday.

As a result of these bookings, Kohner is now asking $25,000 per picture for Lex Barker, and Lex has had enough money to phone Lana in London practically every night. Not too long ago, Lex wrote a friend in Hollywood, explaining that he was very upset about items in the newspapers to the effect that he had quarreled with Lana.

"We've been apart for about a month," he wrote at the time, "but we call each other every other day. It's expensive but helpful."

A few days later, unable to stay away from his love, Lex flew to London. He and Lana saw each other at Maidenhead over the weekend. Then Lex flew back to work.

When Hollywood heard about Lex's fast flight to London, one columnist quipped, "Boy! That's a switch."

The reference was to the time in 1947 when Lana was very much in love with Tyrone Power. She was making Green

Dolphin Street at MGM and Ty was on location in Mexico. Undaunted, Lana decided that she simply had to see her sweetheart. She flew to Mexico where bad weather prevented her from getting back to work for two days. Luckily, a kind director shot around her while she was absent.

Lana isn't that foolhardy any longer—either that, or she doesn't care for Lex in the same way she cared for Ty—but she still believes in obeying her impulses. As a matter of fact, that's how her friendship with Lex began—on impulse.

Last year, at the extravaganza thrown for Johnny Ray at the Marion Davies mansion, Lana was escorted by Fernando Lamas.

Lex came to the party with Susan Morrow. During an interlude, Lana impulsively asked Lex Barker for a dance. Lex said it would be an honor. It's a matter of record that Lamas blew his top when he saw Lana and Lex together. He called Lana some choice names, challenged Lex to a fight, and then drove Lana home.

Lana will not tell what happened after Lamas brought her to her house on Mapleton Drive. The next morning, however, she was in a sorry state, and admitted that she and Fernando were finished.

SEVERAL weeks later, Lex Barker began to lay siege to the Turner heart, and his ardor has never diminished. For almost a year, he has been Lana's trusted friend.

When Lana announced that she was going overseas to make pictures, Lex, through his press agent, announced that he was seriously thinking of forming his own independent production company in Europe. What this meant, of course, was that Lex intended to follow Lana, to be with her as much as possible. An MGM executive, upon hearing this, expressed the opinion that it would not be in the best taste for Lex and Lana to travel all over Europe together.

Like Rita Hayworth and Ava Gardner, two other children of impulse, Lana Turner has never catered to public opinion. When she flew to Paris this past April, Lex Barker was with her. When she arrived in Spain, Lex Barker was close at hand. At Cannes, Capri, in Rome, in London, it was Lex and Lana. Tongues wagged but the lovers paid them no heed.

Allegedly, Lex said that it was okay for him to travel with Lana, because his intentions were honorable; and they certainly have been.

Flynns." He stays close to his wife and family. Also, much has been made of the fact that Alan, due to the number of pictures he has made abroad, was partly eligible for the "tax dodge."

I know these things. Many another reporter-photographer knows them, too. I know that Ladd, like every other star, is open to criticism. Wide open in every move he makes. Yet, here at Banff, in this conservative crowd of people, many of whom had never seen a movie star and had a pardonable antipathy for celebrities, Mr. and Mrs. Ladd got along as though they had known the other guests all their lives.

It was not until I woke up the next morning at ten—with a guilty conscience—that I was aware that Alan was still a movie star, and he was still the same old Alan Ladd. He and Sue never have been the up-and-early-chest-beating type. When I called their room I was given a D.A. (Don't answer). So I knew that their telephone would be shut off until around noon. Not that they sleep that late. It's only their way of squeezing in a little private family life before they expose themselves to an admiring, but endless public. As I

When Lex left Lana in London to continue work on The Flame And The Flesh—some background shots had been made in Naples previously—Lana had dyed her hair from the familiar blonde to dark reddish.

Lex was sad to leave her. Lana, however, threw herself into the picture with enthusiasm and vigor. "I've got more acting to do in this one than I've ever done before," she explained to one newspaperman. "It's really very tough. I play a young Italian girl, cynical, tough, jaded. She's not exactly a prostitute, but she wanders from man to man, and I'm trying to make the girl look very real."

"I don't want people to say, 'Turner's bitten off more than she can chew.' I spent a lot of time in Italy watching how girls of this type dress and walk and behave, and in this picture, I just wear a dress and an old suit, and my hair. Well, you can see for yourself. Pretty dark, isn't it?"

THE reporter asked if, after thirty or forty films, she had conquered her stage fright.

"No," she said, "I still almost have a nervous breakdown before a picture starts. I'm afraid I'll forget my lines or trip over my feet or just make a fool of myself."

Reputedly in financial trouble (the story goes that she had to take a whopping advance from MGM in order to meet her back income taxes) Lana admitted that she is trying to sell her Holby Hills house, the one with the six tv sets. "I don't intend to return to Hollywood for a while, so I might as well sell the place." No one has met the asking price of $175,000.

Lana also said that she did not favor her daughter's future entrance into show business. "I once said I'd try to keep her out of this rat race, and I mean it. It's okay if you stay up there among the winners, but everyone can't be lucky."

As for being in love with her latest suitor, Mr. Alexander Crichton Barker of Rye, New York, Lana insisted that she had been misquoted. "We're just good friends."

There's nothing wrong in a girl's marrying a good friend especially when he's tall, handsome, slavish in his devotion, and capable of making a good living.

Now, that The Flame And The Flesh is finished, and work is no longer on her mind, Lana has done that very thing. If she hadn't, all of Hollywood would have been disappointed.

Lana has been in love with the idea of marriage for a long, long time. END

homesick but happy

"Don't flatter yourself," Alan advised. "You're the first of the Old Guard we've seen for a long time." He handed me the kind of drink that separates the men from the boys.

As we mingled with the guests, I kept a reporter's eye on Sue and Alan to see whether or not their extended European trip had changed them. I confess that even if I hadn't liked them for many years—even if I had been looking for trouble—I couldn't have taken a poke at their behavior. I suppose ten or twenty million words have been written about the Ladds, and I've never seen them referred to as "homey people." Oh, I know that people write a lot about their magnificent home and their still more magnificent ranch. The fact is that Alan is perhaps the richest of the present generation of movie stars, and possibly he is a little dull for reporters, because he never engages in what we refer to as "Errol stepped off the elevator, I saw Alan sneaking through a side corridor, a frisky dachshund tugging ahead on a leash.

He never has been the type to stroll through a lobby to let the people know there's a movie star around. As a matter of fact, in order to reach Banff Springs, he and Sue had arranged their schedule so that they could leap into a cab (two cabs to be exact) with their family, directly from the Queen Elizabeth, and land on a Canadian Pacific railway car, spending only a half-hour in New York. Alan has more friends among reporters than almost any other star, but he can't get used to the fact that every move he makes is an event.

"I'll meet you at one o'clock on the first tee, if you're not doing anything else," he said, knowing full well that my camera and I were there only to take pictures of him.

"It's a date," I replied, and went into the dining room. A captain came up to me. "Mr. Parry? Mrs. Ladd just called and suggested that you'd better have a big breakfast. She ordered orange juice, wheatcakes and ham and eggs. Will that be satisfactory?"

I said it would, realizing that, as always,

Sue had automatically adopted me as one of the family. It was a good feeling. I ate the breakfast with considerable relish. And while I was at it, I pondered the talk that Alan and I had fallen into the night before. I think his thousands of friends should know this, too: that for many years Alan had planned his trip to Europe. He is not the type of actor who starts counting his money when he wakes up in the morning. His business manager does that kind of worrying for him. Alan did a couple of pictures in Europe and he's going back for another one. But he didn't do these pictures in order to take advantage of the eighteen-month tax exemption. All of his earnings have been impounded by his own business manager, and whatever taxes are to be paid will be paid. Like any other tax payer, if he has a legitimate deduction, he'll be grateful for it, and he reserves the right to beef about the amount of taxes he pays, just like the rest of us. But he knows, too, that the movie business has been wonderful to him and to his family. He wants no more, nor less, than what is coming to him.

As I say, Alan Ladd is family. With many another actor the emphasis is on the big "I am." With Alan, it's different. He's not an actor first and a human being second. That's clear enough if you have seen him with Sue and their children, Carol Lee, Laddie, Alana and David. Any of these kids, stripped of the glamour and wealth that surrounds them as children of Alan Ladd, could walk into a schoolyard and "get with it" with a gang in a matter of minutes. They have never been pampered and do not expect any favors.

Only in one department are the Ladds "too soft" in their family relations. They are suckers for their dogs. The boxers and the dachshunds can ruin their gardens, jump through plate glass windows and ruin the rugs with no more punishment than a harsh look. The newest arrival in their canine division is an impudent little hound they've named Beret, for the picture, Red Beret. They picked up this important little monster on their European trip, and he acts just like what he is—a German dog with a French name.

I made Beret's acquaintance out on the golf course right after breakfast. Alan had been making some practice shots while waiting for me, and Beret was showing how smart he was by retrieving the golf balls. As I arrived on the tee, a young lady was having words with Alan. She flounced away with no small degree of petulance.

"What was all that about?" I asked.

Alan grinned. "That dope, Beret. I hooked out into the next fairway. What did this guy do but run over and bring me back two golf balls. I tried to explain to the lady, but she wouldn't buy my alibi."

We settled down for eighteen holes of golf, with Beret tagging along and giving us dirty looks because we wouldn't let him retrieve every shot we made. Alan played his usual steady game in the middle eighties. "I can't say I care too much for this course," he said. "The scenery is so great you can't keep your eye on the ball, and the grass grows so fast you feel as though you ought to run to the next tee before it's up to your ears."

Later, at the nineteenth hole—the one golfers find in the tavern when the game is over—he grew serious. "This trip has been wonderful for my family," he said. "Long before I earned my first dollar in pictures I thought about having a family and getting around the world a little. I know how many other people spend years saving for a trip, and I wanted my kids to have the experience before they settle down to the serious business of getting an education, working for a living and raising their own families. I'm proud of my kids. They have some special talents, but being an actor's child can be a handicap, I know. I hope that Sue and I have taught them to meet their problems on a level with everyone else. Sue, like every other mother, has had most of the responsibility, and I think she is doing a tremendously fine and normal job."

I am not a writer, but as an old friend of the Ladds, I think I can explain them better than most writers. Carol Lee, soon to graduate from her teens, took a year off from college to make this trip. She is second mother to the Ladd children, while Laddie, now fifteen, is the big brother. The only discord I noted was the kind that is normal in all families.

TALKING with them, I discovered that theirs was nothing but a "fun trip" through Europe, during which Alan was kidded unmercifully because he couldn't get used to the foreign food. Everywhere they went, the rest of the family delighted in trying strange dishes in interesting restaurants but Alan kept asking for hamburgers. Despite their jeering that he could get a freight car of them when he got home, Alan finally located a sympathetic chef in Heidelberg, and talked him into preparing hamburger with chili.

"I still think," Alan told me, "that nothing would perk up those countries like a few chains of motels and hamburger stands."

On the second evening of our stay at the Banff Springs Hotel, one of the college kids invited the Ladds to their dance. It was held on the ski lift, which was bereft of snow at that time of year. Alan and Sue mingled with the kids and had a wonderful time.

Unfortunately, this is not the best place in the world for fishing. Due to the altitude,

*Joanne Gilbert is 21,
In Love and Engaged*

■ Ever since MODERN SCREEN introduced Joanne Gilbert to its readers some months ago there has been a flood of mail asking for more news about her. This is it: Joanne has just turned 21, and to celebrate she returned to sing at night club Mocambo where she was discovered a year ago. This time she smashed all records, including the one set by veteran comedian Joe E. Lewis. Among the big stars who flocked to see her was Rosemary Clooney, who is Joanne's Number One Fan and vice versa. Rosemary brought Joanne a piece of wedding cake, a "residual" from her own marriage to José Ferrer, and was greeted by the news that Miss Gilbert, too, had cause to celebrate. She is engaged to marry Danny Arnold, ace writer for Martin and Lewis. Joanne, who has the most exciting pair of legs since Marlene Dietrich, and a figure that doesn't take second place to Marilyn Monroe, has always been a "one man" girl.

Her first night's appearance at Mocambo was torture, "like being put in an arena with wild lions," but Joanne has managed to suppress her timidity, and in the Paramount picture, Red Garters, the report is that she comes over like Gang Busters. Bold though her costumes may be, Joanne Gilbert is a definite introvert. To the annoyance of other actresses, her ceaseless appetite for sweets has no negative effect on her supple figure.

or for some other reason, the fish don't spawn in the multitudes you would expect. Still, Alan and David had a fine time. As Alan explained it, "When a boy and his dad go fishing, it's not what they catch that matters, it's the companionship they get out of tossing their lines into the water, talking and being together."

It's the "being together" that makes the Ladds a great family. Alan Ladd is not put together like the movie star who feels that he is not being "manly" unless he gets away from his family and carries on some minor or serious flirtations with local belles, wherever he goes. Somehow, young people sense the integrity in this man and respect him for it.

We were sitting in the tavern, having a last glass of beer. Outside, the rain poured down in a flood. The tavern keeper came over and said to Alan, "There are a lot of kids outside, waiting for your autograph."

Quickly Alan replied, "I know there are too many for you to ask them to come in. And if I went outside, they would have to stand around, soaking wet, waiting for me to sign their autographs. Why don't you ask them all to sign their names, bring them to me and I'll see that autographs are mailed as soon as I get back to Hollywood."

The tavern keeper thought that was a considerate plan, so he went out and told the kids.

I don't have to tell you that Alan kept his promise. He always does. By this time he's back in Hollywood, and it's like he said to me: "This trip is the greatest thing that ever happened to us, but we've been homesick as the devil, most of the time. We're happy to be home in Hollywood where we belong."

The elaboration of that charge is certainly going to be one of the most fascinating aspects of the divorce action.

Mrs. Wayne has been seen with a black eye on occasion, and she is sure to testify or offer depositions as to how, where, why, and from whom she received such tell-tale bruises.

It is no secret that in preparation for the divorce trial, private detectives have been hired "to get the goods" on each of the participants. Both the plaintiff and the defendant in the pending trial have made that clear.

A FEW weeks ago, Mrs. Wayne's lawyer hired a couple of detectives to see what they could find out about Wayne's behavior while he was in Mexico making his latest film, Hondo.

He explained to the two investigators that Mrs. Wayne did not have enough money to pay them at the time. Should the private eyes return to Los Angeles with evidence that could be used in court—either photographs or recordings—then they would be well taken care of. That is, they would be paid at the end of the divorce trial when the Court ordered a final financial settlement.

The detectives were also told not to undertake the job unless they sincerely believed in the righteousness of Mrs. Wayne's cause—that out of the $500,000 John Wayne makes each year, she was entitled to more than the temporary alimony allotment of $13,200 per year.

The two detectives made their way to Camargo, Mexico, where Duke was on location. They attempted to install small, hidden microphones in Wayne's hotel suite. Instead of entering Wayne's suite, however, they got into the apartment of the governor of Chihuahua, the top official in that area.

They were arrested and (with their recording equipment) tossed into the Camargo jail. A few hours later, the news services were carrying reports to the effect that the two detectives, both of Los Angeles, were in jail for installing "bugs" in the suite of the governor of Chihuahua. These two detectives were sent to Mexico by attorneys representing Mrs. Esperanza Wayne, John Wayne's estranged wife. Allegedly, they were below the border to gather evidence against Wayne who is in Camargo working on a film. His two sons are with him there on vacation.

According to Ward Bond, one of Duke's best friends, who was down in Camargo at the time, this is what happened.

"One afternoon," Bond recalls, "Duke gets a phone call from one of the Mexican police officials. He tells Duke that the Mexican police have picked up two guys from Los Angeles who were attempting to 'bug' a room at the Santa Rosalia Motel. He also says that after searching these two characters they found one with a letter addressed to John Wayne."

"Duke says he never heard of the guys. The police say, 'We've got 'em in jail, and we're holding them on four or five different counts, entering the country illegally, working without a working permit, forced entry into a room, tampering with the mails, spying on the governor, and a lot of other stuff.'"

"One of these two detectives is fat and the other is lean. One lives in Glendale, and the other in Los Angeles. They're interrogated by the police, and they say that they were hired by Chata's lawyer, Jerry Rosenthal, to come down to Mexico to investigate Duke. They say very frankly, and mind you, they swear to this in a signed statement to the Mexican authorities, that they were trying to find Duke with some girl. This is a very funny thing in a way, because at the time, Duke's brother, Bob Morrison, was down there with his fiancée. These two guys apparently got some wrong information from someone and figured that Duke was with a girl who'll probably be his sister-in-law eventually."

"Anyway, the governor of Chihuahua didn't know what to believe. He didn't know whether these two guys were private detectives or spies or Communists or what."

"Being the kind of decent fellow he is, Duke explained that they had been hired by his wife to tail him and that they had no evil intentions toward the Government of Mexico."

"The police official then stepped in and said, 'We're gonna try these two men, and I think we can send them to jail for thirty years. One of them is sick. Looks as if he's got a ruptured appendix, but we'll get that fixed up and then we'll try them.'"

"Duke and I went to see these two private eyes, and they told us everything. They had come down on speculation with cameras, microphones, and the whole works, just to get the goods on Duke, just to catch him with some girl, just to get some pictures they could show in the divorce trial."

"One guy, I forget which one, he pleaded with Duke. The sick one. He said, 'Please, if I'm operated on down here and something happens to me! I've got three kids and a wife back in the States."

TRADE MARK

I'm their only means of support. Please give me a break.'

"I'll tell you frankly," Bond goes on. "I said to Wayne, 'Duke, let these guys rot in jail. They knew what they were doing when they came down here. You're trying to make a picture for Warner Brothers. It's tough enough without these guys. They upset you, me, everyone. To hell with 'em. Let 'em rot.'"

"But you know Duke, a real soft-hearted, good-natured guy. He goes to the police officials. He goes to the governor, and he pleads for the release of these two private eyes who came down to Mexico specifically for the purpose of ruining him. I know it's their job to get evidence. But there's evidence and there's evidence."

"After these two jokers give a complete statement of their whole background (and this statement is part of the record in the possession of Duke's attorney) Wayne springs the men."

"Not only that, but he charters a private plane to fly them to Chihuahua, and then he sees that they're flown back to L. A."

"I was there. I witnessed the whole incident, this attempt to crucify one of the nicest men on earth. And that's what happened. With such tactics as these, you can get an idea what an unholy mess that divorce trial's gonna be."

FROM the other side, Chata's side, also comes stories of private detectives. Wayne's attorney, Frank Belcher, says, "At no time has Wayne ever had his wife followed or shadowed by detectives."

Mrs. Wayne, however, insists that "I've been followed for months. I have positive proof," she states. "I've seen the cars outside the house, men in the cars."

"Only a few weeks ago—well, I will tell you the whole story. I was riding with my cousin Charles—Carlos Baur, he is fifteen years old. He is my cousin from Mexico City."

"We are riding along. I think it is Ventura Boulevard. I see in the mirror we are being followed. The same car is following me for weeks. I jam on my breaks, and this car runs into me."

"I get out and I run back to him. 'You've hit my car,' I say. 'And you've been following me. I'm going to call the police.'"

"This fellow, this detective, he says it's part of his job. And I say, 'What do you want to know?' And he says, 'Who is that young boy you've been riding with?' And I say, 'It's Carlos. My cousin.' He puts it down in his book, and he apologizes, and then he rides off. So I know very well I am being followed."

icably? This is the question many people in and out of Hollywood have been asking. Why all this cloak-and-dagger routine? Why can't the Waynes get a divorce quietly and preserve some dignity?

The answer is money.

Duke's wife claims that Duke earns $500,000 a year. She claims that they used to spend $13,000 a month. Under the law, she says, she is entitled to live after the divorce, in a manner similar to her way of living before the divorce. She wants approximately $9,000 a month in alimony after seven years of marriage to Duke.

Wayne admits that his monthly earnings average $40,000—this is all part of the public record—but he has also said that after taxes and expenses, all he has left at the end of the year is $60,000.

Moreover, he has to support his four children by his first marriage; and they get twenty per cent of his earnings.

A few months ago, in an attempt to award temporary alimony, pending the divorce trial, California Superior Court Judge William McKay ruled that Chata would have to get along on $1,100 a month until the final divorce settlement.

Not long after this decision was handed down, Chata's Cadillac was attached because of failure to pay $2,367 in grocery bills. Mrs. Wayne, in this case, testified that she knew she owed the money, but that she had expected it would be taken care of in her separate maintenance settlement. She lost the case and was given ten days in which to raise the money or lose her car. She now rides around in a half-ton pick-up truck.

What are the reasons behind the failure of the John and Esperanza Wayne marriage? Are the partners equally to blame? Is one more wrong than the other? Was Duke really physically cruel to Chata, as she charges? Was Chata's extravagance, as Duke testified, responsible for much of the stress and strain, and for the final break?

Adultery, alcoholism, sterility, extravagance, physical cruelty, mental cruelty, aggravation—all of these have been advanced as possible reasons for the Wayne marital mess.

This magazine, of course, takes no side in the case.

On October 19, unless there is a cancellation, postponement, or private settlement—and lawyers for Chata and Duke say none of these are probable—the truth will emerge in the Domestic Relations Court.

Of one thing you may be certain.

In this particular divorce case, the truth will sizzle, and two fundamentally decent and respectable human beings will emerge from the trial hurt and bitter.

to all as to myself

(Continued from page 49) as a patient, and one of the things he mentioned was that I should "feel free to express myself."

"How far can I go along this line, doctor?" I asked. "No restraint at all?"

"Well, let us say you want to express an anger which has gripped you," he said. "An anger at me, for instance. You are privileged to double up your fist and swing it at me as hard as you can. But the instant you hit my nose you are no longer privileged. The point is that that's the way of the world. I am your doctor and you are my patient. But I, too, am privileged to express myself. I can be just as angry as anyone else and can retaliate as fast as anyone else because I have my own life to live and to protect. Does that make sense?"

Everybody ticks in his own way. Most of us can do with some regulating of the works. That's why I had the experts check mine. As a result, I think I'm running a little smoother and my alarm is not so liable to pop off when there is no need for it. Nobody wants to hear it and I want to hear it least of all. The main corrective I required was oil—the oil of understanding; not only of others, but of myself.

WHAT makes a fellow become wound up too tightly is not always easily explained. Very early in boyhood I began holding my fists in front of me and people started to call me cocky. Maybe it was because I was raised in one of the world's most competitive spots—New York's west side—where nobody needs any special reason to pop you in the eye, and I got popped. Or it might have been the sum of my particular reaction as a child to the bitter realities of life. You go along with them, but not always as the same kid. I remember, for instance, that it was years before I got over the shock of my grandmother's funeral. She was a favorite of mine and died when I was only eight. When she was laid in her grave, when I saw the first shovelful of earth thrown on her coffin, I broke down and cried out in resentment. It seemed to me that someone I knew to be a wonderful person was being treated cruelly, while other people, not at all as nice as she, were escaping this punishment.

I'm guessing at the psychological effect on me but it could be that I got badly twisted as a result of this, developing a feeling that not even being good (and to me my grandmother was the epitome of goodness) could save you from being a victim of life. And very probably (but still guessing) I could have felt that a fellow had best protect himself from this fate at all times. At least that's the way I acted as I grew up—pugnaciously protective about myself.

At home, on the street, in all my contacts with people, I was touchy, very conscious of my rights. When we bought a loaf of bread and it wasn't fresh, I was the kind of kid who liked to go back to the grocery store with it and plank it down, saying, "This bread is stale!" No, sir, nobody was going to put anything over on me! (Nobody, that is, but myself—by getting a little hipped on the subject!)

I can look back now and put my finger on what was wrong with me—I was afraid of life. A lot of us are. But even worse than fear itself was the fear of having the fear known. This, too, is a common reaction, and among kids that's exactly the kind of personality you need to get yourself booked for a steady series of scraps.

Of course, I didn't know it as fear, then. I accepted others' appraisal of it and they called it temper. When on my grammar school graduation day I took a swing at a lad a lot bigger than I, I analyzed my action afterward as a case of my temper overcoming my brain. Most kid fights are over with quickly. This one turned into one of those long, terrible sessions that seemed to go on forever. Long after my "temper" had cooled off, when I was sick to death of the fight, yet wearily swinging away, I can remember thinking how stupid it all was. But I couldn't stop. I had to keep punching. To quit, to be thought a quitter—that was worse than anything.

I THINK that fight did me some good, but also because I had held my own with a larger fellow and that gave me a measure of confidence in myself. I didn't walk around with my hands up in front of me so much. Since I really had confidence, it wasn't so necessary to show it by my demeanor. It was there if I needed it. But it wasn't all there, yet. I know that when the time came for me to go out with girls, as it must to all boys, scared or not, I played safe. I wasn't a one-gal man for a long time. I was the kind who comes to the dances to look over the field and then leaves, unattached—the lone stag. I was as unsettled on what I wanted romantically, you might say, as I was in every other way. And when, eventually, I did pick out a girl whom I wanted to know better, she happened to be someone else's—a football hero's, no less.

I had no car, no money, yet life was good to me and gave my confidence another boost. I learned that what you are comes through. What I was she liked, and she overlooked what I lacked in position or possessions. Now I know that if a girl doesn't go out with you (or if you can't impress a boy) you might as well not try to reach her with outside accoutrements or veneers. If you can't reach through to each other for what you are, you can't do it by pretending to be something better.

The way we got along was quite a boost to my ego, but the cure was by no means complete. Many years later I was still fear-bound and swinging out, figuratively, when I should have kept my hands at my side. Even when my big chance came up in Hollywood I nearly scared myself out of it by behaving in a crude manner born of my fear of not making good.

At MGM, I was asked by the dramatic coach, Lillian Burns, whether I wanted to do a light or heavy scene for my first test. I will never forget the look on her face at my reply:

"Why ask me? What do they pay you for?"

I actually cringe at the memory. One of the reasons I even mention it now is as a sort of additional apology to the lady. She came out of this little set-to a much bigger person than I. She came to downtown Los Angeles to see me in the legitimate show, I Married An Angel, and decided I had possibilities despite my rudeness.

She had told Billy Brady, head of the studio's talent department, that personally I was "... a most revolting young man." Later, she changed her opinion (I hope!) and we became very good friends. But because of fear I had been rude and had darn near frightened myself out of a movie career.

I think that if I had enjoyed a stronger spiritual identification with my faith during my early days as an actor I would have been able to accept my later success without having it affect me temperamentally as much as it did. I was nervous about the kind of roles offered me, the dramatic values involved and the theatrical level of the productions. A man with trust in the ultimate meaning of his life is not inclined to be overwrought about its day-to-day phases. I am still concerned about the way I am represented to the public in my pictures but now I am much more aware of the problems of the directors and writers.

WHEN I was making I Can Get It For You Wholesale, the director and I made a pact to meet each night in my dressing room for a talk, no matter what happened during the day's shooting. Plenty happened. Some mornings and afternoons we couldn't lay up a scene because of the arguments we had to go through first. But every evening the director and I got together and worked out our differences with an honest discussion and a handshake that washed out all bitterness. We recognized that no matter what else was involved, we had a common cause—a good picture. People thought the production was going to pieces, but because we trusted each other's hearts, if not each other's ideas, we finished up with a good job.

I should have had this sort of tolerance long before I got to Hollywood, but I didn't. When I was bouncing around on Broadway, trying to get a part in a show, and getting turned down, I used to get pretty bitter. Everyone said I was a good actor, but no one had anything suitable for me. Even when I got going a bit, and won top comment as a good comedian and dancer, I would hit against stone walls of opposition. A good friend of mine was (and is) Jack Nonenbacher, manager of José Greco, leading male exponent of Spanish dancing. Enviously, I had mentioned to him some big names who were in Broadway shows.

"I know I can do better than those fellows," I said. "Why can't I get a chance?"

"Look, Dan," he replied, "you'll be better off, eventually, if it isn't too easy to get started. The very thing that holds you back, now, keeps you up there when you make good."

"But what do I do in the meantime?"

"Have faith," was the simple answer.

"That's what faith is for."

That's what every man needs—a deep trust in himself and in his future. He needs it in everything he tackles, particularly in the job of being a human being. I know faith can move a mountain; I moved one when I was in the Army.

This particular "mountain" was a problem handed to me when I attended Signal Corps Officers School at Fort Monmouth, N. J., in 1942. If I passed, I was to graduate and get my officer's commission. If I didn't, back to the ranks. I took one look at the problem and knew I was licked. It consisted of a map of the communications system of Berlin, and I, on the premise that the whole system had been wrecked, was to tell exactly how I would go about restoring it to working order if I were to be the first American Signal Corps officer to enter the city.

I found just a small job in the communications map—a generator to provide power. Then I located a switchboard which could be run from this generator. And from this I progressed via small segments of the problem until the whole thing was done!

I don't think it matters much that I didn't turn out to be the first signal officer to enter Berlin. I was sent to Italy and never had a thing to repair. It didn't matter much to the Army, that is. But it made a lot of difference to me to learn that small gains plus strong faith can add up to big victory.

A great many of the fears I used to have are not with me any more. Over the years, I have learned that when I have stewed and worried it has been for nothing. I am not speaking here of actual danger to life or limb. As a matter of fact, whenever I have actually been on the point of breaking my neck, my mind has always refused to accept the fact and busied itself with an inconsequential aspect of what was happening. A year or so ago, while driving a new car, I was forced off the road and turned over. The thought in my head while I was in mid-air was, "Gee, this is going to scratch up the car!" Only recently, my horse failed on a high jump. Even as I knew I was falling, I was conscious only of the fact that I would probably rip my riding coat and it was the only one I had.

What I have in mind is the sense of peril to your well-being that settles on you like a weight and very often makes you a hard man to live with.

I HAVE no desire to become the biggest star in my profession. There may have been a time when I was dedicated to that proposition. I'm not sure. But I am certain it forms no part of my thinking, now. I am more tolerant of people, now, because I judge them by the basic level of their relationship to me, not by all their outward manifestations. I can forgive a friend any mistake if there is no mistake about his friendship for me.

I am trying to enjoy each day as it comes along, and without causing others any harm. I am remembering, always, that if I want to antagonize someone, it is within my power to do so. And therefore it is within my power to accomplish the reverse—to win them over. This, I have actually demonstrated to my satisfaction a number of times, and I have come to the conclusion that if I can win other people over to me, I can definitely win myself over to a better way of life.

From what I can see, most of us are problems to ourselves. I have had to be honest and admit it to myself. But I'm working on it. That's the most—and the least—a man can do. END

monroe and the wild life

(Continued from page 38) that Joe DiMaggio planned to check in a day early. The dreamy look left her eyes.

"Honest?"

"Not honest," he covered himself. "It's just what I heard."

"Maybe you heard something I didn't," she said, anxiously.

"No, I don't think so. After all, you talk to him every day, don't you?"

"Every day," she agreed, "when he can get a call through." Then she added as an afterthought, "If for no other reason, we'll probably get married to cut down on the long distance telephone expense."

Marilyn grinned as though she had a secret all her own. That secret may be that she and Joe are already married. Nobody could swear to that, although Louella Parsons may confirm it one day in an exclusive scoop. It is safe to say, though, that no girl's heart ever belonged as thoroughly to any man as Marilyn's does to Joe. If they have some complications, they have already been settled, spiritually and mentally.

"What's to be so nervous about?" he asked her as they discussed Joe's arrival. "Everybody has been telling me how relaxed you are."

"I'd be relaxed," she flashed, "if Joe were here."

An assistant director on the set of River Of No Return called her, and she walked toward the camera with that deliberate, slouchy gait that has become so famous. If she had been Betty Grable or Jane Russell, somebody would have whistled. But they wouldn't whistle at Marilyn. The easygoing fun and harmless wolf passes accorded a glamorous star aren't tossed her way. Because, clearly, she is deeply in love and would resent any of the rough fun that passes for nothing when a star has been married a long time. Then it's a mark of respect. Now, Marilyn behaves like a bride, and the studio crew treats her like one.

THIS was a scene in which Rory Calhoun and Marilyn were caught on a raft running wild down the churning Athabasca River. Bob Mitchum is supposed to toss them a rope, r'ar back on his steed and pull them to shore. When Marilyn walked past Bob, for just a moment he started to register some overt, masculine appreciation. He didn't. He never even dropped a lazy eyelid in her direction, and Mitch usually does that with every female in the cast.

It took an hour to go through the scene. On one occasion, Marilyn slipped into the river. Casually, Bob pulled her out. It was a little thing, but big enough to make headlines in the next day's newspapers.

That night, back at the location lodging, Marilyn chatted for a few minutes after dinner.

"Coming over to the tavern, tonight?" someone asked.

"No, thanks," she replied. "I've got some work to do."

Now, almost every other member of the cast was there that night, and to be friendly, Marilyn would normally have dropped in. Everybody knew she was waiting to hear from Joe. It isn't that Marilyn isn't a trouser, or couldn't be—it's just that building a career which will make up for all that flamboyant, early publicity is the important thing with her, just now. The career—and Joe.

At five o'clock the next morning, the camp was up and roaring in order to catch the private train which had to leave at 6:30 to reach the location scene in time for early shooting. Everyone was aboard on time, but Marilyn. She showed up almost fifteen minutes later. If her fellow workers wanted to complain, they didn't. There were no wisecracks. Apparently, everyone knows that Marilyn is living in a world of her own.

At times, she snaps out of it, though, and does extra favors for people—as she did for the engineer and the Canadian Pacific Railway people who wanted her to pose with their train. She made like a switchman, a brakeman and a conductor.

There's something new with Marilyn. Instead of her short haircut, she showed up with golden strands hanging twenty inches down her back. The visitor exclaimed in amazement, "Where did you get that hair?"

"Makeup department, of course," she replied. "They put it on for me, every day, because I have to wear my hair with a bun in the back and there's not enough of it. Now I like it long, so at the end of the day I just let it down and parade around as if it were my own. When I get some time off between pictures I'm going to sit around and grow my own."

She looked at him gravely to see if he understood that she was kidding. Much of what this girl tosses off, ad lib, is considered dumb or accidental by some listeners, razor blade wit, by others.

easy money!

MARILYN doesn't appear to be overly enthusiastic about the rugged life in the north woods. After all, she has just settled down in a magnificent little apartment on Doheny Drive in Beverly Hills, and it has all the comforts that she never has known before. She's hardly the type whose idea of fun is getting up for a before-dawn breakfast ride, but she did fool the boys when they asked her to pose with a horse. The horse took one look at her and plainly fell in love. They nuzzled each other for fifteen minutes, to the delight of all cameras present.

In a way, Marilyn is a little pathetic. She's so darned pretty and sexy-looking that everyone expects her to be stupid in the bargain. She isn't. She obviously follows every direction and suggestion made by her coach, Natasha. For two days I watched for director Otto Preminger to blow his top. He is a shrewd, always fair, but sometimes extremely sarcastic veteran. On some takes it was obvious that he wasn't getting things his way. But he patiently did the scenes until he was satisfied. It's problematical whether the finished version belongs to him or to Natasha, to whom Marilyn is so intensely loyal.

That's the word—loyal. That's the way Marilyn Monroe is to Joe DiMaggio, too. She is like the bride waiting for her new husband to come home, behaving as though no matter what his excuse for being late, it's all right with her. But in this case, "the bride" is always working late, and she isn't going to let anyone whisper to Joe one legitimate word of real or imaginary misbehavior on her part. She's loyal and in love, and she doesn't care who knows it. END

Meyer Mishkin rapped on the hotel door and entered. Meyer is Jeff's agent. He hero-worships Jeff, his most profitable client, and spends most of his working day in an effort to convince the world that Chandler is the kindest, greatest, most talented actor on earth.

"Here is a for instance," Meyer will explain to a reporter, "about Jeff's versatility. You think he can only act? You're wrong. Did you hear him with Peggy Lee on the radio? Nothing but sensational. She asked him to come back again. Not as an actor, as a singer. Chandler is also a singer, a great voice. He was in Chicago recently, plugging his picture. Vic Damone was on the stage. He called Jeff up. They sang a duet and brought the house down. Now they want Jeff to sign a recording contract. Make records. I'm telling you. The guy is sensational."

Meyer Mishkin, the cheer leader, is also a perceptive man. When he entered the room, he knew at once that Jeff was unhappy.

"Just spoke to Marge," Chandler said. He shook his head, and by that one movement, Meyer understood that between Jeff and Marjorie it was all over.

THE following morning, the news came out of Hollywood. Mr. and Mrs. Jeff Chandler had decided to call it quits. The studio issued the brief announcement.

The truth, of course, is that Jeff and Marjorie decided to separate before he left for New York, but no one else knew about it.

While Jeff was on tour, he phoned Marge every night to ask about the children. In his heart, he hoped that he might effect a reconciliation.

When announcement of the Chandlers' impending divorce was made in Hollywood, reporters, remembering that Mrs. Chandler two years before had called off divorce proceedings against her husband, wondered if she might not do the same thing again.

"This isn't just a separation," Jeff's wife explained. "I think we've had it. Jeff has moved to an apartment in Westwood, and I'm here in the house with the children.

"What caused the break? Another woman? No, nothing like that. Nothing like that, at all. Just a bunch of little things. Incompatibility covers it. It's been two years this month since we reconciled. We tried. We really did. Very hard. Call it differences in personality, temperament, outlooks. We just can't see eye-to-eye on the things that count.

"Jeff is a wonderful man, and we're both adjusting to the situation. No, I haven't got a lawyer yet. The same lawyer I used last time? I don't know. We're going about this whole thing very slowly. There's always time for a divorce. He's in no big hurry to get one and neither am I.

"Will it be one of those Nevada quickies? I don't think so. In fact, I'm sure it won't. We'll get the divorce in California."

Marjorie Hoshelle Chandler was under contract to Warner Brothers long before her husband first set foot on a sound stage. She was asked if she contemplated a renewal of her career.

"I think so," she said. "I'm the kind of girl who needs to be busy. I like to have a lot to do. With my children and any jobs I can pick up, I should keep occupied."

"When you file for a divorce," a reporter asked, "what will the grounds be?"

Marjorie thought for a moment. "I guess it'll have to be one of those mental cruelty things."

"You mean," the reporter said, "that no one is going to give out with the real reasons."

"It has been very nice speaking to you," Mrs. Chandler said.

WHEN Jeff was approached and asked to comment on the divorce, he shrugged his broad shoulders. "What can I say?" he asked. "It just didn't work out."

But there are others in Hollywood, friends and acquaintances of the Chandlers, who have much to say.

One radio actor, for example, who has known the Chandlers ever since Jeff got his start on the Our Miss Brooks show, says, "I think it's a case of jealousy, pure and simple. Two acting careers in one family never work. Marge used to be much bigger than Jeff. So what happens? She becomes the wife and mother and he becomes the star and the celebrity. Unconsciously, she resents that."

"Look," an actress points out, "I know women, and I understand what makes them tick. Marge Chandler is the kind of girl who dies a thousand deaths every time Jeff hits the road."

"Marge Chandler has been in show business a long time. She's nobody's fool. She knows all the angles. She has friends. She hears what Jeff is doing wherever he is. She knows that girls go nuts over her guy. My feeling is that the minute she lost sight of Jeff, she began to worry."

"Mind you, I'm not saying this is exactly what happened between Marge and Jeff. I'm just suggesting the possibility based on my own analysis of the situation."

IN ALL fairness to Mrs. Chandler, it must be pointed out that when a man and wife separate in Hollywood, the person who is under contract to a studio usually receives the better press. Studios must protect their investments and cannot afford to have their stars subjected to close scrutiny.

This, for example, is what happened with Shirley Temple and John Agar. To this day, Agar has never given his version of their marriage and divorce. "I would never do anything to hurt Shirley," he said.

Marjorie Chandler feels the same way about Jeff, which is why, in the interest of fair play, it is equitable to hear from a director who believes that in every marital failure, blame may be attributed to both parties.

"I like Jeff," this director points out, "and as actors go, he's a pretty nice guy. He's level-headed. He has both feet on the ground, and he has a good mind. But let's face it. He has changed. He has arrived."

"The guy has confidence in himself. He knows he's a star. Whatever humility he once had—well, it's gone. There's nothing wrong with that. It's inevitable. Same thing has happened to a lot of kids who were born poor. They may deny it, but money makes a lot of difference to them. It introduces them to a new kind of life. Humility is not one of its large components."

"Jeff got himself a wonderful agent in Meyer Mishkin. What I'm waiting for is the day that Meyer goes up to Jeff and in all honesty says, 'Jeff, you know that last performance you gave? Well, it wasn't great.' I'm waiting for that sort of objective appraisal. Idolatry is what most actors love and what they receive from the subordinates around them. Especially Jeff! He may step out of line once or twice, but who is going to tell him? Well, I think Marge told him and told him in candor and honor and objectivity. And I think his vanity was hurt. That's how quarrels start, and sometimes they never stop."

"Also—and this is very important—there comes a point in a woman's life when she realizes that her husband no longer needs 22 her advice. He's a big shot. He has got it made. His stardom is achieved and from here on in, if necessary, he can go it alone. There was a time when Jeff needed his wife's advice, her encouragement, the benefit of her experience. That's no longer true, and Marge knows it. The realization must hurt."

"Marriage is very tough for a career woman. She is torn by two instincts, the maternal one and the professional one. She wants fame, and still, she wants to take care of her children, to supervise their growing up. It's very tough."

"I've been very long-winded about it, I know. But I just want to be sure that you don't make Marge out to be all wrong and Jeff to be completely right. There is always that temptation when you write about a movie star. We forget that movie stars are also made of flesh and blood and have weaknesses as well as virtues."

Now, Jeff Chandler would be the first to

I SAW IT HAPPEN

When Rosemary Clooney came back for a visit to her hometown of Maysville, Kentucky, we were standing on a wall watching her dedicate a street in her name. admit that. I remember not too long ago when he was discussing his first break with Marge. "A funny thing," he said, "but success can be an influence in any separation. When you're very poor you don't have enough time to analyze and figure out why you're not ecstatically happy all the time. You're too busy making a living. When you do make a few bucks, you have some leisure to stand back and evaluate and criticize. One of my main troubles in my marriage was my moodiness. When something bothered me, I didn't speak out; I clammed up."

WHAT hurts him most about the failure of this, his first marriage, is the effect it will have upon his children. Both he and Marge are children of divorced parents. Jeff's youth, as a matter of fact, is something he has almost succeeded in blocking out of his consciousness. It was tragic, jammed with heartache, and he hates to think about it, much less to talk about it.

So more than anything else, he wants his two little girls to enjoy a normal childhood. If there should be another reconciliation, the welfare of his daughters would be his primary motivation. One of Jeff's most acute little sorrows lies in the fact that he was separated from Marge and away from home when his daughter, Dana, began to mutter her first few words. It was Dana, too, who didn't recognize her daddy in 1951, when he landed at Los Angeles International Airport. Marge and Jeff had decided on a reconciliation over the long distance phone. When Chandler pulled in from New York, Marge and the two girls were on hand to greet him. Only Dana had to be told who her daddy was.

A sensitive man, Jeff remembers all this with poignancy and pain. He remembers the glowing pride and the wonderful hope when, seven years ago, he and Marge were married in the home of their friends, Mr. and Mrs. Ralph Solloway, in Beverly Hills.

Jeff had been out of the Army only one year. He had practically no money, and Marge married him because she loved him and for no other reason. They spent their honeymoon in a motel out in North Hollywood. It was a small motel off Ventura Boulevard. No scenery. No de luxe accommodations. Only the smell of gasoline and the roaring of the trucks bound north for San Fernando. But they cherished every minute of it, and when it was over, they moved into a one-room apartment in Hollywood. No kitchen. One Murphy bed. A small hotplate. Seventy dollars a month and plenty of love.

The early years were the good years, so good, in fact, that the Chandlers were remarried in Glendale, a second ceremony just in case there had been some legal hitch in the first. And then there was the little house they bought on Jeff's G.I. Loan, and the arrival of little Jamie, and Jeff's contract at Universal and another deal at 20th Century-Fox. It all seemed too good to last. And it didn't.

After five years and two daughters there was a separation. It lasted seven months, and in that time Jeff learned that he was in demand with the ladies. It was very flattering to have many of the biggest names in the business make a play for him. But as he says, "I found it was no substitute for marriage."

So he called Marge from the east, and they both agreed to let bygones be bygones. Marge had bought a new home, and she introduced Jeff to the domestic staff. He felt a little awkward at first, especially with his new daughter, Dana, but gradually he got used to it. After three months, it seemed to all of the Chandlers that Jeff had never been away and they were very happy.

THEN Chandler's contract was renewed by Universal at a large increase. The studio rushed him into one picture after another. His fan mail tripled. He began to dream up a Jeff Chandler comic book. Demands for benefit appearances grew geometrically.

Jeff decided to branch out. He began to take singing lessons. And his marriage began to crumble. One columnist said it was because he worked too hard. Another expressed the opinion that Jeff's agent who was also Marge's, should spend less time praising Jeff and more time finding jobs for Marge. Other bystanders declared that Marge was jealous, Jeff was jealous, Marge was ambitious, Jeff was flirting, Marge was an extrovert, Jeff was an introvert, Marge was retreating, Jeff was developing, Marge was frustrated, Jeff was neurotic, and on and on ad nauseum.

Quarrels at the Chandler household became incessant and all of the Chandlers were unhappy. One night Marge and Jeff decided it was senseless to continue. Perhaps they were mismatched. Whatever it was, their unhappiness was certain to tell eventually on their children. This, neither of them wanted.

Secretly, Jeff hoped to bring off another reconciliation via long distance telephone. In New York, just before he returned to the coast to do Yankee Pasha, he learned that he hadn't a chance. The die was cast and the announcement was made.

Fortunately, Jeff and Marge are mature, intelligent adults who decline to lead their private lives in public. As a result their marital difficulties have never inspired fault-finding, recrimination, or name-calling.

It is sorrow enough for both of them to realize that after seven years their marriage will end in a divorce court. This is a high price to pay for success, but it is the price Hollywood chronically demands. END

"hi, honey—so long, dear"

(Continued from page 35) Lydia Heston can rattle off half a hundred upsetting domestic contretemps like those, brewed by the zig-zag, water spider pattern on their ten years of hectic, but still happy, married life. There was the time for example, when Lydia, after a year-and-a-half's separation from her Charlie, came back from a Chicago run with Detective Story—all set for a few cozy months of married life in Manhattan. When she boarded the train, she was sure Chuck would be still safely involved in his tv work.

But when he met her in Grand Central Station he was lugging a suitcase.

"Well!" she gasped, "where are you going?"

"Hollywood! Got a contract at Paramount." It was the first she'd heard about that. What's more, his west-bound train left in exactly one hour—so the long anticipated home life turned out to be a couple of stools at a coffee shop while crowds of people scuffed suitcases around their toes, redcaps dashed in and out and the clock hands circled ominously.

About the time you read this, too, the big, blond bruiser will be giving a hasty bear hug to his cute life's companion and dropping her off a flight from Bermuda in Chicago before he hustles back west to finish High Andes in Hollywood, while Lydia opens on a Windy City stage in The Seven Year Itch. For all she knows, the run might be seven days, seven weeks, seven months or seven years—but the itch to get back together will still be there, as indeed it has been ever since the Hestons swore their hurry-up marriage vows back in 1944—and two weeks later lost each other for two long years via Air Force duty in the Aleutians for Chuck. Their "Hi, Honey—So long, Dear" domestic pattern has been more or less the same ever since, and seems a good bet to continue.

Meanwhile, they've got two separate sets of furniture on two coasts, two Packards parked 3000 miles apart, two complete wardrobes, right down to lipstick and shaving kits, two maids who've never seen each other, and sets of unacquainted friends in the three first cities of the land.

Now, all this sounds like a sure-fire formula for domestic disaster. It's certainly true that the Hestons have had the odds stacked against their married life.

"Goodnight" is too often relayed over telephone wires, and on at least one anniversary, Chuck and Lydia actually passed each other in mid-air, headed in different directions. It's true, too, as previously hinted, that there are moments of long distance stress and strain, misunderstandings, and mixups brought about by their stop-and-go home lives. Not long ago, Chuck invited forty-five people to a gala dinner completely unknown to Lydia, then breezed off east on some career summons. She was amply paid back for the day she hopped away from New York, leaving him to prepare food and drink for the eighty-five guests set to swarm into their flat.

But none of these harassments seem to have altered the firm status of a happy union which one of their best friends, Jan Sterling, calls, "so perfect it's a little embarrassing." There's only one word to explain it—love—but it's two kinds of love, love for each other and love for the thing that's terribly important to them both—acting.

That might sound a little on the serious side, considering the subjects—a deceptively Dulcy faced girl who's as full of beans as a Boston belle and a super-charged husky whom one critic recently described as "A 3-D Mister Coffeeneerves." Chuck and Lydia Heston maintain a life of love on the run without wilting in the race because all their lives they've never been in love with anyone in the world but each other. And all their lives they've never really wanted to do anything else but act.

Seventeen-year-old Charlton Carter Heston first met Lydia Clarke, or rather stared boorishly at the back of her pretty neck, in a drama class at Northwestern University. He had never had a date in his life. "And, to tell the truth," says Lydia, "he looked it." She got this impression when she turned the neck in surprise at a statement Chuck made regarding a play they had studied, and about which the instructor asked for critical comment. The voice back of her boomed, "It's skeletal," as Lydia remembers, and when she swivelled around to see just who came up with that, she thought, "Brother, so are you!"

Charlton had gone to a one-room school in the backwoods of the Michigan peninsula where the ink froze in the inkwells. That's where he was born and spent his boyhood. It's a boyhood that Chuck Heston still looks back on today with a fond longing tugged by strong family roots. The 1300 acres and the hunting lodge, that he recently bought for a get-away is part of a whole wild county which his speculator grandpa bought up for taxes years ago. Russell Lake, on his place, is named after Chuck's dad.

As a kid in this wilderness, Charlton (that's his mother's maiden name) had roamed happily around by himself, lugging a string of rusty traps, for muskrat and beaver. He tangled with scrappy bass on a bamboo pole, was trusted with a .22 almost as soon as he could go out alone.

At eight, he'd been lost in the woods—no light matter, even for adults, in that country—but got home by himself, following a flight of ducks for direction.

But there weren't many kids around to play with. About the only girl he ever knew was his little sister, Lilla. Chuck was a lone wolf, hunting his romance in adventure books, then going out to his woodsy hiding spots and pretending to be every character in the tattered volumes. "There's no doubt in my mind," Chuck says, "that my acting kick started in those days. I was acting all the time. I never did anything else."

Once, spurred by an adventure tale, he wrapped up a book and an apple inside a shirt, tied it on a stick for bandle and set out to see the world. Way down the road, about dusk, his father met him, coming home from work.

"Where do you think you're going, Son?" he inquired.

"I'm running away," stated Chuck.

"Well, goodbye," said his dad, passing calmly on. That wasn't the way Chuck's script was written. He had envisioned his parents in tragic tears. He turned, ran and caught up and was glad he had when the owls started to hoot.

BOTH Chuck and Lydia had won scholarships to Northwestern University. She wasn't as lost in the clouds as Chuck, and Lydia Clarke arrived in Evanston a much smoother article all around. Undoubtedly, this accounts for her reaction to Chuck after she had given in to his awkward advances and granted a date. Lydia scribbled home to her mother: "I've just gone out with the most uncivilized, crude and rude, wildly untidy, impossible man on the campus!"

With that impression, naturally Charlton Heston's first and only dream girl gave him a pretty hard time, or if you prefer Chuck's description, she was "interestingly combative." When he pestered this contrary cutie with reckless, absurd proposals she would yawn, "I'm just not interested in getting married."

"Well," he'd press, "if you ever did get married, do you think you'd be interested in marrying somebody like me?"

"Not possibly!" she'd dust him off, but in the end Chuck outhammered her.

At that time, he was running the night elevator in a swank North Shore apartment house, inhabited mainly by rich, retired tenants. You could tell just about when they'd go out and when they'd come in. There were long, idle hours when Chuck could stalk out of his cage and emote to the overstuffed furniture in the lobby. Sometimes a querulous guest would ring to ask if somebody was being murdered, but usually it worked out fine. At Christmas, too, there was a jackpot of tips which added up to the magnificent sum of $75 and gave Chuck his chance to make an impression on his reluctant lady love.

He took the $75, rented a swank suit of tails, top hat and boiled shirt. Then he called up Lydia at the campus cafeteria where she worked. She almost dropped a stack of plates when he invited her to do the town. "We'll dress, of course, white tie and all that" she actually heard this untamed bumpkin declare.

They went to the Pump Room at the Ambassador East—Chicago's finest—and even though they rolled down and back on the bus it was pretty high style. The awkward moment of the evening came when the captain steered the elegant revelers right past the table of a resident of his building who had unwittingly contributed a ten-dollar tip to this spree and was stunned speechless to see his elevator boy sweep by in full dress and wave a chummy "Hello!" Looking back, Lydia thinks it was then and there that she knew resistance to Chuck was no longer possible. But she didn't let him know that, of course.

In fact, Charlton Heston was quite surprised when a telegram from Miss Lydia Clarke arrived. It stated rather primly and right out of the blue, "I have decided to accept your proposal." Chuck had been canned from his hotel job, but had been picked right up by the Army Air Corps and was in basic training at Greensboro, North Carolina. Lydia had spring vacation coming up. They were married on St. Patrick's Day in Greensboro when Chuck promoted a pass from the sarge by pretending he was an Irishman. Being a pair of true artists, they wandered around town until they spied just the right setting—a church with a white cherry tree blooming in front. They went in and even though it was almost six o'clock, they managed to do it up right.

So—you can see that romance and acting have been twisted together like sweet-peas on a trellis ever since Charlton Heston and his Lydia spotted each other—although usually the peas themselves have been in widely scattered pods. In fact, on Chuck's brief leave the newlyweds took in a theatre performance—and the usher placed them in separate seats! "We should have known then how things were going to be," Chuck grins. Pretty soon he found out for sure. In a matter of days, the groom was at Port Heiden, in the clammy Aleutians, hunched over a radio transmitter, and the bride was back at Northwestern.

When the conquering hero came back he had never looked better in his life. "He weighed 225 pounds," remembers Lydia. "I thought, this is war?"

It was peace. And, of course, peace to Mister and Missus C. C. Heston meant launching a couple of green acting careers—a project guaranteed to reduce overstuffed figures. In the first year, Chuck regained his Lincoln-esque look with no effort at all. He settled with his bride in a shabby furnished room in Chicago. They stored their food in a foot locker, cooked on a hot plate and washed dishes in the bathroom basin. The family budget for feasting was $6 a week.

In New York they lived in a railroad flat in rough, dockside, Hell's Kitchen. It cost $30 a month and it meant sleeping on a bed Chuck had hammered together from a few boards. The Hestons look back from these affluent years on those hungry ones with special tenderness. Until a few months ago, they sentimentally kept the Hell's Kitchen flat as their eastern hangout. They would have it yet, if the city hadn't condemned the building.

The reason is simple. They were together then. The clicking sound in their two careers was also the snapping of their poor, but permanent, home ties. Chuck, for instance, blew off alone to Boston for his first big break in The Leaf And The Branch. When Lydia's turn came with Detective Story, it was back to Chicago for her, with most chances to see her husband coming via a tv set in her dressing room. Then there was Hollywood for one, New York for the other. Separation has been the price of their success.

"It would be silly to say we like it that way," Chuck will tell you honestly. "But," he asks just as earnestly, "what can we do?"

One thing the Hestons could do—if they were the types—would be settle down cozily in Hollywood and never move. Ever since The Greatest Show On Earth, Charlton Heston hasn't had to beg for screen jobs. He's the heroic toughie type who's box-office bait as his jobs in The Savage, Pony Express, Ruby Gentry, The President's Lady, Naked Jungle and others have proved. Lydia did perfectly all right, too, in Atomic City and Scalpel with Chuck. Both are tailor-made for Hollywood's tv radio and the west coast stage stops which are multiplying season by season. Unfortunately, that's not the antidote for their particular acting bugs—as virulent as ever, after all these years.

Chuck's goal is to play Macbeth better than anybody has ever played it. Already, he has done some pretty terrific performances of it, the last being this summer in an ancient British fort hanging over the surf in Bermuda.

By now, Chuck and Lydia Heston are conditioned to settle down like tabby cats wherever they are. But anywhere at all Chuck is in levis or shorts and a T-shirt the minute he slings his bags to the floor.

Except for Charlton's sketching kit, a couple of cameras and the necessities of a peripatetic existence, the Hestons travel light—and they almost live as light as they travel. Long ago, they learned that collecting plunder is just a headache when you're hotfooting around. Luckily, neither is interested in rich trappings or fine feathers. It took Lydia years to talk her husband into investing in two suits. He had a collection of antique ties, hoarded since college days, and as rag-tag as kite tails, which she spirited to their incinerator, replacing the shabby lot with seventeen bright new ones. It almost caused a rift in the family. Probably the only other time Chuck got as riled at his wife was when he impulsively bought her an elegant mink stole as a surprise. But when she opened the fancy box Lydia popped his balloon. "Why, it's a mink stole!" she exclaimed. "I don't need a mink stole. Wherever would I wear one? Take it back."

Both Chuck and Lydia are used to separation rumors and don't get too upset, knowing what the score is with themselves and what they're in for as movie celebrities. They know that as long as they keep hopping here and there, rift rumors are an occupational hazard. But the lack of a solid homelife, as the years tick by, worries them a lot more. For one thing, there's the matter of a family. "Sure, we want kids," Chuck will boom from under a wrinkled brow, "but not in a suitcase." The only live dependent they've owned was their Great Dane, Caesar, whom they parked with Chuck's dad as they rambled around. The big pup died when he was only four. "Ulcers," explained the veterinarian. "Purely from loneliness for you two." So thoughts of a family give them real pause.

In fact, the only way Chuck Heston has figured out to carry on the line is to revert to his rustic beginnings, hole in on the shores of Russell Lake and commute to Hollywood and all directions by rocket plane. The Michigan place is paid for. There's plenty of wood for the fireplaces and the big eight-room lodge could take care of all comers.

"Snows are deep in the winter," muses Charlton Heston at that pipe dream, "and we could just hibernate—like the bears. Lydia could have a baby every spring and I could grow a long beard like Father Abraham." On him it might be becoming, but probably it will be a while before we see it. At twenty-nine, and with things going the way they are, that would be strictly a thought for the hustling Hestons' future.

GREGORY PECK who has been accused of having more girls overseas than an Arab sheik has wives in his harem, is miffed about reports that he was responsible for Audrey Hepburn's wedding cancellation. Audrey, twenty-four, Belgian born and British bred, was scheduled to marry Jim Hanson until she co-starred with Peck in Roman Holiday. After that, she called off her wedding, and gossips attributed her precipitous action to falling in love with Greg.

When questioned about this in Munich, where he is starring in Night People for Nunnally Johnson, Peck said, "Miss Hepburn is an excellent actress. I enjoyed working with her. I know she will be a great success back in the States, and my schedule being what it is, I probably won't run into her for another six months."

Greg was also rumored to have fallen in love with Jane Griffiths, his leading lady in The Million Pound Note. But when the last scene was shot in this film at Pinewood, near London, Miss Griffiths scotched the rumor once and for all by going out and getting married to Gerald Nell-Nichols, company director.

As to his marital status, Peck insists he contemplates no divorce—which is exactly what his wife says. The eldest Peck boy, Jonathan, is scheduled to join his father in Switzerland this Christmas for some skiing provided Greg hasn't returned to Hollywood by then.

PATRICIA NEAL, whose heart was broken when Gary Cooper refused to divorce his Rocky and marry her, was recently in Rome on her honeymoon. She is married to an English writer, Ronald Dohl. Coincidentally, Cooper was in Rome at the same time. He had gone there with his wife and daughter, both Catholics, for an audience with the Pope. Although Pat and Coop lived in hotels less than half a mile apart, they fortunately didn't run into each other. Mrs. Cooper says her husband can have a divorce any time he wants one. He doesn't. It's much safer for an American actor in Europe to remain married, at least technically.

GENE TIERNEY is wearing a five-carat engagement ring from Aly Khan who is being most faithful to her. When Aly was in New York several weeks ago selling some of his father's horses at Saratoga, the only woman he had anything to do with was his ex-wife Rita Hayworth, who refused to let him take their daughter, Yasmin, overseas for a visit. It has been rumored in Paris that Aly's father does not approve of his son's companionship with Gene Tierney. This isn't true. Knowing Aly, he feels that only a European wife might be able to tolerate his son's behavior as a husband. Gene, once married to an Italian dress designer, feels she is well-qualified to get along with Aly Khan who is half-Italian.

CLARK GABLE is no longer making a secret of his love affair with Susanne Dodolle d'Abadie. They're seen all over Paris together and make no effort to avoid publicity. Gable, who knows one sentence in French ("C'est beau."), seems happier now than he has for a long time. He and Susanne took strolls on the Champs-Élysées, and Gable doesn't mind being stopped by the autograph hunters. One afternoon he spent more than an hour signing two hundred autographs, and a smile never left his face.

When asked recently to explain his turnabout in public accessibility, Gable said, "I like France so much that it's just impossible for me to turn down any Parisian. This is a great country and I'm happy to be here for a while."

Susanne, who speaks excellent English, gave up her job as a Schiaparelli model to tour the continent with "the King," is confident that he will marry her eventually.

CHARLES BOYER saddened many hearts in Europe when he announced, "I am through with love. Now I'm going to act my age, which is 53. Love, kisses, the deep voice... can I help it if I am French? But let us have no tears because my lover's role is gone. There are still new horizons to be met." Boyer just finished Madame de X, his first French film since 1937, starring opposite Danielle Darrieux. He says that instead of the lover, he plays the role of the sophisticated husband who struggles to save his son from a cunning lady ambassador.

shocking failure of susan hayward's marriage

(Continued from page 33) My mind went back many years to that time when Susan was pregnant with her twins. She and Jess had a battle royal in front of the Tom May home, following a party. It was a secret she had asked me to keep, and I had.

At that time, as now, she had come to see me; but then she had been forgiving of Jess. She said she was not going to divorce him.

"Jess is miserably unhappy," she had said. "Only I know how miserable. His work has gone against him; there don't seem to be any parts for him in pictures. I don't know why; he's really a good actor."

"Maybe being my husband, sort of a Mr. Susan Hayward, has affected his career. If that's true, I am sorry. The least I can be is understanding."

"I don't believe in divorce. I'm going to fight to keep our marriage together, not only for ourselves, but for the babies we expect. I took a vow when we were married—for better, for worse—and I'm sticking to Jess. I hope for the better from here on in."

I was pleased, after the twin boys were born, that things really seemed much better between Jess and Susan. In the early years of their nine-year marriage, Susan would often see the question in my eyes and she would always assure me, "Things are all right, Louella. Honest!"

Of course, the very big obstacle of Jess' not working was still a large factor and a problem. Always it was Susan who comforted him and sympathized, although it became increasingly difficult, for her own career was zooming. She was one of the most important stars on the 20th lot and was being given outstanding pictures and fine roles.

Now the end was here, and there was no more strength in Susan to keep trying.

HER lovely red hair was moist against her forehead as she sat talking with me across a table in my playroom. I had ordered coffee, and she sipped it gratefully. This girl, I realized, was exhausted, not only physically, after the beating she'd taken, but emotionally and spiritually as well.

Her voice was calmer as she said, "I don't have to tell you that Jess has never contributed any money to my support or to the support of Timothy and Gregory. You know all about that."

"And I know you realize that I was deeply sympathetic with him, at first. I believed him when he said he was an actor and couldn't do anything else. But there must come an end to the unnatural way of living in which the woman is the wage earner and the man sits home with the children."

"The little boys couldn't understand why I got up early every morning and went to work and Daddy stayed home. It was not that way in the homes of the children they played with. Children can be cruel. I'm sure their playmates often taunted Greg and Timmy about their father's going to the market and driving them to school, when in their homes it was the mother who did these tasks."

"A mother can give her children love and tenderness, but she cannot set the example of a father, a leader—a man who is head of his home. Boys need to respect their fathers, and Jess was letting things slide to the point where he didn't even try to get work—as an actor or anything else."

"We began to quarrel about this more and more bitterly. Jess would be angry. But this last time it was blind rage."

"I was not only terrified when I saw Jess' fury, but I realized he was trying to ruin my face—the very means by which I earn my living."

"Well, I've already told you what happened: the nightmarish scene at the swimming pool, the police. Then I sneaked away. I had to be by myself for a few days. I knew they were saying I was hiding because of a black eye, but I didn't care. The end has finally come, Louella. There is no turning back."

And what a heartbreaking ending, I thought, to the love story of the gallant, spirited, redheaded little Susie, who was born Edith Marriner in Brooklyn and who came to Hollywood as one of the original contestants for the role Vivien Leigh played in Gone With The Wind.

Of course she did not get the role, but there was to be much glory and success for Susie in Hollywood. Not at first, however. She almost died out as a perennial ingénue and milktoast heroine in many Paramount pictures.

Just about that time, I asked Susan to join some other young starlets for a Hollywood stage act I was going to take on tour for eight weeks, playing all the key cities.

She was delighted to join Jane Wyman, Ronald Reagan, June Preisser, Arleen Whelan and Joy Hodges, and she was her cute, completely honest self when she told me right to my face that she thought being associated with me "will help my career".

You come to know people well when you travel with them, and I was surprised that with all of Susan's luscious, sexy beauty that she was at heart a real Miss Prim, easily shocked by the backstage "stories", even when they were mild. And her feelings were so easily hurt she dissolved into tears if anyone even looked at her crossly.

She seldom went out, even when we hit such big towns as Philadelphia and New York. If she did go, it was usually with a relative or friend from Brooklyn.

She was an ultra moral and conventional little thing, a quality which endeared her to me fully as much as her loveliness and sweetness. Many years have passed since then. I brought myself back to the present and to the heartbroken girl who had once again come to me with her troubles.

She said, "My reputation is highly valuable to me, or I would not be telling these things against the man I have loved for so many years."

"But I am shocked to my soul about some of the terrible stories being circulated about why we separated. What I have told you is the truth."

"Since I first met Jess there has never been any other man for me, and I really believe there has never been any other woman in his life."

A little sigh escaped Susan; she leaned back against the wall and closed her eyes as though she were consciously remembering Jess as he was when they first met and fell in love.

SHE had known Jess when they were both on the Paramount lot, he playing young leads just about as important and lasting as Susie's ingénue parts.

It wasn't a case of love at first sight—but they had much in common, particularly their being on just about the same rung of the ladder of fame.

They began to see more and more of one another and discovered their tastes were delightfully similar. Neither liked the nightclub circuit, both liked to save money and they spent hours driving up the beach roads talking about their careers.

Jess was really more ambitious than Susan. He was (and is) a sensitive actor and he had had a greater sampling of real drama at that time than she.

In 1944, they were married, and to all outer appearances, very happy. They continued their simple manner of life, invested their money and continued to keep abreast in their careers. Then, gradually, so gradually that it was hardly important—Susan began to forge ahead. Success wasn't a blinding thing, in her case. It came, picture by picture, year by year, until today she is one of the most important stars on the 20th lot.

And, picture by picture, year by year, until there were few and then no offers, Jess' career moved backward.

A resentment he must really have felt against fate and himself, Jess began to take out on Susan. They fought frequently and he became very unreasonable about how she spent her money.

"But even then," went on Susan, "there were many wonderful times of happiness between us, particularly after the boys were born.

"Jess can be so charming. He is handsome and young and no one has insisted louder than I that he has real ability as an actor.

"Recently, he has been getting some offers. I hope they keep coming for him. If so, I'm sure Jess will be himself again. He is easily discouraged and he had only three days' work in his new picture."

"If Jess does change, is there any chance of your taking him back, Susan?" I asked. "Perhaps he has learned his lesson."

"No, no," she cried, "Never. It's too late. There have been too many 'lessons,' too many 'new' starts, too many times to forgive. When I could keep things to myself and no one else knew about it, I could take it. But this time there were not only the police, but we had a houseguest, Martha Little, staying with us. She is the sister of one of my old schoolmates from Brooklyn.

"Soon—just as soon as Jess signs the property settlement—I shall take the children to a ranch in Nevada and file for my divorce," she said. And I knew she meant it. "Now that the end has come, I want it over as soon as possible."

She picked up her bag and prepared to leave. She had talked as fully and as much as she could. The wounds were literally so fresh that she could go no further.

But as she rose she said, "There's just one thing, Louella. Despite the sad memory of what brought on our final break, don't be too bitter against Jess in the future. In every marriage breakup there are two sides, and I'm not pretending to paint myself as an angel and Jess as a devil.

"I have a temper and a hot tongue, and I work so hard I'm frequently tired and almost sick with nerves. Movie stars are never easy to live with, and no one knows that better than I."

I said, "I suppose a psychiatrist might say that Jess' sudden violence was a defense mechanism against living in a set of circumstances intolerable to a man's pride, or perhaps a guilt complex from doing nothing about the situation.

"Perhaps, Susie," I added as I walked with her to the door, "Jess' violence was not really directed so much against you as it was against himself."

"Maybe," she replied softly, "I don't know. I just know that my marriage is finished and done with—a sorry, shabby ending to many moments of happiness. My heart aches very much, but it is closed forever on the past." END

(Susan Hayward can be seen in 20th Century-Fox's CinemaScope, Demetrius And The Gladiators.)

love begins at 30

(Continued from page 40) and lit a cigarette. "Being married to Frank Sinatra," he said good-naturedly, "would not exactly simplify any woman's life. Another thing," he added, "Ava's been abroad a great deal of the time. I don't see as much of her as I used to."

Weren't you in London recently?

"Yes, and I saw her there. She had a very nice apartment out at Regent Park and a very nice secretary. And when I was there, Frank was with her."

How were they getting along?

"I will tell you," the executive continued, "Ava gets more beautiful with the passage of time."

Do you think Ava's rid of all those little devils that used to plague her?

The executive thought for several moments. Then he mashed his cigarette in the ash tray. "Well, Ava is happier now than she was five years ago. She has grown up intellectually and emotionally. She has also discovered that as an actress, she has talent. Not so much talent as Sinatra. Did you see Frank in Eternity? A sensational performance. Academy Award caliber. The guy is really great.

"Ava," the producer continued, "has developed her talent through hard work. It's a source of satisfaction to her. What you must never forget about Ava is this: when she came out to Hollywood, she had nothing. She couldn't sing, she couldn't dance, she couldn't act. All she could do was pose for cheesecake. As for her mentality—well, you remember. She didn't show much judgment in her private life.

"But she has come a long way since then. A long, long way. And shall I tell you something? The guy most responsible for her mental development is Artie Shaw. Whatever you say about Artie, you must admit that primarily he's a scholar, a man who worships the intellect, a student of art and literature and good music. In my opinion, he's the one who really developed Ava. He showed her the door to knowledge. He forced her to read books. He made her brain come alive. As a husband, the dames say he's impossible. But certainly, he stimulated their pretty heads. He attracts intellectuals.

"All right, so his friends are all in analysis—that's neither here nor there. The point is that he taught Ava plenty. She began to assess herself, to take stock. Unfortunately, she is more emotional than intellectual. I mean she knows when she's doing wrong or taking chances, but she goes ahead, anyway.

"A few years ago when Sinatra was down in Texas, she knew she shouldn't have flown down to him, but she did, anyway. I'm sure her brain told her not to marry Frank, but her heart told her just the opposite. She listens to her heart.

"Why do she and Frank fight? They both have violent natures; they are both creatures of emotion. Ava is happier now than she has ever been before. Her new contract calls for $5,000 a week for the next five years, so she doesn't have any money worries. She didn't like most of the pictures we put her in, but she's no Garbo. She doesn't like Hollywood because she doesn't have very many friends here. Just Les Koenig, Fran Heffin and a few others. She says she wants six kids, but I don't think she'd ever give up her career.

"Maybe, now that she's financially fixed, she and Frank will adopt a couple of kids. Maybe that's what she needs to fulfill her life. You ask me if, at thirty, Ava Gardner is a happy woman. I think she is happier than she was five years ago, but she is still an unfulfilled woman; she is unrequited. She has found flashes of love but she is still bedeviled.

"As I told you before, that's just my opinion. Why don't you interview her friends and acquaintances? Ask people about Ava. See what they say."

DIRECTORS, producers, publicity men, old friends, old lovers, old schoolmates, shopkeepers, people who somewhere along the line had made contact with Ava Gardner—all had different interpretations of Miss Gardner.

A director said, "I don't know Ava except professionally. She's a good actress if you don't ask too much of her. She is cooperative. She doesn't hold you up, and she's easy to work with. One of these days she's going to get a role she falls in love with, then watch out. She's going to surprise the world. Is she really thirty? You'd never think it."

From a publicity representative: "Ava Gardner is a lot better than some actresses we've handled. You know what they say about actors and actresses—they need you on the way up, and they need you on the way down, and in between you can go to hell. Ava has never been like that. Of late, she has regarded us with a jaundiced eye but the still men swear by her, and you could never call her anything but cooperative.

"She's really a level dame. If she gives you her word, you can count on it. She never pulls rank, either. At heart, she's a nice kid. I'd say that she has given us less trouble than practically any other actress. To a large extent, she owes her success to publicity, and she knows it."

Said one reporter: "She's okay, I guess. I've written about twenty stories on Ava. I've always asked my photographer to get her best angles. Never once has she sent me a thank-you note. I wrote one yarn about her fights with Frank and right away I was the prize heel of all time. A lousy double-crosser. Boy! You should have heard her."

And a man who used to take her out says, "She's a beautiful girl. No doubt about it. But when she's got you on the hook, she can really give it to you. Maybe deep down she hates men. Some of them have given her a hard time. Anyway, I'm glad she's married to Sinatra, and not to me."

An old schoolmate from Newport News, Virginia, says, "I haven't seen Ava Gardner since she was twelve or thirteen. Her family came from North Carolina, I think. I don't know how long they lived in Newport News. She was in my class at school and seemed very shy, almost backward. Maybe it was because she was new. I never thought she would become famous. Just goes to show you."

A fellow-citizen of Grabtown, North Carolina: "She comes from good old stock. Her daddy never made much money. He shared crops around here. I think there were seven kids in the family. Her mother died of cancer a couple of years back. A fine woman she was. They say she was plumb crazy about her brother, Ava was. Family kinda scattered now. Lot of nephews and nieces. They all speak very well of her. She used to send money home. Very proud of Ava Gardner in North Carolina. She and Kay Kyser. Right nice girl, Ava Gardner. They say she married that Italian crooner fellow, Perry Como, or somebody like that."

A Hollywood girl who knows Ava well:

"Ava's a doll, a beautiful doll. Not a phony thing about her. Speaks her mind. When L. B. Mayer tried to take care of her because she was dating Frank, she told him right off, told him, but good. Anything she's got she's earned the hard way. She's very honest. She thinks that making movies is a whole lot easier than working at a typewriter. She doesn't mind saying so, either. None of this dramatic coach business with her. She calls the shots as she sees them."

A BRITISH newspaperman reports, "Ava's a good interview, speaks frankly, once in a while claims she's being misquoted. I was down in Africa with her on that Mogambo location. I heard some funny stories about her and Sinatra. I don't know how true they are, but here's one.

"One night when she and Frank were way out on location—no cities or towns nearby—they got into a battle royal. I've had it," Frankie said. "I'm finished. I'm getting out." And with that, he walked out into the jungle. Incredible! Where could he have gone?

"I think they wanted Lana Turner for that picture, originally, and I don't think Ava was a particular favorite of the director, John Ford, but she gave an excellent performance. The British fans like her quite well. She had an apartment in London when she was there, and she had English friends.

"I understand she suffers from an inferiority complex and is wary of people. Oddly enough, she never seems especially happy. Do you think her marriage with Frank Sinatra will last? Over here, we don't."

A Hollywood actor indulges in a little professional jealousy, perhaps. "I judge Ava on the record. She married Mickey Rooney in 1942. She divorced him in 1943. She got $25,000 for her heartache. She married Artie Shaw in 1945, divorced him in 1946. She got $5,000, a liberal education, and an introduction to psychiatry. I read all the time about this poor, fear-ridden, insecure little girl from North Carolina. This poor lil' ole Ava honey-chile is gettin' five grand a week, and I wish I were she. I can't work up one ounce of sympathy for Ava."

A Hollywood agent discusses her: "Ava's a sweetie but when it comes to men, she has no judgment at all. She is attracted to men in show business because she speaks their language. That's why she married Rooney, Shaw, and Sinatra.

"My wife said to me only the other day, 'Ava Gardner should have married a doctor,' and I said, 'And what would she have talked to him about?' With people in other professions—doctors, engineers, lawyers, scientists—Ava feels strange. She doesn't belong with them.

"She's like Lana Turner. They are lusty, frank, down-to-earth, laugh it up, live it up, tell-him-off girls. Ava has a lot of bounce; so has Lana. An unhappy marriage? Okay, try again. These girls go out and do things."

Another former escort from Hollywood says, "Ava likes the simple things, informal clothes, plain food, staying at home and having a good time. In Hollywood she stays out of the night clubs now. She's crazy about kids and if she has any sense she'll adopt a few. Joan Crawford has four, and they keep her darn busy between pictures. That's what Ava needs. From Here To Eternity should make it easier for Frank to get jobs in town. Maybe he won't have to be on the road so much, and maybe Ava won't have to spend so much time worrying about him. Both of them are truly wonderful people, and I hope they do settle down and be happy now."

audrey hepburn

(Continued from page 53) This type of interview had its limitations, of course, for there is no possibility of a normal flow of conversation. The reporter remembered Miss Hepburn's dignified manner in Roman Holiday, and began with "Well, Miss Hepburn, I'm going to have to ask you a lot of sassy questions."

If she objected to such personal questions, fired at her for a solid half hour by an utter stranger six thousand miles away, her reply gave no sign of it. Her answering tape arrived from England within a few weeks, and was equally long and extremely gracious in tone. The most immediately remarkable thing about it was her voice. Having been educated in England she speaks with the precise and clipped diction of the British, yet there is something so soft, almost sleepy, about her voice that it is enchanting. It is unfortunate that, along with a report of the questions and answers, it is not possible to allow the reader to hear this voice. It is expressive, sometimes lilting in laughter, sometimes, when speaking of tragic things, barely audible. Maybe you can imagine it as you read her answers.

Q. Would you describe the house near Brussels in which you lived as a child? What was your father's occupation? Did you have any brothers or sisters?

A. The house we lived in outside Brussels was a very charming, quite large country house where I lived with my father and mother and my two brothers, both of whom are older than myself. My father was a businessman. I was very fond of my brothers. We had the normal squabbles, but they were always happy ones.

Q. Were your parents strict, or do you feel you were spoiled? Were you a tomboy? Do you think you were particularly difficult to raise?

A. My mother, I think, has brought me up as well as any mother ever does. I think she did a wonderful job, with three children, and I don't feel she was over-strict or that we were spoiled. She brought us up in a very natural, healthy way.

I don't think I was a tomboy. I'd say I was a rather moody child, quiet and reticent, and I liked to be by myself a great deal—which made me quite an easy child to raise. Nevertheless I needed a great deal of understanding, which I always got from my mother.

Q. You were sent to school in England? Did you like school?

A. I was. I went to a little private school in England as, at the time, we were living in Belgium and my mother thought it was right for me to speak English, being brought up as an English child. I spent the first years of my life there, with periods back home either in Belgium or wherever my parents happened to be at the time.

"Did you like school?" you ask me. Well, I liked the children and my teachers, but I never liked the process of learning. I was very restless and could never sit for hours on end, learning things. I enjoyed learning the subjects I liked—I always loved history and mythology and astronomy—but I hated anything to do with arithmetic or that sort of thing. School in itself I found very dull and I was happy when I finished.

Q. Your biography says you were ten when the war broke out and your mother took you back to Holland, where you later studied ballet. Why did you attend school in Holland under a Dutch name? What about your entertaining in Underground concerts to raise money for the Dutch resistance movement?

A. Actually, my mother was in Holland when the war broke out, and I was at school in England. I flew over to join my mother in Arnhem—that was Christmas of 1939, just before the Germans entered Holland—because things were beginning to blow up all over Europe, and Mother thought the safest place for a child of ten was with her mother, after all. No one knew where it was safest at the time.

Yes, I did go to school under a Dutch name. I used my mother's name because it wasn't too good an idea to draw attention to the fact that I was English. My nationality just might have got me into trouble.

I was there all during the war, and I started studying ballet very soon after I arrived in Holland. I had taken various lessons in England and loved dancing, and once I'd started in Holland, I decided I wanted to be a ballerina. I had a rather sketchy and erratic training because of the war. Malnutrition stopped me on one hand, and conditions got more and more difficult.

I did indeed give various Underground concerts to raise money for the Dutch resistance movement. I danced at recitals, designing the dances myself. I had a friend who played the piano and my mother made the costumes. They were very amateurish attempts, but nevertheless at the time, when there was very little entertainment, it amused people and gave them an opportunity to get together and spend a pleasant afternoon listening to music and seeing my humble attempts. The recitals were given in houses with windows and doors closed, and no one knew they were going on. Afterwards, money was collected and given to the Dutch Underground.

Q. Would you tell me about your family and your life during the war? Did your family suffer any hardships because of it? Didn't the English parachute into Holland near your town of Arnhem in an attempt to deliver the Dutch from the Nazis?

A. I couldn't really talk about the war without talking for hours. It's five years out of my life. I was living there and saw the landing and was there all during the fighting.

Q. An impertinent question. Are your parents still living, and if so, are they still married? I ask this because your biography mentions only your mother in your later life. Does the family still own the home outside Brussels?

A. No, they are not. I mean, they are divorced. They are both living. No, we don't own the home now.

Q. When you went to England in 1948, did you go alone? How did you get the part in High Button Shoes?

A. Yes, I went alone to England. It wasn't until I had my first job, in High Button Shoes, that I was able to afford the luxury of having my mother come over. At the time, there was a great deal of restriction where money was concerned, and I couldn't get any money out of Holland. I did an audition for High Button Shoes and, with many other girls, was put through my paces and then was engaged by the producer of the show at the time—a man called Archie Thompson—who gave me my first real break.

Q. How old were you when you came to America to do Gigi on Broadway? Did you sail or fly? Would you tell me your impression of New York? Was there anything in particular you wanted to see, or eat, or experience in the States? How did our cities impress you? What did you like about Americans the most?

A. I was twenty-two when I went to New York to do Gigi. I sailed, especially, as I wanted to approach America by sea for the first time, and was dying to see the New York skyline and the famous Statue of Liberty. Of course it was my luck that we arrived about three o'clock in the morning. It was pitch dark, and I stood freezing in a nylon nightie in front of my porthole, and saw nothing.

I had a great day. I was shown New York, and went to my first baseball game immediately. Within two hours of my arrival in New York, I was standing in the Yankee Stadium, cheering my head off at a great game which I knew nothing at all about, but found very exciting. Naturally, I wanted to see everything, but I wanted to absorb America slowly, to take it as it is, as everybody sees it and lives it. The food? Well, I must say—all those steaks! Very exciting! Incidentally, they did a great deal for my health as I needed them at the time, and I've been a much healthier person since.

The cities showed me America. We went through Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Detroit, Chicago, Washington, Wilmington, Richmond, Los Angeles, Seattle, San Francisco. San Francisco's a great city, isn't it? Oh, boy! I found it exciting to see America this way—working my way across—and thought it particularly exciting because each city was so different. It was like arriving in a different country each time.

I liked the unaffectedness of the Americans. They're warm, they're kind, and whatever they've got to say, they say it.

Q. Were you homesick when you were making Gigi? Tell me about your meeting with William Wyler.

A. Never. I was too happy to be homesick. I was too excited about what I was doing. This was something I'd been longing for all of my life. I would have loved my mother to have been with me, and to have seen it all with me, but otherwise there was too much to be grateful for to nibble away at it with petty homesickness.

Mr. Wyler came to London and I met him and his wife at his hotel. We talked about the picture and he agreed I could be tested for it. I made the test, which he arranged for me, as he wasn't able to stay in London, and it wasn't long before I heard the great news I could do Roman Holiday and that I was under contract with Paramount.

Q. Did you enjoy making Roman Holiday, and American methods of picture-making?

A. The American method of picture-making was slightly diluted by the Roman and Italian atmosphere. I don't think I'll get the real American method until I work in Hollywood. I thought it was a great combination—good Hollywood organization with a bit of Roman sunshine thrown in. We had great fun, and it was a fantastic experience.

Q. Has anyone ever told you that you resemble Gregory Peck? Some people here have said your face looks like a feminine version of his.

A. I must say I haven't noticed, because I've never thought of it. I'd like to think so because—I mean, he's a pretty good looking man. Isn't he?

Q. Do you consider London your home?

A. London is my home. We have a little apartment here and my mother lives here. But I'm quite used to the idea now that I shall be commuting for the rest of my life—I hope—between America and England. I hope to spend a lot of my time in New York. I love New York. I'd love to settle there. I love San Francisco and it's a beautiful city, but you can't compare the two. I like New York because there you're in the center of things. Whatever's going on in the world seems to sort of center around New York. People pass through, and I have the theatre there. If it were not for the theatre, I might very well live in San Francisco.

Q. What about your appetite? What are your favorites?

A. I don't say I eat a lot. I eat small meals, but I love to eat quantities of the things I like. I love meat. I love a steak. And I adore sweets and chocolate and things like that. But I try to take myself in hand.

Q. How about reading? How much? What type of thing?

A. I read as much as I possibly can, not as much as I'd like to. Anything, as long as it's by a good writer. My great hero has always been Rudyard Kipling—right now I'm a fan of Graham Greene's. I've found that my life has been spent so much in ballet class or studios or working that I haven't spent as much time in studying these things as I'd like to. In short, I'd like to see and read and know a lot more than I do, and I'm working hard on it.

Q. What about love life? What can you say about your romantic life and your ideas on it?

A. Oh, boy. (pause) I've been asked the question often enough—I should know the answer. Everybody knows I was engaged and no longer am, at this point. I've not as yet discovered a way to combine a career and married life, both of which are full time jobs and entail a great deal of responsibility because mainly they involve other people. It would be simple if it involved only one's self. You've got to be pretty sure, and to be able to say with certainty that you can cope with the combination, and until I find a way of doing that, I don't think I dare get married. Right now I'm still pretty level-headed about it. I'm not a great girl for going out with a lot of people. I have my particular friends and like to see a lot of them. This is all a lot of talk—you realize that, don't you? One day I'll just fall in love and get married, career or no career. That doesn't mean I wasn't in love last time—I was very much so. Perhaps too much so to dare embark on a life I didn't know too much about. Well—at this point I'm free lance, and I think it's the best.

Q. What about Sabrina Fair?

A. I read the stage play but haven't yet read the screen script. I love the story, I love the idea. I think Paramount bought it for me partly because I like it so, and I'm very happy about the whole idea—and that Billy Wilder is going to direct. How lucky can a girl be? She makes her first picture with William Wyler and her next with Billy Wilder. It almost seems too good to be true, and I'll try to live up to all this.

I'd like to add something to this now I've finished it. Dear Miss Wilkie, I want to thank you very much for this interview. On hearing it played back, I find it rather incoherent and hope you will forgive me for being so. I do hope to meet you very soon when I come out to Hollywood. I'll say goodbye, and thank you very much.

If Miss Hepburn thinks she gave an incoherent interview, she should know that the most vitriolic profiles ever written were those in which the writer reported verbatim the conversation of his subject. It is an unflattering method, usually. Miss Hepburn had no idea her replies would be set down verbatim (and they wouldn't have been if she had been less competent). Yet she comes out of it a charming and articulate girl.

At first glance, the story seems to give little besides the statistics of Audrey Hepburn's life. Examined more closely, it establishes the fact that she is a girl of tact and refinement. She is a grateful and devoted daughter. The utter silence on the subject of her father suggests that the family rift disturbed her considerably, yet she has the taste to bypass the subject. She is a candid person, being one of the few actresses to admit delight when school was over, and to admit a feeling of inadequacy where self-education is concerned. Reading between the lines, one understands that Miss Hepburn suffered considerably during the war, yet she does not dwell on the fact. She glosses over the fact that she has been a victim of malnutrition, that she was a spectator of bloody fighting, and that today she can't get enough meat or chocolate. She treats lightly the fact that she contributed to the Dutch resistance movement, an activity for which she could have been caught and put into a concentration camp. She modestly neglected to answer questions that would necessitate a bit of boasting—such things as her linguistic ability and the extent of her travels. She discloses a delightful sense of humor, a zest for life, a sincere liking for Americans and the adoption of American slang. She seems to be a self-reliant, ambitious and courageous girl who has a deep capacity for love. Her recent engagement to a wealthy British businessman is discussed, however briefly, in a frank and refreshing manner, and her ideas about marriage would prove her to be an unusually thoughtful girl.

This is all we know. This, and the description of people who have met her. They are the only ones, at this writing, who are capable of describing her in terms slightly new to the Hollywood vocabulary. They include coquettish, saint-like, alluring, hoydenish, disarming, sensitive and captivating. The American press will soon be swamped with news about her, but in the interim MODERN SCREEN has copied the first interview for a fan magazine. Despite the revolutionary method of interviewing, it was successful because the new star is, among other things, coherent. END

Rita's forgotten child

(Continued from page 57) room. He beckoned and she darted to his side and put a trusting hand in his. Eduardo Cansino is a kindly man who has worked hard for all of his fifty-odd years. He loves and understands children. A few minutes later, Rebecca was laughing in the tiny kitchenette, while Grandpa was fixing her a cheese sandwich.

THE Cansino dancing studio swarms with children. Eduardo goes through class after class, pointing his stick, demonstrating intricate steps. Between classes, he tucks his castanets into his belt, sits briefly at his desk and goes over his accounts. Some stars are very slow to pay for their children's lessons. Eduardo's life is not easy. "It is strange. They expect me to carry their accounts when they are not working, but so often when they are successful they are too busy to remember to pay me."

Perhaps Eduardo is the most normal influence in the lives of Rita's children. Simple, unassuming, he is a man with natural sympathy for the awkwardness of kids, and takes pleasure in encouraging them. His pupils adore him, and most of the youngsters knock themselves out trying to please him.

At Grandpa's studio, Rebecca has a chance to be with other children like any normal eight-year-old. "Normal" is a word that could not be used to describe the life of the little girl up to now. Before she was born, on December 17, 1944, Rita had announced that she wanted a boy "just like his daddy—another Orson."

Rebecca's proud father declared that he wanted seventeen children. Nothing was said, then, about Christopher, his daughter by his first wife. Christopher is now eighteen and lives in North Africa with her mother, who is remarried to a British diplomat. Even Orson's best friends admit that he never has contributed consistently to the support of Christopher, although he has shown great interest in her during recent years and carries on a steady correspondence with her. He has displayed a similar attitude toward Rebecca, contributing little or nothing, financially, but showing concern for her welfare.

Even in the beginning, a hectic life eddied around Rebecca. During her first year of life, her parents raged and quarrelled. When Rebecca was four months old, Mrs. Volga Haworth Cansino died, and Rita was grief-stricken.

Work became an escape for the film star. Rita wanted to forget her personal life. She became feverishly active. A few days after Rebecca's first birthday, Rita told reporters she would keep working with the "exception of a few days during the Christmas holidays" which she planned to devote to her daughter.

Rita has always professed devotion to Rebecca. She has a great deal in common with other working mothers who are constantly torn from their children. Some of Rita's yearning that things might be different came out in her statement following her divorce from Orson Welles.

"Right now there is a young person named Rebecca Welles who means more to me than career or anything else. I will always be grateful that I have her. You don't know what it means to me to come home and have her put her arms around me and hug me. She's awfully smart, too."

Rita's alleged romance with Haymes is one of the latest items of Hollywood gossip—and it is amazing how much of that gossip is known to the small fry of Beverly Hills, who repeat to each other morsels overheard at home. Ugly reality and cynical wisdom can come during childhood in this tinselled town, and more than one famous parent has come to the point of asking, "What have I done?"

Rita, as everyone knows, has made mistakes of judgment, but not of the heart. No one knows how she may have suffered during the long hours of the night. Surely, her intention has not been to harm Rebecca.

Rita's turbulent existence—the demands of her career and her need to rest and relax between pictures—has kept her away from Rebecca four to six months of every year of the child's life. Yet she listened attentively five years ago to the counsel of Dr. Maurice Bernstein, a surgeon in Beverly Hills, who has been Rebecca's doctor since she was born and her former guardian. He advised Rita, "You are leaving Rebecca alone too much. I would suggest you spend more time with her. She cannot grow up normally and develop as she should without the love and attention of her mother. I feel that a child needs the closeness of her parents, and I strongly advise you to spend more time with Rebecca."

Rita probably did not intend to ignore Dr. Bernstein's advice. But her personal life was becoming more complicated and she was on her way to Europe again.

While she was abroad, the doctor and his wife, Hazel, did all that they could for Rebecca. The child's serious little face would light up when Dr. Bernstein made his daily visits. He provided toys and gifts from Orson Welles, who is the doctor's best friend. The doctor also brought drawings made by Orson in Paris, which delighted Rebecca, who enjoys a talent for art. The little girl must have felt that she was loved, even in her mother's absence. During the period that Rita was making international headlines, the doctor brought Rebecca steel bars, paints and brushes, a swing and a sandbox.

Rita provided every necessity and luxury for Rebecca, and did little to attempt to collect from Orson Welles the $50 weekly support awarded by the court. Frank Belcher, the attorney who represented Rita at that time, says that to the best of his knowledge the sum due Rita is now almost $15,000. Rita would never press Orson for the money, knowing that times were difficult for him.

Neither attorney Belcher nor Dr. Bernstein ever see the film star any more. Dr. Bernstein just shakes his head sadly and says, "Something has happened to that girl. What, I don't know. I am not allowed to see Rebecca any more, and I love her like my own. I write; I wire; all my communications are ignored. I don't know if the letters and gifts I send on to Rebecca from her father ever reach her. There is a wall. Rita seems to be so suspicious now."

When did the change in Rita begin? It is difficult to tell. She seldom associates with any of her old friends any more. Even so, her co-workers are still loyal to her and only reluctantly admit that she has changed.

MILLIONS of words were written about Rita's mad fling with the still-married Aly Khan, just as the presses are rolling now with stories about the still-married Dick Haymes. But in the midst of her idyll with Aly, Rita dashed home, took Rebecca and her nurse and kept them with her for several months.

While Rebecca was traveling with her mother, her father hoped for a chance to see her. When he learned that they were at Aly's Chateau L'Horizon, Orson sent Rita a wire stating that he wanted to see his daughter and giving the time of his intended arrival. He practically bought out the Paris toy shops. But when he reached the chateau, Rita, Rebecca and Aly were gone. Orson waited two days for Rebecca to return, amusing himself by playing with the toys he had brought. He waited in vain.

Finally, there was the belated wedding of Rita and Aly on May 27, 1949, six and one-half months before the royal birth of Princess Yasmin in Lausanne, Switzerland, on December 28, 1949.

This event was regarded as so important that it stopped traffic in Lausanne and made banner headlines in newspapers all over the world. There was some criticism of Rita by church and women's groups, but there was no condemnation of Rita at home by Dr. Bernstein. He waited patiently, regarding the Aly episode as a "fling." He hoped that Rita would have time for Rebecca, now that she no longer toiled before the cameras.

Instead, Rebecca was packed off to Gstaad, Switzerland, with her nurse shortly before Princess Rita's regal accouchement. The advent of Yasmin completely eclipsed Rebecca. Months went by while Rebecca waited in a lonely hotel for her mother to return. Meanwhile, the world press spewed millions of words over the birth of the Princess Yasmin.

Finally, in February, 1950, Rita and Aly joined Rebecca in Gstaad, and she no longer played alone in hotel corridors.

But the months that followed were no happier than before. Rita and Aly led a tumultuous life. Rita's old complaint against Orson—"he was not interested in making a home"—was also directed against Aly. Does Rita now see twice-married Dick Haymes as her future defender of the home?

WHILE she decides, Princess Yasmin, the $3,000,000 baby, and Rebecca are at home with the servants. Rita said that she needed a rest. She had been working hard at the studio for the last year. When she is making a picture, there is little time for her family. If she has an early call, she seldom can see the children before she goes to work. When she is not working, she sleeps late.

Only on weekends, when the warm, family-loving Cansinos gather at Rita's house for Sunday dinner, are they really together. When Rita is depressed and mistrustful of the glittering existence she has sought—then she turns to her family. And they come—father, aunts, uncles, brothers and in-laws. In Hollywood, where dependent relatives are the rule, Rita's family is a well-known exception.

It is a pity that Rita, who came from such a warm and loving family, has not succeeded in duplicating such a home life for herself. She has complained loudly of her husbands' lack of interest in "home life." Has she ever shown them what a loving home life is like? When she is busy with her torrid romances, doesn't she neglect her family?

Rebecca has needed protection from stupid people. More often than Princess Rita cares to remember, little Rebecca has overheard such careless remarks as, "Isn't it a shame she isn't as pretty as Yasmin? . . . too bad, she looks just like Orson . . . well, at least, people say she's smart. . . ."

Thoughtless "friends" have said these things. Rita's secretary, Margaret Parker, has shuddered as she saw the impact on little Rebecca, who has grown more and more silent, more and more given to bursts of temper and outright rebelliousness.

But four years ago Rita thought she had gilt-edged insurance on happiness for herself and Rebecca with marriage to the Prince of the Moslem world.

When Rita married Aly Khan her father remarked, "Now, all we know about Rita is what we read in the papers." Then he wrapped up a bottle of perfume and mailed it to his daughter as a wedding present.

FAMILY ties were renewed when Rita came home with Rebecca and Yasmin in tow. Rumor has it that she was absolutely broke. According to the stories, the film queen had spent her entire fortune during her two-year tenure as Princess Margarita, and she had to borrow $50,000 from her agents to get started again.

Even her hope for a settlement on the Princess Yasmin came to nothing. All she has is an empty court order awarding her $48,000 annually for Yasmin's support, signed by Judge A. J. Mastretti in a Reno courtroom. Announcement of the award drew this comment from her father-in-law, the Aga Khan: "Aly need not pay one penny, as the court order applies to Nevada, and, at most, to America, where Aly has no money."

Rita finds herself in the same position as thousands of other American mothers who are divorced and unable to collect support for their children from their ex-husbands. Fortunately, she has enough earning years left to be able to compensate for some of the income she has lost. But this film star has much more to recover than her fortune.

Rebecca Welles lives in her mother's shadow. When Rita devotes herself to making her daughter's life happier, she may find more contentment in her own life. Rita will learn that the sparkle in her child's eyes can outshine Aly's diamonds, her own name in lights, and the fleeting glow of romance.
